complotted secretly and conspired to surprise Capua out of the Tuscans hands. When the sacrifice H was done, the General of the army by his Pursevant at arms, commanded to cite and call forth by name, the noblest persons, either for parentage or acts atchieved: who were brought into the place aforesaid, one by one. Amongst other preparations of this sacred solemnity (which were able to strike a religious fear and devotion in a mans mind) there were certain altars erected in the midst of this place, lately covered in all parts, and sacrifices lying slain all about, and the Centurions standing round with their swords ready drawn. Then the souldier was caried to approach neer the altars (like a sacrifice himself, rather then one that should have his part of the sacrifice) and urged by vertue of an oath, to promise, that he would never utter abroad and reveal whatsoever he there should see or hear. Afterward he was put to swear, after an horrible and dreadful I form of words, framed and tending expresly to the curbing of his own person his house and all his race and linage, in case, he went not into any battel, whersoever the Generals should lead him, and if either himself fled out of the field, or saw any one to run away, and slew him not outright in the place. At the first verily, some there were that refused to take such an oath, and presently were massacred by the Altars side. And lying there along together with the beasts which had their throats cut for sacrifices, they served for a warning to teach all the rest how they made refusal. When the chief of the Samnits had taken this abominable and cursed oath, ten of them were elected and nominated by the soveraign Captain, who every one had in charge to chuse himself a fellow, and they likewise successively to take other to them, man by man, until they had made up the number of 16000. And these were called Linteata Legio [i. the linnen Legion] taking K the name of the covering of that inclosure, wherin the Nobility of the Samnits were sworn. These had given unto them brave and glorious armor, with helmets crested and plumed, because they should seem taller then the rest. Another army there was, consisting of twenty thousand and better, who neither in goodly and tall personage nor in martial prowess and reputation, nor yet in furniture and setting out, were inferiour to the linnen Legion aforesaid. Lo, what a number there was of fighting men, even the whole strength and manhood of all Samnium, assembled and encamped in Aquilonia.

The Roman Consuls took their journey from the City of Rome, and C. Carvilius first; unto whom were appointed the old Legions, which M. Attilius the Consul of the former year had left in the territory of Interamna. And with them he marched into Samnium. And mean while L that the enemies were over much busied and amused about their superstitious ceremonies, and held their secret and mystical counsels, he won by force from the Samnits, the town Amiternum. Where almost 2800. men were slain, and 4270. taken prisoners. But Papyrius, having by direction from the Senat enrolled a new army, forced the town Duronia; took fewer prisoners then his Collegue but in lieu thereof, put many more to the sword. A rich booty there was got, both in the one place and the other. Afterwards the Consuls overran the whole country of Samnium, but they pilled and wasted especially the lands about Atinium. Carvilius marched as far as Cominium, and Papyrius to Aquilonia, where the whole power of the Samnits lay encamped. There, for a good while they neither sat still, and were altogether idle in the camp, nor yet was there any hot service in the field. They spent the time in provoking them to fight, that gladly M would have sitten still; or in lying off and giving ground, to those that assailed them: and thus, I say, with threatning, rather then offering battel they passed the day. For whiles they began ever and anon and gave over as quickly, there was no issue seen of any skirmishes, & the decision even of small matters and occurrents were prolonged and put off from day to day. The other camp of the Romans lay twenty miles off: and albeit the other Consul was absent, yet his hand and counsel was in every enterprise and exploit. For as there lay a greater weight and charge at Aquilonia, then at Cominium: so Carvilius had a more careful eye that way, then to the place which himself besieged. L. Papirius being now at all points provided to fight, dispatched a messenger to his Collegue, to signifie unto him: that he minded the next day, if he were not checked by the Auspices to give the enemy battel: and withal, that it was expedient and needful that he likewise N should with all his forces assault Cominium; that the Samnits within, might have neither means nor leisure to send any succour to Aquilonia. This post had that one day allowed him to doe his message and attend his dispatch; and by night he made return, and brought word unto the Consul from his Collegue, that he liked well of his purpose and advice. Papyrius then immediatly dismissed and sent away the courrier aforesaid, and assembled his souldiers to an audience, where he discoursed at large concerning war in general. Much he spake also as touching the present preparation and magnificent furniture of the enemies, more brave and goodly for shew and ostentation then effectual and of importance in the end: "For they are not the plumed crests "(quoth he) that give the deadly wounds, but the Romans spear and lance it is, that is able to "pierce their guilded and damasked shields: yea, and that other glittering army with milk white O "diaper coats must be died red in blood, when they come to stroaks, and to try it out by dint "of sword. The golden and silvered armies of the Samnits, were sometimes by my father put "to the sword, and killed to the last man: and they served rather for rich spoils to honour the "victorious enemy, then for armor of proof, to defend and save themselves. This is a fatal gift, "and destined to our name and family, for to be chosen Generals, and to be opposed against the "greatest puissance and attempts of the Samnits, and to bring away with them, those spoils "which might be ornaments to beautifie the publick places of the City. And the immortal gods

Thus having ſhewed unto his ſouldiers (who were already of themſelvs badly and malitiouſly enough bent againſt the enemies) that he had certain intelligence of all theſe things, by the con-ſtant relation averred by certain fugitives that were fled from them unto him; they all being now full of aſſured hope of Gods help and mans, with one uniform cry called for battel: and nothing grieved them more then this, That it was put off until the morrow; hating in their hearts the reſt of that day behind, and that one night, for being ſo long. About mid-night, Papyrius having received letters back from his Collegue, gat him up cloſely when all were faſt aſleep, and ſent the chick-matter to take token, & obſerve the preſage of the pullets. There was not one throughout the whole camp, of what quality or degree ſoever but had a deſire to fight. The higheſt as C well as the loweſt were earneſt and eager: the Captains might behold and ſee the ſouldiers affection and courage that way, and the ſouldier likewiſe the Captains; in ſo much that the ſame ardent deſire of battel which was in all the reſt, reached alſo even to thoſe that had the charge of the Auſpices. For when as the chickens would not peck, the chick-maſter adventured to lye and falſifie the token, and made report to the Conſul, that it was * Tripudium ſoliſtimum. Whereat the Conſul right glad and joyous, pronounced that the token was lucky, and that they were to fight under the favour and conduct of the gods; and hereupon he put forth the ſignal or bloody banner of battel. As he was now marching forth into the field with his army, behold a fugitive out of the enemies camp, brought word, that twenty cohorts or companies of Samnits, and thoſe were about 400. in a cohort, were gone to Comtnium. And becauſe his Collegue Carvilius ſhould D not be ignorant hereof, he preſently diſpatched a currier in poſt unto him, and himſelf commanded the Enſigns and Standards to be advanced and ſet forward with ſpeed, ordaining the bands in the rereward for ſuccours, and diſpoſing them in divers places, with Captains over the ſame, accordingly. He appointed L. Volumnius to lead the right wing, and L. Scipio the left, and the horſemen he committed to the conduct of two other Lieutenants, C. Cedrius, and Trebonius.
As for Sp. Nautius, he charged him in all haſte to take off the pack-ſaddles from the Mules, and to mount the cohorts of the light armed footmen that ſerve in the wings, upon their backs, and with them to fetch a compaſs, and to ſeize upon an hill there in ſight, and in the heat of the conflict, to ſhew himſelf from thence, and to raiſe as great a cloud of duſt as poſſibly he could. Whiles the General was occupied hereabout, there aroſe ſome warbling amongſt the chicken-maſters E touching the Auſpice or preſage of that day; in ſo much as they were over-heard of the Roman horſemen; who ſuppoſing it a matter of good conſequence and to be regarded, advertiſed Sp. Pa-pyrius (the Conſuls Nephew, or Brothers Son) that there was ſome doubt and queſtion about the Auſpice. The youth born in thoſe days when there were no Atheiſts, nor Lectures read of deſpiſing God and Religion; enquired farther into the matter, becauſe he would not certifie any thing wherof he was not ſure: and when he had found out the truth, gave knowledg thereof to the Conſul: who ſaid thus unto him, "God bleſs thee my ſon, and be not thou diſmayed therat, "but fight hardly more valiantly, and do thy beſt endeavour. As for him that has the charge and
"overſight of the Birds and Auſpice, if he have made a wrong report, and given up a contrary
"preſage, or falſe ſign, all the miſchief and peril light upon his own head for his ſewd lye. As for me F "I was told of a Tripudium, and that the birds fell heartily to their meat: and I hold it for a lucky "Auſpice and token of good ſucceſs unto the people of Rome and the army, and for no other. This ſaid, he commanded the Centurions to ſet thoſe pulletors, in the forefront of the battel. The Sam-nits alſo for their part ſet forward their Enſigns, and their battaillons follow after gallantly ſet out in gorgeous armor and brave apparrel, in ſuch ſort, as the very ſight of the enemies repreſented a magnificent and ſtately ſhew to the beholders. But ſee what hapned; before the firſt ſhout given, before the firſt volly of ſhot and encounter, the principal Pulletier chanced to be ſtricken with a javelin, lanced at aventure and at random, and fell down dead even before the Enſigns. Which being reported unto the Conſul, "Behold the handy work of God (quoth he) the gods are preſent
"in this battel, the guilty perſon hath his due reward. And as the Conſul was a ſpeaking theſe G words, lo, juſt before him a Raven ſet out a wide clear throat, and cried with a loud note: at which Augury, the Coſ. rejoiced, and avowed, that the gods appeared never in mens affairs more evidently. And herewith he commanded the trumpets to ſound, and to ſet up a luſty ſhout: then followed a cruel and terrible fight on both ſides, but with hearts and courages far unlike. The Romans were raviſhed and carried on end to the battel, with anger, hope, and heat of conflict greedy of bathing their ſwords, and embruing their hands in the enemies bloodſhed. But the Samnits many of them by force of neceſſity, and conſtraint of a blind and ſuperſtitious religion, even a-gainſt their wills, were forced to make reſiſtance, and defend themſelves rather then to fight
and

* The chickens fell to their meat ſo eagerly, that with their haſty feeding, ſome corn fell from their bils to the ground, and rebounded againſt: and this was Tripudium ſoliſtimum, and in their learning was reputed the beſt Auſpicium in that kind, and preſaged moſt happy ſucceſs.

and offend the enemy. Neither had they ſuſtained and held out the firſt ſhout, charge and H ſhock of the Romans (as having now for certain years paſt been uſed ever more to go away defeated and vanquiſhed) but that a mightier fear imprinted and ſetled in their heart roots, held them perforce from running away: for they ever had continually repreſented in their eye, the whole furniture of that ſecret ſacrifice; of thoſe armed ſacrificers and Prieſts with naked ſwords; of that hideous butchery of men and of brute beaſts, lying ſlain one with another in their blood intermingled together; of the Altars beſprinkled and ſtained with the lawful ſhedding of the one, and the deteſtable effuſion of the other; of the dreadful and horrible execrations; and to conclude, of that frantick, furious, and deteſtable form of words, compoſed and deviſed to the deteſtation and malediction of their line and race. Being faſt bound, I ſay, with theſe bonds for fleeing a- I way, they ſtood to it, and ſtirred not back, fearing their own countrymen more then the enemies. The Romans from both points, and from the middle and main battaillon charged hotly, beat them down, killed and cut them in pieces, thus amazed and aſtonied as they were with dread of gods and awe of man. Small reſiſtance made they, as who only feared to flie and run away: ſo as by this time, there was execution and havock made of them almoſt to the very Standards. At which very inſtant, there appeared overthwart from the one ſide a duſt, as if a mighty army had raiſed it to their march; namely, Sp. Nautius (or as ſome ſay, Octavius Metius) who had the leading of certain Cohorts called Aleria, mounted upon Mules, which on purpoſe made a duſt greater, then for that number they were. For thoſe varlets and new horſemen, as they ſat on their Mules and Sumpter-beaſts, drew after them trailing on the ground, boughs of K trees full of branches and leaves: and firſt, there appeared in the fore-front (as it were, through a duskiſh and dim light) their armour and guidons: but the duſt behind them, riſing higher and thicker, made ſhew of a troop of horſemen ſtanked an army of footmen: wherewith not only the Samnits but Romans alſo were deceived. And the Conſul himſelf, to avow the error and bear them down it was ſo; cried aloud amongſt the formoſt Enſigns, ſo as his voice reached unto his enemies, That Cominium was won, and his Brother Conſul was come with victory; and therefore, they ſhould endeavour and enforce themſelves to get the day, before that another army ſhould win the honour out of their hands. Thus cried he out on horſeback galloping among the ranks to and fro. Then he commanded the Colonels and Centurions, to make a way for the men of arms. Himſelf afore, had willed Trebonius and Ceditius, that when they eſpied him to bear his ſpear upright and to ſhake it, then they ſhould with all the might they had, put forth the Cavalry and charge the enemies. Every thing was done at a beck, according as they were directed and inſtructed before-hand. The wayes were made wide between the files. The horſemen fling out, and with ſpear in reſt charge upon the middle battaillon of the enemies, and brake their arrayes whereſoever they charged. Volumnius and Scipio ſeconded them with the Infantry: and while they were diſarrayed overthrew them, and bare them to the ground. Down went theſe linnen Cohorts now, when God and man fought againſt them, and were diſcomfited: and as well thoſe that took the oath, and the other that were unſworn, fled amain; and without reſpect of one thing or other, feared none but their enemies. All the footmen that eſcaped the battel, were beaten into their camp at Aquilonia. The Gentlemen and the men of M arms fled toward Bovianum. The Cavalry of the Romans purſued the horſemen, and the Infantry chaſed the footmen. The wings took divers ways, the right toward the camp of the Samnits, the left unto the Town. V. Iamnius was ſomewhat before, and got the Camp. Scipio found more reſiſtance in the City: not for that vanquiſhed men, as they were, had more courage and reſolution, but becauſe that walls are ſtronger to endure an aſſault, and better to keep out armed men, then a plain trench and rampart. For, from the Courtine, with ſtones they beat and repulſed the enemy. Scipio foreſeeing well enough that they ſhould be longer about the aſſault of a ſtrong and fenced town unleſs he diſpatched the matter quickly and went through with it, in their firſt affright and confuſion, before they took heart again: demanded of his ſouldiers, If they could take it well, and abide to ſee the camp won by the other point of N the battel, and themſelves (being likewiſe Conquerors) to be repelled from the City Gates? When they all cried, No; and ſaid they would never endure that diſgrace: himſelf with his target over his head, approached the gate, the others following after under a target-ſenſe, ruſh into the City, thruſt down the Samnits about the Gate, and gat to the Walls: but to engage themſelves farther into the City, they durſt not, being ſo few as they were. The Conſul himſelfe at the firſt knew nothing of all this, but was occupied about the retreat, and rallying of his men: for now the ſun was well neer down; and the night comming on apace, cauſed every thing even to the very victors to ſeem dangerous and ſuſpicious. But when he was advanced farther, he ſaw on the right hand the camp taken: and on the left, he heard a confuſed cry and tumult in the City, compounded of the noiſe of fighting men, and frighted perſons: and even at that in- O ſtant, it fortuned, that they skirmiſhed at the gate. Then he rode on, neerer and neerer, and ſaw his own men upon the Walls, howbeit nothing yet fully performed: but through the raſh adventure and fool-hardineſs of ſome few, an overture only made, and ſome advantage got of performing a great piece of ſervice and worthy exploit. Whereupon, he commanded the forces that were retired to be called, and with banner diſplayed to enter the City. So ſoon as they were in, they took the next quarter to the Gate, and for that the night approached, there they reſted, and went no farther. But even in that very night, the enemies abandoned the Town.

There

A There were ſlain that day before Aquilonia 3034 o Samnits, and 3870 taken priſoners: and of field enſigns they went away with 90. Moreover, this is reported and recorded of Papyrius, that there had not been lightly ſeen a General in any battel more lightſome, chearfull, and merry; were it of his own natural diſpoſition, or upon aſſured confidence of victory. Upon which courage and reſolution, he could not be revoked from battel, albeit there was ſome queſtion and ſcruple about the Auſpice: and even in the hotteſt time, and dangerous point of the conflict, at what time as the manner is to vow temples to the immortal gods: he vowed unto Jupiter Victor, If ſo be that he defeated the Legions of the enemies, to preſent him with a cup of a ſweet and pleaſant mead before he drank any ſtrong and heady wine of the grape: which vow the gods accepted and B liked of, and turned the ill preſage of the Auſpices to good.

The other Conſull had as good ſpeed at Cominium: For at the break of day he approached with all his forces to the wals of the town, and inveſted it round about: and ſet ſtrong guards at the gates, for fear they ſhould iſſue or ſally forth. And even as he was about to give the ſignall of aſſault, there came a meſſenger poſt from his fellow Conſ. who in great affright brought word of the coming of twenty cohorts to the ſuccour of them within the City: which both kept him ſhort from giving the aſſault, and cauſed him to call back again part of his forces, which were arranged and ready under the counterſcarp to aſſail the defendants. Then he gave charge to Decius Bratus Scæva, one of the Lieutenants, to take the firſt legion and twenty cohorts of the wings, and other horſemen, to make head againſt the reſcue of the enemies aforeſaid; and whereſoever he C met them, there to impeach them, yea, and if occaſion ſerved, to give them battel; and in no caſe to ſuffer that power to come to Cominium. Himſelf commanded that ladders ſhould be reared on every ſide of the town, and under a fence of targets approached the gates. So that in an inſtant the gates were burſt open, and the wals ſcaled on every part. The Samnits, as their hearts ſerved them well enough to keep the enemies from entrance, before they ſaw any armed men upon the wals: ſo, after they perceived, that they were aſſailed not aloof with ſtones and darts, but faſt by and with hand-ſtrokes: and how that they, who hardly and with great difficulty from the plain gat up the wals, having now gained and ſurmounted the place (which they moſt feared before) could fight at eaſe from aloft with their enemy, who was not able to match them in the even ground; quit their towers and wals, and gathered all together in the market place, and there for D a while tried the utmoſt hazard of battel. But afterwards throwing down their weapons, 15400 of them yielded themſelves to the Conſul his mercy. There were ſlain 4380. Thus went the game at Cominium, and thus at Aquilonia.

In the mid way between theſe two Cities, where a third battel was looked for, the enemies were not to be found. And when they were ſeven miles off from Cominium, they had a countermand from their own country-men, and were called away, and ſo came not to the reſcue, neither in the one battell nor the other. In the ſhutting in of the evening, when it began to be dark, being within the ſight of the Camp of one hand, and Aquilonia on the other; they might hear a like noiſe and cry from both parts, which cauſed them to pauſe. But afterwards, when they were over-againſt the Camp which was fired by the Romans; the flame ſpreading far E abroad declared the defeat of the Samnits more evidently, and ſtaied them there for going farther. In which very place they laid down here and there in their armour (as they were) and paſſed a reſtleſs and unquiet long night, expecting (and yet fearing) the light of the day. At the dawning whereof, and ſo ſoon as it began to peep, while they were uncertain and doubtfull what way to take, they hapned to be diſcovered by the cavalry of the enemies: and ſuddenly in a fearfull amaze and affright, they took them to their heels and fled in great diſorder. Thoſe horſemen having purſued the Samnits, who in the night ſeaſon eſcaped out of the town, chanced to eſpy this foreſaid multitude, and perceived they were neither entrenched, nor defended with a good corps de guard. This company was deſcried alſo even from the wals of Aquilonia: whereupon, by this time the legionary footmen likewiſe made after them; but they could not overtake F them in the chaſe, ſo faſt they fled: howbeit the horſemen cut off ſome, and ſlew two hundred and fourſcore in the tail of the rereguard. In this affright they left much armour behind them, and eighteen enſigns, and ſo the reſt of the army ſaved themſelves, and as well as they might in ſo fearfull confuſion, recovered Bovianum. The joy of theſe two Romans armies was wonderfully encreaſed, to ſee one another have ſo good and fortunate ſucceſs in their enterpriſes. Both the Conſuls, by each others advice and conſent, gave their towns thus won unto the ſouldiers to be ſacked and rifled: and after the goods were out, to ſet fire on the empty houſes; in ſuch wiſe, that in one and the ſame day both Aquilonia and Cominium were burnt to aſhes: and the Conſuls, with mutuall congratulation and joy, as well between their Legions as themſelves, feaſting one another joyned both their Camps in one. Afterwards in the ſight of both Armies, Carvilius highly G commended and praiſed his ſouldiers every one as he deſerved, and rewarded them with gifts accordingly. Papyrius alſo for his part, who had performed many and ſundry skirmiſhes as well in the field and battel, as about the winning of the Camp and forcing the City, beſtowed by way of honour upon Sp. Nautius, and Sp. Papyrius his brothers ſon, as alſo upon four Centurions and the band of the Haſtati or Javelineers, bracelets and coronets of gold: and namely, Nautius for that he bare himſelf ſo worthily in that journey and expedition, wherein with his counterfeit troop of horſemen upon Mules, he ſo terrified the enemy, as if he had conducted a main army of men at armes: and young Papyrius for his good ſervice with his cavalry as well in the battel and conflict, as alſo in that night, wherein he forced the Samnits to flie ſecretly, and quit the City Aquilonia: the Centurions and ſouldiers, in this regard, that they were the firſt who ſeized the gates and wals of that town: as for all the horſemen, in conſideration of their manifold travell, and brave exploits ſhewed in ſundry places, he gave them bracelets and little horns of ſilver. This done, foraſmuch as it was time now to withdraw their army from out of Samnium, either both twain, or one of them alone; they ſate in Counſil and conſultation thereupon: and thought it was the better courſe (to the end that the Samnits might be brought lower, and their ſtate more ſenſibly decayed) to go forwad ſtill, and charge them with greater force and reſolution, and to purſue the reſt that was behind; that Samnium might be delivered up to the Conſuls their ſucceſſors, utterly tamed and ſubdued: ſince that the enemies now had no army abroad in field, like either to give or abide another battel; and there remained but one manner of making war, even to beſiege and aſſault their Cities and ſtrong Towns; by the winning and ſubverſion whereof, they might with the pillage enrich and make their own ſouldiers for ever; and withall impoveriſh their enemies, and make a hand of them quite, being now at the laſt caſt, forced to fight for Church and Home. Hereupon the Conſuls diſpatched their letters to the Senat and people of Rome, containing the effect at large of all their exploits; and then divided themſelves, and took two ſeverall waies: Papyrius marched with his legions to the ſiege of Sepinum; and Carvilius with his to beſiege Volana.

The Conſuls letters were read and heard with exceeding joy, as well in the court of the Counci'l of the City, as in the Common Hall of aſſemblies; and this publike contentment and rejoycing was ſolemnized with generall proceſſions, for the ſpace of four daies, and with marvellous zeal, affection, and devotion of private perſons in particular. And to ſay a truth, this victory was to the ſtate of Rome not only great and honourable, but alſo of great conſequence, in regard that it fell out in ſo good and commodious a time. For even then, news came, that Tuſcany was revolted and rebelled, and men began to caſt in their minds, and diſcourſe how they ſhould do (in caſe ought ſhould hap but well in Samnium) to withſtand the forces and invaſions of the Tuſcans: who taking heart, and preſuming upon the Samnits, and their curſed and execrable oath, by vertue whereof they were obliged to fight to the utmoſt extremity, embraced the occaſion and opportunity of taking armes again, whiles both the Conſuls and the whole forces of Rome were diverted and withdrawn into Samnium and there employed. The Embaſſadors of their allies and confederats, were by M. Attilius the Prætor brought into the Senat, and had audience given them; where they complained, that their Territories were over-run, burnt, and ſpoyled by the Tuſcans their next neighbours; and all becauſe they were unwilling to revolt from the people of Rome: humbly beſeeching the LL. of the Senate, to defend and protect them againſt the violence, wrong, and outrage of common enemies. Anſwer was returned unto the Embaſſadors: That the Senate would have regard, that their allies ſhould have no cauſe to repent of their faithfull allegeance, and conſtant loyalty; and that ere many daies went over their heads, the Tuſcans ſhould taſte of the ſame cup that the Samnits had begun unto them. Howbeit, they would have been ſlack and cold enough in dealing with the Tuſcans, had not freſh news come, that the Faliſci alſo, who had for many years continued in amity and friendſhip with the people of Rome, were combined with the the Tuſcans, and entred into arms, as well as they. The near neighbourhood of this nation, gave an edge to the Senators, and whet them on, to take care and ordain, that their Fetiall Heralds ſhould be addreſſed thither to demand reſtitution and amends for harms done: which being denied, and no goods reſtored; by the advice and authority of the Senat, together with the grant of the people, war was proclamed againſt the Tuſcans: and the Conſuls were commanded to caſt lots, whether of them ſhould paſs out of Samnium with his forces, into Tuſcany.

By this time now Carvilius had won Volana, Palumbinum, and Herculaneum, towns appertaining to the Samnits. Volana was forced within few daies: Palumbinum, the ſame day that he came before the wals: but at Herculaneum, he fought two ſeverall battels, with doubtfull and uncertain iſſue, yea, and with more loſs of his own part than of the enemies. But afterwards, he pitched his camp before the town, beleaguered the enemies, and kept them within their walls, gave the aſſault, and won it in the end. In theſe three towns there were either taken priſoners or ſlain in all, to the number of ten thouſand: but ſo as through fear the greater part by far, ſuffered themſelves to be captives, rather then to dye on the edge of the ſword.

The Conſuls caſt lots for their Provinces; and it fell unto Carvilius to go into Tuſcany, as the ſouldiers wiſhed and deſired, who could no longer away with the rigour of cold weather in Samnium. As for Papirius, he found a greater power of enemies, and more reſiſtance, before Sepinum. Many a time he was fought withall in battell arranged: oft skirmiſhed with in his march: yea, and oftentimes under the very walls, the enemies ſallied out againſt him from the Town, in ſuch ſort as he could not tell what to make of it: for neither was it to be called properly a ſiege alone, nor yet altogether a battell fight; conſidering that the enemies were no more protected and covered themſelves, by the ſtrength of their walls; than the walls were defended by force of arms, and men of war: howbeit in the end, what with fighting and what with skirmiſhing, he lodged them within the City ſo as they durſt come abroad no more, but kept themſelves cloſe, and were beſieged indeed: and after long ſiege, as well with forcible aſſaults, as by trenches, baſtils, and rampiers, he was maſter of the town: and therefore after he was poſſeſſed of it, upon anger and choler

A choler that they had ſo long ſtood out and put him to ſo much trouble, that there was more bloud-ſhed; and ſeven thouſand died by the ſword, whereas under three thouſand were taken priſoners. The ſpoil and pillage, which was exceeding great, conſidering that the Samnits had laid up all their gods in ſome few Cities, was given to the ſouldiers. And now lay the ſnow thick all over upon the ground: neither could men endure abroad in the field without houſe and harbor: and thereupon the Conſul retired his Army out of Samnium. Againſt his comming to Rome, it was decreed by the general voice of all men, that he ſhould triumph: and ſo he triumphed whiles he was in his Magiſtracy, with great magnificence, and ſumptuous pomp, as thoſe daies would afford. For as well his footmen as horſemen marched and paſſed by in a ſhew, adorned with their B gift and prizes of honour. Many a civick, vallare and *murale garland was ſeen worn that day. Much looking and wondring there was at the ſpoils alſo of the Samnits armour and apparel: for with their goodly beauty and glorious hue, were they comparable to thoſe that his father had won before him, which were commonly ſeen, and well known in the publike places of the City, adorned and beautified therewith. Moreover, there were led before him in this triumph and pompous entrance of his into the City, certain captives and priſoners of noble bloud deſcended, men of great worth ſometime, and name, as well for their own deeds, as their fathers acts. Great ſtore of Braſs Bullion in Ingots, and not coined, was carried in ſhew, amounting to the weight of *2009533 pound: which maſs of braſs or copper was raiſed of the ranſome of priſoners. But the ſilver which was got in the ſaccage of the towns came to *1330 pound weight and above. All C the braſs and ſilver was laid up in the common Treaſury of the City, and nothing at all of the whole booty given to the ſouldiers: and the diſcontentment and heart-burning that grew thereby, was ſo much the greater in the common people, by reaſon they were charged beſides with an exaction and contribution for ſouldiers pay; whereas if the Conſul had not upon a vain-glorious humour brought into the City-Chamber, ſuch ſums which he had gained from the enemy there might a good portion thereof have been beſtowed freely amongſt the ſouldiers, & of the ſurpluſſage their due wages paid and diſpatched. Moreover, whiles he was Conſul, he dedicated the Temple of Quirinus, which his father, being Dictator, had vowed: for, that himſelf vowed it in the very time of the battel, I find not in any ancient writer; and certainly in ſo ſhort a ſpace, he could not poſſibly have built and finiſhed it. He trimmed it beſides, and garniſhed it with D the ſpoils of the enemies, whereof there was ſuch ſtore and abundance, that not only the foreſaid Temple and the market-place were therewith ſet out and bravely decked, but they were diſtributed abroad to their allies alſo and Coloners, near inhabitants, for the decoration and beautifying of their Churches and publike places. After the triumph ended, he brought his Army to winter in the Territory of the Veſtins, becauſe thoſe quarters were diſtreſſed and annoied by the Samnits.

In this mean while, Carvilius the Conſul, having at his firſt coming given the aſſault unto Troilium, a City in Tuſcany, granted licenſe to 470 of the richeſt Citizens, to depart from thence and by compoſition, to pay a great ſum of money unto him. The reſt of the multitude fell into his hands, after he had won the town by mere force. This done, he fortified five Caſtles, ſituate in places
E of great ſtrength: where were ſlain of enemies 2400, and not all out 2000 taken priſoners. He granted to the Faliſci (who ſued for peace) truce for one year, and yet to make preſent payment of *100000 Aſſes, and to diſcharge the ſouldiers wages for that year. After theſe exploits atchieved, he departed to his triumph: which as it was leſs honourable and glorious than that o-ther of his companion in government, in regard of the ſervice performed againſt the Samnits: ſo, if we conſider withall, the Tuſcan war, it was equal and comparable unto it every way. Of braſs money he brought into the common Cheſt *300090 pound: of the ſurpluſſage of the pillage and other ſpoils, he cauſed the Chappel of Fors Fortuna to be built, neat unto the Temple of the fame goddeſs, dedicated by King Servius Tullus. To the ſouldiers that ſerved on foot, he gave of his booty *102 Aſſes a piece, and twice as much to every Centurion and horſeman. Which re-F ward they accepted more thankfully at his hands, by reaſon of the nigardice and miſery of his Collegue before him. And ſo gracious was this Conſul, that he protected and ſaved L. Volumnius, one of his Lieutenants, againſt the people: who being arreſted and called to his anſwer by M. Caucius, a Tribune of the Commons, fled for his laſt help, to his Lieutenantſhip (as they ſay) and avoided thereby the danger of their judgement: for that during his abſence in that charge, his accuſation might well be ſet on foot and followed, but brought to a final end and definitive ſentence, it could not be.

After this year expired, the new Tribunes of the Commons entred their office: and for that there was ſuppoſed ſome errour in their creation, the fifth day after were other choſen in their ſtead. The ſame year there was a Luſtrum or ſolemn ſurvey of the City, held by P. Cornelius Arvi-
G na, and C. Martius Rutilius Cenſors. In which were numbred and aſſeſſed 262322 pols of Roman Citizens. Theſe were in order the ſix and twentieth Cenſors from the beginning: and this was reckoned the nineteenth Luſtrum after the firſt inſtitution. In this year, and never before, the ſpectators of the Roman Games and Plaies, in regard of their happy ſucceſs in wars, ſtood adorned with wreaths and garlands of flowers upon their heads: and then came up the faſhion at Rome, borrowed from the manner and cuſtome of Greece, to honour thoſe with branches of the date tree, who won the prizes, and were victors in thoſe ſolemn Games.

The ſame year the Ædiles Curule, who exhibited the ſaid paſtimes and exerciſes of activity,

* For ſaving of a Citizens life in battel, made of graſs.
* For mounting firſt over the rampier of the enemies Camp, faſhioned like the pales in a rampier.

paved the cauſey or high-way with flint or pibble ſtone, from the Temple of Mars unto Boville: H and the fines of certain Publicans or farmers of the City, that were graſiers and condemned, paid the charges. Then Papyrius held the great Aſſembly for election of new Conſuls, and created Q. Fabius Gurges the ſon of Maximus, and D. Junius Brutus Sceva, Conſuls. Papyrius himſelf was choſen Prætor. This year, ſo joious and fortunate in many reſpects, could hardly countervail and recompence with all other comforts, one only calamity, namely, a peſtilence and mortality, which conſumed and devoured both town and country. Inſomuch, as for the ſtrangeneſs and extremity thereof, it was held for a prodigious and portentous ſign beyond all courſe of nature, and reach of reaſon. Whereupon, the books of Sibylla were peruſed, to know out of them, what iſſue and remedy the gods would vouchſafe to ſhew of this malady and miſery. Wherein they found, I that the Image of Æſculapius muſt be ſent for, from as far as * Epidaurus to Rome. But for that by year, reaſon that the Conſuls were buſied in the wars, nothing was done, but only one day beſtowed wholly in ſupplications and devout Letanies, to the honour of the ſaid god Æſculapius.

WHen Fabius Gurges the Conſul, had fought an infortunate battell againſt the Samnits, and the Senate were about to diſcharge and remove him from his Army; Fabius Maximus his father, beſought them for his ſake, not to offer him that diſgrace and diſhonour. For rather than that ſhould come to paſs, he promiſed to ſerve in perſon under his ſon in quality of his Lieutenant. Which moved the Senate, and prevaled more than any thing elſe. And he was his words maſter. For he went to the field, and by his means and good advice, the Conſul his ſon was ſo well aſſiſted, that he defeated the Samnits, triumphed over them, led captive before his triumphant Chariot C. Pontius, Lord General of the Samnits, and afterwards ſtruck off his head. Whiles the City [of Rome] was pitiouſ- M ly viſited and afflicted with the plague, there were certain Embaſſadors addreſſed and ſent to Epidaurus, for to tranſlate the Image of Æſculapius from thence to Rome. And inſtead thereof they brought away a great ſnake or ſerpent, which of it ſelf embarked in their ſhip, and wherein they were verily perſwaded, that the puiſſance and divine power of the ſaid god was reſident. And when they had conducted it with them by ſea as far as to Rome, it went forth of its own accord, and ſwam to the Iſland within Tyberis, where it ſetled: and in that very place where it took land, they erected a Temple to Æſculapius. Three Colonies were erected, and peopled, to wit,* Caſtrum, Sena, and Adria. *The three Triumvirs to ſit upon capitall crimes were then firſt created. # The one and twentieth book of T. Livius.

THe ſame may I well ſay, in the Præface and entrance of this one part of my work, which moſt writers of hiſtories have promiſed and made profeſſion of, in the beginning of the whole, to wit, That I will write the moſt famous and memorable war that ever was, even that, which the Carthaginians under the conduct of Annibal fought with the people & State of Rome. For neither any other Cities or Nations are known to have warred together more wealthy and puiſſant than they; nor at any time ever were they themſelves ſo great, ſo I ſtrong in forces, and ſo mighty in means, as now they were. Moreover, they came not newly now, to wage war, without knowledge of the proweſs and martiall skill, one of another; for trial they had made thereof ſufficient already, in the firſt punick war. Beſides, ſo variable was the fortune of the field, ſo doubtfully were their battels fought, that neerer loſs and danger were they, who in the end won the better, and atchieved the victory. And to conclude, if a man obſerve the whole courſe and proceeding of theſe their wars, their malice and hatred was greater in a manner than their forces: whiles the Romans took foul ſcorn and diſdain that they, whoſe hap before was to be vanquiſhed, ſhould unprovoked begin war afreſh with the Conquerors; and the Carthaginians were as male-content, and throughly offended, as taking themſelves (notwithſtanding they were overcome) to be abuſed too much at their hands by their proud, inſolent, and covetous rule over K them. Over and beſides all this, the report goeth, that Annibal being but nine years old, or thereabout, came fawning and flattering as wanton children do to his father Amilcar, that he would take him with him into Spain, at what time, as after the Affrican war ended, his father was offering ſacrifice, ready to paſs over thither with an army: where he was brought to the altar ſide, and induced to lay his hand thereupon, and to touch the ſacrifice, and ſo to ſwear, that ſo ſoon as ever he were able, he would be a profeſſed and mortal enemy to the people of Rome. Vexed (no doubt) at the heart, was Amilcar himſelf, a man of high ſpirit and great courage, for the loſs of the Iſlands Sicily and Sardinia: for not only Sicily was overhaſtily yielded (as he thought) as deſpairing too ſoon of the ſtate thereof, and doubting how it ſhould be defended: but alſo Sardinia was by the cunning and fraudulent practice of the Romans ſurprized out of the Carthaginians hands, L whiles they were troubled with the commotion and rebellion of Affrick; and a Tribute beſides impoſed upon them. He being diſquieted, I ſay, and troubled with theſe griefs and diſcontents, ſo bare himſelf for five years ſpace in the Affrick war, which inſued immediatly upon the peace concluded with the Romans; and likewiſe after, in Spain, for nine years together, enlarging ever ſtill the dominion of Carthage; that all the world might ſee, he intended and deſigned a greater war than that he had in hand; and if God had ſpared him longer life, it ſhould have been well ſeen that the Carthaginians under the leading of Amilcar, would have made that war upon Italy, which afterward they waged by the conduct of Annibal. But the death of Amilcar hapning in ſo good ſeaſon [for the Romans] and the childhood and tender nonage of Annibal together, were the cauſe that this war was put off and deferred. In the mean time, between the father and the ſon, Aſdrubal M bare all the rule for the ſpace almoſt of eight years. This Aſdrubal had been Amilcar his minion, grown highly into his grace and favour, at the firſt (as men ſay) for the very prime and flower of his youth: but afterwards, in regard of the ſingular towardneſs of a brave and haughty mind, which ſoon appeared in him, and for his forwardneſs to action, he was preferred to be his ſon in law, and married his daughter. Now, foraſmuch as he was Amilcar his ſon in law, he was advanced to the ſoveraign conduct of the war, with no good liking at all and conſent of the Nobility and Peers, but by the means and favour only of the Barchin faction, which bare a great ſtroke, and might do all in all, among the ſouldiers and the common people. Who managed all his affairs, more by policy and ſage counſell, than by force and violence: and uſing the authority and name of the Princes and great Lords of thoſe countries, and by entertaining friendſhip with the chief N Rulers, won daily the hearts of new nations ſtill, and by that means enlarged the power and ſeignory of the Carthaginians in Spain, rather than by any war and force of arms. But for all this peace with forrein States, he was never the more ſure of his own life at home. For a certain barbarous fellow, for anger that his Maſter and Lord was put to death, ſlew him in open place: and being laid hold on by them that were attendant about Aſdrubal his perſon, he kept the ſame countenance ſtill, as if he had eſcaped and gone clear away: yea, and when he was by cruell torments all mangled and torn, he looked ſo cheerfully and pleaſantly on the matter, as if he had ſeemed to ſmile; ſo far his joy of heart ſurpaſſed the pains and anguiſh of his body. With this Aſdrubal, for that he had ſo ſingular a gift and wonderfull dexterity, in ſolliciting and annexing unto his dominion the nations aforeſaid, the people of Rome had renewed the League, upon theſe two capitulati- O ons and conditions; firſt, that the river * Iberus ſhould limit and determine the ſeignories of them both: Item, that the Saguntins, ſeated in the midſt between the territories of both nations, ſhould remain free, and enjoy their ancient liberties.

The wonderfull conſtancy and reſolution of a ſlave.

No doubt at all there was now, but when a new Commander ſhould ſucceed in the room of Aſdrubal, the favour of the people would go clear with the prerogative voice and choice of the ſouldiers: who preſently brought young Annibal into the Generall his pavilion, and with exceeding

A ding great acclamation and accord of all, saluted him by the name of Captain General. For this you must understand, that Asdrubal by his letters missive had sent for him, being very young, and hardly fourteen years of age; yea, and the matter was debated first in the Council-House at Carthage, where they of the *Barchine side laboured and followed the matter earnestly, that Annibal should be trained in warfare, and grow up to succeed his father in equall prowess & greatness. But Hanno the chiefe man of the contrary faction; "It is but meet and reason (quoth he) "that Asdrubal doth demand: and yet for mine own part I think it not good, that his request "should be granted. When they mused and marvelled much at this so doubtfull speech of his, and wist not what construction to make of it. "Why then (quoth Hanno) to be plain, That flour B "and beauty of youth, which Asdrubal himself yielded and parted withall sometimes unto An-
"nibals father, for to use or abuse at his pleasure: the same he thinketh by good right he may "challenge and have again, from the son, to make quittance. But it beseemeth not us for to ac-"quaint our young youths with the Camp, that under the colour, and instead of their military in-"stitution and teaching, they abandon and give their bodies to serve the lust and appetite of the "Generals, What? Is this the thing we fear, That the son of Amilcar should tarry too long ere
"he see the excessive grandeur and soveraignty of his father, and the stately shew as it were of his "royalty? Or doubt we, that we shall not soon enough serve in all dutifull allegeance his natu-"rall son, unto whose son in law, all our Armies have been left (as it were) in lawfull right of in-"heritance? Nay, I am of opinion, and this is my judgment, That this youth be kept in awe at C "home, under obedience of lawes, under civill Magistrates, and learn a while to live in equall con-"dition with the rest of the Citizens and subjects: for fear lest at one time or other, this little "spark do burn outright, and raise a mighty flame. A few, and those were, in a manner, all of the best sort and soundest judgment, accorded with Hanno. But, as commonly it is seen, the greater number over-weighed the better.

Thus Annibal was sent into Spain, and immediately at his first coming, drew all the whole army after him; so highly he was regarded and beloved. The old souldiers beleeved verily that Amilcar was alive again, and come amongst them: they thought they beheld and saw the same vigour and spirit in his countenance & visage, the same quickness and liveliness in his eyes, the same proportion, feature and lineaments of his face. And afterwards, within short time, he had so D wrought and wound himself into their favour, that the late rememembrance of his father was the least matter of all others, that won him grace and love among them. Never was there one and the self-same nature, framed and fitted better, for two things that are in quality most contrary; namely, to rule, and to obey. Whereby, a man could hardly discern and judge, whether he was more dear unto the General for the one, or to the Army for the other. For neither Asdrubal would make choice of any one before him, when there was some valiant service or brave exploit to be executed: nor the souldiers put more confidence in any other Leader, nor go more boldly and resolutely to any enterprise, than under him. Most forward he was and hardy to all hazards
E and dangerous adventures: right provident and wary again, at the very point of perill and jeopardy. No travell was able to weary and tire his body: no pains-taking could daunt and break his heart. He could away with heat and cold alike. For his diet and feeding, he measured both his meat and drink by his naturall appetite, and not by pleasure and delightsome taste. For sleeping, for waking, day and night was all one with him. When he had once performed his service, and finished his exploit; if there were any spare time after, therein would he take his rest and repose: and that should not be upon a soft bed neither, nor procured with great curiosity by still silence, and making no noise about him. Full often many a man hath seen him lying on the hard and bare ground, under a good souldiers jacket and homely cassock cast over him, even among the sentinels and corps de guard. For his apparel, it was not more costly nor braver than his fellows and companions: mary, in his armour and horses he loved ever to be goodly be-seen above all other. Amongst footmen and horsemen both, he would alwaies be a great way formost. And to F conclude in giving a charge upon the enemy, and to begin to battell, he was by his good will ever the first: and when the fight was done, the last man seen to retire out of the field. Of these so noble qualities and manly vertues, he had not so many, but there were as great vices and imperfections in him again, to counterpoise the same. Cruelty most savage and inhumane, falshood and treachery more than *Punick: no truth, no honesty, no fear of God, no regard of oath, no conscience, nor religion.

Disposed thus as he was, and inclined by nature, to vertues, and vices, he served full three years under General Asdrubal. During which time, he omitted and forgat no one thing that was meet either to be executed or enterprised by a man that was himself another day to be a Captain and chief Commander in the wars. From the very first day that he was chosen and declared Lord Ge-G nerall; as if at the same instant, Italy had been the Province assigned unto him, as if, I say, he had received Commission to war with the Romans, he thought good to make no delaies, for fear lest haply whiles he lingred and slacked the time, some mischance might prevent his designs and cut him short, like as it had overtaken his father first, and Asdrubal afterwards: but present-determined to make war upon the Saguntines, by assailing whom, the Romans no doubt were touched, and would take arms and enter into the quarrel. But first he led his army into the marches of the *Olcades (a nation beyond Iberus, rather siding and taking part with the Carthaginians, than under their jurisdiction) that he might not seem to have shot at the Saguntins and intended intended ought against them directly: but that by order and course of his affairs, after he had H subdued the countries bordering upon them, he had been drawn (as it were) for vicinity and he wan by force, and sacked b Carteia, a rich City, the seat town and chief place of all that nation.

Whereupon, other meaner and smaller Cities also, for fear came under his obedience, and yielded to pay tribute. His Army then after these victories, and enriched with spoil and pillage, was brought back to new c Carthage, there for to winter. Where he made sure unto him the hearts and affectionate love, as well of his own countrymen as of the allies, partly, by bestowing the pillage liberally among them, and partly, by making true paiment of souldiers wages for the time past. And then in the very prime of the spring, he went forward to war upon the d Vaccei. He for- I ced by assault e Hermandica and Arbacula, two Towns of the f Cartei. Arbacula by the manhood and multitude of the Townsmen held out a long time. But certain fugitives that were fled from Hermandica, having rallied themselves, and joyned with other exiled persons of the Olcades, a nation the summer before subdued, raised also the g Carpetans to take arms: and set upon Anni- bal, in his return from the Vaccei; and not far from the river h Tagus, troubled and disordred his march, heavily charged with spoil and booty. Annibal forbare to fight, and encamped himself upon the bank of the river: and so soon as the enemies were in their first sleep, and all still and husht, passed over with his Army at the foord: and after he had pitched his Camp so far off from the river side, as that his enemies might have room enough to march away besides him, he determined to set upon them as they should pass over the river: To his horsemen he gave com- K mandment to charge upon the Regiment of footmen, so soon as they perceived them to have taken the water: and upon the bank he arranged forty Elephants afront them. There were of the Carpetans, counting the aids and succours of the Olcades and Vaccei, 100000 strong: an Army invincible, if they had fought on even and indifferent ground. Who being both by nature fierce and couragious, and for multitude confident; presumptuous besides upon their imagination that the enemy was retired for fear; supposed that the only stay of their victory was, because the river ran between: and setting up a shout and out-cry, without direction of any Leader, in all disorder they ran into the river here and there, every man what way was next him. Now from the other side of the bank, a great troop of horsemen were entred into the river, encountred them in the midst of the channel and fought with great advantage. For whereas the footmen unsteady L and not able to keep fast footing, and hardly trusting the foord, might easily be cast aside and overturned, even by naked horsemen if they did but put forth and prick forward their horses it skilled not how: the horsemen on the other side having their bodies at liberty, and able to wield their weapon, with their horses under them standing sure even in the midst of the stream and whirlpools, might with ease either fight close hand to hand, or assail the enemies aloof. Many of them besides perished in the water: some by the whirling waves of the river were driven upon the enemies, and by the Elephants trodden under foot, and crushed to death. The hindmost, who might with more safety recover their own bank, after they were rallied together into one from divers places, as fear had scattered them; before they could upon so great a fright, take heart and come again to themselves, Annibal who with a four-square battaillon had entred the river, forced to M flie from the bank: and when he had wasted the country, within few daies brought the Carpe-tans also under his obedience.

And now all beyond Iberus was subject to the Carthaginians, the Saguntins only excepted.
With whom as yet he would not seem to war: howbeit, to minister some cause and occasion thereof, quarrels were picked, and seeds of dissentions sown between them and their neighbors, namely the * Turdetans. Unto whose aid, when he was come, that was himself the sower of all the variance, and had set them together by the ears; and when it appeared plainly that it was not a matter of right to be tried by law, but an occasion rather sought of fight and open war; then the Saguntins sent their Embassadors to Rome, for to crave aid against that war, which doubtless was at hand. The Consuls at that time of Rome, were P. Cornelius Scipio, and Titus Sempronius N Longus, who having brought the Embassadors into the Councill House, and proposed matters unto the LL. there, concerning the weal publike, and decreed to send their Embassadors into Spain to take survey, and looh into the state of their allies: who also if they thought it meet, should give Annibal warning, not to meddle with their confederats, and molest the Saguntins; and withall, to sail over to Carthage into Affrick, and there make relation of the complaints and grievances of the allies of the people of Rome: when, I say, this Embassage was decreed, but yet not sent, news came sooner than all men looked for, that * Saguntum was already besieged. Then was the matter propounded new again before the Senate. Some were of mind to dispatch the Consuls unto the Provinces of Spain and Affrick, with commission to make war both by sea and land.
Others thought better to bend all their forces wholly into Spain against Annibal. There were a- O gain of opinion, that so great and weighty an enterprise was not hand over head, and rashly to be attempted; but rather that they should attend the return of the Embassadors out of Spain: and this advice that seemed most safe, was held for the better, and took place. And therefore so much the sooner were these Embassadors P. Valerius Flaccus, and Q. Bebius Pamphilus, addressed unto Annibal before Saguntum, with direction, from thence to go forward to Carthage (in case he would not desist and give over war) and for to demand the Captain himself, for amends and satisfaction of breaking the league. But whiles the Romans were amused about these consultations & decrees,

A decrees, Saguntum was by this time with all forcible means assaulted. This City of all other most wealthy and rich, stood beyond Iberus, situate almost a mile from the sea. The inhabitants are said to have had their beginning out of the Island * Zacynthus: and some among them, were descended from Ardea, a City of the Rutilians: but they grew within short time to this puissance and wealth of theirs, partly, by the fruits and revenews of their lands, and partly, by the traffick and gain of their merchandise, and commodities transported by sea, as also by the great affluence and encrease of people, and lastly, by their straight rule of discipline, whereby they observed their troth and loyalty with their allies, even to their own ruine and finall destruction. Saguntum besieged by Annibal. * Zanto.

B my overrun and wasted their countrey, besieged and assailed the City three waies. There was one canton or angle of the wall shooting out into a more plain and open valley, than any other place all about: against which he meant to raise certain mantlets or fabricks, under which he might approach with the Ram to batter the wall. But as the place far from the wall, was even enough and handsome for such engins of battery to be driven upon: so after that they came to the proof and execution indeed, the success answered nothing to the enterprise begun. For besides that there was a mighty tower over-looked and commanded them than the wall it self (as in a place doubted and suspected) was more fortified and raised higher there than elsewhere: and also the chosen youth and ablest men were bestowed to make more forcible resistance, where there was like to be most trouble and danger. And first with shot of darts and quarels, and such like, they put the enemy back, C and would not suffer the pioneers and labourers in any place to entrench or raise rampiers in safety. In process also, they shot not from the wall only and that tower, and shewed themselves there in arms for defence, but also their hearts served them to sally forth, and to break into the guards of the enemies, yea, and to enter upon their trenches and fabricks. In which skirmishes there died not many more Saguntins than Carthaginians. But so soon as Annibal himself, approaching unadvisedly under the wall fortuned to be wounded grievously in the forepart of his thigh, with a dart or light javelin, and therewith fell to the ground: they all about him fled so fast and were so scared, that they had like to have given over quite and abandoned their mantlets, and other fabricks aforesaid. After this, for some few daies, whiles their General was under cure of his hurt, they lay at siege rather, than followed the assault. In which mean time, as they rested from skir-D mish, so they ceased not to invent new devices, and to prepare new fabricks. Whereupon the assault began again more hot than before: and in many parts at once they fell to raise rolling mantlets, so many and so thick that some places would not receive them; and withall to drive the Ram against the walls. Annibal had men good store, for it is thought he was 150000 in Camp strong. The townsmen with devising means to defend, and see to every place, began to have their hands full: but all would not serve. For now were the walls beaten with the rams, and many parts thereof shaken and battered: and at one place above the rest, by continual battery there was such a breach, as the town lay open and naked to the enemy. After that, three turrets, and all the wall between fell down with a mighty and horribly crash, insomuch as the Carthaginians thought verily that with that rush the town had been won: by which breach, as if the wall had protected both E parties before, they ran forth together on each side to fight. The battell was not like to a tumultuary skirmish, such as are wont to be about assaults of Cities, by the occasion and advantage of the one part or the other; but a very set and ranged field (as it were) in an open ground between the breaches of the wall, and the houses of the town, that stood a pretty way distant within. Of one side they were pricked forward with hope, on the other with despair; whiles Annibal thought verily that he was master of the town already, if he held on but a little longer; and the Saguntins seeing their town bare, and void of wals, opposed their bodies in the breach, not one stepping back a foot, lest in the space between he should let in the enemy. The more fiercely therefore, and the thicker and closer that they fought together on both parts, the more were wounded; and there was not a dart could light in vain between their bodies and their armour, but it did mis-
F chief. The Saguntins used a weapon called Falarica, in manner of a dart, which they let fly and lanced from them having a long shaft or steel, round and even every where toward the one end, where it was headed with iron, and bound about with tow, and smeared with pitch. The iron head was three foot long; that it might pierce both harness and body through. But the greatest scare that it did was this, although it stuck fast in the target, and entred not into the body, that being driven and flung, when the middle part was set on fire, by the motion thereof as it flew, it gathered much more fire, forced the souldier to forsake his armour, and exposed him disarmed and naked to the shot following. Well, the fight continued doubtful a long time, by reason that the Saguntins took better heart unto them, because they had rested beyond their hope and expectation: and the Carthaginians took themselves vanquished, for that they had not got the victo-G ry, and better hand: whereupon, the townsmen all at once set up a cry, and beat the enemies back to the very breaches, and ruins of the wall, and from thence thrust them out clean. whiles they were thus encumbred and affrighted, yea, and at last discomfited them put them to flight, and chased them as far as their Camp. The description of a weapon or dart, called Falarica.

In the mean while news came, that there were Embassadors arrived from Rome: unto whom Annibal dispatched certain messengers to meet with them at sea side, and to give them to understand, That neither they might safely with security of their persons come among the broiles of so many barbarous & fierce nations; nor their Master Annibal amidst those dangerous and troublesome b'esome affairs, had any leisure to attend or give audience unto embassages. He knew full well, H that the Embassadors being not received and entertained, would straight to Carthage. Whereupon, he addressed aforehand his letters and curriers to the chief of the Barchine faction, to frame and prepare the minds of that side, so, as they of the other part might not gratifie, or do any thing in favour of the Romans. By which means, besides that they were neither admitted by Annibal, nor audience given them, that embassage also was in vain, and took no effect at Carthage. Only Hanno notwithstanding the whole body of the Senate was against him, spake with great silence and assent of the hearers, by reason of his authority and reputation, and pleaded to the point of the breach of League, in this wise: "I have, quoth he, foretold and warned you in the name "and for the love of the gods, who are the witnesses and judges of covenants and confederacies, I "I have, I say, admonished you, that ye should not send Amilcar his son, or any of his breed unto "the Camp: for that neither the ghost and spirit, nor the progeny and race of that man can rest "and be quiet; nor the Roman league will ever be assured and established, so long as there re- "mained one alive of the Barchine name and family. But sent ye have, for all my words, unto "your armies, a youth boiling in ambition, enflamed with a covetous desire of being a King, and "one that seeth no other way thereto, but by raising one war after another, to live guarded with "armies and legions about him. In which action of yours, ye have as it were ministred dry fewel, "and put oil to the fire: ye have, I say, fed that fire, wherewith ye now all are set a burning. Your "armies now besiege Saguntum, from which by covenant and vertue of the League they are de- "barred. Within a while and shortly will the Roman legions lie in siege before Carthage, under K "the conduct and guidance, no doubt, of those gods, by whose support and aid in the former war, "they were revenged for the breach of the accord and alliance. What? know yet not yet, either "your enemy, or your selves, or the fortune of both nations? This good Captain and gentle Ge- "neral, forsooth, of your making, would not admit and receive into his Camp Embassadors com- "ing from our allies, and in the behalf also of our allies: wherein he abolished the law of Nations. "Howbeit, they having taken a repulse, from whence even the very Embassadors of enemies, are "not wont to be repelled, are come unto you, and by vertue of their League demand amends of "trespass and restitution or satisfaction for their damages. And presuppose the State be not tou- "ched nor culpable in this Action, they require no more, but to have the author himself in person, "who is the offender. The more gently they deale, and the longer it is ere they begin, the more L "obstinat they will be, and continue with greater rigour (I fear me) if they once begin. Set before "your eyes the Islands * Ægates, and * Eryx: and what for these four and twenty years past, ye "have endured both by land and sea. Neither was this beardless boy our Captain then, but his fa- "ther Amilcar himself, even a second Mars, as these his suppосts would have him. But what of "that? We could not then, according to our league, hold our hands, and let Tarentum in Italy a- "lone; like as now we are doing with Saguntum. Therefore, both God and man took the mat- "ter in hand, and vanquished us in the end: and when we were at arguing and debating the case "with discourse of words about this point, Whether Nation of the twain had broken the league? "the event of war, as an indifferent and equall judge, awarded victory where the right was. And "Carthage it is, against which, Annibal even now hath reared mantlets, towers, and other engins M "of assault: even now, battereth and shaketh he Carthage wals with the Ram. The ruins of Se- "guntum (God grant I be a false Prophet) will fall upon our heads, and the war begun with the Sa- "guntins, we must maintain against the Romans. How then? (will some man say) shall we yield "Annibal unto them? I know well, how small my authority is in this point, by reason of the old "grudge and enmity between me and his father deceased. Howbeit, as I rejoyced, that Amilcar "was dead, for that if he had lived still, we should ere now have warred with the Romans: so this "very youth, an impe of his I hate and detest as the very fury and fire-brand of this war: whom "I would have by my good will, not only to be rendred unto them, for to purge and expiate the "breach of league; but if no man would challenge him for to be punished, I would award that he "should be carried and transported as far as there is sea or land and to be sent away thither from N "whence we might not once hear of him again and where he might never trouble the quiet and "peaceable state of this City any more. Over and besides my opinion and resolution is, that some "Embassadors be sent present y to Rome, to satisfie the Senate: and others also, with a message to "Annib.l that he withdraw his forces from Saguntum: and with commission to render up Anni- "bal himself into the Romans hands, according to the tenour of the League: and a third Embas- "sage likewise to the Saguntins, for to make restitution and amends for their harms and losses al- "ready sustained. When Hanno had made an end of his speech, it was altogether needless, that any one man there should make reply, and debate the matter with him by way of Oration. the whole Senate was so possessed already and wrought for Annibal: and with one voice they blamed Hanno, and sounded it out, That he had made a bitter speech, and more favouring of an enemy, O than Flaccus Valerius himself the Roman Embassador. After this, the Roman Embassadors had this answer returned. That the war began by the Saguntins, and not by Annibal. Also, that the peo- ple of Rome offered them injury, in preferring the Saguntins before the most ancient alliance of the Carthaginians. Whiles the Romans thus spent time in sending Embassages, Annibal having wearied his men, what with skirmishes, and what with trenching and raising mounts and fa- bricks, he gave them rest some few daies and bestowed certain good guards to ward and keep the mantlets and other engins of battery. In the mean season he encouraged his souldiers, and set their hearts

A hearts on fire, partly, by pricking and provoking them to anger against their enemies, and partly, by drawing them on, and alluring them with hope of great rewards. But after he had once in a general assembly made proclamation, That the spoil and pillage should be the souldiers share; they were all so enkindled and enflamed, that if presently he had sounded the signal of battel, it seemed, that no force in the World had been able to resist them. The Saguntins, as they had some rest from skirmish, and continued certain dayes, neither assailing nor assailed: so they gave not over labouring night and day, for to make up a new wall and counter-mure, on that side of the Town which lay open by reason of breaches. But after this, grew the assault more hot and furious than before: neither wist they well (the shouts and alarms were so divers and dissonant on B every side) whether to come first, or where was most need of help and succour. Annibal himself was present in person to encourage and exhort his souldiers, where as the rouling Tower was driven which was so high, that it overlooked all the mures and counter-Fabricks of the City, and being once approached neer the walls, furnished as it was in every loft and story, with ordnance of quarrel shot brakes, and other artillery, beat the defendants from off the walls, so as none durst abide upon them. Then Annibal taking the time, and supposing that he had now a good opportunity presented unto him, sent about 500 Affricans that were pioners with pick-axes, mattocks and such like tools, to undermine the wall, yea, and to dig into it from the very foundation. And that was no hard matter to do, for that the cement or morter was not hardned and bound with lime, but tempered with earth and clay, after the old manner of building: and therefore the wall C came tumbling down before it was hewn and wrought into: and through the wide breaches, whole troops of armed souldiers entred the Town: and withal, they seized one high place above the rest, whereon they planted their artillery and ordnance of slings and brakes, and cast a wall about it, that they might have within the very City a fort and bastillon of their own, like a Castle to overlook all. The Saguntins likewise raised another mure within along that side where the Town as yet was not taken; So that on both sides they made fortifications, and also fought with all their might and main. But the Saguntins defending the inner parts, by little and little brought their Town daily into a smaller compass. And by that means, as also by reason of the long siege, as scarcity and want of all things grew more and more so the expectation of forrain aid and succour was every day less than other: the Romans their only hope, being so far off, and their D enemies so neer on every hand. Howbeit, the sudden rode and journey of Annibal against the * Oretans and * Carpetans, refreshed for a while their troubled and afflicted spirits. These two Nations being risen upon a discontentment of a streight muster and rigorous levy of souldiers, had staied and detained those Muster-masters, that had in commission to take up all sufficient and able men for the wars and so, made some shew and fear of rebellion: but being prevented in the beginning by the speedy coming of Annibal, were soon quiet, and laid down their arms. But the assault of Saguntum continued nevertheless. For Mabarbal, Himilco his son whom Annibal had left behind as Lieutenant, so bestirred himself, that neither the Townsmen nor the enemy found the miss or absence of the General. This Mabarbal had made some fortunat skirmishes, and with three rams shaken a good part of the wall, so as he shewed to Annibal at his return all lying along E and every place full of fresh ruins. Whereupon the army was presently brought against the very Castle of the City, where began a cruel and bloudy conflict, with the slaughter of many on both sides, and one part of the said fortress was forced and won.

Afterwards there was some treaty of peace and agreement, by means of two persons, Alcon a Saguntine, and Alorcus a Spaniard, and some small hope there was of it. Alcon supposing he could somewhat prevail by way of request and entreating, without knowledge of the Saguntins, departed away by night to Annibal. But after that he saw, that with all his weeping he could do no good, but that heavy and intolerable articles and capitulations of peace were exhibited, as from a wrathful conqueror, of an Orator, proved to be a very traytor, and remained still in the camp with the enemies, saying, that he was sure to die, whosoever should move the Saguntins to peace, F under those conditions. For demanded it was of the Saguntins, Imprimis, to make restitution to the Turdetans of all harmes and losses. Item, to deliver up all their gold and silver. Item, to quit the Town, and depart but with one sute of apparel a piece: and there to dwell where the Carthaginians would appoint. When Alcon avouched plainly, that the Saguntins would never accept of peace with these conditions, Alorcus replied again and said, That seeing all things else now failed them, their hearts also must needs come down, and fail likewise; and therewith promised to deliver unto them the tenor of the said peace, and to be a mediator and dealer in the compassing thereof. At that time he served Annibal as a private souldier: howbeit a publick friend he was, and an host and guest of old to the Saguntins. Who having in sight of all men yeelded up his offensive arms, to the warders of the enemies, and passed the rampiers was brought (for so himG self desired) before the Governor and Provost of Saguntum. Thither came running presently, a number of all sorts of people: but after the rest of the multitude were commanded to void Alorcus was called into their Councel house, and having audience given, made this or the like speech unto them. "If Alcon your countryman and fellow citizen, as he came from you to Annibal for "to treat about peace, had likewise brought back again unto you from Annibal the conditions "and articles of peace, I needed not to have taken this journey; who am come unto you neither "as an Orator from Annibal nor yet as a fugitive. To the hearing of this Oration the people had flocked about, and by little and little entermingled their own aſſembly with the Senators: and all of a ſudden the chief of them withdrew themſelves and departed, before anſwer was given: and brought all their ſilver and gold, as well publick as private, into the market place: and when they had caſt it into a great fire made haſtily L for that purpoſe, moſt of them threw themſelves into it headlong after. Whereupon there being a fear and trouble already throughout the whole City: behold another outcry beſides and noiſe was heard from the Caſtle. For a certain Tower that had been a long time battered and ſhaken, fell down; and at the breach thereof a band of Carthaginians made entry, and gave ſign to their General that the City was abandoned of the ordinary Watchmen and corps de guard of the enemies, and altogether lay open and naked. Annibal ſuppoſing it was no wiſedom to neglect and ſlack ſo good an opportunity, with all his forces at once aſſailed the City, and wan it in the turning of an hand: and preſently gave order that all above fourteen years of age ſhould be put to the ſword. A cruel commandment, no doubt, but yet needful, as afterwards it was well ſeen in the end and upſhot of all. For who would have ſpared and taken pity of thoſe, that either ſhut themM ſelves with their wives and children into their houſes, and burnt them over their own heads, or in their armor, gave not over fight before they died? Thus was the Town won with exceeding ſtore of pillage within it. And albeit much was ſpoiled on purpoſe by the owners, and that in the maſſacre and execution they had no reſpect of age in the fury of their anger: and for all that, the priſoners fell to the ſouldiers ſhare: yet certain it is, that of the goods ſold in port-ſale, there aroſe a good round piece of mony: and much rich houſhold ſtuff and coſtly apparel was ſent to Carthage.

Which being ſo, it cannot be, that P. Cornelius N and *T. And we muſt ſay, that either all theſe things were atchieved in ſhorter time a good deal, or elſe that Saguntum in the beginning of that year wherein P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Conſuls, began not to be beſieged; but finally was forced and won. For the battel at Trebia could not be ſo long after, as to fall in the year wherein Cn. Servilius and *C. About the ſame time, as well the Embaſſadors which returned from Carthage, brought word to Rome that there was nothing but war: as alſo tidings came, of the deſtruction of Saguntum. And ſo greatly grieved and ſorrowed the Senators, and pitied withal their allies thus unworthily maſſacred, ſo aſhamed in themſelves they were, that they had not ſent aid in time, ſo deeply offended and incenſed with indignation againſt the Carthaginians, yea, and ſo mightily feared the loſſe of the very main chance at home, as if the enemy had been already at the gates of the City: that in very deed, having their minds poſſeſſed at one time, with ſo many troubles, they rather trem-

A trembled and quaked for fear, than fetled themſelves to conſultation and counſel. For they conſidered and ſaw very well, that neither a more fierce and warlike enemy ever encountred with them: nor the State of Rome was at any time ſo reſty, ſo feeble, and ſo undiſpoſed to war. Moreover, it was commonly ſaid, that the * Sardi, * Corſi, * Hiſtri, and * Illyrici had rather cha lenged the Romans, and made bravados of war, than exerciſed and toiled them in any hard conflicts: as for the Gauls, they were but tumults, rumors, and alarms which they made, and no wars indeed: but the Carthaginians their enemies, they were old beaten ſouldiers, inured and hardned for this 23 years in moſt difficult ſervice of war, amongſt the Spaniſh Nations, and went away ever with victory: firſt trained and practiſed under Amilcar, then under Aſdrubal, and now laſtly
B under the conduct of Annibal a right hardy and valiant Captain. Conſidering moreover, that now he cometh freſh from the ruin of Saguntum, a moſt rich City, and paſſeth ſtraight-wayes over Iberus: drawing after him a train of ſo many nations of the Spaniards, exerciſed already by him in the wars: and will no doubt raiſe the Gauls, a people at all times ready to take arms: ſo as now they were to wage war in Italy, with no more but all the World beſides, yea, and under the walls of Rome, for the defence of the City.

Now had the Provinces been nominated and appointed before to the Conſuls: but then were they commanded by caſting lots, to part them between them. To Cornelius fell Spain: To Sempronius Affrick and Sicily. Likewiſe decreed it was, that for that year, there ſhould be levied ſix Legions of Romans: and of allies, as many as they thought good: alſo that as great a navy as might C be, ſhould be rigged and ſet out. So there were enrolled 24000 Roman footmen, and of horſemen 1800: of allies 44000 foot, and 4000 horſe, 220 gallies, with five courſe of oars on a ſide, and twenty foiſts, were ſet aflote. After this, a bill was preferred unto the people, that it might pleaſe them to determine and grant, that war ſhould be proclaimed againſt the people of Carthage. And in regard of that war, there was alſo a ſolemn ſupplication holden through the City: wherein the people adored and prayed the Gods to proſper and bring to an happy end, this war which the people of Rome had determined. And betwixt the Conſuls thus were the forces divided: Sempronius had the conduct of two Legions, conſiſting of four thouſand foot, and three hundred horſe a piece; alſo of allies ſixteen thouſand foot, one thouſand and eight hundred Horſe, beſides 160 gallies, and twelve barks or foiſts. With this power for Land and Sea ſervice, D was Sempronius ſent into Sicily, from thence to paſſe over into Affrick, in caſe the other Conſul were able to impeach the Carthaginians for coming into Italy. Cornelius had the charge of a ſmaller power: for that L. Manlius the Pretor, was ſent in perſon into France with a ſufficient army: but in the number of ſhips eſpecially, was Cornelius ſcanted 60 gallies of five banks of oars he had, and no more, (for it was ſuppoſed that the enemy would neither come by Sea, nor fight in that kind of ſervice) and two Roman Legions with the full proportion of Horſemen, and 14000 footmen of allies, with 1200 men of arms. That Province of France (in thoſe parts where the Carthagian [illegible] was expected) had that year two Legions of Roman footmen, 14000 allies, beſides 1000 Horſe from them, and 6000 of the Romans. When all things were thus prepared, to the

F "Your former Embaſſage, my maſters of Rome, was even as vain as this, when ye required and "would needs have Annibal to be yeelded unto you; as if he had beſieged Saguntum of his own "head. And as for this, that you come with now, howſoever in words it ſeem more mild and "ſmooth, in very deed and in truth it is more rude and rigorous: for then, was Annibal only "charged and demanded to juſtice; but now are we both urged to acknowledge a fault, and alſo "forced to make reſtitution and ſatisfaction out of hand; as if we had avowed and confeſſed the "action. For mine own part, of this mind am I, that the caſe ought thus to be laid, and the que-"ſtion brought to this iſſue, not whether Saguntum was beſieged by a privat perſon, or pub ick "Councel: but whether by right, or wrongfully. For to enquire and examine whether our citizen

F "Your former Embaſſage, my maſters of Rome, was even as vain as this, when ye required and "would needs have Annibal to be yeelded unto you; as if he had beſieged Saguntum of his own "head. And as for this, that you come with now, howſoever in words it ſeem more mild and "ſmooth, in very deed and in truth it is more rude and rigorous: for then, was Annibal only "charged and demanded to juſtice; but now are we both urged to acknowledge a fault, and alſo "forced to make reſtitution and ſatisfaction out of hand; as if we had avowed and confeſſed the "action. For mine own part, of this mind am I, that the caſe ought thus to be laid, and the que-"ſtion brought to this iſſue, not whether Saguntum was beſieged by a privat perſon, or pub ick "Councel; but whether by right, or wrongfully. For to enquire and examine whether our citizen "and ſubject have done this by our advice, or of himſelf, pertaineth to us alone, as alſo to cenſure "and puniſh him accordingly: with you we are to debate this point only, Whether it might ſtand
G "with the league to do it, or no? And therefore ſince it pleaſeth you that we ſhould diſpute and "diſtinguiſh, between the action of a General, warranted by the publick State, and an enterpriſe "proceeding from his own motive; ye ſhall underſtand that there was indeed a league between "you and us, contracted by Luctatius the Conſul, wherein there is a clauſe, comprifing the allies "of both parties: as concerning the Saguntins (who as then were none of your confederats) there "was not one word at all therein: but in that league, (ye will ſay) that was contracted with Aſ-"drubal, the Saguntins are expreſly named and excepted: to which I have nothing to plead, but "even that which I have learned of you. For ye your ſelves denied, that ye were bound to ſtand

"to that accord which C. Lucatius your Consul first made with us, becauſe it paſſed neither by H
"conſent of the nobles, nor grant of the people. Whereupon, there was another league anew "drawn out, and by publick agreement enacted. If you then, be not tied to obſerve your "leagues, unleſs they be authoriſed by the nobles, or ratified by the people: no more can the league "of Aſdrubal oblige us, which he concluded without our privity and knowledge. Forbear there "fore to ſpeak either of Saguntum, or Iberus; and what your mind hath ſo long conceived, let "it hatch now at length, and bring it forth. Then Q. Fabius the Roman Embaſſador, having made a hollow lap within the plait and fold of his ſide gown, Here quoth he, within this lappet, we preſent and offer war and peace unto you, take whether ye will. At which word, they all cryed out at once with as great ſtomack and boldneſs: Mary even which you will your ſelf. I Whereat he let his robe looſe again; Why then, there is war, quoth he, take it amongſt you; Let come ſay they all again, and welcome be it; and as willingly as we accept thereof, ſo ſhall we follow and manage it as throughly.

This direct demand, and round denouncing of war, ſeemed more for the honor of the Romans, than to make much diſpute and argument about the right of the cauſe, and of the covenants; a vain matter before, but now eſpecially, after the winning and deſtruction of Saguntum.
For if the queſtion were to be decided by words and reaſoning, that league of Aſdrubal which was exchanged for the former of Lucatius, was not the ſame nor the tenor thereof to be compared: ſeeing that in the accord of Lucatius, this branch and proviſo was expreſſely added, [That it ſhould ſtand good, and be ratified, if the people approved thereof:] but in this of Aſdrubal, K there was no ſuch condition at all: and beſides, the covenant for ſo many years ſpace during his life, was ſo eſtabliſhed and confirmed, and no word to the contrary; that when the very maker and author thereof was dead, there was no change and alteration. And yet, put caſe they ſhould have ſtood upon the former alliance: the Saguntins were therein well enough compriſed and provided for in that the allies of either part were excepted and comprehended. For neither was this clauſe added [They who at that time were allies] nor yet were they excepted againſt, who afterwards ſhould become, or be admitted allies. And ſeeing that it was lawful to entertain new con-federats, who is it that would judge it reaſonable, either that no man ſhould be received unto amity for any good deſert whatſoever; or being once received into protection, ſhould not be defended accordingly: Provided alwayes, that no allies of the Carthaginians ſhould either be ſolli- L cited to rebellion or received again, if of themſelves they once revolted.

The Roman Embaſſadors as they were commanded at Rome paſſed the ſeas from Carthage into Spain, for to viſit all the Cities, and to ſee whether they could either draw them to their ſociety, or withdraw them from the Carthaginians. And firſt they came to the Barguſians, where being courteouſly entertained (for weary they were of the Carthaginians government) they ſtirred up many other nations beyond Iberus, to have a deſire to change for a new world. From thence they came to the Volſcians, whoſe notable anſwer reported throughout all Spain, turned away all other States from banding with the Romans: for thus in a ſolemn aſſembly a ſage and ancient rather among them framed his anſwer. "With what face can ye (Romans) require us to preſer your friend-
"ſhip and amity before the Carthaginians? ſeeing that the Saguntins who did the ſame, have been M "more cruelly by you their allies betrayed, than by their enemies the Carthaginians deſtroyed?
"By my advice go and ſeek you confederats there, where the woful calamity and miſery of Sagun-
"tum is not known. The lamentable ruins of which City, as it is a doleful example, ſo it ſhall be a "notable warning to all nations of Spain, that no man ever after repoſe truſt in the protection "and ſociety of the Romans. Whereupon, they were commanded to depart the borders of the Volſcians immediately, and in no Diet or Councel of Spain, had they afterwards any better entertainment, and more courteous language. Thus having in vain gone through all Spain, they took their way into Gaul: where they ſaw a ſtrange ſight, and a fearful faſhion: for all in armour (ſuch was the guiſe and manner of the country) they came to their publick aſſemblies: and there, theſe Embaſſadors after they had ſet out in goodly words the greatneſs and glory of the people of Rome, N and highly magnified their large empire and dominion, and thereupon made requeſt, that they would not give the Carthaginians leave (who minded to make war upon Italy) for to paſs through their Cities and Towns: hereat they ſet up ſuch a laughter, with a certain grumbling and murmuring, that ſcarcely could the youth be ſtilled and quieted by the Magiſtrats and Elders; ſo fon-tiſh, ſo fooliſh, and ſhameleſs ſeemed this demand, in their conceit: that they ſhould once imagine that the Gauls were ſuch Aſſes, as they would be content (rather than to let the war paſſe into Italy) to avert and turn it upon themſelves, and to ſuffer, yea, and offer their own territories to be ſpoiled and foraged, for the ſafety (forſooth) of other mens Lands, who were but meer aliens and ſtrangers unto them. The noiſe and garboil being at length huſht and appeaſed, this anſwer was returned to the Embaſſadors: "That neither the Romans had deſerved ſo well, nor the O "Carthaginians ſo ill at their hands, that they ſhould take arms either for Romans, or againſt "Carthaginians. But contrary-wiſe they were advertiſed, that ſome of their nation, whereby
"the people of Rome driven out of the marches and confines of Italy put to pay tribute, yea, and "indured other outrages and indignities. The like demands and anſwers paſſed to and fro in other Councels and Aſſemblies of Gaul: neither could they meet with any friendly entertainment, or have peaceable words given them, before they came to * Maſſilia: where, after diligent inquiry, and faithful ſearch made by their allies, they had true advertiſements, that Annibal

A aforehand had wrought the hearts of the Gauls to his own purpose, and was possessed of them: but they understood withal, that they were not like to continue long in good terms of kindness and favor even to him, (so fierce and savage, so untractable are they, and untamed by nature) unless their Princes and Rulers be ever and anon well fed and plied with gold, whereof that nation of all other is most greedy and covetous. The Roman Embassadors, having thus gone their circuit over all the States of Spain and Gaul, returned to Rome; not long after that the Coss. had taken their journey into their Provinces: where they found the whole City possessed with the expectation of war: so rife and currant was the rumor and bruit abroad, that the Carthaginians were already passed over the River Iberus.

B Annibal after the winning of Saguntum, had retired himself to winter in new Carthage: and there having intelligence what had been done and decreed as well at Rome, as at Carthage [in Africk] and that he was reputed not only the Captain General and Conductor, but also the very author and cause of all this war; so soon as he had divided and sold the rest of the booty and pillage that remained, thought good now to make no longer delayes, but assembled the souldiers of the Spanish Nation, and to them he spake in this manner. "My trusty friends and loyal confede- The speech of Annibal to his Spanish souldiers.
"rats, I am perswaded, that ye your selves do see as well as I, now that all the States of Spain are in "peace and quietness, that either ye are to make an end of souldiery, and all our forces to be cassed
"and discharged from service; or else that ye must remove the war into other Lands. For so "shall these Nations prosper and flourish, and not only enjoy the blessings of peace, but also reap C "the fruits of war, if we will seek to gain riches, and to acquire glory and honor from others.
"Sin e therefore we are to war shortly far from home, and doubt it is, when you shall see again
"your houses, and whatsoever there is deer unto you: if any of you be desirous to visit home, his "wife and children, kinsfolk, and friends, I give him licence and free passport. But I command
"you withal, to shew your selves here again before me, in the beginning of the next spring; that "with the help of God, we may in hand with that war, whereby we shall purchase both worship "and wealth. There was not one in a manner but well accepted of this liberty so frankly offered by himself, and were desirous to have a sight of house and land both for that every one already longed for their friends and kindred, and foresaw in farther time to come, a greater miss, and cause of more longing after them. This rest all Winter time, between their travels past, and those they D were soon after to endure, refreshed as well their bodies as their minds, and prepared them to abide and endure all new pains whatsoever. So in the very prime of the spring, according to the Edict aforesaid, they all assembled together again. Annibal having taken a muster and survey of the aids that were sent unto him from all those Nations, went to * Gades; and there, to Hercules he paid his old vows, and bound himself to new, if the rest of his enterprizes should speed well and have good success. After this, dividing and casting care indifferently, as well for offensive as defensive war, doubting lest whiles he went by Land through Spain and France into Italy, Africk should lie open and naked to the Romans from Sicily side; purposed to fortifie and make that part sure with strong garrisons. In lieu whereof, he sent for fresh supply out of Africk, specially of Archers and Javelotiers, and those lightly armed: to the end, that the Africans might serve in E Spain, and the Spaniards in Africk; like (both the one and the other) to prove the better souldiers, far from their own countries, and being bound as it were, with mutual and reciprocal pledges. So he sent into Africk 13850 footmen, armed with light targets, and 870 slingers of the Islands * Baleares, 1200 Horsemen also out of sundry Nations. Which forces he disposed, partly for the defence of Carthage, and partly to be divided through Africk, for the guard thereof. He sent withal, certain Commissioners into all their Cities to take up souldiers, and enrolled 4000 of their chosen youths, who should be brought to Carthage, there to lie in garrison, and to serve for hostages. And supposing that Spain was not to be neglected, and the rather, because he was not ignorant how the Roman Embassadors had visited the same round to see how they could sollicit and work the Princes and rulers to their mind, he committed the charge of that Province to his F brother Asdrubal, a valiant and hardy man: and furnished him with good forces, especially out of Africk, to wit, 11850 Africans footmen, 300 Ligurians, 500 Balear Islanders. To this power of footmen, three hundred Horse of the * Libyphœnicians, a Nation mixt of Carthaginians and Africans. Of * Numidians and Mores, that coast upon the Ocean, 1900. with a small cornet of 200 Horsemen of Ilergetes out of Spain. And because he should want no manner of Land help, fourteen Elephants besides. Moreover, there was a fleet allowed him for the defence of the Sea-coasts. For by what forces and service the Romans had before got victory, thereby it was likely, that they would still maintain and continue their wars, 50 Gallies therefore of five banks of oars, he had at Sea, two of four, and five of three. But of the five oared gallies aforesaid, he had no more but two and thirty, fitted and well appointed with rowers and marriners, and so were the G five of three banks.

From Gades, the army of Annabil returned to winter in Carthage: and from thence he passed by the City * Etovissa, and marched forward with his forces to Iberus and the Sea-coasts. Where it is reported, that in his sleep he dreamed, and saw a vision namely a young man of divine shape and semblance, saying, That he was sent from Jupiter to guide him in his voyage into Italy, and willed him therefore to follow him, and in no wise to turn his eyes from him one way or other. Also, that at the first he being scared and affrighted, durst not look either about or behind, but followed him still: afterwards (as men by nature are curious) when he cast and discoursed in his mind, what it might be, that he was forbidden so to see behind him, he could not hold and H rule his eyes but must needs look back: and then he beheld behind him, a serpent of huge greatness coming amain, and all the way as it went, to bear down trees, groves, and thickets: and after all that, he perceived a great storm and tempest ensuing, with mighty thunder-claps. Now when he was desirous to know what this so great confusion and strange sight might signify, he heard a voyce, saying, That it betokened the ruins and wasting of Italy: willing him therefore, to go still forward with his voyage, and search no further into the secrets of the Gods, but leave them to the hidden destinies. Annibal right joyous at this vision, passed over Iberus with his whole power, divided into three parts having sent certain before him with gifts and rewards into all parts whereas he should march with his army, to gain the hearts of the Gauls; and withal, to I seek out and discover the passages of the Alpes. So he crossed the River Iberus with 90000 foot, and 12000 Horse, strong. After this, he subdued the Ilergetes, the * Bargusians, * Ausetans, and * Aquitain, which lyeth under the hills Pyrenæi. The government of all these Nations he set over to Hanno that he might have at his command the streights which joyned France and Spain together. Unto whom he allowed 10000 footmen, and 1000 horse, for to defend and keep in obedience those countries. After that his army was on foot, and began to march through the forrest Pyrenæus, and that there ran amongst the barbarous people a more certain bruit, That they were to make war with the Romans; three thousand footmen of the Carpenats, returned back: and for certain it was known, that they departed not, for fear so much of the war, as the tedious journey and unpassable wayes of the Alpes. Annibal, considering that either to recal them or to keep K them by violence, was a dangerous matter; for fear lest thereby he should provoke the fierce stomacks of the rest; sent home again above 7000 of such, as he perceived to be weary, and to have no mind to the service; and made semblance withal, that the Carpetans were by his leave discharged. And doubting lest long stay and ease there, might tempt his souldiers and give occasion of mutinies, with the rest of his forces he passed Pyrenæus, and pitched his camp before the Town * Illiberis. The Gauls, albeit they were advertised, that it was Italy, at which Annibal shot; yet because the bruit was blazed, That the Spaniards beyond Iberus, were by force subdued, and strong garrisons placed in their Cities: certain Nations of them, for fear of servitude and bondage, rose up in arms, and assembled together at † Ruscino. Which being related to Annibal, he fearing more that they would stay him in his journey, than endanger him in fight; sent certain L Orators or Embassadors to their Princes and great Lords, to signify unto them. "That himself

"in person would gladly parle with them, and that it should be in their choice whether they "would come neerer to Illiberis, or himself go forward to Ruscino: where, being neer together,
"they might more easily meet and confer. For as he was willing to receive them into his camp,
"and would be glad to see them there: so he would not think much of his pains, to repair unto "them himself, as one that was thither come as a friend and guest unto France, and not as an "enemy; and would not by his good will draw a sword (if the Gauls would let him alone)
"before he were entred within Italy. And thus much verily passed by messengers and cour-riers between. But so soon as the Lords of France, who presently removed their camp to Il-liberis, were come willingly enough to Annibal, as being bribed and corrupted with money M and presents, they gave his army good leave to pass through their confines along the Town Ruscino.

In Italy this while the Embassadors of Marseilles had brought no other word to Rome, but that Annibal was only gone over Iberus: but, by that time, the Boii had stirred up the Insubrians to mutiny, and were revolted themselves, even as if he had passed the Alpes already: which they did not so much upon old rancour and malice to the people of Rome, as for that, they took it ill and were discontented, that there were Colonies brought lately into the Gauls country, to be planted about * Padus, * Placentia and Cremona. Whereupon they arose suddenly, took arms, and entred by force into those parts, and made so foul work and fearful havock, that not only the country people and villagers, but also the three Roman Commissioners called Triumvirs, to wit, Caius N Luctatius, Aul. Servilius, and Titus Annius, who were come to set out the Lands and territory to the said Colonies, not trusting the walls of Placentia, fled to * Mutina. That Luctatius was one of them, it is not doubted: but some records have Q. Acilius and C. Herennius, instead of A. Servilius and T. Annius: and others again, nominate P. Cornelius Asina, and C. Papirius Maso.
It is uncertain also, whether they were the Embassadors sent to the * Boii, to reason or expostulat the matter, that had abuse offred them, and were evil intreated; or that the Triumvirs above said, were set upon and assailed as they were measuring out the Lands. But whiles they were thus besieged at Mutina, and those Boians lying at siege (a nation unskilful altogether in the feat of assaulting Towns, and likewise of all other most cowardly, to attempt any martial exploits) whiles they lay idly about the wals, and never once advanced against them, they began to make shew of O a treaty for peace. Whereupon the Roman Embassadors or Commissioners, being by the chief of the Gauls called out to parle, were not only against law of nations, but with breach also of their faithful promise, and word which they had given that time, apprehended: and the Gauls said plainly, they would not let them go, unless their hostages were delivered them again. These news touching the Embassadors being reported and Mutina with the garison in danger: L. Manlius the Prætor, in great anger and indignation, brought his army in more hast than good order, before Mutina. There were in those dayes great woods about the high way, and most part of the country

A wilds and wasts, not inhabited: where he having engaged himself without his espials, was intrapped within an ambush; lost many of his men, and hardly recovered the open champain country. There he incamped himself strongly: and for that the Gauls had no heart to assault, nor hope to win the camp, his souldiers courages were refreshed; albeit it was well known that they had received a shrewd foil, and knew their forces to be much impaired. Then began he to march on, in his journey afresh. And so long as he led his power through the open country, the enemies were not in sight: but when they were entred the forrests again, they set upon the fereward of them: where, besides the great fright and damage of all the rest, 800 Roman souldiers were left dead in the place, and the enemies went away with six ensigns. But afterwards the Gauls ceased to molest
B and trouble, and the Romans gave over to fear. So soon as they were passed, and escaped the rough, umbrous, and unpassable forrests. And the Romans being now able in the open and champian country to march with safety, made haft to get to * Tanetus a village neer unto the Po. There within a fort which they made for the time, with the help and provision of victuals by the river and the aid also of certain Gauls called * Brixians they defended themselves against the enemies whose number daily encreased. After this sudden tumult was reported at Rome, and that the LL. of the Senat were advertised, that besides the war with the Carthaginians, the Gauls were up in arms: they gave order, that C. Attilius the Pretor should go (with one Roman Legion, and four thousand allies, who were enrolled by the Consuls in a new levy) to aid Manlius: who without any skirmish (by reason that the enemies were fled for fear) came to Tanetus. Also P.
C Cornelius having newly levied one Legion in lieu of that which was sent with the Pretor, departed from the City of Rome, and passing with 60 Gauls along the coasts of Tuscany, Liguria, and so forward of the Salyes, shortly arrived at Massilia, and encamped neer the next mouth of * Rhodanus (for the river is divided into many branches, and so dischargeth it self into the Sea) being not fully of belief that Annibal as yet had passed over the mountains Pyrenæi. But when he understood that he was ready even then to pass Rhodanus also; and doubting in what place to encounter and meet him, his people as yet not well recovered, after their being sea-sick: he sent before, 300 elect men of arms, guided by the Massilians, and certain Gauls that came to aid; for to discover all, and to take a full view of the enemies safely without danger.

Annibal having appeased the rest of the country either for fear or by means of mony, was now
D come into the country of the * Volcans, a puissant people and a valiant. These inhabit along both the banks of Rhodanus: and mistrusting that they were not able to defend their Lands against the Carthaginians, on that side of the River which lay to them: because they might have the whole River to serve them for a good defence and rampier, transported over the Rhosne all in manner that ever they had, and kept the bank on the other side. The rest of the inhabitants neer to the River, and even those also in whose territories Annibal had set foot already, both he himself with gifts allured to get together from all parts shipping, and to frame new vessels: and they of themselves likewise were as willing to have his army transported, and their own country eased and delivered (they cared not how soon) of so great a multitude of troublesome guests. Whereupon, there was got together an huge number of lighters, barges, and boats especially, which E were made in haft without great workmanship; in which the people inhabiting thereby used to transport wares and commodities from one to another. Other new whirries also, the Gauls began first to make of the hollowed trunks of trees: and after them, the souldiers for that they had both store of timber and saw the workmanship but sleight and easy, made in haft certain bottoms, such as they were, like troughs without form or fashion, regarding no handsomeness at all, so they would but flote on the water, and receive burden, in which they might convey over themselves and that which they had.

Now when they had prepared and made all ready for their passage, the enemies on the other side right against them, kept and covered all the bank along with men and Horse, putting them to much trouble and fear. Annibal therefore to withdraw them from that place, commanded Hanno
F the son of Bomilcar, at the first watch of the night, to go up the stream along the river side, one dayes journey, with part of the forces, and those most of them Spaniards: and whersoever he first could espie a convenient place, to cross the river, and to land as secretly as he could: and then to fetch about with his men, that when need were, he might charge upon the back of the enemy. Hereunto were appointed certain Gauls for guides: who from thence conducted them some 25 miles above, to a little Iland compassed about with the river, which here spred out in bredth, by reason that it divided it self, and thereby the channel was not so deep: where they shewed him a place of passage. There, in all haft they cut down and hewed timber, and made boats to set over Horse and man and other burthen. The Spaniards made no more ado, but fastning their apparel to vessels of lether like bladders, full of wind, and laying their bucklers thereupon, sat aloft and G passed over nimbly. The rest of the army also, with joyning planks and troughs together, was set over. Where having encamped neer the river, as being weary with their night journey, and toilsome work, they rested one day to refresh themselves, whiles their Captain studied and was occupied to execute his commission and his intended service in good and convenient time. The morrow after they removed from thence, and gave knowledge by smoke that they were passed over and not far off. Which when Annibal perceived, for that he would not lose the vantage of that time, he gave signal to his men also to get over the water. Now had the footmen already their boats prepared and fitted. And the course and ranks of barges (which to receive and break break the force of the current from above, transported the Horſemen, beſides the Horſes that ſwam H

Horſes ſwam after the ſhips, haled by the bridle reins which were tied to the poups, beſides thoſe, which being ſadled and bridled, and fitted to ſerve the men of arms ſo ſoon as ever they were landed, were beſtowed in barges and ferry boats. The Gauls ſtood upon the bank with loud hooping, hollowing, yelling and ſinging after their manner, who ſhaking their targets over their heads, brandiſhing and floriſhing their ſwords in their right hands, ſhewed themſelves ready to receive them, albeit ſo great a number and World of barges and boats full in their eye over againſt them, together with an hideous roaring of the water, might have ſcared them: beſides ſundry noiſes of mariners and ſouldiers, who laboured and ſtrived to break the power and force of the I water, and who being on the other ſide of the bank encouraged their fellows that were paſſing over. And thus frighted enough as they were, with the tumult and noiſe preſented before their faces: behold there aroſe a more fearful and terrible outcry behind their backs, upon the forcing and winning of their camp by Hanno. And himſelf in perſon came ſoon after: ſo that they were put in fear on both ſides. For not only out of the ſhips there was a great multitude got to Land, but alſo a power at their backs unlooked for, came forward and charged them. The Gauls, after they had made ſome reſiſtance, and ſaw they were eaſily put back; brake through, where they eſpied the way to lie moſt open, and ſo in great fear they fled divers wayes into their Towns and Villages. Annibal then, having conveied over the reſt of his forces by leiſure, cared no more now for any French ſtirs and tumults, and ſo encamped himſelf. But for the tranſporting of the K Elephants, I ſuppoſe there were ſundry devices: and certainly, how ever it was, the thing is di-verſly recorded. Some ſay, that when the Elephants were gathered together upon the bank, the moſt couragious and fierceſt of them all, was chafed, angred, and raiſed of purpoſe by his maſter or keeper: and when he was purſued of the beaſt, and to ſave himſelf fled from him, and took the River, thereupon the Elephant followed after him as he ſwam, and ſo drew after him the whole drove of the reſt: and as any one of them (fearing the depth) failed to wade, the very force of the River carried him to the other ſide. But it is more credibly and certainly reported, that they were conveyed over in certain barges: which as it was a ſafer way and ſurer courſe before it was practiſed, ſo when it was done and paſt, it was more eaſily credited. They cauſed therefore one veſſel or barge, 200 foot long, and 50 foot broad, to reach from the ſtrand ſide and L the ſhore into the River; which becauſe it ſhould not be caried down with the courſe and ſtream of the water, they faſtned to the bank above with many ſtrong ropes, and like as it had been a bridge, they covered it over with earth, that the beaſts might boldly go thereon as upon the firm ground. Now there was another barge full as broad, but of length only 100 foot; fitted and appointed to paſs the River, and was tied and coupled thereto: and when as the Elephants (driven after the females going before) upon the ſteady barge, as it had been upon a cauſey, were gone over into the leſſer which was faſtned unto it; then preſently was it looſed from the bonds wherewith it was ſlightly tyed, and ſo haled and drawn by certain galley boats, directed with oars through to the other bank. Thus when the firſt were landed, they went for more ſtill, until they were all ſet over: and verily, ſo long as they were driven on ſtill, as it were upon a long bridge, M they nothing feared: the formoſt only were afraid when the barge was looſened, and they parted from their fellows, and ſo were caried away into the wide and deep River, where thronging and ſtrugling together, and juſtling one another, they made ſome trouble, whiles they that were outmoſt gave back from the water aſmuch as they could, until ſuch time as very fear (when they ſaw all about them nothing but water) cauſed them to be quiet. Some of them alſo like raging beaſts as they were, and unruly, fell out into the River, but by reaſon of their heavineſs, they ſtood ſure, and caſting their Governors, they ſought the ſounds foot by foot, by little and little, and got ſafe to Land.

Whiles the Elephants were thus tranſporting over, Annibal in the mean time had ſent 500 Numidian light Horſemen to the Romans camp, as eſpials to diſcover the ground, where they N were to learn what forces they had, and liſten after their deſigns and purpoſes. This wing and troop was encountred by three hundred Roman Horſemen, ſent as is aforeſaid, from the mouth of Rhodanus: where there was a more cruel skirmiſh than for ſo ſmall a number, for beſides many hurt, there were ſlain on both ſides in a manner alike: but in the end, the fear and flight of the Numidians gave the victory to the Romans, being now already much travailed and wearied: on whoſe part (being the winners) were ſlain 160. not all Romans, but ſome Gauls: and on the loſers ſide who were overcome, there dyed above 200. This beginning and prognoſtication as it were of the war, as it portended and preſaged an happy end and ſucceſs of the whole unto the Romans:
ſo it ſhewed plainly, that the victory would hang long in equal balance, not without much effu-ſion of bloud, and danger of their part. The conflict being thus determined, they returned each one to his own Captain. As for Scipio, he could not reſolve to take any courſe himſelf; but according as he ſaw the plots and enterprizes of the enemy, ſo to frame his own. And Annibal again being uncertain whether to go forward with his journy begun, into Italy, or to give battel unto the firſt army of the Romans that came in his way and met him: was drawn away from all preſent conflict, by occaſion of the coming of the Embaſſadors of the Boii, and of a great Lord and Potentate, called Matalus; who promiſing to be his guides unto him in his voyage, and companions in his perils, thought it good, and gave advice to invade and ſet upon Italy firſt of all before any

A any other war, whiles forces were entire in heart, no where put to the hazard, and to give them as it were the firſt hanſel. The common multitude of the Carthaginians (for that the former war was not clean forgot and out of remembrance) feared verily their enemies, but more their infinit journey and the Alps eſpecially, the name whereof to men not experienced, was very fearful & terrible. Whereupon, Annibal being now reſolute to march onward in his journey, and to paſs into Italy aſſembled his people to an audience, and by ſundry means, as well by way of rebuke, as alſo by encouragement, windeth and aſſayeth the minds of his ſouldiers. "I marvel (quoth he) what "ſudden fright or new fear hath poſſeſſed your hearts, that ever before now have been undaunted; "who have ſerved ſo many years, and alwayes won the victory; who departed not out of Spain, B "before that all thoſe Nations and Lands, which lie encloſed between two divers Seas, were "brought in ſubjection to the Carthaginians; who taking indignation and great diſdain, that "the people of Rome ſhould require all thoſe to be yeelded unto juſtice (as offenders and male-"factors) that had beſieged Saguntum, have thereupon paſſed the river Ierus, with this intent "even to deſtroy and extirp the Roman name, and to ſet free the whole world out of their ſervi-"tude and bondage: no man thought it long then of his travel from Eaſt to Weſt, from the ſetting "of the ſun, to the riſing of the ſame: now when as ye ſee the greater part (by far) of our journey "done and paſt, the forreſt and mountain of Pyrenæus, amid moſt fierce and cruel nations ſurmoun-"ted; that great river Rhodanus, paſſed over, maugre the hearts of ſo many thouſand Gauls that C "would have impeached your paſſage, yea, and the force of his main ſtream overcome: now I ſay, "when you are within the ſight of the Alps, to the other ſide whereof lieth Italy cloſe: ye faint as "it were, and ſtand ſtill tired at the very gates of the enemies. Why? what other thing take ye the "Alps to be but high hills? And imagine they be higher than the cliffs of Pyrenæus: what? there is "no land (I am ſure) that reaches up to heaven, and no place for men unſuperable. But for the "Alps, they are inhabited, and they are tilled: they breed and feed living creatures and cattel: and "are they acceſſible indeed, and paſſable for ſome few, and unpaſſable for whole armies? Theſe very "Embaſſadors whom you ſee here, flew not over the Alps with wings, neither were their anceſ-"tors time out of mind born and bred there, but came from other parts as ſtrangers and inhabited D "Italy before; yea, and oftentimes have gone over the ſame Alps in huge multitudes, together with "their wives and children, in manner of travellers and pilgrims that ſeek new countries to inha-"bit: what ſhould there be unpaſſable then or impoſſible for the armed ſouldier, carying about "him nothing but inſtruments of war? For the winning of Saguntum, what perils were adventu-"red, what travels were endured and ſwallowed for eight moneths ſpace? ſhould any thing then "ſeem ſo hard and difficult as to ſtay them in their enterpriſe once begun, who aim at no leſs than "to conquer Rome, the head City of the world? And have the Gauls indeed forced and won "that in times paſt, which the Carthaginians deſpair now to come unto? Therefore, either ye "muſt confeſs your ſelves inferior in ſtomack and valor to that nation, which ſo oft (theſe dayes "paſſed) by you have been vanquiſhed: or elſe make reckoning with aſſured hope, that the goodly "fair fields that lie between Tyberis and the walls of Rome, are the end of your journey.

When in theſe terms he had exhorted and encouraged his ſouldiers, he commanded them to E take their repaſt and repoſe, to cheriſh and refreſh their bodies, and to prepare themſelves for the march. The morrow after he departed croſs from the banks of Rhodanus, and entred the inland parts of France: not for that it was the more direct way to the Alps, but becauſe he thought the further he went from the Sea ſide, in ſo much leſſe danger he ſhould be of meeting the Romans, with whom he was not minded to fight, before he was arrived into Italy. After that he had traveled four dayes journey, he came to an Iland, where the two rivers * Arar and Rhodanus, iſſuing out of ſundry parts of the Alps and taking a direct courſe, after they have run through a good part of the country fall at length together and meet in one and the ground lying between is called by the name of the Iland. Neer there, inhabit the * Allobroges, a Nation even in thoſe dayes
F nothing inferior, either in wealth and puiſſance, or in fame and reputation to any people or ſtate of the Gauls whatſoever. But at that very time there was ſome diſcord and variance among them, by occaſion of two brethren who were at ſtrife for the crown and Kingdom: the elder (whoſe name was Brancus, and had before enjoyed the Seignory) was depoſed and thruſt out by his younger brother, and a luſty crew of the youth; who as they had leſs right on their ſide, ſo they were the mightier. The deciding of this variance, was referred and put over unto Annibal, in as good and fit a time for his purpoſe, as he could have wiſhed: and he forſooth was made the umpire and judge, to determine whether of them ſhould be King: who reſtored the elder to the Kingdom; like as it would have been adjudged by the award of the Senators and Nobles of the country. For which benefit and good turn, he was ſerved with victual, and ſtore of all things
G abundantly, yea, and with rayment and apparel, which he was driven to provide aforehand, for the name that went of the Alps, which for their coldneſs were in great diſcredit.

Having thus appeaſed the debate of the Allobroges, and minding now to ſet forward to the Alps; he would not go the direct ſtreight way, but turned on the left hand to the * Tricaſtins, and from thence paſſing by the frontiers of the * Vocontians, he marched into the * Tricorians; and never was he ſtayed or impeached in his journey before that he came to the River * Druentia, which deſcending alſo out of the Alps, is of all other Rivers in France moſt hard to be paſſed over: for although it carry with it a mighty force of water, yet will it bear no veſſel, becauſe it is kept and reſtreined with no banks, but running at once by many divers chanels, maketh ever new new foords, and caſteth up new ſhelves and whirl-pits, (for which cauſe alſo a footman hath much ado to wade therethrough, and knoweth not the foords) beſides, it rolleth down round ſtones and pibbles, whereby there is no ſure nor ſafe footing for him that would wade through. And it chanced at that time, that it ſwelled and was riſen high by fall of rain, and by land-floods, and cauſed them to have very much to do, that paſſed over it: and over and beſides all other difficulties, they were of themſelves troubled and diſquieted through their own fearfulneſs and ſundry cries which they made. Publius Cornelius the Conſul, about three dayes after that Annibal diſlodged from the bank of Rhodanus, was arrived with his army (arranged in a fourſquare battel) as far as the place where the enemy was lately encamped, purpoſing without any ſtay to give him battel. But ſeeing the hold abandoned, and that he was not like to overtake him, being ſo far gone forwards; he returned to his ſhips at Sea, ſuppoſing by that means, with leſſe danger and difficulty, to encounter Annibal as he deſcended from the Alps. But leſt that Spain (which was the Province allotted unto him) ſhould be left diſfurniſhed of Roman ſuccours, he ſent his brother Cn. Scipio with the greateſt part of his forces againſt Aſdrubal: not ſo much to defend their old allies, and procure new, as to drive Aſdrubal out of Spain. Himſelf with a very ſmall company returned to Genua*, with intent to guard Italy, with that army which was about the Po.

* Genes.

Annibal being departed from Druentia, marched for the moſt part through the champion countries, and came in peace and quietly, to the foot of the Alps, for any trouble from the peaſants that there inhabited. And albeit he had ſome knowledge of the Alps before by report, (which uſeth to make things that are uncertain, much more than indeed and truth they are) yet ſeeing now neer at hand the height of thoſe Hills, and the ſnows, entermingled along with the skie; the rude and miſhapen houſes ſet upon rocks; the cattel, ſheep, oxen, and horſes, ſinged with cold; the people with long ſhagg'd hair, and without any trimming, both living and liveleſs creatures, even parched, ſtiff and ſtark with froſt; and all things elſe more ſtrange and ilfavoured, than can be ſpoken: then began his ſouldiers to fear afreſh. So ſoon as they advanced forward, and began to march up the firſt cliffs, there appeared over their heads the mountain people, who had ſeized the Hills: who if they had kept the ſecret and hidden vallies, and ſuddenly all at once chatged upon them, they would have made a foul ſlaughter of them, and put them to flight. Then Annibal commandeth the enſigns to ſtand ſtill, and ſent certain Gauls afore, as eſpials; by whom he underſtood, that there was no paſſage that way: whereupon, he pitched his camp amongſt thoſe craggy and ſteep rough places, upon as large a plain and valley as he could find. Then by the ſame Gauls (who much differed not in tongue and manners from the other, and had entermingled themſelves in talk with the mountainers) he underſtood, that they kept the paſſage, but in the day time, and ſlipt away in the night every one to his own harbour. So at the break of day he mounted thoſe ſteep hills, as if he would openly in the day time march through the ſtreights. Thus having ſpent the day in making ſemblance and ſhew of one thing, and intending another, he encamped himſelf ſtrongly in the place where he had reſted and ſtaid: and ſo ſoon as he perceived, that the mountain people were departed from the ſteep hills, and kept not ſo ſtreight watch and ward; after that he had made ſhew of fires, more than for the number of thoſe that remained behind; and left with the Cavalry all the bag and baggage, with the greateſt part of the footmen: himſelf in perſon took unto him the nimbleſt, moſt active, and valiant ſouldiers lightly appointed, and with all ſpeed paſſed through the ſtreights aforeſaid, and encamped on the very hills which the enemies before held and beſet. Then in the morning betime his camp diſlodged: and the army behind, began to march and ſet forward. By which time the mountainers, at the ordinary ſignal given, came forth out of their Caſtles and Forts, and met at the uſual place of their accuſtomed guards: but then all at once they might ſee ſome of the enemies over their heads, to have gained their own fortreſs, and others alſo marching in the way. Both which objects at one time preſented to their eye, made them blank and to ſtand ſtill in a muſe a good while. But afterwards, when they ſaw Annibal his army, diſtreſſed in the ſtreights, and in great trouble and diſorder among themſelves in the march, by reaſon eſpecially the horſes were ſo affrighted: ſuppoſing, that the leaſt fear and terror (beſides) that they could procure, would be enough for their enemies overthrow and confuſion, they croſſed the rocks overthwart, and (as they were accuſtomed and uſed to them) ran to and fro, up and down through the blind and unhaunted bywayes. But then verily, the Carthaginians were much encumbred, as well by their enemies, as alſo by the diſadvantage of the place, and more ado there was among them (whiles every one ſtrove who ſhould firſt eſcape the danger) than with the enemy. There was nothing that diſordered and troubled the army in the march, ſo much as their own horſes, which (by reaſon of the diſſonant and divers cryes, that the ecchoes between the woods and vallies redoubled) were affrighted: and alſo if any of them chanced to be ſtricken, galled, or wounded; they kept ſuch winſing, and flinging about them, that they overthrew and made great havock of men, and of all ſorts of carriage. Beſides, the preſs was ſo great, and the ſtreights of both ſides ſo ſteep and craggy, that many a man was thrown down head-long a mighty height: yea, and ſome of them armed: and the ſumpter horſes and beaſts for carriage eſpecially tumbled down amain with their load, as if a houſe or Caſtle had come down with a miſchief. Which, although it were terrible to behold, yet Annibal for a while ſtood ſtil, and kept his own men together, for fear of encreaſing this diſorder and affright. But after that he ſaw his army diſbanded and marching in diſarray, and that it was to no purpoſe

A pose to lead his army safe through the streights, if he lost the carriages: for fear hereof, he ran down from the higher ground, and albeit, with the violence of his charge, he discomfited the enemy, yet he encreased the trouble and fear of his own people. But that was soon appeased in a very moment, after the wayes and passages were once cleared, by reason of the Mountainers that were fled: so that within a while the whole host passed through, not only at ease and leisure, but also in a manner without any noise at all. This done, he seized upon a Castle, which was the chief strength of that country, with other villages lying about it: and for three dayes space he victualled and maintained his whole army, with the Cattel of his prisoners. And for that he was now neither molested with the Mountainers, who were at the first discomfited, nor B greatly encumbred with the difficulties of the wayes, in those three dayes he rid a good deal of ground, and journeied a great way into the country; until at the length he came to another coast well peopled (for such Mountain and Hilly quarters;) where he had like to have been overtaken, not by open force, but even in his own professed cunning: first, by a subtile practise, and after by a secret ambush. Certain ancient men, the Rulers and Governours of the Castles, repaired unto Annibal as Orators, saying, That they having been taught and made wise, by the profitable example of other mens harms, made choice, rather to trye the amity, than prove the force of the Carthaginians; and therefore were willing to do his commandment, and be at his devotion: requesting him to take at their hands victuals and guides for their journey, yea, and hostages also for better assurance of promises to be performed. Annibal neither overhastily be-
C lieving them, nor yet churlishly distrusting and refusing their offer, lest being rejected and cast off, they might become open and professed enemies; gave them good language, and a courteous answer, received the hostages whom they gave, accepted victuals, which they had brought with them to maintain his army by the way, and followed their guides, but so, as his army was not disarraied in their march, as if he had been amongst his friends, and in a peaceable countrey. First, went in the van-guard the Elephants, and the Horsemen; himself marched after with the flower and strength of his Footmen, looking all about him with an heedful eye. So soon as he was entred a narrow passage, which of the one side lay under a steep Hill that commanded them aloft, the barbarous people rose out of their ambush from all parts at once, both before and behind, and charged upon him both a far off and neer at hand; yea, and rol-
D led down mighty huge stones upon them as they marched. But the greatest number came behind upon their backs: against whom he turned and made head with the power of his footmen, and without all peradventure (if the tail both of his army, had not been strong and well fortified) they must needs have received in that lane and streights, an exceeding great overthrow. And even then, as it was, they came to an extremity of danger, and in manner fell into a present mischief. For whiles Annibal made long stay; and doubted whether he should engage the Regiment of footmen within the streights, for that he had not left any succours in the rereward to back the footmen, like as himself was a defence to the Horsemen; the mountainers came overthwart, and flanked them; and breaking through the files of the battel, beset the way, and crossed upon him. So that Annibal took up his lodging for one night, without his carriages and Horse-
E men. The morrow after, when as the barbarous people ran between them more boldly than before, he joyned his forces together, and passed the streight not without great damnage and loss; but with more hurt of the sumpter Horses than of men. After this the Mountainers (fewer in number and in robbing wise rather than in warlike sort) ran in heaps one while upon the vanguard, other while upon the rereward, as any one of them could either get the vantage of ground, or by going one while afore, and by staying another while behind, win and catch any occasion and opportunity. The Elephants, as they were driven with great leisure, because through these narrow streights, they were ready ever and anon to run on their noses: so what way soever they went, they kept the army safe and sure from the enemies; who being not used unto them, durst not once come neer. The ninth day he won the very tops of the Alps, through by-lanes
F and blind cranks: after he had wandred many times out of the way, either through the deceitfulness of their guids; or for that when they durst not trust them, they adventured rashly themselves upon the vallies, and guessed the way at adventure, and went by aim. Two dayes abode he encamped upon the tops thereof, and the souldiers wearied with travel and fight rested that time: certain also of the sumpter Horses (which had slipt aside from the rocks) by following the tracks of the army as it marched, came to the camp. When they were thus overtoiled and wearied with these tedious travels, the snow that fell (for now the star Vergily, was set and gone down out of that horizon) increased their fear exceedingly. Now when as at the break of day the ensigns were set forward, and the army marched slowly, through the thick and deep snow; and that there appeared in the countenance of them all, slothfulness and desperation: Annibal ad-
G vanced before the standards, and commanded his souldiers to stay upon a certain high Hill, (from whence they had a goodly prospect and might see a great way all about them) and there shewed unto them Italy, and the goodly champian fields about the Po, which lie hard under the foot of the Alpine Mountains: saying, That even then they mounted the wals not only of Italy, but also of the City of Rome; as for all besides (saith he) will be plain and easy to be travelled: and after one or two battels at the most, ye shall have at your command, the very Castle and head City of all Italy. Then began the army to march forward: and as yet the enemies verily themselves adventured nothing at all, but some petty robberies by stealth, as opportunity and occasion served.

How-

However they had much more difficult travailing down the hill, than in the climbing and getting H up; for that most of the passages to the Alps from Italy side, as they be shorter, so they are more upright: for all the way in a manner was steep, narrow, and slippery, so as neither they could hold themselves from sliding, nor if any tripped and stumbled never so little, could they possibly (they staggered so) recover themselves and keep sure footing, but one fell upon another, as well XXXVI Horse as Man. After this they came to a much narrower rock, with crags and rags so steep downright, that hardly a nimble souldier without his armor and baggage (do what he could to take hold with hands upon the twigs and plants that there about grew forth) was able to creep down. This place being before naturally of it self steep and pendant with a down-fall, now was choked and dammed up with a new fall of earth, which left a bank behind it of a wonderful and monstrous I height. There the Horsemen stood still as if they had been come to their wayes end: and when Annibal marveiled much what the matter might be that stayed them so, as they marched not on: word was brought him that the Rock was unaccessible and unpassable. Whereupon he went himself in person to view the place, and then he saw indeed without all doubt, that although he had fetched a compass about, yet he had gained nought thereby, but conducted his army, to passe through wilds, and such places as before had never been beaten and troden. And verily that (of all other) was such, as it was impossible to pass through. For, whereas there lay old snow untouched and not trodden on, and over it other snow newly fallen, of a small depth; in this soft and tender snow, and the same not very deep, their feet as they went, easily took hold: but that snow, being once with the going of so many people and beasts upon it, fretted and thawed, they were fain to K go upon the bare ice underneath, and in the slabbery snow-broth, as it relented and melted about their heels. There they had foul ado and much strugling, for that they could not tread sure upon the slippery ice: and again going as they did (down hill) their feet sooner failed them: and when they had helped themselves once in getting up, either with hands or knees; if they chanced to fall again, when those their props and stayes deceived them, there were no twigs nor roots about, whereon a man might take hold, and rest or stay himself, either by hand or foot. And therefore all that the poor beasts could do, was to tumble and wallow only, upon the slippery and glasse ice, and the molten slabby snow. Otherwhiles also, they perished as they went in the deep snow, whiles it was yet soft and tender: for when they were once slidden and fallen, with flinging out their heels, and beating with their hoofs more forcibly for to take hold, they brake the ice L through; so as most of them, as if they had been caught fast and fettered, stuck still in the deep, XXXVII hard frozen, and congealed ice. At last, when as both man and beast were wearied and overtoiled, and all to no purpose, they encamped upon the top of an hill, having with very much ado cleared the place aforehand for that purpose: such a deal of snow there was to be digged, shovelled, and thrown out. This done, the souldiers were brought to break that rock through which was their only way: and against the time that it was to be hewed through, they felled and overthrew many huge trees that grew there about, and made a mighty heap and pile of wood: the wind serned fitly for the time to kindle a fire, and then they set all a burning. Now when the rock was on fire and red hot, they powred thereon strong Vinegar for to calcine and dissolve it. When as the rock was thus baked (as it were) with fire, they digged into it, and opened it with picke-axes, and made the M descent gentle and easy, by means of moderat windings and turnings: so as not only the Horses and other beasts, but even the Elephants also might be able to go down. Four dayes he spent about the levelling of this rock: and the beasts were almost pined and lost for hunger. For the hill tops for the most part are bare of grass; and look what forage there was, the snow overhilled it.
The dales and lower grounds have some little banks lying to the sun, and rivers withal, neer unto the woods, yea, and places more meet and beseeming for men to inhabit. There were the labouring beasts put out to grass and pasture, and the souldiers that were wearied with making the wayes, had three dayes allowed to rest in. From thence they went down into the plain country, where they found both the place more easy and pleasant, and the natures of the inhabitants more tractable. N

XXXVIII In this manner and by this means principally, entred the Carthagiuians into Italy, five months after they departed from new Carthage (as some write:) and within fifteen dayes overcame and passed the Alps. What power Annibal had, when he was arrived in Italy, the historians do not agree. They that speak with the most, write that he was 100000 foot, and 20000 horse strong: they that make the least of it, say they were 20000 foot, and 6000 horse. L. Cincius Alimentus, who hath delivered under his hand, that himself was taken prisoner by Annibal (a writer of great authority) would induce me sufficiently to believe him, but that he setteth down the number of confusedly, by adding to the rest, the Gauls and Ligurians. He recordeth, that counting them, the Infantry was 80000, and the Cavalry 10000, which was conducted into Italy (but likely it is that from all parts there came more thither than so, and so some Authors do report) and that he O heard from Annibal his own mouth, that after he had passed Rhodanus, he had lost 36000 men, and a great number of Horses and other beasts of burden, when he was come down into the Taurins Country, which was the next Nation in Italy, adjoyning to the Gauls. Which being a thing agreed upon amongst all, I marvel so much the more, that there is any doubt, on which side he went over the Alps: and that commonly it is believed, that he passed by a place called Penninum, and that thereupon the top of the Alps took the name, and was so called. Celius saith, he took his way over by the top of Cremon: both which passages surely would have brought

A brought him not into the Taurins country, but through the mountain forrests, unto the Gauls called Libui. But neither is it probable, that in those days the same passages were open into France: considering, that the wayes which lead to Penninum were environed with nations half Germans. And certainly the Veragrians, who inhabit this very top (in case a man may build ought upon this conjecture) never knew that these mountains took the name of any passage of the Carthaginians, that way: but of some one place consecrated in the top of the hill, which the peasants and mountainers called Penninum.

Very happily and fitly it fell out for the enterprise of his first designments, that the Taurins the next nation he came unto, made war upon the Insubrians. But Annibal being busied in refresh-
B ing his army (that now had most feeling of their harms which they had caught before) could not arm the same to the aid and gratifying of either party: for ease after travel, plenty upon scarcity, good keeping and delicate, after loathsome nastiness, did by a sudden change greatly alter and distemper their lean and pined bodies, well neer savage and wild grown. Which was the cause that P. Cornelius the Consul, being arrived and landed at Pisa, after he had received of Manlius Attilius an army of new and raw souldiers, fearful for some shameful disgrace and defeat lately received, made haste and highed him to the Po, for to give battel unto the enemy, before he were well refreshed and in heart again. But by that time that the Consul was come to Placentia, Annibal had dislodged and removed his camp, and won by assault the chief City or Town of the Taurins, because it willingly yeelded not to accept of his amity and protection; and surely not by fear only,
C but also of voluntary good will, he had gained unto him the Gauls that inhabited about the Po, but that the sudden coming of the Consul interrupted and surprized them, as they were casting about to spie some opportunity of rebellion. So Annibal dislodged, and removed out of the Taurins country, with this opinion, that the Gauls especially, being doubtful as yet what part to take, would follow him being present in place. Now were the armies in manner one in sight of the other, and the Generals approached nigher together: and as they were not yet well known one unto the other, so they had already both of them a great opinion, and reciprocal admiration one of the other. For as Annibal was much renowned, and his name right well known among the Romans, even since before Saguntum was lost: so Scipio was taken of him, and reputed for some singular and excellent man, in that he especially above all other, was chosen General against him.
D Which mutual conceit and impression they had, they augmented themselves one to the other: for that Scipio, albeit he was left behind in France, yet he met Annibal, and was ready to make head against him, so soon as he was passed the Alps: and Annibal again, because having enterprised so great an adventure, as to pass the Alps, and now brought the same to good effect. But Scipio to prevent Annibal in crossing the Po before him, removed his camp to the river Ticinus: and for to encourage his souldiers, before he brought them forth to battel, he made an Oration unto them, and began in this manner.

"My valiant souldiers and trusty friends, if I were now to lead that army into the field, which "I had with me in France, I would have forborn to make any speech at all unto you; for to what "purpose needed I to exhort, either that Cavalry, which so valiantly had vanquished the horse-E "men of the enemies at the river Rhodanus: or those legions, with whom I followed in chase as it "were, even these very enemies, and whose falling off and refusing battel, I take to be a confession "of victory? But now for as much as that army, being indeed levied for the province Spain, "serveth with my brother Cn. Scipio, under my name and commission, where it pleaseth the Senat "and people of Rome, they should be employed, to the end that ye might have a Consul to be "your Captain, against Annibal and the Carthaginians, I have willingly offered my self to this "war. If being then, your new Captain, and you my new souldiers, meet it is and convenient "I should use a few words unto you. And to the end you should not be ignorant, either of the "manner of this service, or quality of your enemy; with those men ye are to fight, whom in the "former Punick war ye overcame both by land and sea; of whom for these twenty years ye have F "received tribut; from whom ye have won (as the due wages and reward of the war) Sicily "and Sardinia both, and them do hold and occupy. In this battel therefore, both you and they "are to carry that mind, and so to be affected, as winners and losers are to be: for never think that "it is valor and hardiness that provoketh them now to fight, but meer necessity and compulsion "enforceth them to the field. Unless you wil believe, that they who when they had an entire army "and unfoiled refused battel, should now have greater hope, and take more courage, after they "have lost two parts of their horse and foot, in the very passage of the Alps; and of whom, there "have more perished in a manner, then remain alive. But will some man say, True it is, few they "are in number, but stout in heart, and tall of hand, whose strength & puissance, no force is hardly "able to abide. Images they are, nay, to say more truly, the very shadows of men, and no better; G "with hunger bitten, with cold starved, lost for want of keeping, spoiled with nastiness, and filthy "ordure, bruised and weakned amongst hard rocks and craggy cliffs: over and besides, joints and "marrow dried up and burnt, their sinews shrunk, hard, and stiff again with cold and chilling "snow, their lims singed with bitter frost, their armor crushed, bruised, and their weapons bro-"ken; their horses, no other then lame jades and poor hide-bound Tits. See what horsemen, lo "what footmen ye are to fight withal. Beleeve me, ye shall have the very reliques and last rem-"nants of enemies and not enemies indeed. And I assure you, nothing fear I more than this, that "before ye shall skirmish with this kind of enemy, it will be thought that the Alps already have

"vanquished and defeated Annibal. But peradventure it was so meet, and reason would, that H
"the gods themselves without mans help, should against that Captain and nation, which had bro"ken league and covenants, begin the war first, set it in good forwardness, and bring it to the point
"of an end; and then we, who next to the gods have been offended and wronged, should finish
"the same thus begun to our hands, and brought to so good a pass. I fear not that any man here
"doth think, that I utter these brave and glorious words only for to hearten you, and that my "self think otherwise in heart, then I speak with tongue. I might have gone my self well enough
"into Spain, my proper and peculiar province, (where I had been aforetime) and with an army "of mine own: I should have had my brother there, both a counsellor to me in my distresses, and "a companion with me in my dangers. I found Asarubal rather then Annibal mine enemy, and I
"no doubt the affairs and charge of the war far less then here. But when I sailed by the coast of "France, and upon the bruit and news of this enemy was set a land, I sent my Cavalry before, and "removed camp as far as to Rhodanus, and in a battel of horsemen (for with that part of my forces
"it was my hap to encounter and fight) I discomfited the enemy: and for that by land I could "not overtake his Infantry, (so hastily they marched away, like men that fled) I was fain to return "to the sea, and embark again into my ships: and with as great expedition and speed as I could "make (considering so great a compass about of sea and land) at the very foot of the Alps, I was "ready to encounter and affront him. Can it be thought then, that whiles I shunned and avoided
"fight, I fell by chance and at unawares upon this dread and redoubted enemy? or rather, that "I followed him hard at heels, and challenged him, to draw him forth unto a battel, thereby to K
"have it decided who should have the victory in the end? I would gladly make tryal, whether
"all of a sudden the earth hath brought forth for these twenty years, Carthaginians, of another
"mould or new stamp: or whether they be the same that fought neer the Islands Ægates, and "whom ye sent away and let go from Eryx, valued after the rate of 18. * deniers a piece, and no "more: and fain would I see, whether this Annibal be the concurrent of Hercules, to undertake
"his journeys and voyages, as he saith himself: or one left by his father, a tributary, a vassal, and
"a slave of the people of Rome: who but that he is tormented in conscience for the outrage and
"and cruelty committed upon Saguntum would have some respect and regard, if not of his na"tive country (conquered and subdued) yet of his own house, of the peace and covenants writ"ten by his father Amilcar, and his own hand? Asdrubal (I say) who at the commandment of our L
"Consul, removed his garrison from Eryx; who fuming and storming, received with sorrowful "heart the grievous and heavy conditions of peace imposed upon the conquered Carthaginians;
"who capitulated and covenanted to abandon Sicily, and to pay a tribut to the people of Rome: I "would have you therfore (my hardy soldiers) to fight against him, not only with the same cou"rage as you do with other enemies, but in a certain heat of choler & indignation, as if you should "see your own servants and slaves on a sudden to rise up in arms against you. We might well if we "had been so minded, when they were enclosed and shut fast within Eryx, have put them to the "utmost extremity of all worldly pain, and famished them. We might have passed over with our "victorious Armado into Africk, and within few days forced and razed Carthage, without any "battel fought. We pardoned them at their humble request, and took them to mercy; we set them M "out where they were besieged and beleaguered; and notwithstanding that they were by us sub"dued, we made peace, and contracted amity with them: and afterward, when they were mole"sted and distressed with the Africans war, we counted them within our protection. In recom-
"pence of these good favours and demerits, they come against us, under the leading of an humo"rous brain-sick and furious young man, to invade and assail our country. And I would it had "pleased God, that we had all this war for our honor only and reputation, and not for our safety
"and our lives. But we are to fight now, not for the holding and possession of Sicily and Sardinia,
"as in times past; but for our freehold, and the inheritance of Italy: and that which more is,
"there is no army behind our backs to withstand and make head against the enemy, if we chance
"to fail of victory: neither are there any more Alps, which while he is getting over, we might have N
"leisure in the mean time to assemble and prepare new forces. Here in this very place (souldiers)
"must we stand to it, and make resistance, as if we were fighting under Rome walls. Let every man
"think that he is not only to defend and ward his own body, but to protect his wife and litle chil"dren: and let every one regard and take care, not for his privat affairs and domestical charge, "but often consider this, That even now the Senat and people of Rome beholdeth and seeth our "hardy deeds, and look how our force and valor now speedeth and sheweth it self, such from "henceforth will the state and fortune be of that City and Empire of Rome.

These words had the Consul to the Romans. But Annibal, supposing that his men were first to be encouraged by representation of some deeds, & then exhorted with words; having marshalled his army in a round compass (as it were) to behold some spectacle in a Theatre: he set in the midst O of them all, the prisoners mountainers, bound (as they were) hand and foot: and casting down at their feet the armor and weapons of the Gauls he demanded of them by a truchman, or interpreter, Which of them (upon condition to be eased of his bands, and to have armor, and an horse of service, given him for a prize of victory) would enter into combat, and fight at the utterance for his life. And when they all answered with one voice, That they would wish no better, and not one of them but called for a sword, & required to fight: and therupon, the lots were shuffled to be cast, & not one there was but wished himself to be the man, whom fortune would chuse for the combat.

Then

A Then every man as his lot fell, in token of cheerfulneſs and contentment of ſpirit, leapt for joy among his fellows that rejoiced in his behalf, fell a dancing after their manner, and ſo (haſtily) took arms and weapons: all the while that they were in fight there appeared ſuch affection and diſpoſition of mind, as well in them that were in the ſame ſtate and condition, as alſo in thoſe who ſtood there as ſpectators only in the multitude to look on; that no leſs happy and fortunat were they accounted, whoſe chance it was to die in the place, then thoſe who had the upper hand. Upon the ſight of ſome couples that were thus matched in combat, he diſmiſſed them: and whiles he ſaw them in this good mind, ſo well affected and reſolute, then he aſſembled them all together to an audience, and thus by report he ſpake unto them.

B "My valorous ſouldiers, if in the conſideration of your own fortune, ye will anon but bear "that mind, which even now ye ſhewed in beholding the example of the ſtate of others: the jour- "ney is ours, and we have the victory. For that was not a dumb ſhew and bare pageant, but a ve- "ry mirror and pattern of your own condition: and I wot not, whether fortune hath compaſſed "about with harder bonds and greater neceſſities, your own ſelves, or your priſoners. On both "hands, as well the right as the left, encloſed ye are, and ſhut up within two ſeas: and have not ſo "much as one ſhip to embark in for to eſcape away, and ſave your ſelves. Before you neer at hand "is the Po, a greater river; and more violent then Rhodanus; behind you are the Alps to hem you "in; the Alps, I ſay, which ye hardly paſſed when you were in heart and luſty. Here muſt ye "either get victory (ſirs) or loſe your lives, even where ye have firſt encountred your enemy: and C "the ſame fortune, which hath laid upon you neceſſity of fight preſenteth and proffereth unto you "(if you go away with victory) ſuch rewards, as men uſe not to wiſh for greater and more hono- "rable at the hands of the immortal gods. If by our manhood and valour we ſhould but reco- "ver and win again Sicily and Sardinia, which were got from our fathers; thoſe were rewards "and prizes ſufficient: but now, over and beſides what riches or treaſure the Romans in ſo many "triumphs, have gathered, laid up, and held in poſſeſſion, all that will be ours yea and the owners "thereof themſelves withal. Go to it then a Gods name and take arms, in aſſured hope of gaining "ſo rich a booty and reward. Ye have all this while been long enough a courſing and chaſing "the wild beaſts in the wide and deſart mountains of * Luſitania and * Celtiberia, and have ſeen * Portugal.
"no recompence and fruit of your travels and dangers: it is now high time for you to ſerve in * Biſcay, or as D "the wars for good pay and rich rewards, and to receive great wages and prizes for your labour ſome think Arragon.
"and painful ſervice; you that have meaſured ſo long a voyage, paſſed over ſo many mountains "and rivers, and marched through ſo many armed and warlike nations. Here is the place where "fortune hath ſet down the utmoſt bound, and pitched the fartheſt point & limit of your labors: "here will ſhe give you a condigne recompence and ſalary, after you have ſerved and followed "the wars the full time by order and law required. Never think that the victory will be ſo hardly "atchieved, as the war in name is counted difficult. For oftentimes an enemy of ſmall or no rec- "koning and regard, hath given a bloody battel; yea, moſt noble States, moſt renowned and "glorious Kings, have in the very turning of an hand been overthrown. For, ſetting aſide this E "goodly, gay, and glittering name only of the Romans, what is there wherein they are with you "to be compared? To ſay nothing of that continual warfare of yours, for 20 years ſpace with ſuch "valour and happy ſucceſs: even from Hercules pillars, from the Ocean, from the utmoſt bounds "of the earth, through ſo many nations of Spain, and moſt fell and cruel Gauls, ye are come thus "far with victory. And now ſhall ye fight with an army of new and untrained ſouldiers, who no "longer ago then this very ſummer, were beaten, put to the ſword, vanquiſhed and beſieged by "the Gaulsian army (to ſay a truth) not known at all to their own Captain & as little acquainted F "with him. And to ſpeak of mine own perſon, if not born yet at leaſtwiſe brought up in the very "tent and royal pavilion of my father (a moſt noble warrior and renowned Captain of his time) "who have ſubdued Spain, conquered Gauls, overcome not only the people of the Alps but that "which is much more, the very Alps themſelves. Should I make compariſon between my ſelfe, "and this half-year Captain, who hath abandoned and left his own camp and army? Unto "whom, if a man ſhould this day, preſent the Carthaginians and Romans together, without "their enſigns and colours, he could not tell, I dare well ſay, of whether army he were the lea- "der and Conſul. For I make no ſmall account, I tell you of this (my tall fellows) that there is G "not one of you all, who hath not many a time and often ſeen and beheld my ſelf in perſon, per- "forming ſome warlike and military exploit; and unto whom I (as beholder and eye witneſs of "his valor) cannot recount the time and place of his worthy deed & ſervice. Then ye praiſed and "commended me, then ye rewarded & honored me with divers gifts & preſents. And even I (who "have been a ſouldier trained up and taught by you, before I was your General) will march in "battel againſt them, that know not one another, and are unknown likewiſe unto their Captain.
"Which way ſoever I turn and caſt mine eys, me thinks I ſee all full of couragious ſtomack, and "forcible puiſſance. The footmen, old beaten and practiſed ſouldiers: lances and men of arms, with "bard horſes, and the light horſemen likewiſe, choſen forth of moſt hardy and valiant Nations: "of one ſide moſt faithful and reſolute allies; on the other, doughty Carthaginians, ready to "fight, as well in countries defence, as alſo for moſt juſt and due revenge. We come of our "ſelves to make war, and we deſcend into Italy with banners diſplayed, reſolved to fight with "ſo much more courage, as they commonly who are aſſailants, have greater ſtomack and more "hope then the defendants. Over and beſides, our hearts are kindled, and our minds pricked

"on and provoked with ſenſe of injuries and indignities. Firſt and formoſt they required, that I H
"your General ſhould be delivered unto them, as a condemned priſoner at the bar: then they "would have had all you that were at the aſſault of Saguntum, yeelded up into their hands, to be "put to moſt extream torturs & execution. A people they are, ful of all exceſſive cruelty, inſolent
"and proud beyond all meaſure; they would have but all in their power, and at their diſpoſition:
"they muſt preſcribe, limit, and ſet down, with whom we ſhould war; with whom we may "make peace; reſtraining and encloſing us within the tearms and bounds of hills and rivers;
"which, forſooth, we muſt not paſs: and they themſelves keep not the limits which they appoint.
"Paſs not (ſay they) Iberus in any wiſe; meddle not at all with the Saguntins; come not neer "them, Saguntum ſtandeth upon the river Iberus, ſtep not one foot forward, we adviſe you. It I
"ſufficeth not their turn, that they have taken from us our ancient Provinces, Sicily and Sardi- "nia, unleſs they may have away Spain too. And if I ſhould depart from thence, and quit that "Realm alſo, they would not ſtay there, but will paſs over ſtraight into Africk: nay, they have
"ſent over this year already two Conſuls, the one into Africk, the other into Spain: nothing "have they left for us, but that which we can win and hold with the ſwords point. Well may "they be cowards, and play the idle lusks, having a place of refuge to retire unto, who in their "own country and ground may be received, when they take their heels and run through wayes
"without danger, to ſave themſelves. As for us, it ſtands us upon to play the men, and to make "account of no mean deſigns between victory and death, but upon certain deſpair of all ſhifts be-"ſides, either to obtain victory: or if fortune ſhall fail and give us the foil, chuſe rather to die figh- K
"ting, than to be killed flying. If this be ſetled and deeply imprinted in your hearts, if this be your "reſolution, I will ſay once again, The day is yours. A more poinant and ſharper goad, than
"this, to provoke men to victory never gave the immortal gods to any whatſoever.

XLV When by theſe Orations, the ſouldiers hearts of both ſides were inflamed to fight, the Romans made a bridg over Ticinus: and for defence of the bridg, erected a ſconce and fort thereupon. But Annibal while the enemies were buſie at work, ſent Maharbal with a Cornet of Numidians, to the number of 500. light horſemen, to overrun and waſte the territories belonging to the allies of the people of Rome: commanding him withal, to make as great ſpare of the Gauls as he could, and to ſollicit and perſwade their Nobles and Lords unto rebellion. After the bridg was finiſhed, the Roman army paſſed over into the Inſubrians country, encamped themſelves upon certaine L hills, five miles off from a village where Annibal alſo lay in camp: who ſeeing there was a battel toward, ſent ſpeedily for Maharbal back again, and the horſemen: and thinking belike, that he could never ſay enough to his ſouldiers, and admoniſh them ſufficiently to do well and animate them to fight, he called them all again together to an audience; where he propoſed, and promiſed unto them openly, certain aſſured rewards, the hope whereof might incite them to fight: namely, Imprimis, that he would endow them with fair lands in Italy, Africk, or Spain, where they would themſelves, to have, and to enjoy to him and to his heirs for ever, as free hold in frank tenure, without ſervice: if any one would chuſe to have money rather then land him he would content with ſilver. Item, of the allies, as many as hereafter were deſirous to be enfranchiſed Citizens of Carthage, they ſhould have their free burgeoſie: & thoſe that had a mind rather to return home again, M he would endeavor and bring about that he ſhould live ſo well, as not one of them would wiſh for to exchage his ſtate with any of his neighbors and countrimen whatſoever. Laſt of all, look what bond-ſervants attended and followed their maſters, to them he promiſed freedom; and that in lieu of them, he would deliver again unto their maſters, two for one, of the ſlaves taken captives in war. And that they might be aſſured, that he would perform all theſe promiſes, he held with his left hand a Lamb, and in the right a flint ſtone, and prayed ſolemnly, That if he failed herein, Jupiter and the reſt of the gods, would ſo kill him, as he ſlew that Lamb: and preſently after his prayer done, he ſmote the Lamb on the head, and daſht out the brains. Whereat they all every one, conceived and embraced aſſured hope unto themſelves, that the gods ſaid Amen and were on their ſide: and ſuppoſing that the only ſtay of enjoying their hopes, and obtaining their N rewards, was, becauſe they had not fought already; with one heart and voice they called for battel.

XLV The Romans for their part were nothing ſo luſty: for beſides other things, they were affrighted with new prodigies and fearful ſights. For it hapned that a Wolf entred their camp, & after he had worried and torn thoſe that came in his way, eſcaped unhurt. Alſo a ſwarm of Bees ſetled upon a tree that grew over the General's pavilion. Which ſtrange tokens being purged and cleared by an expiatory ſacrifice, Scipio with his Cavalry and darts lightly appointed, went toward the camp of the enemy to view their forces, and to obſerve how many and of what condition and quality they were; and there he encountred Annibal, who alſo was gone forth with his horſemen to diſcover the country about. At the firſt they ſaw not one another but afterwards, by reaſon of the thick duſt C that roſe upon the march of ſo many men and horſes, they knew that enemies approached neer. On both ſides the battaillons made a ſtand, and every man buckled himſelf to the skirmiſh. Scipio placed his Archers and horſemen of the Gauls in the forefront: the Romans and ſtrength of Allies, he beſtowed behind for ſuccours in the reregard. Annibal ſet in this battel, his great barbed horſes with his lances and men of arms, and ſtrengthned the wings with Numidian horſemen. The very firſt charge and ſhout was ſcarce done, when the Archers aforeſaid retired among the rereguard in the ſecond battaillon: by occaſion wherof, the horſmen alone fought a good while in

A qual battel: yea, and afterwards, becauſe the footmen that were intermingled among troubled and diſordered the horſes, many either fell, or elſe alighted from their horſes, to go thither where they ſaw their fellows to be environed and overcharged. The conflict became very doubtful in many places until ſuch time as the Numidians (who were in the wings) wheeling about by little and little, ſhewed themſelves behind the backs of the Romans: this fearful ſight troubled them greatly, and the fear was encreaſed by reaſon of the Conſul his hurt; the extream danger whereof, was put by and avoided by the reſcue of his ſon (then a very ſtripling as yet, and ſcarce had any hair upon his face) this youth is he, who had the honor of happy ending this war, ſurnamed afterwards (upon the noble victory and memorable conqueſt over Annibal and the Carthaginians) Africanus. But the Archers were they that fled faſteſt away, even thoſe whom the Numidians ſet upon firſt. The reſt that were horſemen, keeping thick and cloſe together, recovered their Conſul within their files into the midſt of them: and protecting him not only with their weapons, but alſo with their bodies, brought him back ſafe unto the camp: retiring all the way neither diſorderly, nor like fearful men over haſtily. The honor of ſaving the Conſul, Cælius attributeth unto a bondſlave of Liguria. But I verily would rather beleeve it of the ſon: which alſo the greater number of authors do affirm, but the common fame goeth of the ſaid bondſlave. This was the firſt battel with Annibal: wherein it eaſily appeared that the Carthaginians were better in Cavalry, and therefore the open plain field ſuch as were between the Po and the Alps, were not ſo good for the Romans to fight in. The night following therefore, Scipio commanded his ſouldiers ſecretly C without any noiſe to truſs up bag and baggage, and to diſlodge: and removed from Ticinus, and made haſte to Po: that whiles his boats were not yet unlooſed one from the other, in which (as upon a bridge) he had brought over his army, he might without any trouble and purſuit of the enemy, conduct the ſame back again. And they came to Placentia before that Annibal knew they were departed from Ticinus; howbeit, he took ſome of them that made ſtay on the hither ſide of the bank, as they were too ſlow about diſjoining and looſening the foreſaid bridg of boats: upon which he could not paſs over, by reaſon that when both ends were let looſe, the planks and all, went down the water with the ſtream. Cælius writeth, that Mago with his horſes, and Spaniſh footmen, preſently, ſwam over the river; and that Annibal himſelf led over his army at the upper foords of Po: for which purpoſe, he ſet the Elephants along on arow to break and bear off the D violence and ſtream of the current. A thing ſurely that they were hardly able to do, who were skilful and by long experience knew the nature of the River very well. For it ſoundeth not like a truth, that horſemen with their armor and horſes ſafe, could overcome ſo great a rage of the river, although we ſhould grant that all the Spaniards gat over upon blown bladders or leather veſſels, and beſides, they had needed many days to fetch a compaſs for to find the foords of Po, over which, the army (laden with carriage) might be conveighed. But thoſe authors carry more credit and authority with me, who write that ſcarcely in two days they found a place to make a bridge (of planks joined together) over the river, and that Mago and the Spaniſh light horſemen were ſent that way over before.

Whiles Annibal on this ſide of the River, ſtaid in giving audience to the embaſſages of the Gauls, E he conducted over the regiments of footmen more heavily armed: in the mean while, Mago and the horſemen, after they had paſſed the river, marched one * days journey apace toward the enemies at Placentia. And Annibal (few days after) encamped himſelf ſtrongly ſix miles from Placentia: and the morrow after in the ſight of the enemies he put his men in array, and made them offer of battel. The night following there was a petty maſſacre committed in the Romans camp by the Gauls that came to aid: but greater was the garboil and tumult, then the harm indeed. For about 2000 footmen, and 200 horſemen, having ſlain the warders at the gates, fled away to Annibal: whom he ſpake courteouſly unto, and when he had drawn them on, in hope of great gifts and rewards, he diſmiſſed every one into his own City and Country, to ſollicit and perſwade their countrimen to ſide with him. Scipio taking that maſſacre as a foretoken and overture to the Gauls F revolt in general; and ſuppoſing, that now being once guilty and tainted with this offence, they would in a madneſs run all to take arms and riſe. Although ſtill he were ſore of his late wound, yet the night following at the relief of the fourth watch, he marched ſtilly, and removed his camp neer the river Trebia, into the higher countries, and hills, that were more troubleſom for men of arms. But he wrought not ſo cloſely and without the knowledge of the enemy, as he did at Ticinus. For Annibal having ſent out, firſt, the Numidian light horſe, and then all his Cavalry; without queſtion had diſordered and endammaged the rereward, but that the Numidians for greedineſs of prey and booty, diverted aſide, and turned into the tents, abandoned and forſaken of the Romans. Where, whiles they ſpent time in ranſacking and rifling every corner of the camp (and when all was done, could find no pillage worth the ſtay) the enemy eſcaped their hands. And G when as they had eſpied that the Romans were newly got over Trebia, and pitched out a plot for a camp, they intercepted a few of them that lingred about the river, and ſlew them. Scipio not able now to abide any longer the grief and pain of his wound, by reaſon of the ſhaking and ſhogging of his body as he travelled, and thinking it good to expect the coming of the other Conſul his Collegue, (whom he heard already to be ſent for out of Sicily) choſe out a place neer the river which ſeemed moſt ſafe for to encamp in, and it he fortified. Annibal alſo lay not far off in camp; who as he was proud upon the late battel of horſemen, ſo was he perplexed for want of victuals, which ſcarcity encreaſed upon him every day more and more, as he travelled through the enemies country, finding in no place proviſion aforehand. Whereupon, he went to Claſtidium, a town wherein the Romans had beſtowed and laid up great ſtore of grain: where, as he prepared with violence to force the town, there appeared ſome hope of treaſon, by corrupting of P. Brundiſinus, the captain of the garriſon there, and that with no great ſum of money; for in conſideration only of 400. peeces of gold given unto him, Claſtidium was betrayed unto Annibal: the very ſtorehouſe and garner of corn that the Carthaginians had, all the while they were in leaguer neer Trebia. Upon thoſe priſoners that were taken when the garriſon and fort was betrayed, he exerciſed no cruelty, becauſe that in the beginning of his affairs, he would win himſelf a name and opinion of clemency.

Whiles the war by land continued thus at Trebia, there had been ſome warlike exploits atchieved both by ſea and land about Sicily, and the Iſlands that lie againſt Italy neer unto it, both by Sempronius the Conſul, and alſo before his coming. Twenty gallies with five ranks of Oars and a thouſand armed men, were ſent from the Carthaginians to invade and waſte the coaſts of Italy. Nine of them arrived at * Liparæ: eight fell with the Iſland of Vulcan*, and three were driven by tempeſt into the ſtraights of Sicily. Againſt them being deſcryed within kenning, there were twelve ſhips ſet out from * Meſſana, by Hiero King of the Saracuſians, who hapned at that time to be in Meſſana, attending the Roman Conſul his coming; and without any reſiſtance made he boorded thoſe three ſhips, and brought them away into the Haven of Meſſana. By thoſe that were taken priſoners, it was known that beſides the twenty ſhips aforeſaid, ſent againſt Italy (of which Fleet they were) 35 gallies of five courſe of Oars, made ſail for Sicily, to ſollicit and perſwade the old allies there to revolt. Item, that the eſpecial point and deſign that they ſhot at, was to ſeize upon * Lilybæum: but they thought verily that by the ſame guſt or tempeſt wherein they were ſcattered, that other Fleet alſo was caſt upon the Iſland Ægates. And according to this intelligence, the King from Meſſana writeth to Æmylius the Roman Pretor or Governor of Sicily, adviſing him to keep a ſtrong garriſon in Lilybæum: whereupon the Lieutenants and Colonels about the Pretor, were ſent from him with all ſpeed to all the Cities about, to give order, that their people might be in readineſs, to keep good ward, and above all, to hold Lilybæum ſure. And for preparation of war, there went forth a proclamation, that the ſailers and marriners ſhould bring into the ſhips ten days proviſion of victuals and meat ready dreſſed, to the end that upon the ſignal given at an hours warning, without all delay, they ſhould aſhipboord: Alſo that all that dwelt along the coaſt, ſhould from their ſentinels, watch-towers, and beacons, eſpy when the enemies fleet approached. Now (albeit the Carthaginians of purpoſe ſtayed the courſe of their ſhips, that they might come juſt before day to Lilybæum) they were diſcovered, both for that the Moon ſhone all night, and alſo becauſe they came under ſail which they had hoiſed up. So ſoon therefore as the ſignal was given out of the Sentinels and watch-towers, & alarm cried in the town, the mariners were ſoon imbarked the ſouldiers alſo were beſtowed, ſome to man and guard the wals, and guard the gates, others to ſerve in the ſhips. But the Carthaginians perceiving, they were to deal with them that were provided for them, (as being advertiſed of their coming) forbare to enter the haven until day, and imployed the time in ſtriking ſails, in untackling their ſhips, and preparing them for a battel. When it was broad day light, they retired into the deep, to have ſea roome enough to fight and that the enemies ſhips might have free egreſs out of the haven. The Romans for their part refuſed not battel, comforting themſelves with the remembrance of the valiant exploits performed in that very place, and truſting alſo upon the number and valour of their ſouldiers. They were not ſo ſoon lanched into the open ſea, but the Romans were deſirous to grapple, and to come cloſe to hand fight: but contrariwiſe, the Carthaginians held off aloof, willing to proceed by cunning and policy more then by ſtrength and meer force; and to make trial rather of the nimbleneſs and agility of their ſhips, then either of the proweſs of men, or goodneſs of armor: for as their Fleet was ſufficiently furniſhed, and to the full, with a multiude of marriners, ſo was it ill provided of ſouldiers: and whereſoever they grappled together and came to hand-fight, they had not an equal number of men armed to hold play with the enemies: which being once perceived the Romans gathered heart, and redoubled their courage, by reaſon of their number; the other ſide again were diſcouraged and out of heart, for their default of ſouldiers. Inſomuch as ſeven Carthaginian gallies were ſoon inveſted round and boorded, the reſt fled. Of ſouldiers and marriners together, 1700. were in them taken; amongſt whom, there were three great Gentlemen of Carthage. The Roman fleet ſtill entire and whole, ſave one veſſel only that was bouged and pierced (yet able to be brought back) returned into the haven.

Preſently after this battel, and before that they of Meſſana had knowledge thereof, T. Sempronius the Conſul arrived at Meſſana: and as he entred within the found King Hiero met him, with a fleet well furniſhed and richly decked, and coming forth of his royal ſhip into the Admiral of the Conſuls he welcomed him and rejoyced for the ſafe return of his men and ſhips, and prayed God that his voyage into Sicily might prove happy and fortunate. Then ſhewed he unto him the preſent eſtate, and the affairs of the Iſland; opened the deſignments of the Carthaginians; and promiſed withal, that with as good a mind and ſound heart, as in the former war againſt the Carthaginians when he was a young man, he had aided the people of Rome: ſo now in his old age he would aſſiſt them: and for proof hereof, he would of his own free coſt furniſh both the Conſuls legions, and alſo the marriners with corn and rayment. Among other matters he enformed him how Lilybæum, and other Cities on the ſea coaſt were in great danger, by reaſon of ſome

* Liparæ, one of the Iſlands Æoliæ.
* Vulcano, another of the ſame Iſlands.
* Miſſina.

* Marſalla a City in Sicily, and a Cape there, called the Eye of Sicily.

A ſome among them that deſired a change and alteration. Whereupon the Conſul thought good to make no delay, but to ſet ſail with all ſpeed to Lilybæum, whom the King and his royal fleet accompanied: and as they were ſailing, tidings came of the foreſaid battel before Lilybæum, and how the enemies ſhips were either ſcattered and put to flight, or boorded and taken.

The Conſul having bid King Hiero adieu, with his fleet ſet ſail from Lilybæum, leaving behind him the Pretor to defend the coaſt of Sicily, and croſſed the ſea himſelf to the Iſland * Melita, which was held by the Carthaginians. At whoſe coming, Amilcar the ſon of Giſco, Captain of the garriſon there, rendered himſelf, and 2000. ſouldiers within a very few, together with the Town and the Iſland. From whence, within few days he returned to Lilybæum: where the priſoners B (excepting certain noble perſons of high parentage) were by the Conſul and the Pretor both ſold openly in port-ſale. When the Conſul thought Sicily on that coaſt ſure enough, he ſet ſail from thence towards the Iſlands of Vulcan, for that the bruit went that a fleet of Carthaginians there lay at road: but there were no enemies to be found about thoſe Iſlands: for it chanced they were already paſſed over to waſte along the river and coaſt of Italy; and having forraged the territory of * Vibo, they put the City alſo in great fear. As the Conſul returned back again to Sicily, tidings came that the enemy had made rodes into the country of Vibona: and he received letters alſo from the Senat, concerning the coming of Annibal into Italy, and therefore that he ſhould with all ſpeed poſſible aid and ſuccour his Collegue. The Conſul being at once troubled with many cares, preſently embarked his army, and by the Adriatick ſea, ſent them away to * Ariminum. To Sext. C Pomponius his Lieutenant, he gave the charge of 25 Gallies for the defence of the territory of Vibo, and the ſea-coaſt of Italy. With M. Æmylius the Pretor he left a fleet augmented to the number of fifty ſail: which done, and all things ſet in order in Sicily, himſelf with ten ſhips coaſted along Italy, and arrived at * Ariminum, from whence he put himſelf in his journey, and marched with one army to the river Trebia, where he joined with his fellow Conſul. Now were both Conſuls, and the whole puiſſance and force of the Romans oppoſed againſt Annibal, ſo as it appeared plainly, that either with that power the Empire of Rome might be defended or elſe all their hope was gone. Howbeit, one of the Conſuls being weakned and diſcouraged with the defeat of his horſemen in one battel, and diſmayed beſides with the hurt he had received in his body, deſired to have the fight deferred: but the other coming freſh and luſty, and therby more hardy, would D abide no delay.

* Seſtertio.

It fell out ſo at that time, that the Gauls inhabited all the Country between the two rivers Trebia and Po: who whiles theſe two moſt puiſſant nations were at ſtrife and warred held off as neuters, and favoured neither ſide, making full account of the good will and grace of that part which ſhould have the better. The Romans becauſe they would now make no ſtir, and have no more irons in the fire, took the matter well enough: but Annibal was very much thereat offended, giving out very often, that he was ſent for by the Gauls for their deliverance and liberty. Upon this indignation and diſpleaſure, and for that alſo he would feed his men with booties, he commanded 2000 footmen, and a thouſand horſemen, moſt of them Numidians, and ſome Gauls among, to overrun and ſpoil all the country forward, even to the banks of Po. The Gauls ſtanding in need E of help, and having until that time kept themſelves in doubtful tearms, were forced to turn from thoſe that offered them wrong, and to encline and cleave unto the Romans that ſhould revenge their injuries and protect them. Whereupon they ſent Embaſſadors to the Conſuls, requeſting the Romans help for their land, which by reaſon of the exceeding fidelity, and too much loialty of the inhabitants toward them, was now endangered. Cornelius liked neither the cauſe, nor yet the time to deal in ſuch affairs: he had the nation beſides in ſuſpition and jealouſie as well for many treacherous parts, as alſo (in caſe he would or could forget all other lewd pranks of theirs) for the ſame diſloyalty and falſhood of the Boians. Sempronius contrariwiſe thought it the ſureſt bond to keep their allies in faith and allegeance, to defend thoſe that came firſt to band and ſide with him. But notwithſtanding his Collegue caſt doubts and held off, yet he ſent his own F Cavalry, and a thouſand well neer of footmen darters amongſt them, to guard the country of Gaul beyond Trebia: who coming ſuddenly upon the enemies, and charging them at unawares, as they came ſcattered aſunder, and out of order, yea, and moſt of them laden with ſpoil, mightily affrighted them, and made a foul ſlaughter and purſued them in flight, as far as to their ſtanding camp, and corps de guard. From whence (nevertheleſs) they were beaten back by the multitude that iſſued forth: but by new ſuccors from their own companies, they renued the fight again. The fight afterward was doubtful and variable: and although they made a ſaving bargain on both parts, yet the common voice gave the honor of victory (ſuch as it was) to the Romans rather then the enemies. But no man made a greater matter of it, and reckoned it more to the full, then the Conſul himſelf. "He joyed, he made his boaſt, that he had got the better, with the help of the ſame for- G "ces, which under the conduct of the other Conſul, came by the worſe. And now (ſaith he) the "ſouldiers are comforted and refreſhed wel enough, and none there is but my brother Conſul that "would have the battel deferred: who no doubt is more hen-hearted than bodily hurt: and for "the remembrance and ſmart of a little green wound, quaketh to hear of the field & of all things "cannot away with edg-tools. But we muſt not thus ſit ſtill here and wax aged for the pleaſure of one craſie and ſickly perſon. For what reaſon is it, that we ſhould drive off longer, and ſpend more time in vain? What other Conſul expect we to make up the third? or what army beſides ſhould we look for? The Carthaginians lie encamped in Italy, and well-neer within the view and ſight

"of the City of Rome; and it is neither Sicily nor Sardinia taken from them by conqueſt, nor H
"Spain on this ſide Iberus, which they ſhoot at, to win again: but that the Romans ſhould be
"thruſt out of their native ſoil and country wherin they were born, that is their drift and deſign-
"ment. Oh how deeply (quoth he) would our Fathers ſigh, how heartily would they groan, "they who were wont to mannage war about the wals of Carthage, if they ſhould ſee us their off-ſpring and children, two Conſuls with Conſular and roial armies in the midſt of Italy, fright-ed thus and panting for fear within our camp? And that Annibal hath ſubdued and brought under his ſubjection all the country between the Alps and Appenninum? Theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches uttered he to his Collegue, as he ſat by his beds ſide, where he lay ſick: thus ſpake he, as in an open audience, in the Coſſ. pavilion and all that quarter, to the ſouldiers. The time alſo of the E- I lection of magiſtrates at Rome, being ſo neer at hand, ſet him forward: for fear, leſt the war ſhould be deferred unto the new Coſſ. and the opportunity withal, of winning all the honor to himſelf whiles his Collegue continued ſick, pricked him on. Whereupon, for all the contradiction of Cornelius, which he nothing weighed and regarded, commandment he gave to his ſouldiers to be ready, to give battel anon unto the enemy. Annibal as one that knew and ſaw well enough what was beſt and ſafeſt for his enemy, could hardly imagin or conceive any hope to himſelf, that the Conſuls would enterprize any thing raſhly, or without adviſement; but when he underſtood by hear-ſay, that which afterwards by good proof and experience he found true, namely, that the one of them by nature was hot haſty, proud, and furious: and ſuppoſing, that he was the prouder and more furious for the late good hand he had of his forragers; made no doubt and diſtruſt K of the happy ſucceſs and iſſue of a battel, whenſoever it ſhould come. Marry, careful he was, that no good time and opportunity preſented unto him ſhould be overſlipt: but to try the hazzard and fortune of the field, whiles the enemies ſouldiers were raw and untrained; and the better and wiſer man of the two Generals, was unmeet for ſervice, by reaſon of his wound as yet uncured: and the courages of the Gauls luſty and forward: for well he wiſt, that a mighty number of them would the more unwillingly follow, the further they were drawn from their own home. Annibal, I ſay, hoping that by theſe and ſuch like occaſions, a battel would be ſoon offered; deſirous alſo himſelf to bid battel, if the enemy ſtaid long: and being advertiſed beſides by the Gauls, his eſpials (whom he employed to hearken out and learn what he deſired to know, and thought them more ſure, becauſe they ſerved in both camps) that the Romans were ready for the L field; then began he (crafty Carthaginian as he was) to ſeek out a convenient place for an am-buſh. Now there was in the mid way between, a river running within the borders, having very high banks of either ſide, and therefore lying cloſe hidden, and all about overſpred with moory weeds, with briers, brambles, and bruſh-wood, as for the moſt part, ſuch forlet places are overgrown withal. Which when Annibal in perſon had ridden about, and well viewed, perceiving that it would afford lurking holes handſom enough even for horſemen there to be hidden, This ſhall be the place (quoth he to his brother Mago) which you ſhall keep. Chuſe therefore out of all the horſe and foot a hundred luſty tall fellows of each; and ſee you repair with them to me at the firſt watch, for now is it time to take repaſt, and to refreſh your bodies. And with that he ſent out to the camp the Criers, to call the ſouldiers to ſupper. And long it was not, but Mago was M come with his choſen men. I ſee (quoth Annibal) ye are goodly men of perſon, and ſufficient.
And that ye may be as able in number, as hardy in courage, elect ye alſo out of the Cornets of of horſe and ſquadrons of foot, nine a piece ſuch as your ſelves to ſort withal. Mago ſhall ſhew you the ground where ye muſt lie in ambuſh: you ſhal find the enemy as blind as beetles, altogether unacquainted with theſe feats and cunning devices.

Thus Annibal having committed unto Mago a thouſand horſemen and as many footmen himſelf betimes in the morning, willed the Numidian Cavalry, when they were paſſed over the river Trebia, to ride braving before the gates of the enemies, and by darting and ſhooting into their guards, to provoke and draw them forth to fight: with this direction moreover, when the skir-miſh was begun, to fall off, and ſeem to retire by little and little, and ſo to train them on this ſide N the river, This charge had the Numidians. But the other Captains, as well of foot as horſe, were commanded to let their Companies all to their breakfaſt: which done, to arm themſelves, and with their horſes ready ſadled, to attend the ſignal of battel. Sempronius upon the alarm and hurliburly of the Numidians, as being forward and deſirous of fight, firſt brought forth all his horſemen, and bare himſelf bold and confident in that ſervice; after that ſix thouſand footmen; and at laſt, all his whole forces: and led them to a place which before he had deſigned and appointed in his mind. It fell out to be in Winter, about the midſt of December, and a ſnowy day it was in thoſe parts lying between the Alps and Apenninum. Now by reaſon of the rivers and moors ſo neer both horſe and men were exceeding cold: alſo for that they were haſtily on a ſudden, called forth faſting, and unprovided of all means againſt the cold, they had never a whit of heat left in O them: and the neerer they came to the air and vapour of the river the ſharper cold pinched and pierced them through. But when as once they followed upon the Numidians that gave back and were entred into the water (which by reaſon of the rain that fell by night was riſen breſt-high) they were not ſo ſoon gotten out again of the river, but all their bodies begun to chill and be ſtiff again for cold that ſcarcely they could hold their weapons: and withal, as the day went further on, for very hunger they fainted. But Annibal his ſouldiers, who in the mean time had made fires before their tents, and had oyl ſent them to every company, for to ſupple and ſoften their joints

A and lims, and taken their repaſt, and eated at leaſure; when they heard ſay, that the enemies were paſſed the river, with hearts couragious and bodies freſh and luſty, take them to their weapons, and come forth to fight in ordinance of battel. The Baleares, and light armed men, to the number almoſt of 8000. he ranged before the ſtandards in the front: after them he placed the footmen, better appointed and armed to the proof, even the very ſtrength and manhood of all his forces: about the wings he ſet 10000 horſemen, and behind thoſe wings, he divided and appointed his Elephants both on the one ſide and the other.

The Conſul Sempronius ſeeing his horſemen following the chaſe on the ſpur, and out of order; and how at unawares they were charged again by the Numidians, who upon a ſudden turned and B made head upon them, ſounded the retreat: and when they were rallied about him, he compaſſed his footmen with them. The Romans were in number 18000. of Allies and Latines 20000. beſides the aids of the * Cenomanes: which Nation of the Gauls only, continued faithful and true to the Romans. With theſe forces came they into the field, and began the battel. The firſt charge of the skirmiſh was given by the Iſlanders of Baleares, upon whom, when the legions made head with greater violence, their light armed men were quickly brought into the wings: which was a cauſe that the Roman horſemen preſently were ſurcharged and diſtreſſed. For whereas of themſelves they were but 4000. horſe, and hardly able to withſtand the ſhock of ten thouſand horſemen of the other, the Romans alſo were wearied, but moſt of the Carthaginians freſh and untainted: over and beſides, they were overwhelmed with a cloud (as it were) of darts, flung and C ſhot by the Beleare Iſlanders: Moreover the Elephants which appeared aloft from the hindmoſt ends of the wings frighted the horſes eſpecially, and not only with the ſtrange ſight, but alſo with as uncouth a ſcent and ſavor, made them flie every way. The battel of the Infantry was equal in courage of heart, rather then in ſtrength of body: which the Carthaginians, (as having a little afore taken repaſt) brought freſh with them into the field: but contrariwiſe the Romans were faſting and weary, and for cold even ſtark and benummed. Howbeit their ſtomacks would have ſerved to have held out and withſtood to the end, if they might have fought with footmen onely. But both the Baleares, having diſordered the horſemen, flanked them with their ſhot, and alſo the Elephants by this time were entred into the middle battaillon of footmen: and with al, Mago and the Numidian light horſe (ſo ſoon as this battaillon was unawares gone paſt their am-D buſhment and lurking holes) ſtart up and aroſe from behind, and put them in exceeding trouble and fright. Yet for all theſe inconveniencies and diſadvantages (ſo many on every ſide) the main battel a good while ſtood unmovable and ſtirred not, but kept the array, and eſpecially (beyond the expectation of all men) againſt the Elephants. For certain footmen placed for the purpoſe by flinging of darts forced them to turn head: and when they were once turned fromwards, they followed hard upon them, pricking and galling them under the tails, in which place by reaſon of the tender skin they are ſoon wounded. Whom when Annibal ſaw thus feared and ready to turn upon their own part, from the main battel to the flanks and outſides, he commanded them to be driven unto the left wing upon the Gauls that came to aid, and preſently enforced them to run away. The Romans ſeeing their auxiliary Gauls put to flight, were driven into a new fear. Wher-E upon fighting now as it were in a ring and round on both ſides, there were among them to the number alſo of 10000, who ſeeing no way elſe to eſcape, brake through the middle battaillon of the Africans, which was ſtrengthned with the aid of the Gauls, and that with a great ſlaughter of their enemies: and ſeeing they neither could return into their camp (the river being between) nor for the rain well diſcern how to ſuccour their fellows, they took the way ſtraight to Placentia. After this, the reſt brake forth in all parts. They that took the river either periſhed in the ſtreams and whirl-pools: or ſuch as made ſtay to enter, were by the enemy overtaken and ſlain. But as many as here and there fled ſcattering through the fields, following the footing and tracks of the battaillon that retired back, came to Placentia. Some for fear of the enemy, adventured boldly to take the river, and being once over, recovered the camp. The rain and ſnow together, and F the intolerable cold killed many, as well men as beaſts: and in manner all the Elephants. The Carthaginians followed the enemies in chaſe as far as Trebia, and there gave over: and returned into the camp ſo clumſie and frozen, as ſcarcely they felt the joy of their victory. By reaſon wherof, the night following, when as the guard of the Roman camp, and the remnant of that great company of ſouldiers paſſed Trebia with float-boats and flat barges, the Carthaginians either perceived them not indeed for the noiſe the tempeſtuous rain made, or for wearineſs and ſore wounds were not able to ſtir, and therefore made ſemblance, as though they knew not of it. And ſo whiles the Carthaginians were at reſt, the army was by Scipio the Conſul brought (in a ſtill march) to Placentia: and from thence having croſſed the Po, came to Cremona, becauſe one Colony alone ſhould not be charged with the wintering of two armies at one time.

G Upon this defeat and overthrow, there arrived ſuch fearful tidings at Rome, that they beleeved verily and looked for no other but that the enemy would come with banner diſplayed ſtraight to the very City: and that there was no hope nor help left behind to defend their gates and walls from aſſault and violence. For ſeeing that the one Conſul was vanquiſhed at Ticinus and the other alſo, who was called unto him out of Sicily; ſince both Conſuls, and two conſular armies were thus defeated, what other Captains, what Legions remained now to be ſent for, to aid? As they were in this agony and fear, Sempronius the Conſul came home: who with very great danger had paſſed through the enemies Cavalry, which was ſpread here and there all about, to fetch in booties:

and more by venturous hardineſs then good advice and hope, either to miſs them uneſpied, or to reſiſt if he had hapned upon them, he got away. And after he had held the aſſembly for election of the Conſuls (the only thing above all other for that preſent moſt deſired) he returned into his ſtanding camp to winter in. Now there were created Conſuls, Cn. Servilius, and Cn. Flaminius the ſecond time.

Howbeit the Romans were not in quiet within their wintering camp: for the Numidian horſemen ranged about, and made excurſions into every quarter, and (thoſe who troubled and empeached them, more then they) the Celtiberians and Portugals. Whereby all convoy of victuals from every part was ſtopped, but only that which came by the Po, in Keels and ſuch like veſſels. Neer to Placentia there was a merchants town, both fortified ſtrongly, and alſo well furniſhed with a good garriſon: upon hope to force that caſtle or town, Annibal went with his horſe and foot, lightly armed; and ſuppoſing that to carry the matter covertly, would avail much to the effecting of his purpoſed enterpriſe, he came upon them in the night; howbeit he was not ſo cloſe and ſecret, but he was deſcried by the watch: who ſuddenly ſet up ſuch an alarm, that it was heard as far as Placentia. Whereby, the Conſul ſomewhat before day was there with his Cavalry, having commanded the Infantry to march on after, ranged in a ſquare battailion. In the mean while the horſemen skirmiſhed, wherein Annibal was hurt, and departed out of the skirmiſh, by which means the enemies were frighted, and the Caſtle and hold manfully defended. After few days that he had taken his eaſe, before he was well cured of his wound, he went forward to aſſault Victumvic. That was a town alſo of merchandize (or mart town) and had been fortified by the Romans in the Gauls war. Whereupon, the people bordering there about on every ſide, uſed thither to make repair, and much frequented the ſame: and even then for fear of rodes and excurſions many of the Peaſants and rural people retired themſelves thither for refuge. This multitude (ſuch as they were) upon the report of the valiant holding and defence of the fort by Placentia were encouraged, and took arms, and went forth to encounter Annibal. And in the midway they chanced to affront him and skirmiſh, in no battel array, but as they marched diſorderly: whereas they were on the one ſide, none but a rude and confuſed ſort; and on the other ſide, both a Captain that might truſt his ſouldiers, and ſouldiers alſo that might reckon upon their Captain, there were to the number of 35000, diſcomfited and put to flight, even by a few of their enemies. The morrow after, they yeelded themſelves and received a garriſon within the walls: and ſo ſoon as upon commandment to give up their armor they had obeyed and ſo done; preſently a ſignal was given unto the conquerors to ſack and ſpoil the town, as if it had been forced by aſſault: where there was not forgotten and omitted any calamity whatſoever, that might afford in ſuch a caſe memorable matter & ſufficient argument for writers to record. So pitiful examples were practiſed upon the poor ſilly wretches, of all looſneſs and luſt, cruelty, and inhuman pride and outrage. And theſe were the expeditions and enterpriſes of Annibal atchieved for this winter time.

After this the ſouldiers took repoſe, but no longer then the intollerable cold laſted: For immediatly upon the very firſt and doubtful tokens of ſpring; he departed from his wintring hold, and led his army into Tuſcany, purpoſing to adjoin unto him (either by force or love) that nation alſo, as well as the Gauls and Ligurians. But as he paſſed over Apenninum, there aroſe ſo terrible a ſtorm and tempeſt, and ſurpriſed him, that it ſurmounted well-neer the foul trouble and encumbrance endured in the Alps. For the wind and rain together did beat and drive upon their very faces. At the firſt, for that either they were to lay away their armor, or elſe in ſtriving and labouring to march on againſt the weather, and by the whirl-puffs of wind turned round about, and ready to be born down, they ſtood ſtill: but when as now the violence and fury of the ſtorm, ſtopped their breaths, ſuffered them not to take their wind at will, they were fain to turn their backs, and ſit them down on the ground for a time. Then ſee, the skie thundered amain, and made an horrible noiſe, and amid thoſe terrible cracks redoubled, it lightned thick. Whereupon, they loſt their hearing and ſeeing; and for fear, all of them became aſtonied. At length it poured down and thereby the wind and ſtorm encreaſed more forceably upon them. Whereupon they were driven to this neceſſity, even to pitch their camp, even in that very place where they were ſo ſuddenly caught and overtaken by tempeſt. But that was to them the beginning of a new toil and travel: for neither could they ſpread and diſplay ought, nor pitch any thing ſurely: neither would that which was pight down continue and abide the wind, which rent and tare, and broke every thing, and hurried it clean away. And within a while, the water that fell, and by reaſon of the wind was raiſed aloft, being congealed once upon the cold tops of the hills, turned into a kind of hail and ſnow together, and came upon them with ſuch a force, that leaving all things elſe, the men were forced to lie along, groveling upon their faces, rather ſtifled and ſmothered, then covered with their hillings. Hereupon enſued a froſt, ſo violent and outragious, that of that miſerable and pitiful heap of men and beaſts, that lay there along, there was not one for a good while could raiſe and lift up himſelf when he would, by reaſon, that for ſtark cold their ſinews were benummed, that they could hardly bend and bow their joints. Afterwards, at length, when with beſtirring and chafing their limbs, they gat ſome heat, and came again to themſelves, and that here and there in ſome places they began to make fires; every one that had no means ſo to do, ran and fled to the ſuccor and help of others. Thus for two days they remained there pinned up as if they had been beſieged. Many a man and beaſt, and ſeven Elephants alſo of them that remained after the battel at Trebia, were ſtarved and periſhed.

By

A By occaſion hereof, Annibal departed from Apenninus, back again toward Placentia: and when he had marched ten miles on his way, he ſat him down and encamped. The morrow after he led againſt the enemy 12000 foot, and 5000. horſe. Sempronius the Conſul alſo, being now returned from Rome, refuſed not battel: and the ſame day, the enemies were diſtant but three miles aſunder. The morrow after they fought on each ſide moſt fiercely and couragiouſly, and with variable event and fortune. At the firſt-on ſet the Romans had the better hand, ſo far forth, as that not only in fight they overcame their enemies, but alſo after they had diſcomfited them, and put them back, they chaſed them into their camp, and anon aſſailed the ſame. Annibal having ordained ſome few to defend the rampart and the gates, retired the reſt thick and cloſe together into the midſt of B the camp, and commanded them to give ear and be intentive to the ſignal, when he would have them iſſue forth. Now was it the * ninth hour of the day, when the Roman Conſul having toiled and wearied his ſouldiers to no purpoſe, and ſeeing no hope to win the camp, ſounded the retreat. Which ſo ſoon as Annibal heard and ſaw the fight withal to ſlack and wax cold, and the enemy retired back from the camp, preſently ſallied forth himſelf with the whole ſtrength of his Infantry, for he had ſent out his horſemen both on the right hand and the left after the enemies. There had not been lightly a more fierce and cruel battel ſtrucken, and more memorable, for the final miſchief of both parts, if the day would have given them time to have fought longer. But the night parted the fray, which was hotly begun with exceeding ſtomack and courage. Whereupon, the confronting and charging one of another, was more eager then the ſlaughter bloody between them: and C as the fight in manner was equal, ſo they parted with loſs alike. For of each ſide there died above ſix hundred footmen, and half as many horſemen. But the loſs on the Romans ſide was greater than in proportion of the number, becauſe certain of the degree and calling of Knights, and five Colonels, and three Captains of the Allies were ſlain.

* Three of the clock after noon.

After this journey, Annibal went into the country of the Ligurians, and Sempronius to Luca. To welcome Annibal at his firſt coming into Liguria there were delivered unto him two Roman Queſtors or Treaſurers, Cn. Fulvius, and L. Lucretius who were intercepted by the Ligurians, & taken in a train of ambuſh, with two Colonels, and five others beſides, whoſe fathers by calling were as good as Senators fellows: and this was done, becauſe he ſhould aſſure himſelf the better, that the peace and amity contracted with them, would be faithfully kept and obſerved.

D Whiles theſe things thus paſſed in Italy, Cn. Scipio who was ſent into Spain with a fleet and army for ſea and land; having ſet ſail from the mouth of Rhodanus, and compaſſed the mountains Pyrenei, arrived at a place called Emporia: where he diſbarked and landed his forces and reduced unto the Roman Empire all the country, beginning at the Laletans and ſo from thence all the ſea coaſt as far as to the river Iberus, partly by renewing their ancient leagues, and partly by deviſing means to contract new. Whereupon, there aroſe a great name of him for his clemency; whereby he prevailed not only with the States by the ſea ſide but alſo amongſt the inlanders and mountainers, even to the nations that were more fierce & ſavage: with whom he not only made peace, but alſo wrought them ſo, that they took arms in his quarrel; and there were levied from among them, certain ſtrong cohorts and bands for to aid and ſuccour him. Hanno, whom Annibal had E left for defence of that province, was not ignorant hereof: and therefore, before all was gone, and the country alienated, he thought good to meet with this miſchief: and having pitched his camp in ſight of the enemies, ſet his men in ordinance of battel. The Roman Captain likewiſe reſolved not to defer the fight; knowing that ſo, he might be forced to encounter both with Hanno and Aſdrubal, and rather yet he deſired to deal with them one after the other ſingle, than at once with both. But this battel was not ſo much dangerous. Six thouſand enemies were left behind ſlain, and two thouſand taken priſoners, together with thoſe that were left for the guard of the camp. For both the camp was forced and won, and alſo the General himſelf with certain guards was taken priſoner. Moreover Stiſſum, a town neer unto the camp, was won by aſſault: howbeit, the ſpoil and pillage of the town were matters of ſmall worth and value; namely, the houſhold F ſtuff, and ſuch pelf and trumpery of barbarous people, and certain poor baſe ſlaves. It was the camp that enriched the ſouldiers: by reaſon that not only the army which was now vanquiſhed, but that alſo which with Annibal ſerved in Italy, and left behind them about Pyreneus, all good things to ſpeak of, that they ſet ſtore by, becauſe they would go lightly, and not be encumbred with carriages. Before any certain report of this overthrow came to Aſdrubal, he had paſſed over Iberus with 8000. footmen and 1000 horſemen, as purpoſing to make head againſt the Romans at their firſt coming: but when he heard how the field was loſt, and the camp withal, he turned his journey to the ſea. And not far from * Tarracon, he found the ſouldiers of the Armado, and the marriners beſides, wandring and ſtragling over the fields (for uſual it is, that happy ſucceſs ſhould breed careleſs negligence) whereupon he ſent out his horſemen every way, and with G great ſlaughter and flight he chaſed them to their ſhips: and not adventuring to make any longer ſtay thereabout, for fear to be ſurpriſed of Scipio, he retired back to the other ſide of Iberus. Scipio alſo upon the firſt report of theſe new enemies, having rallied his forces together in great haſte, after he had ſlightly chaſtiſed a few Captains, and left behind him a ſmall garriſon at Tarracon, returned with his fleet to Emporia. He had no ſooner departed from thence, but Aſdrubal was there in his place; and having induced and incited the State of the Ilergetes (who had given hoſtages to Scipio) for to revolt and rebel, even with their own youth waſted the territories of all thoſe that continued faithful confederates to the Romans. Afterwards, when Scipio was rouſed once out of the place where he wintered, the enemy retired again, and quit all the country on that ſide Iberus. Then Scipio having in hoſtile manner invaded the countries, abandoned and left by him that was the author and cauſe of their rebellion, and by that means the nation likewiſe of the Ilergetes, after he had driven them all within Athanagia, which is their capital town, he laid ſiege unto it round about, and within few days brought the whole ſeignory of the Ilergetes under his obedience: and beſides a greater number of hoſtages then before (which they were conſtrained to deliver) he condemned them in a good round ſum of money. From thence he went forward againſt the Auſetanes, neer to Iberus, being aſſociats alſo to the Carthaginians: and having beleaguered their City, he fore-layed and intercepted the Lacetans as they came by night to ſuccour their neighbors, not far from the town, even as they were at the point to enter in. There were ſlain of them 12000, and the reſt being well-neer all diſarmed, fled every way ſcattering here and there over the fields home to their houſes. All the help and defence that they had who were within, was only the foul and cold winter weather, evermore naught and hurtful to aſſailants that lie forth. The ſiege laſted thirty days, during which time, ſeldom fell the ſnow leſs then four foot deep, and ſo covered the pentiſes and mantilets of the Romans, that when the enemies flung fire ſundry times thereupon that alone ſaved the ſame & nothing elſe. In the end, upon the departure of their Prince Amurſitus, who was fled to Aſdrubal, they yeelded, upon condition to pay * twenty talents of ſilver. & ſo Scipio returned to Tarracon, there to winter.

* 3750 pound ſterling, according to the leſs Attick Talent.

But that year, at Rome and about the City, were many ſtrange and prodigious ſigns ſeen, or at leaſtwiſe (a thing uſual when mens minds are once touched with religion, and given to make ſcruple) many were reported, and ſoon beleeved. Among which, this was one; that a babe of condition free born, and but half yeer old, cried with a loud voice in the herb market Io Triumphe. Alſo in the beaſts market, an Ox of himſelf undriven, climbed up to the third loft or ſtory of an houſe, and from thence being frighted with the ſtir and noiſe of the dwellers by, caſt himſelf down. Moreover, there was ſeen in the welkin or element, the reſemblance of a navy of ſhips; and the Temple of Lady * Spes, ſtanding in the herb market, was ſmitten with lightning. Likewiſe at Lanuvium the ſpear of Juno ſhook and brandiſhed of it ſelf: and a Raven flew into Juno's Church, and lighted upon the very Shrine or Altar of Juno. In the territory of * Amiternum, in many places were ſeen men, as it were, in white garments, but only afar off; for as folk went neerer and neerer, they appeared not, and could not be met withal. In Picenum it rained ſtones: and at Cere the lots were found diminiſhed; and in Gaul, a Wolfe drew forth a watchman his ſword out of his ſcabbard, and carried it away. For other prodigious tokens, order was given to the Decemvirs to peruſe the books of Sibylla. But for the raining of ſtones in Picenum, there was ordain a Novendial feaſt for nine days: and for the expiation of the other prodigies, the whole City in manner was occupied in their devotions. And now above all other things the City was ſolemnly purged, and greater beaſts killed in ſacrifice in the honor of thoſe gods, for whom they were ordained, and a preſent of gold weighing * 40. pound, was carried unto Juno at Lanuvium. And the dames and matrons of Rome erected a molten image of braſs for Juno in Aventinum: and at Cere where the lots were diminiſhed, was appointed a Lectiſtern, and a proceſſion or ſupplication to Fortune in Algidum. At Rome alſo there was a Lectiſtern ſolemnized to Juventa [the goddeſs of youth] and a ſolemn proceſſion at the church of Hercules. Moreover, expreſs commandment was given to all the people, to make proceſſion and ſupplication at every Altar and Shrine of their gods. And to god Genius, they ſacrificed five greater beaſts. And C. Attilius Serranus the Pretor, was commanded to pronounce a ſolemn vow, in caſe the Common-weal continued in the ſame good eſtate, ten years, and decayed not. Theſe portentous prodigies thus expiated, and vows made according to Sibyls books, eaſed mens hearts mightily of their religious fear. Then one of the elect Conſuls, to wit, Flaminius, to whom were allotted thoſe Legions which wintered at Placentia, ſent an Edict with Letters to the Conſul, that the Army ſhould be in camp at Ariminum, upon the * Ides of March. His purpoſe was, to enter into his Conſulſhip in the Province, remembring the old contentions and debates which he had with the Nobles, firſt when he was a Tribun of the Commons, and afterwards when he was Conſul, as well about the Conſulſhip (of which, they would have deprived him) as alſo, about the triumph, which they denied him. Hated he was beſides of the Senat, for the new Act or Law, which Q. Claudius (a Tribun of the Commons) had made, ſo prejudicial to the Senat; and only C. Flaminius) of all the Nobles, ſupported it and ſet it forward: namely, That no Senator, or father of a Senator, ſhould have a Ship at Sea, bearing above * 300. Amphores: for that was thought ſufficient to tranſport their commodities and fruits to Rome, riſing out of their Lands and livings. And as for all other gain by traffick, it was not beſeeming a Nobleman and Senator. This matter having been debated with great contention cauſed the propoſer of this law (Flaminius) to incur much evil will and diſpleaſure with the Nobility, but it procured him the affection and love of the Commons, and in proceſs of time a ſecond Conſulſhip. Suppoſing therefore, that with iterating the Auſpices, and putting him to take the preſages anew by the flight of birds, and by finding other delays, upon occaſion of the Latine holy days, and one buſineſs or other belonging to the Conſuls charge, they would detain and keep him back ſtill in the City; he ſet a countenance, as though he would take a journey like a private perſon, and ſo departed ſecretly into the Province. Which thing, when it was once blazed abroad, made the Nobles who were afore maliciouſly bent againſt him, to be angry anew; and they gave out, that it was not the Senat only, that C. Flaminius warred

A against, but the immortal Gods alſo. For he, who before time had been made Coſ. without regard of taking Auſpices, and having the approbation of the birds, when he was reclaimed and called both by God and man out of the field, obeied not: and now, having a heavy conſcience, ſurcharged with offences paſt, hath fled from the Capitol and the ſolemn nuncupation and making of vows, for that he would not upon the ordinary day of entring his Magiſtracy, viſit the Temple of Jup. Opt. Max. nor (becauſe he was odious to the Senat, and they likewiſe hated of him alone) ſee them and ask their adviſe and counſel; nor proclaim the Latin Holy-dayes, and celebrate to Jup. Latialis the ſolemn yearly ſacrifice upon the Alban Hill: nor yet, after he had entred into the Capitol by the lucky flight and token of birds, pronounce his vows there, and depart from B thence in his rich coat-armor toward the Province. They ſaid moreover, that he was ſlipt and ſtoln ſecretly away like a drudge that followeth the camp, without the enſigns and ornaments of authority without Sergeants and Officers, as if he had been baniſhed, and ſo left his country, minding belike to enter his government more for the honor and dignity of Ariminum than of Rome. and to put upon him his purple robe of eſtate, embroidred with ſcarlet rather in an hoſtelry and common Inne, than in his own houſe. They all every one opined and judged that he ſhould be recalled and brought back again peremptorily, yea and be forced perſonally at home to perform all duties belonging to God and man before that he went forth to the Province and to the army. About this embaſſage (for they thought meet to ſend Embaſſadors) went Q. Terentius, and M. Antiſtius: but they prevailed no more than in his former Conſulſhip the letters miſſive had done, C which were ſent from the Senat. A few dayes after he entred his office, and as he was ſacrificing, the Calf or young Bullock being already ſtickt got away from the hands of the ſacrificers, and ſpotted many of the ſtanders by with bloud. But they that ſtood far off, not knowing what the matter was of that ſtir, fled away, and ran to and fro: which of moſt men was judged a foretoken and preſage of ſome great affright and trouble. After this, when he had received the two legions of Sempronius the Conſul of the year before, and other two, of C. Attilius the Pretor, he began to conduct his army into Tuſcany by the way of Apenninum.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the two and twentieth Book.

E ANnibal came into Hetruria, after he had loſt one of his eyes by occaſion of continual watching in the mariſhes, through which he marched four dayes and three nights without taking his repoſe & ſleep. C. Flaminius the Conſul a raſh and inconſiderat man, went forth, contrary to the warrant and approbation of the Auſpices, and cauſed the field-enſigns to be digged out of the ground, when otherwiſe they could not be plucked up: and being mounted on Horſe-back, fell with his head forward from his horſe. His fortune was to be ſurpriſed in an ambuſh by Annibal, which he had laid for him neer the Lake called Thraſymenus: where he and his army were defeated, and fell upon the edge of the ſword. Six thouſand Romans, who brake through and made an eſcape, notwithſtanding the faithful promiſe that Maharbal had made unto them, were by the falſhood of Annibal put in priſon. When upon the news of this overthrow, there was great mourning and ſorrow at Rome, there fortuned two mothers to die for very F joy, that beyond their hope and expectation, they recovered their ſons, and ſaw them alive, whom they ſuppoſed to have been ſlain in that field. In regard of the foreſaid defeat, there was vowed a ſacred ſpring, according to the books of Sibylla. After this, when Q. Fabius Maximus the Dictator ſent againſt Annibal, would not come to a ſet battel with him, for fear he ſhould hazard in fight the ſouldiers lately terrified and daunted with adverſe overthrows, againſt an enemy luſty and proud of ſo many victories, and by making head, and oppoſing himſelf only againſt Annibal, empeached his attempts and enterpriſes: M. Minutius the General of his Horſe, a man of a proud ſpirit and brain-ſick humour, with charging the Dictator, and accuſing him unto the people for a fearful and cowardly perſon, prevailed ſo much, that by vertue of their power and authority, he was joyned in equal commiſſion and command with the Dictator. By means whereof, the army and the forces were parted indifferently between them, and Minutius gave the enemy battel in a place of great diſadvantage, whereupon his Legions were diſtreſſed & in great ha-
G zard: but F. Maximus came in time to his reſcue with his part of the army, and ſaved him out of the preſent danger. By occaſion of which good turn he was overcome, and his ſtomack came down, inſomuch, as he was content to joyn in camp with him, and ſaluted him by the name of Father: commanding all his own ſouldiers to do the ſame to their fellow ſouldiers under F. Maximus. Annibal after he had waſted and overrun Campain, chanced between the Town Caſilinum and the mountain Calicula to be incloſed and compaſſed about by Fabius: but by a device of tying little bavins of drie ſtick unto oxes horns and ſetting them on fire, put to flight and claſed away the guards of the Romans which kept the ſtreights of Calicula, and by that means gat through the paſſage of that forreſt. The ſame Annibal, at what time as he made havock and burned all the territory about, forbare to touch the Land of Q. Fabius Maximus the Dictator, to the end that he might bring him into ſuſpition of treaſon to the State. After this, when Æmylius Paulus, and Terentius Varro were Conſuls and Generals of the army, there was a battel fought with Annibal, to their exceeding loſſe and utter overthrow, neer unto a village called Cannæ. At which field there were ſlain of Romans, 45000. together with Paulus the Conſul, and fourſcore Senators, beſides thirty other brave perſonages that had been Conſuls or Pretors, or at leaſtwiſe Ædiles of State. After this d feat, when the noble young Gentlemen of the City (for very deſpair of the State) were in counſel to abandon Italy, P. Cornelius Scipio (a Colonel, who afterwards was ſurnamed Affricanus) held his naked ſword over their heads, as they ſat in conſultation, and ſware a great oath, that he would repute him for a mortal enemy that would not ſwear after him: and hereby effected thus much at their hands, that by vertue of an oath, they obliged themſelves not to depart out of Italy and forſake their native country. This book containeth beſides, the fright and lamentation made within the City, and the affairs and exploits atchieved in Spain, with more happy ſucceſs. Opinia and Feronia, two profeſſed veſtal Virgins, were convicted of Inceſt, and condemned. By reaſon of ſmal number of ſouldiers and ſerviceable men for the wars, there were 8000 ſlaves put in arms. The Captives taken priſoners in the wars, when they might have been redeemed, were not ranſomed for all that. A ſolemn meeting there was for Varro his welcome home, with great thanksgiving, becauſe he had not deſpaired of the Common-weal.

The two and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

NOW approached the ſpring, when Annibal removed out of his wintering holds, after he had aſſayed before to paſs over the Apennine, but in vain, by reaſon of the intolerable cold; where alſo he ſtayed in great fear and danger of his own perſon. By which time, the Gauls, who having riſen up in arms on his ſide, for hope of ſpoil and pillage, ſeeing now in ſtead of harrying and carrying away of booties out of other mens Lands, that their own country was become the place of the war troubled and moleſted as well with the one army as the other which abode there all winter turned their hatred and malice from the Romans back again upon Annibal: In ſuch ſort, as after he had been ſundry times forelaid by the ſecret trains of their Princes, and in danger to be murdred, he eſcaped only by the deceiptfulneſs and falſhood practiſed among their own ſelves. For with what inconſtancy and levity they had conſpired together, with the ſame they bewrayed one another, and detected the conſpiracy unto him. By means whereof, as alſo by changing one while his apparrel, another while the bonet and attire of his head, by errour alſo and miſtaking, he avoided the peril, and ſaved himſelf. But ſo it was, that even this fear in which he ſtood, cauſed him to remove the ſooner out of his wintering harbour.

About the ſame time Cn. Servilius entred into his Conſulſhip at Rome, on the * Ides of March: where, after he had propounded to the Senat concerning the affairs of the Common-weal, the hatred and malice which the LL. had conceived againſt C. Flaminius, was renewed afreſh. For they ſaid, that they created two Conſuls, and had but one. For that lawful government and authority which Flaminius ſhould have had, that auſpice of Magiſtracy which was meet and due, he ought to have carried with him from the City, from the publick and private habitations, after he had celebrated the Latin holy-dayes, and offred ſacrifice upon the mountain Alban, and made his ſolemn vows accordingly, within the Capitol. But ſince for default herein, he departed from the City a private perſon, the Auſpices of government could not follow and accompany him: and being gone without them, he might not lawfully take the ſame anew in forrein ſoil. Now there were ſundry ſtrange prodigious tokens beſides, reported from many places at once, which much encreaſed their fear: namely, that in Sicily certain ſouldiers javelins were on fire: and in Sardinia, a Horſemans walking ſtaff, as he went the round, and viſited the watch upon the wall, burned in his hand: That upon the ſtrand and Sea ſhore, there were ſeen many light fires, ſo as all the coaſts ſhone again withal: That two ſhields ſweat blood: That there were ſome ſouldiers ſmitten dead with lightning: That the circle and body of the ſun appeared in ſight leſs in compaſs and eclipſed: Alſo, that there fell from the skye burning ſtones, at Preneſte: And at Arpi there were ſeen in the Element, Palm or Date Trees: and the ſun fighting with the moon: Moreover, at Capena two moons aroſe and ſhewed in the day time: that at Cere, the waters ran mingled with blood: That the very fountain of Hercules yeelded and caſt up water beſpotted with blood: That as folk reaped in Antium fields, certain bloody ears of corn light into their baskets: At Falerii the heaven ſeemed to cleave in ſunder and open, and to ſhew as it were a great chink; and out of the place where it gaped, there ſhone a great light: That the lots of their own ſelves diminiſhed, and one fell out of the pitcher, with this inſcription, Mars brandiſheth and ſhaketh his ſpear. And about the ſame time at Rome the Statue of Mars ſwet in the high way Appia, neer to the images of the wolves: and at Capua the welkin ſeemed to be on fire, and the form of a moon to fall down in a rain or ſhower. After this, men gave belief alſo to prodigies of far leſs importance: namely, that ſome mens goats, in ſtead of hair bare wooll: that a hen turned into a cock, and a cock proved to be a hen. Theſe things as folk reported, were declared abroad, and the authors brought into the Senat: where the Conſul propounded before the LL. and required their advice, as touching matters of Religion. Whereupon, there paſſed a decree that theſe ſtrange tokens, ſome ſhould be purged and expiated with greater ſacrifices, other with young ſucklings:

A and that for three dayes, there ſhould be ſupplications at all the Shrines and Altars of the Gods. As for other matters, afterthat the Decemvirs had looked into their books, ſuch proviſion was to be made, as the Gods in their verſes ſhould foretel to ſtand with their pleaſure and contentment. So, by the advertiſements and directions of the Decemvirs it was decreed as followeth: Firſt, and foremoſt, that to Jupiter there ſhould be made of gold a thunderbolt or form of lightning weighing * 50 pounds, and another of ſilver, preſented unto Iuno and Minerva. Item to Iuno * 1800 li. ſtir.
Regina there ſhould be ſacrifice offred in the mount Aventine, and to Iuno Hoſpita in Lanuvium, of greater beaſts: Item, that the dames of Rome, making a contribution (every one to their ability) of a ſum of money, ſhould offer an Oblation unto Iuno Regina and bring it into Aventine, and B there ſolemniſe a Lectiſtern: Item, that the very Libertin or enfranchiſed women alſo, ſhould according to their power, lay their money together and make a preſent for the goddeſs Feronia. Theſe things accompliſhed, the Decemvirs ſacrificed in the market place of Ardea, and for that purpoſe killed greater beaſts. Laſt of all, by direction out of the books of Sybilla, now in the month December, they celebrated a ſacrifice at Rome in the Temple of Saturn: and commandment was given that a Lectiſtern ſhould be ſolemnized (which bed and table the Senators themſelves ſpred and ſet out with all the furniture) and a publick feaſt beſides, in any hand: and throughout the City both by day and night were proclaimed the ſolemn Saturnalia: and order directed, that the people ſhould hold and obſerve that day, as holy and feſtival, for ever.

Whiles the Conſul was buſied at Rome in pacifying the Gods, and levying ſouldiers, Annibal
C (who was departed from his wintering fort, becauſe the rumor ran that Flaminius the Conſul was come as far as Aretium) albeit he ſaw another way more ready and commodious (though it were ſomewhat farther about) yet choſe that which was the neerer through the mariſhes, whereas the River Arnus at the ſame time had overflowed his banks more than uſually. As for the Spaniards, Affricans, and all his old beaten ſouldiers (the very flower and ſtrength of his army) he commanded to march formoſt together with all their baggage and cariages among them, to this end, that if they were forced any where to ſtay, they ſhould not fail and want neceſſaries about them: the Gauls he appointed to follow next: and becauſe he was deſirous that thoſe kind of people, ſhould be in the middle ward, and the Horſemen likewiſe to go after them hindmoſt in the reregard, he charged Mago with the light Horſemen of the Numidians, to guard the army
D and keep them cloſe together in their march, but eſpecially to have an eye to the Gauls, and keep them in, for fear leſt they for tedioufneſs of travail, and wearineſs of long way (as they are a Nation tender enough and not able to abide any hardneſs) ſhould either ſlink away, or elſe ſtand ſtill. They of the vantguard, what way ſoever the guides led them and went afore, paſſed through thick and thin, waded through great Rivers and deep quickſands; and albeit they were mired and in a manner overwhelmed and ſwallowed up of bogs and muddy quagmires, yet they followed ſtill their colours. But the Gauls, if their feet chanced, to ſlip, could not hold themſelves, and when they were down, they were not able to ariſe out of the durty ſloughs and holes: neither could any of them comfort his corps with courage, nor help his heart with hope of better. Some of them hardly haled their heavy hams, and drew with much adoe their lazie legs and lagging
E limbs after them: others, whoſe hearts were done for tedious toil and travail, when they were once down, lay dying amongſt the jades and other beaſts, which alſo were couched along every where. But that which hurt and undid them moſt, was their want of ſleep, for they had watched four dayes and three nights continually without a wink. Now when as the water had ſo covered and overſpred every place, that they could find no drie ground, to lay their wearied bodies on, they were fain to pile their packs one upon another in the waters, and to caſt themſelves aloft upon them. All the way as they went, they might ſee the beaſts and Horſes lie every where on heaps overthrown and dead: which ſerved them a while, inſtead of Couches for want of other means, who ſought but only for ſome thing or other, that appeared above water to repoſe themſelves upon, for to take a nap. As for Annibal himſelf, (who had already an infirmity in his eyes, F which came firſt by the diſtemperature of the ſpring ſeaſon, now hot and then cold) he was mounted upon an Elephant, the only Elephant that was left alive: this beaſt bare him a good way above the water: but by reaſon that he had overwatched himſelf, and the moiſt nights beſides together with the damp and miſt of the foggy fens ſtuffed his head and filled him full of rhewms, and becauſe neither time nor place ſerved for any cure and to take Phyſick, he loſt one of his eyes quite.

Thus after many a man loſt, many a Horſe piteouſly periſhed, when he was got out at length of theſe foul fens and miry mariſhes, in the firſt dry ground that he came unto, he pitched his camp: and was certified by his eſpials and vantcourriers whom he had ſent out before, that the Roman army lay about the walls of Aretium. Then with great diligence and careful enquiry he G endeavoured, to ſound the intent and the deſigns of the Conſul; to know the coaſts and ſite of the country; to hearken what wayes he travailed; to learn what forces he had; to be advertiſed how he was ſtored and provided of victuals; and to underſtand all other things expedient for his purpoſe in ſuch a caſe, and neceſſary to be known. The countrey was moſt fertile and fruitful, as any one in all Italy, to wit, the goodly champian fields of Tuſcany, lying between Feſule, and Aretium, plentiful in corn, abundant in cattel, and richly ſtored with all good things. The Conſul was ſtout and proud, by reaſon of the former Conſulſhip that he had born: little account he made of the Majeſty of Laws, and authority of Senators, and as ſmall regard and reverence verence he had of the Gods themſelves: which raſhneſs, as it coſt him nought, but was ingraffed in him by nature, ſo fortune had nourriſhed and mainteined the ſame with proſperous ſucceſs in his affairs at home, and wars abroad; ſo as it appeared evidently, that ſince he reſpected neither God nor man, and deigned not to take their counſel and advice, he would go raſhly to work, and do all in haſt, hand over hand, without diſcretion. And to the end he might be more forward to plunge himſelf headlong into theſe his infirmities and imperfections, Annibal deviſed to anger him, and to move his patience. Leaving the enemy therefore on his left hand, he put himſelf into the way to Feſulæ for to waſt and ſpoil the country of Tuſcany; and ſhewed to the Conſul a far off, what foul work and havock he poſſibly could make, with fire and ſword. Then Flaminius, who of himſelf would not have reſted and ſate ſtill, in caſe Annibal had been quiet; I ſeeing once the goods of his allies and friends, harried and driven away even before his eyes, and thinking it tended greatly to his ſhame and diſhonor, that a Carthaginian ſhould march thus at his pleaſure, through the mids of Italy, and without any empeaching and controulement, to paſs on forward, even to beſiege and aſſault the walls of Rome; when all others about him ſitting in counſail, gave advice for profit and ſafety, rather than for ſhew and bravery; namely, to paule awhile, and expect the coming of his Colleague, that they might with joynt armies, with one heart, and with common accord of counſel, conduct and manage the war: and in the mean time, with the Cavalry, with Auxiliary or aid-ſouldiers lightly armed, repreſs the enemy, and ſtay him from ſpoiling ſo licentiouſly at his pleaſure; in a great chafe and choler he roſe up, and departed out of the Councel, and preſently ſounded the march, and gave the ſignal of battail: and withal, K

"Nay we were beſt (quoth he) to remain and ſit here ſtill before the walls of Aretium: for this,
"be like, is our native countrey, and here is our place of habitation: as for Annibal, let him
"eſcape forth of our hands, and waſt all Italy; let him ſpoil afore him, and over-run all with fire
"and ſword, until he be as far as Rome walls: and let not us, in any caſe once ſtir from hence, be"fore that the Senators ſend for C. Flaminius from Aretium, as ſometimes they called Camillus
"from Veii. With theſe and ſuch like reproachful and taunting words, he commanded in all haſt the ſtandards and enſigns to be plucked up, and called for his Horſe. He was not ſo ſoon mounted on his back, but the Horſe fell preſently, caſt the Rider over and over with his his head forward; and there lay Flaminius the Conſul under foot. As they all, that attended about him, were affrighted and troubled in mind, at this unlucky preſage and ſore-token, in the very beginning of L his enterpriſe: word moreover was brought unto him, that one of the port-enſigns was not able to pull up his enſign, do what he could, and putting his whole ſtrength unto it. The Conſul turning to the meſſenger. What? haſt thou any letters beſides (quoth he) from the Senat, to prohibit me for giving battail? go thy wayes and bid them dig up the enſign, with help of ſpade and mattock if their hands be ſo benummed for fear, that they can not pluck it up: and with that began the army to march. The principal Leaders and Captains, beſides that they agreed not, but gainſaid this courſe, were much diſmayed and terrified with this twofold prodigious ſign: but the common ſouldiers rejoyced and took great pleaſure, to ſee this forwardneſs and animoſity of their General: having an eye rather to the end of their hope, than to the cauſe which they had to hope ſo. Now Annibal waſted in all manner of hoſtility that he could deviſe, the territories between M the Town Cotona, and the lake Threſymenus, and all to whet the edge of the Conſuls ſtomack, to chaſe his hot bloud, and to provoke him for to be revenged, for the harms and wrongs done to his good friends and allies. And come already they were to certain places, naturally made as it were for an ambuſh, whereas the lake Threſymenus lieth hard at the foot of the Hills of Cortona: for there is between, but a very ſtraight and narrow paſſage, as if there had been left ſo much ſpace of ground, only for that purpoſe, and nothing elſe. For if a man go but a little further, the plain lieth more open, and groweth larger, and from thence the hills begin to ariſe aloft. Annibal in the open ground pitched his camp, for himſelf with his Africans only and the Spaniards to lodge in, and made abode. The Balearians, and the other light armed ſouldiers, he led about behind the Mountains: the Horſemen he placed at the very gullet of the ſtreight paſſage, where N the little hills handſomely covered and hid them cloſe; to the end that ſo ſoon as the Romans were entred in, when he had put forth his horſemen againſt the gullet of the ſtreight, all might be encloſed within the lake and the Mountains. Flaminius being come to the lake the day before at the Sun ſetting; the morrow after, before it was full day light, without diſcovering and clearing the coaſts by any ſcouts and eſpials ſent out before, paſſed through the ſtreights. After that his army began to be ſpread and diſplayed more at large, as the plain opened wider, he eſpied and perceived thoſe enemies only which he had before his face: for the ambuſhes lay cloſe hidden, both behind his back, and over his head. Annibal having once got the enemy (as he would) encloſed thus within the lake and the Mountains, and environed with his forces, gave the ſignal to them all for to charge: who came down every man the neereſt way he could: and O ſo much the more were the Romans affrighted and troubled with this ſudden occurrent, by reaſon that the miſt which aroſe out of the lake, was ſetled thicker in the plain, than upon the hills: whereby the Companies and Squadrons of their enemies coming out of many Vallies, were ſeen well enough one of another, and therefore more joyntly gave the charge all at once together. The Romans hearing the cry and ſhout which aroſe from all parts, before they could well diſcern and ſee, perceived themſelves compaſſed all about and ſurpriſed, and were aſſailed both affront, and on their flanks, ere they could put themſelves in battail-ray, as they ought, make their

A their armour and weapons ready, and draw their ſwords. When all the reſt were thus amazed, and at their wits end, the Conſul alone, for all this imminent danger, ſhewed himſelf nothing daunted or afraid, but ſet in order the ranks and files which were ſhuffled and blended together, according as time and place would give him leave; and marſhalleth his ſouldiers, (who turned every way as they heard the ſundry and divers noiſes) and in the beſt manner he could deviſe, he comforted and encouraged them, willing them to ſtand to it, and fight like men, for that there was now no means elſe to eſcape. "All the vows and invocations upon the Gods for their help, "would not ſerve, but only it was mere force and mere manhood muſt do the deed: and they were "to make way by dint of ſword, through the midſt of their enemies battaillons: and the leſs men "feared, the leſs danger commonly betided them. Howbeit, by reaſon of the noiſe and hurliburB ly, neither counſel nor command could be heard: and ſo far off were the ſouldiers from knowing their own Enſigns, their ranks and places, that ſcarcely their heart would ſerve them to take arms, and to buckle them, as they ſhould, fitly for fight: in ſuch ſort as ſome of them were ſurpriſed and born down laden rather with their harneſs, then covered and defended therewith. And in ſo great a miſt and darkneſs, more uſe they had of ears than eyes; for at the grones of their wounded fellows, at the blows and ſtrokes upon the bodies and armour reſounding again, at the confuſed ſhouts and ſhrikes of hardy and fearful men one with another, they turned their faces, and caſt their eyes every way. Some as they would have fled, light into the preſs of thoſe that were fighting, and there were ſet faſt: ſome again as they returned for to fight, were born backward by companies that ran away. Afterwards, when they had aſſayed in vain every way to get forth, C and ſaw well, that on both ſides and flanks the mountains and the lake; that afront and behind, the enemies battailons hemmed them in; then they knew evidently there was no hope of life but in their right hand and force of arms. Then every man became a Captain, and encouraged himſelf to fight manfully: ſo as the battail began afreſh, not in order by the Principes, Haſtati, and Triarii, nor according to the accuſtomed manner, whereby the vanguard ſhould fight before the main battail and the ſtandards, and behind them the reregard, and that the ſouldier ſhould keep his own legion, his own cohort, band, and company; but at a venture, even as it hapned, ſo they went to it and buckled, pell mell: and as every mans heart ſerved him, ſo he marſhalled himſelf to fight, either before or behind. Their courage and animoſity was ſo ardent, their ſpirits and minds ſo intentive to the battel, that being as there was, a terrible earthquake at the very inſtant, D which overthrew and turned upſide down, a great part of many Cities in Italy, turned aſide the courſes of great Rivers out of their channels, and drave their ſtreams againſt the current, forced the Sea into freſh Rivers, yea, and overturned Mountains with mighty fals, and laid them flat; yet there was not a man who fought in that battail, that once heard or perceived it. The conflict laſted almoſt three hours. Sharp it was in every place, but about the Conſul moſt cruel: and look in what part ſoever he ſaw his men diſtreſſed and in hazard, there courageouſly he aided them. By reaſon that the flower and braveſt gallants followed him, and was himſelf for his own perſon goodly beſeen in his rich armour, he both aſſailed the enemy moſt furiouſly, and alſo defended his own citizens as valiantly; ſo long, until a certain Inſubrian, a man of arms (Ducarius was his name) one that knew his viſage well enough, This is (quoth he) to his coun-E trey-men, the Conſul that defeated our army, put to the ſword our Legions, waſted our territories, and he that deſtroyed and ſacked our City. Now will I offer him as a ſacrifice out of hand to the ghoſts and ſpirits of thoſe our fellow citizens, who by his means have been piteouſly ſlain: and therewith ſetting ſpurs to his Horſe, he rode through the thickeſt troop and preſſe of his enemies: and when he had firſt ſlain his Eſquier outright (who oppoſed his body between, and ſet himſelf againſt him, ſeeing him coming ſo furiouſly) he ran the Conſul quite through the body with his lance. And when he would rather than his life have diſarmed and rifled him, the Triarii ſtept with their targuets over his corps, and ſo kept him off. Hereupon from hence firſt many began to flie; but anon, neither deep lake nor high mountain, could impeach and ſtop their fearful flight: like blind men they ran and ſought means to make eſcapes, were the lane never ſo F narrow, were the Hills never ſo ſteep and craggy, horſe and man, man and armour, fell headlong one upon another. A number of them ſeeing no way elſe to eſcape, entred into the Lake by the firſt edges and ſhallow brims thereof, waded ſo far, and went up ſo high, that they left their heads and ſhoulders onely above the water. Some there were, who unadviſedly (ſuch was their fear) ſought to ſave themſelves by ſwimming. Which being an endleſs piece of work, and beyond all hope, their wind and breath failing them, they were either ſtifled and ſwallowed up of the gulfs, or after that with too much haſt, they had over-laboured and toiled out themſelves, they did what they could to ſwim back again, and with much ado to recover the Land: and there, by the enemies Horſemen who had taken the water, were they killed every where, and cut in pieces. Six thouſand or thereabout, of the vanguard, who luſtily brake through G the mids, maugre the heads of their enemies, unwitting of all that was done behind, eſcaped ſafe out of the gullet: and having ſeized the top of a little hill, there they ſtood, and might hear only the outcries of men, the ratling and ruſtling ſound of their armor, but how the battel went or ſped, neither could they know, nor yet diſcern for the thickneſs of the dark miſt. But now, when they were come to ſome ods, and one ſide went down and had the worſe, by which time the heat of the ſun had broken and diſpatched the miſt, and the bright day appeared; then through the clear light, the hills and dales ſhewed evidently the havock & overthrow that was made, and how the Roman army was fouly diſcomfited and defeated. For fear therefore, that the enemy (having H deſcried and ſeen them a far off) ſhould ſend out againſt them the Cavalry, up they went with their Enſigns in all haſt, and got them away with all ſpeed poſſibly they could. The morrow after, when over and beſides all other calamities, they were in danger of extream famine, and that Maharbal (who with all his power of Horſe purſued them by night, and overtook them) had given his faithful word and promiſe, that if they delivered up their armour, he would ſuffer them to depart in their ſingle garments, they yeelded themſelves. Which promiſe Annibal ſaw performed as truly, as all Carthaginians uſe to do, and falſe Carthaginian as he was, he clapt them all into priſon, and hung irons upon them. This is that noble and famous battel fought at the Lake Thraſymenus, and of thoſe few overthrows that the Romans had, the moſt memorable of all others. 15000 Romans were there ſlain in fight: 10000 were ſcattered: and flying I through ſundry parts of Tuſcany, gat to Rome. 1500 of the enemies loſt their lives in the field.

But many more of both ſides afterwards died of their wounds. Others there be that report much murder and ſlaughter on both ſides. For mine own part (beſides that, I love not to write vain untruths, nor any thing without good warrant, and yet the humour of writers for the moſt part is too much given that way) I have followed for mine Author Fabius eſpecially, who lived about the time of this war. Annibal having enlarged without ranſome as many of his priſoners as were Latins, and put the Romans in ſtreight ward, culled out from among the heaps of his enemies that lay one upon another, the dead bodies of his own men, and commanded they ſhould be buried: and having with great care and diligence made ſearch alſo, for the dead corps of Flaminius to inter it, he could never find it. K

At the firſt news in Rome of this overthrow, the people ran together in exceeding fear and trouble into the common place of Aſſemblies. The Wives and Dames of the City, went up and down to and fro in the ſtreets, and enquired of whomſoever they met, what ſuddain calamity this was, whereof the bruit went; and what was become of the army? And when as the multitude aſſembled thick (as it were) to a publick audience, turning to the Comitium and the Senat-Houſe, and called upon the Magiſtrats: at length ſomewhat before the ſun-ſet, Marcus Pomponius the Pretor came forth and ſaid, A great battel hath been fought, and we have loſt the field. And albeit they heard of him no more than this of certainty, yet they filled one anothers ears with rumors, and caried home with them theſe news to wit, that the Conſul was killed, and a great part of his army with him ſlain: that there were but a few left alive, and thoſe either fled and ſcattered up L and down in Tuſcany, or elſe taken priſoners by the enemy. And look how many caſualties & misfortunes follow the overthrow of an army, into ſo many cares and perplexities were the ſpirits and minds of all thoſe plunged, who had any kinsfolk that ſerved under Flaminius the Coſ. all the while they were ignorant, what was the fortune of their friends. And no man knew for certain, what he was to hope for, or to fear. The morrow and certain dayes following, there ſtood at the gates a ſort of people, and thoſe were women more than men, waiting to ſee their friends themſelves, or thoſe that could tell tidings of them: and ever as they met with any, they would flock about them, and be very inquiſitive: neither could they be plucked away from them of their acquaintance and knowledge before they had queſtioned every particular circumſtance, from point to point in order. There might a man have ſeen an alphabet of faces, in thoſe that departed from M the meſſengers, according as the tidings was joyful or woful: there might a man have ſeen a number coming about them to accompany them as they returned to their houſes, either rejoycing for their good hap, or comforting them for their misfortune and calamity. The women eſpecially, as well in joy, as alſo in ſorrow, were in their extremities. One above the reſt (as it is reported) ſtanding at the gate upon the ſuddain ſight of her ſon alive & ſafe fell down dead at his very feet.
Another who had received an untrue report of her ſons death, as ſhe ſat mourning at home within her houſe in great ſorrow of heart ſo ſoon as ever ſhe ſaw him coming into the houſe, for exceeding joy yeelded her laſt breath, and died. And for certain dayes the Pretors kept the Senators together in Counſel, from the ſun-riſing to the ſetting, conſulting under whoſe conduct, and with what forces they might be able to withſtand the puiſſance of theſe victorious Carthaginians. But N before they were throughly reſolved of any determinat purpoſe and courſe to be taken, ſuddainly there arrived other news of a ſecond loſs, namely, that 4000 horſmen under the leading of C. Centronius the Propretor, ſent from C. Servilius the Coſ. unto his Collegue, were incloſed by Annibal in Ulcatria. For thither they had taken their way, upon the news they heard of the battail at Thraſymenus. The brute and rumor hereof hammered diverſly in mens heads. Some, whoſe minds were poſſeſſed already with grief of a greater calamity, thought the loſs of that Cavalry but ſmall, in compariſon of the former defeat: Others eſteemed that which hapned, not according to the importance of the thing it ſelf: but like as it falleth out in the natural body of man, that if it be craſe and weak every occaſion, be it never ſo ſmall and light, is more offenſive unto it and ſooner felt, than a greater cauſe and object in a ſound and ſtrong conſtitution: even ſo, when any croſs or ad- O verſity hapneth unto the politick body of a City or C. W. diſeaſed (as it were) and ſickly, we are not to meaſure & weigh the ſame by the greatneſs of the accidents but according to the feeble and decaied eſtate thereof, able to endure and abide no new matter, that may ſurcharge and grieve it, what ſoever. And therefore, the City of Rome took her ſelf to the ſoveraign ſalve and approved remedy which ſhe had long deſired, and yet not applied and uſed of late, namely, to the nomination of a Dictator. And becauſe the Conſul himſelf was abſent, by whom alone it was thought he

A might be named, and by reaſon that Italy was ſo overſpread and forlaied with the Punick forces, there might no courier be well diſpatched, nor letters ſafely ſent unto him: and for that the people had not authority of themſelves to create a Dictator, they therefore elected a Pro-dictator (a thing that was never ſeen and practiſed before that day) namely, Q. Fabius Maximus, and for his General of the Cavalry, M. Minutius Rufus. Theſe had commiſſion from the Senat, to fortify the walls and Towers of the City, to plant and beſtow guards thereon, where they thought meet, and to cut up and break down the bridges upon the great riyers; ſhewing hereby that ſince they were not able to keep and defend Italy, they were now to fight for houſe and home, and to guard the very City.

Annibal in this mean time was come directly by the way of Vmbria, as far as to Spoletum. And after he had grievouſly waſted and ſpoiled the territory, he aſſaied to give aſſault to that City: but B from thence he had the repulſe with the loſs of many of his men. And gueſſing by the ſtrength of that one Colony (where he ſped but badly in the attempt of it) how great and difficult the enterpriſe might be of aſſailing the City of Rome; he turned another way into the * Picene country, not only abounding in plenty of all kind of corn and grain, but alſo affording rich ſpoil and pillage: which the hungry and needy ſouldiers foraged and caried away as greedily, beyond all meaſure. And therefor certain dayes he kept a ſtanding camp, and refreſhed his ſouldiers, toiled as well with winter journies and boggy wayes as alſo in the late battel, which was more joyous and fortunate in the looſe and parting, than right and eaſy in the conflict and fighting. After he had reſted and refreſhed his ſouldiers ſufficiently, who took more pleaſure in booties and prizes than in eaſe and repoſe, he diſlodged, and journied forward; waſting and ſpoiling firſt the * Pretutian C and Adrian territories, and then the Marſians, Marrucins and * Pelignians: and all about Arpi and Luceria, being a region next adjoyning unto * Apulia.

Cn. Jervilius the other Conſul, having had ſome light skirmiſhes with the Gauls, and won from them one mean Town of ſmall importance, after he was advertiſed one of the death of his Colleague and the defeat of the army, fearing even then what danger might betide the walls of his native country, leſt peradventure he ſhould be abſent in the hazard of the main chance, put himſelf in his journey toward the City of Rome. Q. Fabius Max. the Pro-dictator aforeſaid the ſame day that he entred his office, aſſembled the Senate, and began firſt with matters of religion, and concerning the Gods: and after he had laid open unto the LL. of the Senat, that the Conſul Flaminius had tainted more in the neglect and contempt of Divine ceremonies, and the Auſpices, than D otherwiſe in raſhneſs and for want of ſkill in feats of war; and that the Gods themſelves were to be conſulted about the purging and expiation of ſins and offences, and what might appeaſe their wrath; gained and obtained this one point, That the Decemvirs were commanded to repair unto the books of Sibylla, (a thing not uſually decreed: but when ſtrange ſigns and prodigious wonders are reported) who having peruſed the books of deſtinies made relation and informed the Senators, firſt, That the vow made unto Mars for the good ſucceſs of that war, was not performed with due complements, and therefore ought to be a accompliſhed anew, and in more ample manner: alſo, that the great Games and Plaies ſhould be vowed unto Jupiter, with Temples likewiſe to Venus Erycina, and to * Mens. Moreover, that a ſolemn ſupplication and a Lectiſtern ſhould be celebrated, and a ſacred Spring vowed, if the Gods granted them an happy end of war, and E the Common-weal to remain in the ſame eſtate, wherein it ſtood before the war began. The Senat gave order, that foraſmuch as Fabius was to be emploied in the wars, M. Æmylius the Pretor, ſhould have in charge to ſee all the premiſſes performed with all good ſpeed, according to the will and mind of the Colledge of the Biſhops or Prelats. Theſe Ordinances of the Senat being enacted, Lucius Cornelius Lentulus the Arch-prelate, with the advice of the whole Colledge of the Prelates, thought good and gave advice, that firſt above all other things the opinion and pleaſure of the people (as touching the ſacred ſpring) ſhould be known, for that without the voyces and conſent of the people it could not be vowed; And in this form of words was the bill propounded unto the people. Pleaſeth it you, that this grace may paſs and the thing done with your aſſent in this wiſe? if the ſtate of the people of Rome and the Quirites, for five years next enſuing, con- F tinue ſafely preſerved in theſe wars, as I deſire it ſhould, then that the people of Rome, and Quirits perform an oblation and gift vowed and promiſed: namely, in the war between the people of Rome and the Carthaginians: and in the wars with the Gauls on this ſide the Alps: to wit, that the encreaſe which the ſpring ſhall yeeld and afford out of ſheep and ſwine, goats and kine, and all things that ſhall be prophane, be ſacrificed unto Jupiter, accounting from that day that the Senate and people ſhall ſo ordain: Item, that he which ſhall ſacrifice, may do it when he will, and in what manner he will: and in what ſort ſo ever he ſhall ſacrifice, that it may ſtand for good and rightful. If haply it die, that ſhould be ſacrificed let it be counted prophane, & not as wicked: If any man lame or maim, or kill the ſame unawares, let it not be imputed unto him as criminal: If any perſon conceal away the ſame or hide it out of the way let it not be imputed for wickedneſs unto the people, nor to him from whom it ſhall be ſo ſtollen or hidden. If one chance by G ignorance to ſacrifice upon an unlucky & diſmal day, let it be accounted good and lawful whether by night or day, whether bond or free ſhall ſacrifice, let it be taken and held good. If before it, the Senat and people ſhall ordain thoſe ſacrifices to be done, or ſhall ſacrifice, let the people be aſſoiled and diſcharged freely therefore. And for the ſame purpoſe, were the great games (before vowed) performed with the expenſe of * 333333 Aſſes and one third part of an As: beſides the ſacrifice of 300 Oxen to Jupiter, & of white Oxen and other ſacrifices, unto many other ſaints. After theſe vows pronounced and made accordingly, the ſupplication was proclaimed & in proceſſion there went with their wives & children,

estiate, any way depending upon the publick. The Lectistern likewise was prepared and trimmed, and continued for three dayes: and the Decemvirs deputed for holy ceremonies had the ordering thereof. The sacred beds were openly to be seen: one for Jupiter and Juno, another for Neptune and Minerva: a third for Mars and Venus: a fourth for Apollo and Diana: a fifth for Vulcan and Vesta: and a sixth for Mercury and Ceres. Then were the Temples vowed: unto Venus Erycina, Q. Fabius Max. the Dictator, vowed one Temple. For so it was delivered from out of the books of destinies, that he should vow it, who had the soveraign rule in the City, and unto * Mens, Atilius the Pretor vowed another. Thus when Church matters touching Religion were finished the Dictator propounded concerning war and the State: namely, with what Legions and how many the Senat thought good to withstand the victorious enemy. And a decree passed, that he should re- I ceive the army at the hands of Cn. Servilius the Cos. and enrol besides of the citizens and allies, as many horsmen & footmen as he thought convenient: and that he should do and order all things at his own discretion, for the good of the Common-weal. Fabius said, That he would adjoin unto the army of Servilius, two Legions more: which being levied by the General of the horsemen, he proclaimed that they should meet together upon a certain day at Tybur: and when he had published a proclamation, That whosoever inhabited within any Towns or Castles unfenced, should depart into places of safety: and that all should remove out of the villages of that country, through which Annibal was to go (but first to set on fire their houses, and spoil their corn, that he might find nothing there when he came) he went himself forward by the high way or causey Flaminia, to meet with the Consul and the army. And when he discovered them marching about Otriculum K by the river Tyberis, and saw the Consul with his horsemen coming forward to him, he sent a Sergeant, to give warning to the Consul, for to come without his Lictors to the Dictator, who obeyed his commandment. And as their meeting together, represented an exceeding great shew of the Dictatorship unto citizens and allies both, who by reason of discontinuance so long time, had welneer forgotten that government: behold, there came letters from the City importing news, that certain ships of burden transporting victuals from Hostia into Spain for the army there, were by the navy of the Carthaginians boorded and taken about the sound or haven of Cossa. Whereupon immediatly the Consul was commanded to go to Hostia, to take up all shipping at Rome or at Hostia, to furnish them with saylers, and man them with souldiers, and so to pursue the Armado of the enemies, and to keep the coasts of Italy. A mighty number of men was levied at Rome. The L Libertins also, who had children, and were of lawful age to serve, sware allegeance unto him, to be his true souldiers. Out of this army of citizens, as many as were under 35. years of age, were shipped: the rest were left behind to guard the City. The Dictator having received the Consuls army at the hands of Fulvius Flaccus his Lieutenant, went through the Sabins Country, and arived at Tybur, whither he had commanded the new souldiers to repair at a day. From thence by cross wayes he returned into the high way or causey Latina, even to Prenestе: from whence (having searched diligently by his espials, all the wayes) he led forward toward the enemy, purposing in no place to hazard the fortune of battail, but upon necessity. The very first day that he encamped not far from Arpi, within the sight of his enemies, there was no ho with Annibal, but M without further delay, he came forth into the field in battail array, bad him battail, and offred fight. But seeing his enemies quiet, and no stirring in the camp, he fell to taunting and reviling them: saying, That now at length yet, the martial hearts of the Romans were daunted and tamed; and seeing they refused fight, they confessed plainly, and granted themselves inferior unto him in valor, prowess, and glory: which said, he retired into his camp. Howbeit, chafing and fretting secretly in his mind for anger that he had to deal hereafter with a Captain, far unlike to Flaminius and Sempronius: and that the Romans now at last, being schooled and taught by their own harms, and to their great cost, had sought out and got a Captain to match Annibal; streightwayes he begin to fear the wisedom of the Dictator, and not his force: but having had as yet no tryal of his constant resolution, he fell to disquiet his mind, and to tempt him with often removing his own tents, and wasting the fields of his allies even under his nose: one while he seemed N to march away apace out of all sight, another while he would of a suddain stay, and lie close in some by-place and corner, out of the way, to spie when he could take him in some plain and even ground. But Fabius led his army, and marched above on the higher grounds, a prety distance off from the enemy, so as neither he would let him go clean and abandon him, nor yet encounter with him. He kept his souldiers for the most part within the camp, save only when necessity otherwise constrained. For purveyance of forage and fewel, they went neither few in number, nor straggling asunder. The wards of Horsemen and those that were lightly armed, standing alwayes in order of battail, and ready prepared and furnished for suddain impressions and tumults, yeelded both security to his own souldiers, and also danger to his enemies, as they ranged all abroad and foraged the Countrey. In this manner never was the main chance put to the venture all at once O of fortune: and the small tryals of fight scuffling and skirmishes (begun in safety and security, by reason of the recourse of rescue so neer) inured and heartned the souldiers, frighted with former foils, and made them at length to distrust less either their own valour, or fortune. But Annibal was not more discontented and displeased, nor more ready to crosse and thwart these so wholsome policies and counsels of his, as his own General of horsmen: who wanted nothing else but soveraign command, to overturn headlong the Common-weal: a man in all his design-

A ments violent and hasty, and of tongue intemperate. And first secretly among some few, but afterwards openly in the hearing of all men, he termed Fabius, in stead of a stayed and sober man, slow and dull: in stead of wary and heedful, timorous and fearful: attributing unto vertues the names of vices of neer semblance: and having a singular dexterity to debase his betters and superiours, exalted himself thereby: a cunning cast, of all others the worst, and yet hath mightily prevailed and sped too well in many that have used it. Annibal from Arpi passeth into Samnium, wasteth the country of Beneventum, winneth the City Telesia, and still provoketh (of set purpose) the Roman Captain, if haply he could incense him by so many indignities and losses of his allies, and so draw him to fight on even hand.

B Amongst a great number of Italian confederats and allies, whom Annibal had taken prisoners at Thrasymenus and dismissed, there were three Campane horsemen, whom Annibal even then had tol ed on, and allured with gifts and fair promises to win unto him the hearts of their country-men. These brought word unto him, that in case he would lead and bring his army into Campania, he should soon be Lord of Capua. And albeit the thing in it self seemed greater than the quality of the persons that counselled him thereto: and therefore stood in mammering, one while in good hope and assurance, another while in fear and distrust: yet they perswaded him at last to remove out of Samnium into Campania. After he had admonished them very often, to see that they made their word and promises good by deed, and commanded them withal to return unto him with some of their principal Citizens and Country-men, he sent them away.

C Himself gave commandment to his guide, to conduct him into the territory of Casinum*: being advised by those that were skilful and acquainted with the coasts of those parts, that if he could gain aforehand that pase and forest, he might ex lude the Romans from coming to rescue and succour their confederats. But the ambiguity of the name, and the Carthaginian language far differing from the Latine, caused the guide to mistake Casilinum for Casinum: and so missing of his intended journey, he came down, through the Alifanz, Calatiae, and Calene Countries, into the plain champian region of Stella. Where seeing all the coasts environed round about with Mountains and Rivers, he called the guide unto him, and demanded where he was: and when he answered, that he should that day lodge in Casinum, then and not before, the error was found; and he knew that he was far out of his way, for that Casinum was distant in another

D Countrey far off. And after he had beaten the guide with rods, and hanged him up by the head, for an example to terrifie all others, he fortified himself within camp and sent out Maharbal with the Horsemen into the Falern Country, to fetch in booties. So they wasted and spoiled as far as the waters of Sinuessa. Much harm did these Numidians, but the slight and fright of the people was far greater. And yet notwithstanding that great fear, when all was on a light fire as it were, and nothing but war, the Roman allies continued still firm in their faithful allegeance: and the reason was, because they were ruled under a just and moderat government, and neither refused, nor thought much to be subject unto their betters, the only bond of loyal fidelity. But so soon as he had pitched his camp by the River Vulturnus*, and that the most goodly and pleasant Country of all Italy was on fire, and the Villages every where burned and smoked again; whiles

E Fabius led his power over the ridge of the Mountain Massicus, the sedition was like to have broken out again, and certain Captains of the mutiny began to be enkindled afresh. For there had been great quietness, and all was still for some few dayes; because seeing the army march faster than their usual manner was, they supposed verily, that they made more speed and hastned, to save Campania from being spoiled and wasted. But when they were come to the formost edge and point of the Mountain Massicus, and that the enemies were within sight, burning the dwelling Houses of the Coloners and inhabitants of Sinuessa, and likewise of the Falern Country, and all this while not one word of battail; "And are we come hither indeed quoth Minutius, "to behold only and to see, and feed our eyes with looking on our allies, consumed and wasted "with fire and sword? and if we bash at nothing else, can we for shame abide to see the Calamity

F "of these Citizens here, whom our fore-fathers planted in Sinuessa as coloners there to inhabit, "to the end that all this tract and coast should be safe from the invasion of the Samnits? But be- "hold, it is not a neighbour enemy (the Samnit) that fireth it but a forrein and alien, even the "Carthaginian who from the farthest and most remote parts of the world (whiles we stand at a "bay, trifle off still and for lasiness do nothing) is come forward even hither unto us. And are we "so far degenerat (with sorrow of heart I speak it) from our progenitors and fathers, that along "which coast they thought it dishonorable unto their empire, for the Carthaginian Armadoes "and ships to flote, sail, and ride; we should see the same now pestered full of enemies, the Nu- "midians and Moors? We, who ere while taking foul scorn and great disdain to see Saguntum "besieged, called not only upon men, but also upon the faith of alliances and the Gods to wit-

G "ness; stand still gazing upon Annibal marching against the walls of a Roman Colony, and rea- "dy to assault it. The smoke of the villages and the fields now on fire, is ready to put out our "eyes and to choke us up; our ears resound and ring again with the piteous cries of our allies that "weep and lament and cal oftner unto us than unto the Gods for help. And we here lead our army "as if they were a flock of sheep, over the shadowy forests, and hills out of the way, hid among "the clouds and thick woods to keep them from the heat of Sun. If Furius Camillus had been of "mind, by ranging and wandring over hils and forests in this manner, to win again the City out of "the hands of the Gauls, as this our new Camillus forsooth (sought out of purpose to be our only

"Roman indeed, that very day when word was brought to Veii, that he was chosen Dictator by "the suffrages of the people, and approbation of the Senators, although Janiculum was high e-

"Gaulbury or Busta Gallica standeth, and the morrow after, between Rome and Gabes, slew the "Legions of the Gauls. And what should I say of that, which hapned many years after, when at "the streights of Caudium we were put under the yoke by the Samnits our enemies? Whether I "pray you, did L. Papyrius Cursor seek out the mountains of Samnium, or rather lie hard upon
"Lucerta and besiege it, provoking and challenging the victorious enemy; and thereby shook off
"the yoke from the Romans neck, and laid it upon the proud Samnits? And what other thing

"Empire grown to this height; and not by these conceits and devices, which fearful cowards K "term the wary policies of war. As Minutius spake these words in preaching wise, a number of Roman Colonels and Horsemen came flocking about him. Yea, and these lusty and rash speeches of his, came even unto the ears of the footmen: So as, if it had lien in the voyces and election of the souldiers, out of all question they seemed willing to prefer Minutius before their General Fabius. But Fabius again regarding alwayes with good eye his own men, no less than his enemies, carrying a resolute mind, invincible ever before of any other; albeit he was well ware, that not only within his own camp but also now at Rome, he heard ill for his temporizing and slow proceedings: yet drew he out the rest of the summer, and held on stifly the same course and purpose, & never altered his former manner: until that Annibal being clean disappointed of long desired bat-tail, bethought himself anon and looked about for some places of winter abode, considering, That L the country where now he was, rather yeelded plenty for the present, than store for long continuance: as standing upon Hortyards and Vineyards, and all things planted rather for fruits of pleasure and delight, than for necessity and profit. Intelligence hereof being given to Fabius, by his e-spials, for that he knew well enough, that Annibal was to return through the same streights, by which he had entered the Falern countrey; he holdeth and keepeth the hill Calicula, with sufficient garrisons and likewise Casilinum, a City divided by the river Vulturnus, and parteth the Falern and Campane countries asunder. Himself bringeth back his power through the same hills, having sent out to discover and espie 400 Horsemen of confederats, under the conduct of L. Hostilius Mancinus, who being one of the crue of those lusty youths, that ostentimes heard the General of the Horsemen giving out abroad brave words and stout speeches, at first went forward in manner M of an espial, to discover and espie the enemy from a place of safety and security: and when as he saw the Numidians ranging all about the villages, and slew some of them also whom he took at a vantage, streight-wayes his mind wholly possessed and set upon fight, and so forgat the charge and direction of the Dictator, who had commanded him to go forward as warily and as closely as he possibly could, and to retire himself again before he came within sight of the enemies. The Numidians charging and recharging him afront one while, and flying from him another while drew him almost unto their very camp when as both horse and man were outwearied. From whence Cartalo, who then had the conduct and command of the Cavalry, set out against him lustily upon the spur, and before they came within dart-shot put the enemies to flight, and followed them continually in chase almost five miles. Mancinus seeing neither the enemy to give over pursute, nor any N hope to escape away, exhorted his men, and turned head upon them, overmatched as he was every way: where he himself and his choicest Horsemen were beset round and slain: the other taking themselves again to flie for life, first came to Cales, and after through by-lanes and difficult wayes, to the Dictator. That day, as hap was, Minutius had joyned himself to Fabius, having been afore sent to keep with a strong guard, the forrest or pase, which above Tarracina, groweth into a narrow gullet, and reacheth to the sea; for fear lest if the advenue of the way Appia, were without defence, Annibal might enter and invade the country of Rome. When the Dictator and the General of Horsemen had joyned their forces together, they encamped upon the very high way, that Annibal was to passe with his army. Now were the enemies two miles off. The morrow after, the Carthaginians took up with their army all the way between the one camp and the other. O When as the Romans were quarted even under their very trench and rampier, in a place no doubt of great advantage, yet for all that approached Annibal with his light Horsemen: and to provoke his enemies, fought by starts and fits, charging upon them, and retiring back again with great nimbleness. The Romans kept still their standing, embattailed as they were. The fight was cold and lingering to the mind and liking of the Dictator, rather than of Annibal: and where there were of the Romans part 200 slain, there dyed 800 of the enemies. Then seemed Annibal after, to be enclosed and shut up as it were and besieged within * Casilinum, seeing that Capua,

* castellazzo.

Samnium,

A Samnium, and many rich and mighty Nations confederate with the Romans, were on their backs to furnish them with store of victuals. And Annibal contrary-wise was like to take up his wintering place, within the crags and rocks of Formis, amid the Sands of Linternum, and the mossy standing pools. Well wist Annibal now that he was laid unto hardly, by the same cunning sleights, that he had used himself. And therefore when as he could not escape away by Casilinum, and seeing that he must needs to the Mountains, and passe over the top of Callicula: for fear lest that the Romans should set upon his army enclosed in the vallies between the Mountains, he devised a stratagem, by way of a ridiculous illusion, to beguil the eye-sight of his enemies, and to frustrate and deceive them of their expectation: by means whereof, he purposed in the beginning of the night, B closely and by stealth to gain the Mountains. The manner of his crafty device was this. He caused to be gathered out of all the villages thereby many fire-brands; then took he certain bavins or small fagots of brush-wood, dry sticks, and such like trash, and tyed them fast to the horns of the Oxen, whereof he had tame and wild, a great number that he drave before him amongst other prizes gotten out of the countrey: so as he might make wel-neer two thousand head. To Asdrubal he gave in charge, that so soon as it grew to be dark night, he should drive those Oxen with their horns set a fire toward the Mountains, and especially if he possible could, to the very streights and gullet which the enemy kept. It began no sooner to be dark, but Annibal with great silence dislodged and removed his camp, and the Oxen aforesaid were driven a good way before the ensigns and the army. When they were come to the foot of the Mountains, and to the C streight passages, immediatly the signal or watch-word was given to fire the Oxes horns, and to chase them up against the Hill. The beasts, what with fear to see a light fire blazing over their heads, and what with pain to feel the heat now come to the quick flesh and the roots of their horns, fell running up and down, as if they had been mad. By this their gadding thus all at once every way, all the coppises and springs thereabout were set on a light fire, and seemed as if the whole woods and hills had burnt withal: the shaking of their heads also to and fro without stay, made the blaze greater, and gave shew and semblance of men running from one place to another. They who were appointed and set to keep the passages of the streights, so soon as they saw certain fires upon the tops of the Hills, and over their heads, supposing themselves to be entrapped and enclosed with fire on every side, abandoned their hold, and kept their standing no longer:
D and whereas the flame shone most out, thinking that to be the safest way, they sped them thither, even to the top and ridge of the Mountains. Then and there, they light upon certain of the Oxen wandring astray from their company, and at first seeing them a far off, but not well discerning them, they imagined that they spit fire, and breathed these blazing flames out of their mouths; and wondering at the strange sight, stood still amazed and astonied. But when as afterwards they discovered the device, and found it out to be a subtile and deceitful invention, proceeding from mans brain, they mistrusted withal some secret trains and ambush, and with an exceeding noise fled away as fast as ever they could, and stumbled upon the vantcurriers of their enemies, that were lightly armed. But they were affraid as well of the one side as the other, to E begin any skirmish in the night season, and stayed until day light. In the mean while, Annibal having conducted his whole army through the streights, and killed some of his enemies in the very pase, encamped himself in the territory of Alifas. Fabius descryed this tumult well enough, but doubting some privy ambush, and abhorring utterly all night battails, kept his men within the strength of their rampiers. At the break of day there began a skirmish on the side of the hills in which the Romans as being far more in number, had environed on every side the light-armed souldiers of the enemies, and soon defeated them, but that a band of Spaniards, sent back of purpose from Annibal, came to rescue them: who being better acquainted with the Mountains, and more light and nimble in running among the croggs and cliffs, by reason of well of the agility of body, as the fashion of their light harnesse; easily in that kind of skirmish, avoided and shifted from their enemy, heavily armed at all pieces, and used to fight upon the F plain, and to stand firmly and keep their ground. Whereupon in the end they parted asunder one from the other, but nothing neer on even hand: for the Spaniards in a manner all, went cleer away unhurt, the Romans lost some of their men: and so on both parts they returned to their camps. Fabius likewise removed, and having hasted over the streights of the forest, encamped in an high ground, and strongly situate even over Alifas. Then Annibal making as though he would march through Samnium toward Rome, returned back, wasting and spoiling the country as far as to the Peligni. And Fabius hovered still upon the Hill tops between the army of his enemies and the City of Rome; leading his host so, as neither he departed far, nor yet encountred and affronted his enemy. Then Annibal turned his way, and departed from the Peligni, and retired himself into Apulia, until he was come as far as Gerion, a City G abandoned and forlorn of the inhabitants, by reason that a part of their wall was fallen down, decayed and ruined. The Dictator fortified his camp in the territory of Larinum. Now was he sent for home from thence to Rome, by occasion of certain solemn sacrifices: whereupon, he conferred and dealt with the General of the Cavalry, not only by way of absolute commandment, but also with advice and perswasions, yea, and as one would say, by prayer and intreaty, "That he would trust more upon considerate counsel, than doubtful fortune; and be directed "and guided rather by him, than follow the steps of Sempronius and Flaminius; and not "think there was nothing done and effected, and make no reckning of this, That the enemy had wiſe admoniſhed the General of Horſe aforehand (but all in vain) he took his way to Rome.

In the beginning of this ſummer, wherein theſe exploits were performed, war began alſo in Spain both by Sea and Land. Aſdrubal to that number of ſhips which he had received ready rigged and well appointed of his brother, joyned other ten. To Himilco he gave the charge of a fleet of forty ſail: and ſo, looſing from Carthage, whiles his ſhips kept neer to Land, he conducted his I army along the River upon the ſtrand, ready to give battail to the enemy, howſoever he ſhould hap to encounter him either by Land or Sea. Cn. Scipio after he had intelligence that the enemy was removed out of his wintering harbour, at the firſt had likewiſe the ſame intention and purpoſe, but afterwards doubting to encounter by Land, upon the exceeding great report that went of new aids, he embarked his beſt and moſt choice ſouldiers, and with a fleet of 35 ſail, ſet forward to meet the enemy. And the ſecond day after that he had looſed from Taracene, he came to the rode diſtant ten miles from the mouth of the River Iberus. From whence, two Pinnaces of the Maſſilians were ſent out afore, and brought word, that the Carthaginian Armado rode in the mouth of the River, and that the tents were pitched upon the bank. And therefore to the end that he might ſurpriſe them at unwares, and unlooking for them, with all the fearful terrour at K once, that he could poſſibly, he weighed anchor, and ſet ſail toward the enemy. In Spain there are many Towrs ſtanding upon high grounds, which ſerve the inhabitants of the country in good ſtead, both as watch-Towers to diſcover, and alſo as ſconces to withſtand Theeves and Rovers. From whence the enemies ſhips were deſcryed firſt, and a ſignal given to Aſdrubal: in ſuch ſort, as the tumult and trouble aroſe upon the Land, and in the camp, before any was ſeen on the Sea and amongſt the ſhips: for as yet neither noiſe of oars, nor any ordinary ſtir elſe of mariners, was heard; nor yet the capes and promontories between ſuffered the fleet to be ſeen. But then, all on a ſuddain, certain Horſemen ſent from Aſdrubal one after another, commanded the ſouldiers (who either wandred along the ſtrand, or late quiet within their pavilions, looking for nothing leſſe than fight that day) preſently in all haſte to go aboord, and to arme, for that the Ro- L man fleet was not far from the haven. This commandment the Horſemen that were ſent, gave every where. And within a while Aſdrubal came in perſon with the whole army. All was on a hurry, and full of ſundry alarms; whiles both mariners and ſouldiers, made haſt to be ſhipped, rather like men that fled from Land, than went to fight. Scarce were they all embarked, when ſome of them looſed from the ſhoar, and plucked up Anchors, others cut the Anchor Cables, for that nothing ſhould ſtay them: and all that they did, was with ſuch haſte, that whiles the ſouldiers were occupied in making themſelves ready to fight, the mariners were hindred in their buſineſs: and whiles the mariners made ſpeed, the ſouldiers were kept from taking their armour, and fitting themſelves therewith. By which time Scipio was not only approached neer, but alſo had marſhalled and ordered his ſhips ready to fight, So as the Carthaginians were trou- M bled as well with the hurly burly and tumult of their own people, as with the aſſault and battel of their enemies. And having (to ſay a truth) made an aſſay and proffer of fight, rather than begun any indeed, they turned away their fleet, and fled. And ſeeing, when they were once put to flight (by reaſon they were parted aſunder all abroad, and lay open to ſo many of their enemies, following them upon the poop all at once) that they were ready and eaſy to be bonged and pierced, they rowed on all hands to the ſhore. Some were fain to wade to Land, others leapt on drye ground; one ſort armed, another ſort unarmed; and ſo eſcaped to their company, embattailed along the ſtrand. Howbeit, in the very firſt encounter and onſet, two Carthaginian ſhips were taken, and four ſunk. The Romans, albeit they ſaw the enemies, maſters of the Land, and might behold them ſtand in battail array all along the River ſide upon the banks, yet made they no N ſtay, but chaſed the fearful fleet of their enemies: and ſo as many ſhips, as either had not cracked, ſplitted, and broken their ſtems, with daſhing upon the ſhore, or were not run a ground, and ſtuck faſt by their keels in the ſhelves, thoſe they drew up, and warped into the deep, with ropes faſtned to their poops; and ſo of thirty they took five and twenty. And yet, the taking of theſe veſſels was not the beſt and goodlieſt work of their victory: but this paſſed all, that with one light skirmiſh they became L L. of all the Sea along thoſe coaſts. And therefore arriving with their whole navy before * Honoſca, they landed their men, won the City by forcible aſſault, ſacked it, and from thence went forward toward Carthage. And after they had foraged and waſted all the territory about, at the laſt, they fired the very houſes that joyned to the walls and gates of the City. From thence the Armada laden now and charged with rich pillage, ſailed as far as * Longu- O tica. Where they found great ſtore of Spart [to make Cables] provided and laid up there by Aſdrubal to ſerve the navy: and when they had taken thereof as much as they needed, they made a light fire of all the reſt. Neither coaſted the Roman fleet along the continent and main only, and ſcoured thoſe parts which lay out into the Sea, but paſſed alſo unto the Iſle * Ebuſus: where they aſſaulted hotly for two dayes ſpace, the head City of the Iland, with much ado, and ſmall effect. And when they perceived, that they ſpent time in vain, and were paſt all hope to win it, they fell to rob and ſpoil the country: and after they had rifled and burned certain villages, and

From thence he came back with the fleet, and returned into the hither part of the Province, whither resorted unto him the Embassadors of all the Nations that inhabit about Iberus, yea and of many also from the farthest part of all Spain. But of States that absolutely came under the obedience of the people of Rome, doing fealty and homage unto them, and giving hostages for assurance of their allegeance there were above 120. Scipio therefore, taking himself strong enough in land forces, went on as far as to the chase of * Castulo. And Asdrubal retired himself into * Lusitania, near the Ocean sea. Hereupon the rest of the summer was like to be quiet: and quiet had it been, for B any thing that the Carthaginians did to the contrary. But, (over and besides the naturall disposition of all Spaniards unconstant, busie and evermore desirous of novelties and alterations. Mardonius a Nobleman, who before time had been the Lord and Prince of the Ilergetes, seeing the Romans retired back from the forrest, toward the sea-coast, stirred up the the people of his country, and invaded the peaceable Territories of the Romans associates, for to spoil and waste the same. Against whom there were sent from Scipio three thousand Romans, besides certain auxiliary souldiers also, lightly armed; who in a light skirmish discomfited his forces (as being a power gathered in haste, and disordered) slew many, took some prisoners, and disarmed the greater part of them. Nevertheless, the rumour of this alarm caused Asdrubal as he departed to the Ocean, to cross the river Iberus back again, for the rescue and defence of his friends and Allies. The Car- C thaginians were encamped in the territory of the Ilercaonians, and the Romans near the new Armada, when sudden news diverted the war another way. The Princes of the Celtiberians, who had sent the Embassadors of their country and hostages unto the Romans upon a messenger dispatched unto them from Scipio, arose up in arms, and entred the Province of the Carthaginians with a strong and puissant army, won three towns by assault; and afterwards, in two battels which they fought with Asdrubal right valiantly slew 15000 enemies, and took 4000 prisoners, and many military ensigns they bare away.

Whiles Spain stood in these terms, P. Scipio came as L. Deputy into that Province, continuing still his government after his Consulship expired, and was sent from the Senat with thirty ships of war, eight thousand souldiers, and great store of victuals. This great fleet, in regard of D many hulks and ships of burden which accompanied it, was kenned and discovered afar off, to the great joy both of Romans and also of their friends and associats, and arrived within the port and haven of Tarracon. Where the souldiers were disbarked, and Scipio joyned with his brother: and from that time forward they agreed together, and with one accord managed the war. And whiles the Carthaginians were amused with the Celtiberian war, they made no stay, but passed over Iberus & seeing no enemy they marched on toward Saguntum; for that the bruit went, that the hostages of all Spain, delivered unto the custody of Annibal, were kept there in hold within the Castle, but with a small guard about them. That was the only pledge which staid all the Cities of Spaine, whose minds were well affected and enclined to entertain league and society with the Romans, but they feared lest if they should revolt, it would cost the lives of their E children. This bond which held Spain in awe, one man eased them of, by means of a device and practise more witty and subtile than honest and loyal. There was at Saguntum, one Acedux a Nobleman of Spain, trusty and faithful aforetime unto the Carthaginians: but then (as the nature is for the most part of these Barbarians) as fortune altered her countenance, so changed he his allegeance. And supposing, that if he should flie unto the enemies, without performing some notable treason and delivering into their hands one thing or other of great importance, he should be counted no better than a vile, base, and infamous creature, he cast about how he might wind himself into these new Allies, and win them by some good service, unto their best and greatest behoof. And considering all the means that Fortune might bring within his compass to effect, he employed himself especially at the length, to set free and deliver those hostages; thinking that F the only way to win and procure unto the Romans the amity of all the Princes and great men of Spain. But knowing assuredly, that without warrant from Bostar the Constable of the Castle, the keepers of those hostages would do nothing, he setteth in hand and cunningly goeth to work with Bostar himself. Now lay Bostar in Camp without the City by the water side, to impeach the Romans for entring the haven. Thither came Acedux to him, withdrew him apart into a secret place, and declared unto him as a man ignorant, in what state things stood. Namely, "That it was fear and nothing else, that kept the Spaniards unto that day in obedience, because "the Romans were so far off: but now the Romans were encamped on this side Iberus, as a sure "fortress and place of refuge unto them, if they minded any innovation and change of State: "and therefore seeing they could not long be kept by fear, they were to be obliged and bound G "unto Annibal by some favour and good turn. When Bostar marvelled and demanded what sudden demerit this might be, and of so great consequence. "Mary (quoth he) send back "the hostages into their own Cities. An acceptable present that will be both particularly to "their parents, who are of greatest calling and reputation in their own countries, and also ge- "nerally to all the Cities and Nations. Every man (you know) is desirous to be trusted: and "for the most part, credit given frankly unto one, bindeth him surely to be most faithfull. The "ministery and charge of conducting the hostages home to their own houses, I will require to "have mine own self, that I may farther a plot and device of my own, with mine own proper

"ſervice and employment: and the thing which of it ſelf in nature is acceptable, I will in what I N
"can grace and commend the ſame, and make it more meritorious. Having thus perſwaded the man being not altogether ſo wily as other Carthaginians naturally are, he went by night ſecretly as far as the Corps de guard of the enemies, and after he had met and talked with ſome Spaniards that were auxiliary ſouldiers in the Camp, and by them was brought before Scipio, he declared unto him his whole intent and deſignment, and the cauſe of his coming. And after they had given and received faithful promiſe mutually between them, and agreed of time and place for the delivery of the hoſtages unto Scipio, he returned again to Saguntum. The day following he ſpent with Boſtar, in receiving Commiſſion from him for the execution of this matter. And thus being diſmiſſed and having his diſpatch, he purpoſed to go in the night, to the end that he might (forſooth) avoid the watch and wards of the enemies, the Romans: and at the hour appointed he raiſed thoſe who had the guard and cuſtody of the children, and put himſelf on his way; and (ſimple man he) as if he had been altogether ignorant of that which hapned, brought them within the compaſs of an Ambuſhment, forelaid beforehand by his own wily and crafty device: and ſo were they brought into the Roman Camp. All other points beſides, concerning the rendring of the hoſtages, according to the agreement and appointment with Boſtar, were performed in the ſame order, as they ſhould have paſſed, in caſe all had been done in the name of the Carthaginians, and to their behoof. But the Romans won much more thank, and gained greater favour thereby, than the Carthaginians could have attained in the like curteſie. For the Carthaginians I
them and proud) might have been ſuppoſed if they had done it now, to have been mollified and made more benign and gracious through adverſe fortune and fear: but Scipio the Roman General, at his firſt coming, and unknown before time, began with a notable example and teſtimony of clemency and liberality. And Acedux beſides reputed a wiſe and prudent man ſeemed not without great reaſon to have made exchange of his Allies and Friends. Whereupon they all deſired with one accord to revolt, and preſently they had taken arms indeed and rebelled, but for the approach of winter which forced as well Romans as Carthaginians to betake themſelves to their winter harbors.

Theſe were the occurrents that fell out alſo in Spain, in the ſecond ſummer of the Punick war: whiles in Italy the wiſe and wary delaies, the induſtrious temporizing of Fabius in the manner of L his warfare gave the Romans ſome reſpit and intermiſſion of their foils and overthrows. Which as it wrought in Annibal no ſmall trouble of mind and perplexity, to ſee that the Romans at the laſt had choſen for their General, a man who managed war, by diſcourſe and guidance of ſound reaſon & not by adventure of fickle fortune; ſo it was deſpiſed of his own Citizens, as wel thoſe that were armed abroad, as gowned at home: & namely when during the abſence of the Dictator, there hapned to be a field fought through the raſhneſs of the Generall of the Cavalry, with more joyfull ſucceſs (to ſpeak truly) than happy and fortunate. Two other things there were beſides, that cauſed the Dictator to be worſe thought of, and in great diſgrace and obloquy. The one through the deceitful and wily policy of Annibal: who being enformed by certain fugitive Traitors (that fled from Rome unto him) which were the lands and poſſeſſions of the Dicta- M tor; gave expreſs commandment when he had deſtroyed the country about, and made all even with the ground, to forbear all kind of hoſtility there only, and to touch nothing of his, either by fire or ſword: to the end it might be thought there had been ſome packing between him and Annibal; and that this was the hire and conſideration agreed upon between them two. The other aroſe from an action of his own: namely, about the exchange and courſing of certain priſoners or captives: which peradventure at the firſt appearance might have ſeemed doubtful and ſuſpicious (becauſe therein he ſtaid not for to have the Commiſſion and approbation of the Senat) but in the end and up-ſhot it turned no doubt, to his ſingular praiſe and commendation. In that enterchange aboveſaid, it was capitulate between both Generals, of Romans and Carthaginians, (like as it had been afore in the firſt Punick war). That whether ſide received more Captives N than they gave again, ſhould yield for every one ſouldier * two pound and a half of ſilver. When it fell out therefore that the Roman Dictator Fabius, had received more priſoners by 247 than Annibal, and the paiment of the ſilver for them due; after much debate in the Senat houſe, (becauſe he had not direction therein from the LL.) was delaied, and no order taken therefore; he ſent his ſon to Rome of purpoſe, to make ſale of his lands, which had not been endammaged by Annibal: and ſo to his own coſt, and out of his private purſe diſcharged a publike debt.

7,lib.10,ch. 3d, ſterl. accounting 100 drachmes or Roman denarii to a lib.

Annibal now lay in leaguer before the walls of Gerion, a City which he had won and ſet on fire, and reſerved a few houſes ſtanding, to ſerve him inſtead of barns and garners for his grain. From thence he ſent out two third parts of his forces to purvey corn: and remained himſelf in guard with one third part, ready in arms, (but lightly appointed and without any bag and bag- O gage) in a meet and convenient place; both for defence of the Camp, and alſo for diſcovery of all the coaſts about that no aſſault were made upon the purveyors. The Roman Army lay then in the Territory of Larinum, and the Captain General was Minutius, Commander of the horſemen. becauſe the Dictator (as is aboveſaid) was gone to the City of Rome. But whereas theſe had uſually encamped before, upon ſome high hill and ſtrong place of ſecurity; now they began to draw down into the vale and the plain ground, and to deviſe crafty means and ſtratagems beyond the natural reach of the Commander himſelf; namely, how they might aſſail either

A either the purveyors as they ſtragled about in the country, or ſet upon the Camp of their enemies, left with a ſmall power and guard to defend it. Annibal was not ignorant, that together with the General, the whole manner and conduct of their warfare was changed: and that the enemy would fight rather more raſhly and haſtily, than wiſely and warily. And himſelf (who would have thought it, conſidering the enemy was approached nearer) ſent out a third part only of his ſouldiers to provide corn and forrage, and kept the other twain with him in the Camp: he removed alſo his tents nearer to the Romans, almoſt two miles off from Gerion, to a little hill within the ſight of the enemies, to the end they might know he was minded and ready to reſcue and defend the purveyors, if haply they ſhould be charged upon. Then eſpied Annibal another hill nearer, and B ſtanding even over the very Camp of the Romans. For the gaining whereof, (ſeeing that if he ſhould have gone by day time openly, he had been no doubt prevented by the enemies, who would have ſeized it firſt, by reaſon it was nearer unto them) he ſent certain Numidians by night, who ſurpriſed it and kept it. But the Romans making little or no account of their ſmall number, drave them the morrow after from thence, and thither removed their own tents: ſo as then there was but a little diſtance between one Camp and the other, and the ſame, in a manner wholly taken up and repleniſhed with Romans: and withall, at the ſame time, the horſemen of the Romans with certain footmen lightly armed were ſent out at a poſtern gate of the Camp, (which opened not upon the Carthaginians) againſt the forragers, whom they diſcomfited, put to flight, and ſlew a great number of them. Neither durſt Annibal iſſue forth to skirmiſh; for, having C few about him, he was hardly able to defend his Camp, in caſe it had been aſſaulted. So he was driven now to uſe the policy and ſhifts of Fabius, (for part of his forces were away) and managed his war, ſitting ſtill as it were, and keeping the enemy at a bay and at ſtaves end: and ſo retired with his ſouldiers to the former Camp, under the walls of Gerion. Some write, that there was a field pitched, and a ſet battel fought with banners diſplaied, wherein Annibal at the firſt encounter was diſcomfited and chaſed to his Camp: but from thence they iſſued forth who were within and ſo the fear turned upon the Romans, who on a ſudden were put to the worſt: but by the coming of Numerius Decimus (a Samnit) with ſuccour, the fight was reenforced and renewed. This man, not only nobly deſcended, but alſo of great power and wealth, as well in Bovianum his native Country, where he was born, as throughout all Samnium (by order and commandment from the D Dictator) came with a power of 8000 foot, and 200 horſe, toward the Camp: and being eſpied by Annibal on the backſide, gave both parties good hope of freſh and new aid. But when the noiſe went, that Fabius at the ſame time was coming alſo from Rome, Annibal for fear of being entrapped within ſome Ambuſh, retired back with his own men, and the Romans made purſuit after him: and with the help of Numerius the Samnit, won in one day by force two fortreſſes. So there were 6000 enemies ſlain, and 5000 Romans. And yet as equal in a manner as the loſs was of both parts, the rumour ran to Rome of a brave victory, with letters alſo in poſt from the General of horſemen, full of folly and vanity. Much arguing there was and debate about theſe matters, both in Senate, and before the people ſundry times. And when all the City beſides was joyous, and the Dictator (alone) gave no credit either to the bruit that was blazed, or the letters: ſaying withall, E That if all were true, yet he feared more the fawning than frowning of fortune: then M. Metellus a Tribune of the Commons ſtepped forth and ſaid, "That this above all was not to be ſuffe- The ſpeech of Metellus againſt Fabius.
"red: that the Dictator, not only while he lay in Camp, oppoſed himſelf againſt all goodneſs, and
"ſtained all valorous ſervices; but alſo being abſent from thence, croſſed and diſgraced that which "was well done and worthily atchieved: and that he, of purpoſe, drew the war in length and pro"longed the time to the end he might continue the longer in government, and be the man alone
"to command all, both in the City and abroad in the Army: for one of the Conſuls was ſlain in
"battel, the other under a pretence & colour of purſuing the Carthaginian fleet was ſent out of the "way, far enough off from Italy: as for the two Prætors, they were employed both in Sicily and "Sardinia: and yet neither of thoſe two Provinces had any need of a L. Deputy there. And M.
F "Minutius Generall of the horſemen, was kept priſoner as it were, and might neither ſee enemy, "nor do any martial exploit. And hereupon it is (quoth he) that not only Samnium (whereof the "poſſeſſion was ſurrendred unto the Carthaginians, as if it were a territory lying beyond Iberus)
"but the Campane, Calene, and Falern territories were utterly overrun and waſted, whiles the "Dictator abode ſtill at Caſilinum, and with the legions of the people of Rom defended his own "lands & poſſeſſions only. And when the Army and General of the Cavalry were deſirous of bat-
"tel, they were kept back encloſed in a manner within the compaſs of the Camp & their weapons
"taken from them, as if they had been captive enemies: & at length when the Dictator was once "departed from them, they iſſued forth of the Camp, like men delivered from ſiege, & ſo diſcom-"fited & put to flight their enemies. In conſideration of all theſe things, (he ſaid) if the Commons G "of Rome were of that courage, as ſometimes they had been, he would boldly have put up a bil for
"to deprive C. Fabius of his government. But now for this time, he would propound a more in"different & reaſonable law, by vertue wherof the Commander of horſemen may be made equall
"with the Dictator in authority and power. Yet ſo, as that Q. Fabius might not be ſent unto the "Army, before that he had ſubſtituted & ordained another Conſ. in the room of C. Flaminius. The Dictator forbare altogether to come into any of theſe aſſemblies of the people, as a man in action and pleading nothing popular, and who framed not himſelf to the humor of the common people; Neither was he in the Senate houſe heard with patience, at what time as he either magnified and extolled the valour of the enemy; or rehearſed & reckoned up the loſſes and foils received for H two years ſpace, through the raſhneſs and unskilfulneſs of the Commanders: and ſaid withall, that the General of the horſemen was to anſwer and give account for fighting againſt his edict and ex-

"& to do all according as I thought good, I would effect and bring to paſs, within few daies, that "men ſhould know, that a good warrior was to make ſmall reckning of fortune: but wiſdom, wit,
"and counſel were to guid and direct all. And for mine own part, I deem it a great honor & glory
"to have preſerved an army in a time of trouble and danger from ſhame and ignominy, than to "have ſlain many thouſands of enemies. After he had made theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches & reaſons in vain, and created for Coſ. M. Attilius Regulus: for that he would not be preſent to debate the I queſtion concerning the right and authority of his own government, he departed by night ſeaſon toward the army; even the very day before that the foreſaid law ſhould be propounded. The morning came, and the commons were aſſembled to an audience: wherein men ſeemed rather ſecretly in their hearts to malice the Dictator, & to affect and favour the General of the horſemen, than durſt come forth and be ſeen to perſwade and ſet forward that which pleaſed them all in common. And notwithſtanding the bil was exceedingly well liked of, yet there wanted one to give ſome credit and authority thereunto. At length, one ſtepped forth to ſet it on foot, namely, C. Terentius Varro, who the year before had been Prætor, a man not only of obſcure degree by calling, but alſo of vile & baſe parentage deſcended. His father was (as they ſay) a Butcher, who kept ſhop and ſold meat himſelf, and trained up his ſon as his apprentice in the ſame mechanical and ſervile K occupation. This Varro being a young man, and well left by his father (who was grown rich, and gained greatly by his trade) gave his mind and conceived ſome hope to live more gentlemanlike:
and took a great liking to the common place, and pleading at the bar: exerciſing himſelf in entertaining cauſes of baſe perſons, againſt the eſtate and name of honeſt Citizens and of good reputation: by means whereof he grew to be known among the people, and afterwards was advanced to place of worſhip and honour. And having been Treaſurer of the City, and born both Ædileſhips, as well that of the Chair, as the other of the Commons: and at length gone through one Prætorſhip, he aſpired now higher, in hope to be Conſul: and full craftily waited his time, and ſought to wind himſelf within the favor of the people by means of the ill opinion and hard conceit they had of the Dictator: & thus he alone went away with all the affectionate love of the Commons. L All men that were either at Rome, or in the Army, both good and bad, in general (excepting the Dictator himſelf) received and admitted that bill, as made to his diſgrace and ſhameful reproach.
But he with the very ſame gravity and conſtancy of heart, endured theſe injurious courſe & dealing of the people raging againſt him, wherewith he had born his adverſaries ſlandering & charging him before the multitude: and having received in the way as he journied, letters importing the decree of the Senat for dividing his authority equally with the General of the horſemen, and being aſſured that notwithſtanding his commiſſion were parted and communicated with another, yet his ſkill and ſufficiency of conduct and command, remained ſtill with himſelf: with a mind invincible as well againſt Citizens as enemies, he returned to the army. But Minutius, who before that time was hardly to be endured, both for his fortunate ſucceſs and alſo for the favour of the M common ſort: now verily beyond all meaſure and bounds of modeſty, vaunted and gloried, in that had conquered & got the maſtery over Fabius as well as over Annibal: "That Fabius (I ſay) who
"in time of diſtreſs and calamity, was the only warrior and Captain that could be found out to "match Annibal: that the ſuperior Magiſtrate was by the conſent & approbation of the people,
"(a thing never to be found in any record of Chronicles) made but even equal with the inferi"or; to wit the Dictator with the General of horſemen: and in that City, wherein the Comman"ders of the Cavalry were wont to quake and tremble at the rods and axes of the Dictator. So "conſpicuous and evident in the eies of the world, was his felicity and proweſs above all others.
And therefore minded was he to follow his own fortune, and to take his time: in caſe the Dicta"tor ſtill continued ingring in ſloth and idleneſs, condemned in the judgment both of God and N
"man. Whereupon the very firſt day that he & Fabius were met together, he ſaid that they were above all things to determine & ſet down in what ſort they might order this their equal authority of government. He for his part thought it beſt, that each other day (or if longer time between were ſuppoſed better) they ſhould one after the other alternatively have the full and whole command of all for the time in their ſeveral turns: that if any occaſion of fighting a battel were preſented, they might be able to countervail the enemy, not only in counſel, but alſo in power and ſtrength. Q. Fabius liked not of this; ſuppoſing that whatſoever lay in the hands and diſpoſition of his raſh colleague muſt needs be ſubject unto the arbitrement of Fortune: Saying moreover unto him, "That he was indeed to impart unto him government and rule, but not wholly to depart
"therefro, and ſhut himſelf out. And therefore he would never willingly fail, but (to his power) O
"manage by counſel and diſcretion one part or other: neither would he divide with him either
"time or daies, but the forces and armies: that Minutius might have one moyty, and himſelf ano"ther: & ſince he might not preſerve all by his own counſel & policy, yet he would endeavour (ſo "far as he could) to ſave ſomewhat. And ſo much he prevailed, that they parted the Legions between them, as the manner of the Conſuls was. The firſt and fourth fell to Minutius, the ſecond and third to Fabius. In like manner they divided the horſemen number for number, and the auxiliary ſouldiers of Allies and Latines. The Generall of the horſemen would needs likewiſe that they ſhould be encamped aſunder.

A Annibal conceived hereupon a two-fold joy, (for he was not ignorant of all that was done among the enemies, partly by intelligence given him from thence by fugitives, and partly by means of his own escouts and spies) for he made this reckoning, both that he should deal well-enough with the lavish rashness of Minutius, and handle him in his kind; and also that the prudent policy of Fabius was abridged and diminished by the one half. Now there was a little hill between the Camp of Minutius and the Carthaginians: and no doubt there was, but that he who could gain it aforehand should have the vantage of the enemy, in regard of the ground. That hill Annibal was not so desirous to get without skirmish, (& yet it had been a matter of good importance) as willing thereby to give some occasion of fighting and scuffling with Minutius, whom B he wist very well to be alwaies forward enough to encounter him and make resistance. The plain all between, seemed at the first sight nothing commodious nor good for men that would lay an ambushment, because it was neither over-grown with any woods, nor yet in any part roughly over-spread and covered, so much as with briers and brambles. But in very deed, the ground was naturally made for to cover and hide an Ambuscado: and the rather, because in so naked and bare a valley none would have imagined and suspected any deceitful trains, and forelaying of wait. And yet there were in divers nooks and corners thereof certain hollow rocks and caves, and some of them of sufficient capacity to receive 200 armed men. In these lurking holes there were bestowed 5000 of horsemen and footmen one with another, some in one place, some in another, according as they might commodiously lie there closely hidden. And yet, lest that the stirring of C any one that might chance to go forth unadvisedly, or the glittering of armour, should bewray the trains in so open a valley, Annibal by sending out at the break of day some few for to seize the aforesaid hill, withdrew the eyes of his enemies another way. These at the first view were despised of the Romans for their small number, and every man was desirous to be doing with them, and their fingers itched for to set the enemies back, and drive them from thence. The General himself Minutius, as fool-hardy and forward as he that was most, sounded the alarm, and commanded to go to the winning of the place, braving and threatning of the enemies full vainly. First, he sent forth his light armed men to skirmish, but afterwards, the Cornets of horsemen, set close and jointly together in array: and at the last, seeing the enemies seconded with new succours and supplies, he advanced forward himself with his Legions in order of battel.
D And Annibal, whersoever he perceived his men to be distressed, made out continual fresh aides one after another, both of horse and foot, ever as the fight encreased and grew hotter: so as now he had his full army in field, and they maintained battel on both sides with all their power and main forces. First, the light armed Romans, notwithstanding the disadvantage of the ground, desirous to get up against the hill, (possessed aforehand of the enemy) were put back, and beaten down again: insomuch as in their retire, they put the horsemen in fear that followed hard upon them, and fled for refuge to the Ensigns of the Infantry. The main battell of the Legionary footmen, among all the rest that were affrighted, only remained without fear, undaunted; and seemed in a plain, fer, and downright field without ambush, likely enough to have held their own, and in no respect to have been over-matched; so couragious they were, and had taken such E heart upon their late victory, some few daies before. But the enemies starting suddenly out of their Ambuscadoes, so troubled, disordered, and terrified them, flanking them on both sides, and charging withall behind, that neither their heart served any of them to fight, nor their hope remained to fly and escape away. Then Fabius hearing the first cry, and knowing thereby that they were in great fear, and seeing besides a far off their battell disordered and in disarray, "I thought "even as much (quoth he) and no sooner than I feared, it is fallen out: Fortune I see well, hath "over-raught fool-hardiness, and taken it tardy. The man, forsooth, that must needs be made e-"quall with Fabius in government, seeth by this time, that Annibal is his good Master, & his be-"ter by ods in proweſs and fortune: but we shall find out some other time to chide and to be an-"gry. Come on now forth with your standards and ensigns, let us wrest from our enemies hands
F "the victory, and wring from our Citizens mouths confession of their errour and trespass. Now when some of them were slain, and others looked about which way to make escape and flie: Fabius with his forces shewed himself, as sent down from heaven to rescue them. And before he came to lance one javelin, or began to joyn battell and fight one stroke, he not only staid his fellows from running away, but also his enemies from further heat of fight. As many of the Romans as were disbanded and scattered asunder all abroad, repaired again speedily from all parts, and rallied themselves to the entire battell: the rest who by whole troops had turned their backs, made head again upon the enemy: and one while giving ground and retiring by little and little, another while standing in a ring and round together stedfast, kept this order by turns: so as now, both they that were discomfited, and those that were unfoiled became reduced into one body
G of a battell, and advanced their ensigns against the enemy. By which time Annibal sounded the retreat, and openly confessed and said, that as he had vanquished Minutius, so he was foiled and overcome of Fabius. Thus when the more part of the day was spent with variable fortune, and all retired again to their Camps, Minutius called together his souldiers, and spake unto them after this manner: "I have oftentimes heard it spoken (my good souldiers) that he is the best man "and most sufficient, who knoweth himself what is best to do: next to him is he esteemed, that "will be ruled and directed by sage advice & counsel: but he that neither hath the skill to advise an-"other, nor the grace to be advised by another, is simply of the worst nature, & good for nothing.

"Since that we therefore are not ſo happy as to attain unto the higheſt degree of wit, and per- H "fection of nature, let us content our ſelves with the ſecond place, and keep a mean between:
"and whiles we learn to rule, let us ſettle our ſelves and reſolve to obey him that is wiſer than "our ſelves. Let us joyn in Camp with Fabius, and when we have preſented our ſelves and our "enſigns before his pavilion and tribunal, ſee that when I ſalute him by the name of Father (as "is beſeeming his excellent majeſty, and the benefit by us of him received) that ye alſo call thoſe
"ſouldiers your Patrons, whoſe valiant hands and truſty arms erewhile protected you: that this "day may give us yet if nothing elſe, the honour and name of thankful perſons. Having thus ſaid, he gave commandment to pack up bag and baggage, and to diſlodge: and as they marched in good array toward the Camp of the Dictator, they ſtruck both him and alſo all about him into a won- I der and admiration. And having pitched their enſigns before the Tribunal: then Minutius the General of the horſe went forth before the reſt: and after he had greeted Fabius himſelf as his Father, His ſpeech to the Dictator. and the whole Army likewiſe ſaluted thoſe about Fabius, by the name of Patrons: "To my pa"rents (quoth he) O Dictator, unto whom I have made you equall in name only (as much as my "tongue will give me leave) I am bound and beholden for my own life only and no more: but to
"you I am indebted for ſaving both my life, and all theſe here. The Act therefore and ordinance
"of the Commons which hath been a clog and burden to me rather than an honour, here of my "ſelf I renounce, revoke, and aboliſh: and (that which I pray God may prove to the good both "of you and me, of mine army and yours, as well that which is preſerved as that which is the pre"ſerver) lo I ſubmit and ſurrender again my ſelf under your command and government, together K
"with theſe enſigns and legions thereto belonging; beſeeching you to pardon me, and to enter"tain me in the room of the General of the Cavalry, and thoſe here with me, every man in his "former place. Then interchangeably they gave their hands one to another: and the ſouldiers (after the aſſembly diſmiſſed) were curteoully invited, and friendly entertained, as well by them that were unknown unto them as of their acquaintance, and ſo the day, dolorous, heavy, and almoſt diſmall and accurſed, turned to be joyful and feſtival.

So ſoon as tidings came to Rome of theſe occurrents, and the ſame confirmed as well by the letters of the Generals themſelves, as alſo by the common voice of ſouldiers from both Armies, every man, the beſt he could, praiſed and extolled Maximus up to the ſky; whoſe honour and reputation was as great in the opinion of Annibal and the Carthaginians, for then and never before, L they found, that they had to deal and war in Italy and with Romans. As for the two years ſpace before, they ſet ſo light both by Roman Captains and ſouldiers, that they could be hardly perſwaded that they warred with that Nation, whereof there went ſo great a fame, and of whom their forefathers had reported ſuch wonders and terrible things. They ſay alſo, that Annibal as he returned out of the field, gave out theſe words, "That the cloud which ſetled on the hill tops, ho"vered ſo long in the wind that it proved a tempeſtuous ſtorm in the end.

Whiles theſe things were doing in Italy, Cn. Servilius Geminus the Conſul, having ſailed about the coaſts of Sardinia and Corſica with his fleet, and received hoſtages both of the one Iſle and the other, paſſed over into Affrick: and before that he landed in the continent and firm land, he reſt; he came to Affrick, and there ſet his forces aſhore. From thence he led his ſouldiers and marriners likewiſe, one with another disbanded and out of order, as if they were to rob and ſpoil ſome deſart Iſlands, unpeopled and void of Inhabitants. Whereupon they fell unadviſedly into an ambuſh, and being unskilfull of the country, and therewith but few and ſcattered, they were ſoon encloſed among many, and with much ſlaughter and ſhameful flight were driven and beaten back to their ſhips. The fleet thus having loſt a thouſand men, and one Treaſurer of the Army among them, called Sempronius Blæſus, looſed in great haſte from the ſhore (which now was overſpread * Marſalla. by enemies) and held their courſe for Sicily, and at * Lilybæum was ſet over and delivered to T. Ot-tacilius the Prætor, for to be brought back again to Rome, by P. Sura his Lieutenant. Cn. Servilius N himſelf journeyed through Sicily by land, and croſſed the narrow ſeas into Italy: for both he and his Collegue M. Attilius were ſent for by the letters of Fabius, to receive the Army at his hands, now that his ſix-months-ſoveraign government was well near expired. All the Annals in a manner do record that Fabius was the man, who during his Dictatorſhip, fought and waged war with Annibal. Cœlius writeth alſo, that he was created Dictator by the people. But both Cœlius and the reſt, either knew not, or elſe forgot, that the Conſul Servilius, who then was far from Rome, and in the Province of France, had the lawful right and authority only to nominate a Dictator:

and becauſe the City ſo affrighted, by reaſon of that notable overthrow could not ſtay ſo long, they were driven to this ſhift, That there ſhould be created by the people a Pro-Dictator or Dictator his Deputy. But the noble acts and glorious renown of that General, together with the O title of his Image, which might recommend his houſe more honourable to poſterity, gained eaſily this point, and cauſed the Pro-Dictator to be reputed Dictator, and ſo called.

The Conſuls, M. Attilius Regulus, and Cn. Servilius Geminus, having received the army (as is beforeſaid) fortified in good time the places for wintering harbour (for it was then the Autumn ſeaſon) conducted and mannaged the wars together in great concord, and followed the ſame politick courſe that Fabius had done before them. For as Annibal made rodes at any time to purvey corn, they would meet him juſt at every turn, in ſundry places, and either cut off the tail of his men,

A men, or intercept and catch them as they went ſcattering, but never hazard all in one ſet field; the only thing that the enemy ſhot at, by all the means he could deviſe. And ſo near driven was Annibal, and to thoſe terms of want and ſcarcity, that but for very ſhame (leſt by his diſlodging and departure he might be thought to flie) he would have retired back into Gallia, as being out of all hope to maintain and ſuſtain his Army with victuals in thoſe parts, in caſe the new Conſuls who next ſucceeded, ſhould hold on ſtill the ſame policy and manner of warfare. Winter now approached, and all the war that was, continued and reſted about * Gerion: at what time there arrived at Rome Embaſſadours from Naples, who brought with them, and preſented into the Council-Houſe, forty maſſie boles of beaten gold: and withall delivered this ſpeech, and ſaid, * Cirgnola. The Embaſſadors of Naples in the Senate of Rome.

B "That they knew full well, how the Treaſure of the people of Rome was waſted and conſumed "by long wars. And foraſmuch as the ſaid wars were maintained, as well for the defence of the "Cities and Lands of allies, as for Rome, the very head, mother City, and principall Citadel (as it "were) of all Italy, and for the ſoveraign dominion and Empire thereof: the Neapolitans thought "it meet and reaſon, that what ſtore of gold their anceſtors had left unto them, were it for to a-"dorn and deck themſelves, or to relieve them in time of need and neceſſity, with it they were "to aid and help the people of Rome in their adverſity. And if they could have bethought them-"ſelves of any other means beſides, wherein they might ſtead and befriend them they would as "willingly and frankly have made preſentment thereof: ſaying, moreover, that the Senators of "Rome ſhould do them an high pleaſure, if they would make account of all that the men of Na-

C "ples had, as their own; and judge them worthy, at whoſe hands they would vouchſafe to accept "a preſent, much greater, and more precious in regard of the mind and affection of the givers "than the ſubſtance and value of the thing. The Embaſſadors were highly thanked, as well for their liberality and munificence, as for the care they had of them: and that boil was only received which weighed leaſt.

About the ſame time, a Carthaginian ſpy, who for two years ſpace had walked unknown and unſuſpected, was detected and apprehended now at Rome: and after his hands were cut off, was ſuffered to depart. Five and twenty ſlaves were crucified for a conſpiracy contrived in Campus Martius. The informer was made free, and had * 20000 pound of braſs bullion given him for a reward. There were alſo ſent Embaſſadors to Philip King of the Macedonians, to demand * 60 pound 7. ſh 6. d. ſterl.

D again Demetrius Pharius, who having been vanquiſhed in plain field, was fled unto him. Others likewiſe were diſpatched to the Ligurians, as well to expoſtulate with them and complain, that they had ſuccoured Annibal with men, money and other munition: as alſo to hearken and learn (ſeeing they were ſo near) what the Boians and inſubrians did or went about. Beſides, a third Embaſſage was addreſſed as far as to * Illyricum, unto King Pineus, to enquire and call for the Tribute, whereof the term was expired and paſt: and if he were minded to take a longer day, than to receive hoſtages and pledges of him for ſecurity. See how carefull the Romans were, and what a provident eye they had, notwithſtanding the great war which lay heavily upon their necks and ſhoulders, to their other affairs: inſomuch as no one thing in the world, how diſtant and remote ſoever, was by them neglected. But as concerning religion, and Church matters, they * Sclavonia.

E made ſome ſcruple of conſcience, that the Temple of Concord (which L. Manlius, L. Deputy in Gallia, had vowed two years before in time of a ſedition and mutiny of ſouldiers) was not as yet ſet out to workmen for to be built or edified accordingly. And therefore two Duumvirs were for that purpoſe created by Æmylius the Prætor, or L. Governour of the City namely, Cn. Pupius, and Caſo Quintius Flaminius: who gave order, that the Temple ſhould be built upon the Capitoll hill. The ſame Prætor, by vertue of a decree of the Senate, ſent his letters unto the Conſuls, importing thus much, That if they thought good, one of them ſhould repair to Rome for the creation of new Conſuls; and that himſelf would ſummon the Parliament againſt that day which it ſhould pleaſe them to appoint. The Conſuls wrote back again according to the premiſes, That they might not depart far from the enemy without damage of State: adviſing

F them to hold an aſſembly for the Election aforeſaid, by authority of an interregent, rather than that one of the Conſuls ſhould be called away from the wars. But the LL. of the Senate thought it better to have a Dictator choſen by one of the Conſuls, for the holding of that high Court of Parliament. So L. Veturius Philo, was nominated Dictator, and he choſe for Generall of the Horſemen M. Pomponius Matho. But theſe men being not duly and lawfully created were commanded at the fortnights end to give over their places, and then the matter grew to an Interreign. The Conſuls had their Commiſſion, for government and conduct of the Army, continued and confirmed for one year longer. The Senators named for Interregents, firſt Cn. Claudius Cento, the ſon of Appius; and after him, P. Cornelius Aſina. During whoſe Interreign, the Parliament was holden, with much contention and debate between the Nobles and the Commons. The

G Vulgar people endeavoured to advance unto the Conſulſhip C. Terentius Varro, a man of their own coat and condition, one crept into good liking and favour with the common ſort by oppoſing himſelf and conteſting againſt great perſonages, and by other popular practiſes and courſes that he uſed to win grace among the people; as namely, by abaſing the greatneſs of Fabius, and the Majeſty of the Dictatorſhip: for nothing was there elſe in him, to commend him to the world, but a malicious mind to bring others into diſgrace. The Nobles withſtood the Commons all they could, to prevent this miſchief; That men ſhould not take a cuſtome to be their equals, by means of inveighing and making head againſt them. Bibius Herennius a Tribune of the Commons, mons, and kinſman to C. Terentius, blamed and accuſed much not only the Senate, but alſo the Augurs, in that they forbad the Dictator to finiſh and go through with the election: and ſo by drawing them into hatred, ſought to purchaſe favour and credit unto Terentius his Candidate, who ſtood to be Conſul. "Firſt (quoth he) whereas the Noblemen for many years together ſought "occaſions of war, and trained Annibal into Italy, the ſame perſons craftily have made a long war "of it, when it might have been brought to a final end before now. Alſo, when it was well ſeen "that they might have fought a battel with the compleat power of four legions all together; ſeeing "that M. Minutius in the abſence of Fabius had a lucky day: two legions only and no more, were "offered and expoſed as it were to the enemy to be hewn in peeces: and then afterwards, they "were reſcued and ſaved from maſſacre, and the very edge of the ſword: to the end that Fabius "might be called Father and Patron: even he, who to ſay a truth, firſt impeached the Romans for "vanquiſhing the enemies, before that he ſaved them from being vanquiſhed. Moreover, the "Conſuls that ſucceeded, following the ſame courſe and artificiall fetches that Fabius practiſed before them, drew out the war ſtill on length, when they had good means of victory, and "might have fully finiſhed it. A complot (no doubt) contrived and concluded among all the No-"bles. And never will they ſee to make an end of war, before there be a Conſul choſen, a meer "Commoner indeed, to wit, a man never ſeen afore, and of the firſt head. For thoſe who are of "Commoners now made noble, are all alike and of the ſame profeſſion; they draw all in one "line, and have learned one leſſon; and ever ſince that they have left to be contemned of the No-"bility, are faln to deſpiſe and diſdain the Commonalty. For who ſeeth not, that in ſeeking to "have an Interreign, their only purpoſe and reach was that the Election might be full and wholly "in the power and ordering of the Nobles? That was the thing which the Conſuls aimed at, in "ſtaying behind in Camp with the Army: & afterwards when there was a Dictator created againſt "their wills for to hold the great aſſembly for the Election, their drift was, and they wrought ſo, "and brought it about in the end, that the Augurs ſhould give it out and pronounce, that there "was an errour committed in creation of the Dictator. And therefore, ſaith he, the Commons can-"not of all things away with theſe Interreigns: and verily, one of the Conſulſhips (at leaſt) ap-"pertain of right to the Commons of Rome: and no doubt, the people in their free election would "more willingly make choice of one to be Conſul, and confer the dignity upon him, that loved "rather to win the victory at once, than to continue commander in the Army a long time. When the Commons were once enkindled and ſet on fire with theſe ſpeeches and remonſtances, albeit three of the Patritii were competitors, namely, Pub. Cornelius Merenda, L. Manlius Volſo, and M. Æmylius Lepidus, and two * new Noblemen who were already familiar and aquainted with the Commons, to wit C. Attilius Serranus, and Q. Ælius Pætus, of whom the one had been High Prieſt, and the other Augur: yet at length was C. Terentius only created Conſul, to the end that the election ſhould be in his power, that he might chooſe unto him a Collegue at his pleaſure. Then the Patritians having a ſufficient tryall, that their Candidates and Competitors were of ſmall force and not able to prevail, urged and put forward L. Æmylius Paulus, who ſometimes had been Conſul with M. Lælius, in the condemnation as well of himſelf as of his companion, eſcaped the peril of being burnt and was well ſinged and ſcorched, as it were in the fire: a man of all others moſt miſchievouſly bent againſt the Commons: him they urged, I ſay, to ſtand for a Conſulſhip notwithſtanding he refuſed a long while, and alledged many reaſons againſt it. And ſo the next Comitiall or Parliament day, by occaſion that all the concurrents and competitors aforeſaid that ſtood with Varro, gave place and left off their ſuit, he was choſen to match with the Conſul elect, for to thwart and croſs him, rather than to be aſſiſtant unto him in the government. This done, they proceeded to the election of Pretors, wherein M. Pomponius Matho, and P. Furius Philus were created. Unto Pomponius fell by lot the juriſdiction within the City of Rome: and unto P. Furius Philus, between the Citizens of Rome and forreiners. Two other Prætors beſides were choſen, M. Claudius Marcellus, to be ſent L. Deputy into Sicily, and L. Poſthumius Albinus into Gallia. All were created in their abſence, and excepting Terentius the Conſul only, there was no Magiſtracy conferred upon any, who had not aforetime born and exerciſed the ſame: for divers valorous and hardy men were paſſed over and left out, becauſe in ſuch a time of trouble, it was not thought good to prefer any man to a government, wherein he was raw and unexperienced. The Armies alſo were augmented; but to what proportion they aroſe, either in Cavalry, or Infantry, I dare not ſet down any thing for certainty; ſo greatly do authors vary both in the number and quality of the forces. Some ſay, there was a new ſupply of 10000 ſouldiers enrolled. Others affirm that to the five legions there were were adjoyned four new beſides, to the end they might employ nine legions in the wars. Alſo, that the legions were increaſed in number both of foot and horſe: to wit, with the addition of one thouſand footmen, and three hundred horſemen in every Legion: [for ſometime before, a Legion contained 4000 foot, and 200 horſe, called Quadrata legio: whereas at firſt Romulus ordained it to be 3000 of the one, and 300 of the other] ſo as a Legion conſiſted now of five thouſand foot, and three hundred horſe: and that the aſſociats ſhould double the number of horſemen, and find even proportion of footmen with the Romans.

All within theſe marks [ ] read as a marginal note.

Some Hiſtorians have written, that at what time as the battell of Cannæ was fought, the Romans were in Camp 87200 ſtrong. But in this they all agree, that the Romans warred with greater preparation, and more force and fury than in years paſt, becauſe the Dictator had put them in

A in good hope, that the enemy might be vanquiſhed and ſubdued at once. But before that theſe new Legions advanced under their enſigns and banners out of the City, the Decemvirs were commanded to go and peruſe the books of Sibylla; by reaſon that men were commonly put in fear, and terrified with news of ſtrange ſights and prodigious tokens. For the rumour went, that both at Rome in the Aventine, and alſo at Aricia, it rained ſtones, much about one time; and that in the Sabins Country (which no doubt portended a great maſſacre and ſlaughter) there iſſued out of a certain fountain, waters hot, with much bloud: and men were more terrified therewith, becauſe it did ſo many times together. Beſides, in the ſtreet called Fornicata toward Campus Martius, divers perſons were blaſted and ſmitten to death with lightning from heaven. Theſe prodigious
B ſigns were expiate and purged with due remedies out of the foreſaid books. Embaſſadors alſo from the City of Peſtum, brought unto Rome a preſent of maſſie boles of beaten gold. Thanked they were, like as the Neopolitans before them, but the gold was not received.

At the ſame time there arrived at Oſtia from K. Hiero a fleet of ſhips, ready rigged, and furniſhed with ſtore of victuals; The Syracuſian Embaſſadors were brought into the Senate houſe, where they declared, "That K. Hiero, ſo ſoon as he heard of the death of C. Flaminius the Conſul, and the "deſeat of the Army, took it ſo heavily, that no proper calamity of his own, or loſs incident unto "his kingdom, could have troubled him more and touched him nearer: and therefore albeit he "knew full well, that the grandeur and courage of the people of Rome, was ordinarily more admi-"rable in their adverſity, than in proſperity and welfare, yet he had ſent all thoſe things, where-C "with good friends and faithfull Allies are wont to furniſh their aſſociats in time of war: praying "the LL. of the Senat, in any caſe not to refuſe the ſame, but to take all in good worth. And firſt & "formoſt, for good luck ſake and fortunate preſage, they have brought with them the Image of Vi-"ctory in gold weighing 320 pound: requeſting that it would pleaſe them to accept the ſame to "have and to hold it, as their own for ever. Moreover, they had tranſported with them * 300000 "Modios of wheat and 200000 of barley, to the end they ſhould be at no fault for victuals, and "were ready moreover to bring in more, according as they ſhould need, and to what place they "would appoint. As for footmen heavily armed and horſemen he knew well the people of Rome "would uſe none but naturall Romans, or at leaſtwiſe Latines. But foraſmuch as he had ſeen and D "obſerved in the Roman Camp, certein aids conſiſting of light armed ſouldiers, therefore he had "ſent 1000 Archers and Slingers, a meet and competent power to match with the Baleares and "Mores, and other nations that uſe ſhot, and to reach their enemies afar off. Over and beſides "theſe gifts and reall preſents, they counſelled and adviſed them, that the Lord Deputy of Sicily "ſhould paſs with his fleet into Affrick, both to find the enemy work, and give him his hands "full of war at home: and alſo to afford him leſs reſpite, and worſe opportunity, to ſend aid and "ſuccour to Annibal. The Senate returned this anſwer again unto the King: That King Hiero
"had done the part of a right good man, and a ſingular friend and ally: who ever ſince that he was "entred into amity with the people of Rome, hath held on the ſame courſe ſtill, in keeping his "faithfull allegeance, and never failed, but at all times and in all places ſuccoured and advanced "the State and Empire of Rome, with all bounty and princely munificence: which the people of E "Rome took moſt thankfully, as in right they ought. As for gold ſome other Cities likewiſe had "brought and offred unto them, but accepting only in good worth their kindneſs received it not.
"But the Image of Victory, and the happy preſage and foretoken thereof they gladly accepted: and "for that bleſſed Saint, they appointed and dedicated even the Capitol, and Temple of Jup. Opt.
"Max. to be the ſeat and ſhrine thereof: that being conſecrated in that Caſtle and higheſt for-
"treſs of the City of Rome, it might be propice and gracious, and remain firm and faſt to the peo"ple of Rome. As for the ſlingers and archers together with the corn they were delivered to the Coſ. Five and twenty gallies, with five ranks of oars to a ſide, were joined to the Navy which was under the conduct of T. Otacilius the Pro-prætor in Sicily: who had commiſſion, if he thought it good and expedient for the commonweal, to paſs over into Affrick. The Conſuls having finiſhed F the muſters and levied ſouldiers, ſtaid a few daies, untill their allies were come with aid from the Latines. Then were the Souldiers particularly (a thing never done before) by their Colonels, put to their corporal oath, and ſworn to make their repair at the Conſuls commandment, and without their leave not to depart: for until that day there paſſed nothing but a ſacramentall parole & ſimple promiſe in general. For whenſoever the horſemen reſorted to their Decuries, and footmen to their Centuries; both they of the Cavalry in their Decuries, and alſo of the Infantry in their Centuries, ſware (after a ſort) voluntarily among themſelves. That they would not abandon their enſigns by way of flight, or upon any fear, nor go out of their ranks, unleſs it were to fetch either ſome offenſive armour, or to ſmite an enemy, or to ſave the life of a Citizen. Which having been aforetime a voluntary covenant & accord between themſelves, was now by the martial Tribunes G or Colonels reduced to a formal and ſolemn oath and bound the ſouldiers to obſerve them ſame, of neceſſity. Yet before the enſigns ſet forward and marched out of Rome, the Conſul Varro dealt many hot words and brave orations in the aſſembly of the people, intimating & purporting thus much in effect: That the Nobles had called for war in Italy where it was like to remain long enough, and to ſtick cloſe to the ribs of the common-weal, if ſhe were ſerved with many ſuch Generals as Fabius was. "As for my ſelf (quoth he) I ſhall (I trow) vanquiſh the enemy, the firſt day "that I ſet eye upon him, yea, and finiſh the war at once for ever. But his Collegue Paulus made but one only ſpeech, even the day before they were to take their leave of the City: which was not so wel taken of the people for the present, as it is proved true in the end. Wherin he gave Varro no hard words, nor girded at him otherwise than thus: "That he marvelled much, how any Captain, "before he had experience either of his own army, or of his enemies, and knew the situation of "the place and ground and the nature of the country, sitting as yet within the City in his gown, "could perfectly tell what he was to do in the field, and in arms: and be able also to foretell and "set down the very day, wherein he was to encounter and joyn in ranged battel with the enemy. "For his own part, he would not cast thus aforehand, nor plot his designs and counsels before due "time & season, which present occurrences are wont much more to minister unto men, than men "to fit them to the occurrents that shall happen. This would he wish with all his heart, That the "enterprises taken in hand warily and with discretion, might prove as lucky and fortunate. As for I "inconsiderat rashness, besides that it implieth folly, hath ever to that day sped but ill. Thus it was wel seen, that this man of himself enclined to prefer safe proceeding & advised counsel, before doubtful waies & fool-hardy courses: & to the end that he might persever in that resolution more constantly, Q. Fabius Maximus at his departure (by report) bad him farewel, in this or such like manner.

The Oration of Q. Fabius Max. to L. Æmylius the Consul.

"If either you, O L. Æmylius, had a Collegue like unto your self, (which I could rather wish) or "that your self were suitable to your Collegue, these my words to you were altogether needless "and superfluous. For you twain, being two good Consuls, would even without my speech do all "things faithfully to the good of the Commonweal: and contrariwise, if both of you were bad, "ye neither would vouchsafe to give ear to my sayings nor ponder in mind my counsels. But now, "when I consider your companion what he is and your self, to be a man of that quality & worth, "you are he to whom alone I am addressed to direct my whole speech; to you, I say, whom me "thinks I forefee already, like to be in vain and without effect, an honest man and a good Citi- "zen. For if the Commonweal be halt and lame but of one side, as great sway and authority will "bad projects & leud courses carry, as the good, sage and wholsom counsels. For you are far out "of the way and much deceived, O L. Æmylius, if you think to be less troubled with Annibal than "with C. Terentius. And I wot not well, but I greatly fear, that you shall have a more cumbrous "adversary of the one, than a dangerous enemy of the other. For, with Annibal you are to fight "in the field and in time of battel only: but with Terentius you shall have to do in every place, and "at all hours. Against Annibal and his Legions you shall make head, and have the help of your "own Cavalry and Infantry: but General Varro will assail you even with your own souldiers. Far "be from you in any ill sense the late remembrance of C. Flaminius, for I love no such unlucky "presaging. Howbeit, he began his mad fits when he was once Consul, and never before: when "he was in his Province with command & in the Camp with his Army, and never else. But this "Varro even before he stood for the Consulship, and all the whiles he was a suitor therefore, and "now likewise, that he is Consul, before that he seeth camp or enemy in field, is horn-mad, and "talketh like a man besides himself. What foul work then (think you) will he make, when he shal "see himself with armed youths about him in the Camp, who now amongst peaceable Citizens in "their gowns and long robes within the City, stirreth so great storms and tempests, cracking "and vaunting at every second word, of nothing but fight, skirmish, and battel? What a coil, I say, "will he keep there, where no sooner a word spoken, but a blow given; and when upon directi- "on presently ensueth execution? But in case this man (as he saith flatly he will) fall immediatly "to strike a battel, either I know not what belongeth to Art military, and have neither skill how "to conduct this kind of warfare, nor any experience of the quality and nature of this enemy, or "else there will be another place more noble and memorable by our defeat and overthrow, than "was the Lake Thrasymenus. But it is no time now to stand upon these terms, and to glorifie "my self in comparison of this one person: who have loved (as it is well known) to exceed and go "beyond all measure in despising glory & honour, rather than in desiring and coveting the same. "But the truth is this & so it will be found in the end, that the only way to war against Annibal, "is that which I took and alwaies used. Neither is it the issue and event alone (for that is master "and teacher of fools) which sheweth & proveth this unto us, but even reason it self which hath, "and will be still the same and immutable, as long as things in the world hold on as they do. We "war, (you see) in Italy, at home, in our own ground and place of residence: all quarters round "about us, full of our own Citizens or friendly Allies: who daily help us, and will be ready still "to furnish us with armour, men horse, and victuals. Sufficient proof and testimony of their faith- "fulness have they given us already in our hard distress and adversity. Space and process of time "maketh us better stronger, wiser every day than other, and more constant and resolute. Con- "trariwise, Annibal is in a strange and forrein land, in his enemies country, in the midst of all "things that are cross and adverse unto him, far from his house and home, far from his native soil, "having peace no where, neither by sea nor land. No Cities receive him and give him entertain- "ment no wals he hath within which he can retire himself in safety. Nothing seeth he, whereso- "ever he goeth, that he can say is his own. From day to day, from hand to mouth, he liveth of ra- "pine and spoil. Scarce a third part hath he of those forces, which he transported over the river I- "berus. Hunger and famine hath wasted more of them, than the edge of the sword: and for this "small remainder that is left, he is hard and scant provided of food and sustenance. Make you any "doubt then but we shall vanquish him, whiles we sit still and take our ease, who day by day de- "caieth sensibly, and waxeth old and feeble, who neither hath store of victuals to maintain an "army, nor supply of men to make up his broken bands, nor mass of money to entertain them.

E gazed at for their multitude and number, than regarded for the worth & quality of their perſons.

The anſwer of Æmylius to Fabius.

So ſoon as they were arrived at the Camp, and that the new army was interming'ed with the old, they divided the whole army into two camps & ordred the matter ſo, that the new which was the leſſer ſhould be nearer to Annibal: and in the old, the greater number and the whole ſtrength and flower of the main forces ſhould be quartered. Then they ſent away to Rome M. Attilius the Conſul of the former year, who excuſed himſelf by reaſon of his old age, and deſired to be gone. But they gave unto Cn. Servilius the charge and conduct of one Roman Legion, and beſides of two thouſand horſemen and footmen of their allies in the leſſer Camp. Annibal, notwithſtanding he well perceived that the power of his enemies was re-enforced by one half more than before, yet wondrous joyful he was at the comming of theſe new Conſuls. For not only F he had nothing left him of victuals, which from day to day he purveyed for, to ſerve his preſent need and no more; but alſo there was no more to be had, and nothing remained for to fill his hands with; by reaſon that after the territory was not ſafe to travel in, the corn from all parts was conveyed unto the ſtrong walled Towns, and there laid up: ſo that (as afterwards it was known for certain) he had ſcarce corn enough for to ſerve ten daies: and the Spaniards, by occaſion of the dearth and want, were at the point to revolt unto the Romans, if they might but eſpy a good and commodious time therefore. Over and beſides, to the inbred raſhneſs and over-haſty nature of the Conſul, Fortune alſo miniſtred matter to confirm him therein. For in a certain tumultuary skirmiſh (to ſtop and impeach the forragers and Plunderers of Annibal, and which began rather by chance, as the ſouldiers happned to encounter one another, than G upon any conſiderate counſel aforehand, or by direction and commandment from the Generals) the Carthaginians had the foil, and went by the worſt; for of them there were 1700 ſlain: but of Romans and Confederates, not paſſing 100. And when in the train of victory they hotly followed the chace in diſarray, the Conſul Paulus, who that day had the abſolute command (for they governed by turns, each one his day) reſtrained and ſtaied them. Varro thereat chafed and fretted, crying out aloud, That he had let the enemy eſcape out of his hands: and if he had not thus given over the purſuit, the war might have been ended at once. Annibal took this loſs and dammage nothing near the heart, but rather made full reckonieg, that he had caught

(as it were) with a bait & fleshed the audacitousness of the fool-hasty Consul and of the new soul-diers especially. For he knew as well all that was done amongst the enemies, as in his own Camp; namely, that the Generals were not suitable nor sorting one unto the other: and that of three parts of the army, two in a manner were but raw, fresh, and untrained souldiers. And therefore supposing he had now got place and time favourable unto him, to contrive and compass some stratagem, the night following he led forth his souldiers, carrying nothing about them but their armour; and abandoned the Camp full of all things, as well private goods and furniture, as publike provision: and beyond the next hils he bestowed secretly in ambush his footmen well appointed and in ordinance of battel on the left hand; and the horsemen on the right: and conveighed all his carriages into the midst between two flanks: to the end, that whiles the enemy was busied in rifling and ransaking the tents, forlorn (as it were) and forsaken by the flight of the owners and masters, he might surprize him laden and encumbred with bag and baggage. He left behind him in the Camp many fires burning, to the end that the enemies should verily think and believe, that under a pretended shew of an army in Camp, his purpose was to hold and keep the Consuls amused still where they were, whiles himself in the mean time might gain more ground and escape further away: like as he had plaid by Fabius the year before. When day-light was come and the Coss.
saw, first that the standing guards were gone, and perceived (as they approached nearer) an unwonted silence, they marvelled much. But after they discovered certainly that the Camp was abandoned, and no person remaining behind: there was running of all hands who could run fastest to the pavilions of the Coss. with news that the enemies were fled, in such fear as they left their tents standing entire, and had quit the Camp wholly: and to the end their flight should be more secret and not descried they had left light fires burning in every place. Then began they all to cry and call upon the Coss. for to command the standards and ensigns to be brought abroad and to lead forth in pursuit of the enemies, and without any stay to make spoil and havock of their Camp. And in truth, one of the Coss. was no wiser than the common souldiers. But Paulus replied, and told them ever and anon, that they were to be circumspect and wary, and to look about them what they did for fear of an ambush. Yet seeing in the end no remedy and that otherwise he could neither stay the mutiny, nor rule the Captain thereof: he sent out M. Statilius (the Provost marshall) with a troop of Lucan horsemen in espiall to discover the coasts and see all were clear: who having ridden hard to the gates and given order to all the rest for to stay without the fortifications, himself with two horsemen besides entred within the rampire, and having looked and searched every corner advisedly, he returned and made relation, That past all peradventure there were knaves abroad, and a piece of treachery was in hand: for why, there are fires made (quoth he) on that side only of the Camp that looked toward the enemy: the pavilions stand open, and all things of price and value which they set more store by are left at random even to fit our hands: and we have seen besides in divers places, silver plate and coin scattered along the way here and there, as it were a bait laid to train us to a booty. These circumstances reported, of purpose to withdraw their minds from covetous and greedy desire of pillage; set them on and kindled them the more. And the souldiers had no sooner cried aloud, that unless the signal were given, they would set forwards without Commanders: but they had a captain straight at hand to lead them the way: for immediatly Varro sounded the march. Paulus who of himself made slow hast, and perceived besides that the birds in taking the Auspice approved not this enterprise, nor gave good tokens of happy speed, gave order straightwaies that his Collegue should be advertised of the unlucky Auspice, who was ready now to set out of the gate with his standard & that in any wise he should stay. Wherewith albeit Varro was not well content, yet the late misfortune of Flaminius, and the memorable overthrow at sea of Claudius [* Pulcher] Consul in the Punick war, wrought some scruple of conscience and fear in his heart. But it was even the fair grace of the gods (if a man may so say) and nothing else, which put by and deferred rather than impeached and inhibited the danger and destruction that hung over the Romans heads. For as good hap was it chanced at the very instant, when the Consul commanded the ensigns to be brought into the Camp, & the souldiers would not obey him that two slaves (who served sometime two horsemen, the one a Formian, and the other a Sidicin, and who in the year when Servilius & Attilius were Consuls among other forragers were taken prisoners by the Numidians) made an escape and fled that day to their old masters again. Who being brought before the Coss. advertised them constantly, that the whole army of Annibal lay close in ambushado on the farther side of the mountains. The coming of these bondslaves so right and jump as they did, caused the souldiers to obey their Coss. Whereas the one of them by his ambitious courting and seeking unto them at the first for a Consulship, and afterwards by his unseemly indulgence and pleasing of them, had lost all his majesty and reputation among them.

* Read the Breviary of the nineteeth book.

Annibal, when he saw that the Romans rather began to stir without advice, than still to run rashly on head to the full, and that his crafty device was disclosed and took no effect, returned again into his Camp. Where, he could not for want of corn make abode many daies: and besides, not only souldiers (who were not all one mans children but a confused mixture of all Nations) began daily to plot and enter into new designments, but also their Captain himself was of many minds. For whereas they began with muttering and grumbling, and afterwards with open mouth, to demand and call for their due wages, complaining first of the dearth of victuals, and in the end, of meer hunger and famine: and withall a rumour ran, that the mercenary souldiers,

A and the Spaniards especially, were minded and intended to give him the slip, and to turn to the enemy; Annibal likewise bethought himself otherwhiles as it was said, how he might flie into Gallia, but so, as he would leave his Infantry behind him at six and seven, and so be gone with his Cavalry alone. As men, I say, were thus plotting and devising in the camp, he resolved at length to dislodge from thence, and to remove into the hotter countries of Apulia, where the harvest was more timely: considering withal, that the farther he went from the enemies his souldiers who were by nature light-headed and inconstant, would not so easily revolt and flie from him. So he took his way by night, and made fires likewise, and left a few tents standing in sight, that the Romans fearing the like trains and ambush as before, might keep in, and not stir abroad. But when B as the same Statilius the Lucan, having scoured all the coasts, both beyond the camp, and the other side of the hills, and brought word that he had discovered the enemies afar off dismarching, then began they the morrow after to think and consult of making after him with hot pursute. But albeit both Consuls continued, as ever before, the same men still, that is to say, diversly minded, and persisting in their several resolutions: but so, as all in a manner accorded with Varro, and none agreed unto Paulus, but only Servilius the Consul of the former year: yet according to the opinion and counsel of the major pars, they went both together (for what might hold that which fatal necessity driveth) to make Cannæ much renowned and famous for the notable overthrow and defeat of the Romans. Neer this village Annibal had encamped under the wind Vulturnus, and had it on his back: which wind, when the fields are scorched and burnt with drought, is wont C to bring with it clouds (as it were) of dust. Which as it was good and commodious for the very camp it self, so it was like to serve in special stead, when they should range their battel in order, and fight, with the wind blowing on their back, against the enemy, whose eyes the dust was ready to put out, flying with the wind full in their faces so abundantly.

The Consuls having diligently searched the wayes and tried the passages ever before them, followed Annibal hard, and so soon as they were come to Cannæ, had him in sight: where they fortified two camps, of like distance almost asunder, as at Gerion; and divided their forces like as before. The river Aufidus ran close by both these camps, and yeelded watring places according as either of them had occasion and need, but not without some scuffling and skirmish. But from the lesser camp, which lay on the farther side of Aufidus the Romans had more liberty to water, be- D cause upon the farther bank there was planted no sconce nor guard of the enemy. Annibal having possessed himself of a good plot of ground to his mind, commodious and meet for the service of horsemen (in which kind of forces he was invincible) ordred his battailons in array, & by putting out certain Numidian light horse, made a bravado, and bade the Consuls battel. And even then it fell out, that both the Roman camps were disquieted and troubled anew, what with the mutiny of the souldiers, and what with the disagreement and jarring of the Consuls; whiles Paulus laid hard unto Varro, and set before his eyes the rashness of Sempronius and Flaminius: and Varro again hit him home, and twit him with the example of Fabius, which made so goodly a shew in the eyes of fearful, idle, and cowardly Captains: both of them fell to protesting and calling God and man to witness, the one giving out that the fault was not in him that Annibal was E now Lord well-neer of all Italy already, and why? because himself was kept short and tied fast enough by his Colleague, and the souldiers whose hot blood was up, and who were eager of fight, had their weapons even plucked out of their hands: Æmylius on the other side complaining that if ought should hap amiss unto the Legions thus betrayed, and offered wilfully and unconsiderately to the danger of doubtful battel, notwithstanding he were not blame-worthy but innocent altogether, yet should he be the first that smarted, and be partaker of the mischief and misfortune: and yet he would gladly see, whether they who were so ready and hasty of their tongue to speak, would be as nimble & active of their hands to fight, when the time came. Thus whiles they spend time in chopping of Logick & quarrelling one with another rather then in good & sober consultations. Annibal who had stood arranged a good part of the day ready to fight, minding to retire his F other forces into his camp, sent forth certain Numidians out of the battel to charge upon the Romans on the other side of the river, who from the lesser camp went for water. These being a disordered & confused multitude, were not fully landed on the bank, but with the shout only & tumult of the Numidians, they were discomfited and put to flight: whereupon the enemy rode farther, even to the standing Corps de guard, quartered before the rampart, and hard at the very gates of the Roman camp. This was such an indignity offered to the Romans, to see themselves now thus braved and bearded even in the very camp by the auxiliary souldiers, and the rascal sort of the enemies, that there was no other thing stayed the Romans from passing the river presently, and embattelling themselves, but only this, that it was Paulus his turn that day to have the soveraign command of all. And therefore the morrow after, when it came to Varro his course for to rule, * That is a scarlet cassock out of the General his pavilion. G without any advice of his companion, he put forth the * signal of battel, and with all his forces put in order of battel, went over the river. Paulus also followed after him, as one who might well enough mislike and disallow the purpose of his Collegue, but otherwise could neither will nor chuse, but second him, and take part in the execution. Being once over the river, they join also the forces which they had in the smaller camp, unto the other: and in this manner they ordred the battel. In the right point which was neerer to the river was arranged the Roman Cavalry, and after them the footmen. The left point on the outside was flanked with the horsmen of the associats: within stood their Infantry: but in the middle part were bestowed the Archers and looſe ſhot, cloſe to the main battel of the Roman Legions; and of all the reſt of light armed auxiliary ſouldiers, conſiſted the van-guard. The Conſuls led both the points, Terentius the left, Æmylius the right, Cn. Servilius had the conduct of the main battel. Now Annibal by the break of day, having ſent before the Baleare ſlingers, and his other light armor, paſſed over the river, and marſhalled them in battel array, ever as they came to land. The horſe as well Gauls as Spaniards, he oppoſed in the left point, neer to the bank, even againſt the horſemen of the Romans: the right conſiſted of the Numidian light horſe: and the main battel was ſtrengthned and fortified with his Infantry: but in ſuch manner as the Affricans flanked both, in manner of wings: and between them were beſtowed the Gauls and the Spaniards in the midſt. A man that had ſeen the Affricans, would have taken moſt of them for Romans, ſo armed were they with Roman armor, gotten much of it at Trebia, but moſt of all at Thraſymenus. The Frenchmen and Spaniards had targets neer of one faſhion, but their ſwords were unlike and far differing. Thoſe of the Gauls were very long and not pointed. But the Spaniard, whoſe manner is rather to fight with the thruſt and to foyn, then to laſh and ſtrike edglong, had handſome ſhort curtilaſſes, and ſharp at the point. And after this ſort ſtood theſe two nations armed before the reſt (terrible to behold, both for the bigneſs of their perſons, and alſo for their habit and attire.) The Gauls all from the navel upward naked: the Spaniards with linnen waſtcoats or jackets, glittering wondrous bright, bordred and embroidered with purple and ſcarlet. The compleat number of all, as well horſe as footmen, that ſtood embattelled, amounted (as they report) unto forty thouſand foot, and ten thouſand men of arms. Theſe Captains had the leading of the two points, to wit, Aſdrubal commanded the left, Maharbal the right. Annibal himſelf in perſon with his brother Mago, conducted the middle battel. The Sun ſhone ſidewiſe upon the flanks both of the one and alſo of the other army, very indifferent and commodious to both parts, were it that they were ſo placed and marſhalled of ſet purpoſe, or chanced at adventure ſo to ſtand: the Romans with their faces full ſouth, the Carthaginians into the north. But the wind which the inhabitants of that country call Vulturnus, aroſe and blew full upon the faces of the Romans, and raiſed ſuch ſtore of duſt, and drave it ſo upon their eyes, that it took away their ſight and proſpect. The cry and ſhout began on both ſides, and the Auxiliary ſouldiers put themſelves forth firſt to skirmiſh, and charged one another with their light ſhot. Then the left point of the Gauls and Spaniſh men of arms encountred and ran full upon the right hand of the Romans Cavalry, nothing at all after the order of horſe-ſervice, for they were of neceſſity to affront one another ſtraight forward, as having no room left about them to fling out and ride at large, being flanked on the one hand with the river, and encloſed on the other with the battaillon of footmen. Whereupon I ſay, they were forced to charge full butt from both parts, directly before them, ſo long as their horſes ſtood cloſe and thruſt together: but at length when they began to ſtir and wince, the riders, man to man, fell to take hold and claſpe one another, and every man to pluck his enemie beſides his horſe, ſo as now they were driven much what to fight on foot. This conflict was rather ſharp then long: and to be ſhort, the Roman Cavalry was diſcomfited and put to flight. And anon, as the horſe made an end of their fight, began the skirmiſh of the foot alſo. At the firſt the Gauls and Spaniards equal to their enemies both in force and courage maintained the conflict right hardily, and kept their order and arraies. At length the Romans caſt about and deviſed on what ſide, and with what form of a cloſe battaillon, to force back that pointed ſquadron of the enemies, ranged very thin, and by ſo much the weaker, and bearing out withal, from the reſt of the battel. Now when they had once driven them to retreat, and give ground, the Romans preſſed on ſtill at one inſtant, and with the ſame violence pierced through them as they fled for fear headlong, until they were entred as far as to the very midſt of the vanguard and main battel: and finding none able to ſtand in their way and make reſiſtance, they gained in the end the very rereward of the Africans: who having drawn in from both ſides their skirts and wings, ſtood together ſtrong, and firmly kept their ground. The Gauls and Spaniards continued ſtill in the midſt, ſomewhat advanced without the reſt of the battel. Now when this pointed ſquadron was driven in by the Romans, and made even and equal firſt with the front of the battel, and afterwards upon farther enforcement, gave way for them to paſs in a lane through the midſt thereof; by that time the Africans charged upon their flanks: and whiles the Romans unwarily were engaged over far within them, they came about them on the skirts, and within a while having ſtretched out and ſpread their wings, encloſed the enemies round on their backs alſo. Hereupon the Romans who had performed one battel and conflict in vain, were forced to give over the Gauls and Spaniards, whom they had diſaraied and put to flight, and were to begin a freſh fight with the Africans: and that to their own great diſadvantage; not only becauſe they being encloſed and pent up in a ſtraight room, were to deal with them that had compaſſed them all about and were at liberty, but alſo becauſe they being wearied, were to maintain a new skirmiſh with thoſe that were freſh in heart, and luſty. And now by this time, in the left point of the Romans battel, where the horſemen of their aſſociats were marſhalled to affront the Numidians they were faln to cloſe fight: which at the firſt theſe Numidians began but coldly and faintly, after the deceitful manner of Carthaginians, unto whom they were faſt and neer neighbours. For 500. of them or thereabout, having beſides their uſual javelins and darts which they commonly carry, ſhort daggers or skeins hidden under their cuiraſs and harneſs, made ſemblance of riding away from their own companies, and ſiding to the Romans, with their bucklers at their backs, all of a ſudden diſmounted from their horſes, and throwing their bucklers, targets, and

A and ſpears at their enemies feet, were received within the main battel, and from thence conducted to the hindmoſt in the rereward, were commanded there to abide behind at their back. And until ſuch time as the skirmiſh joined on all ſides, they continued quiet. But when they ſaw every mans eye and mind buſied and occupied in the conflict, then they caught up thoſe bucklers that lay ſtrewed and ſcattered among the dead bodies all abroad, and played upon the battel of the Romans from behind: and what with wounding their backs, & cutting their hamſtrings, they made foul work and ſlaughter among them, and more then that, raiſed a greater fear and tumult by far. Now when the Romans in one place were frighted and ran away, and in another fought for life, armed only with deſpair of all means to eſcape; Aſdrubal who had the charge of that ſide, B cauſed the Numidian horſemen, who fought but coldly with thoſe that ſtood affront them, to be withdrawn from the midſt of the battel, and ſent them to purſue the enemies in the chace. And to the Affricans over weary now with execution and killing, rather then with any other fight, he joined the Gauls and Spaniſh footmen to aſſiſt them. On the other ſide of the battel, Paulus, albeit at the very firſt ſhock and encounter, he was ſore wounded with a bullet from out of a ſling, yet oftentimes he made head againſt Annibal, and kept his battaillons cloſe and thick together, yea, and in divers places renued the conflict, and evermore the Roman horſemen guarded and protected him. But at the laſt they left their horſes, becauſe the Conſul his ſtrength failed him to rule his own, and to ſit him. Whereupon there was one brought word unto Annibal, that the Conſul had commanded his men of arms to light afoot. Then (quoth Annibal, as the report goeth) Yea, mar-C ry: But how much gladder would I be, if he delivered them into my hands bound hand and foot? And ſurely the horſemen fought ſo after they were alighted, as if there had been no doubt, but that the enemy had the victory. Howbeit, although they had the worſe, yet they choſe rather to die in the place, then to flie: and the victors angred at the heart with them for thus ſtaying the accompliſhment of the victory, went down with them, and killed outright all thoſe whom they could not make to give ground and yeeld. And yet a few ſuch as were wearied with much toil and overcharged with many wounds they enforced to retreat. Anon they were all diſbanded and ſcattered aſunder: and as many as could, recovered their horſes, and fled away. "Cn. Lentulus a Co"lonel ſeeing (as he rode by) the Conſul ſitting all agore blood upon a ſtone. Ah L. Æmylius (quoth

"vigor and ſtrength remaineth in you. Able I am to mount you upon him, to accompany and "protect you alſo. Come I ſay, and make not this battel more curſed and ſorrowful by the death "of a Conſul. Without it, I wot, we have cauſe enough already, and too much, of dolorous tears "and woful lamentation. Whereunto the Conſul made this anſwer: I give thee thanks, O L. Cor- "nelius gra-mercy for thy kindneſs, and God bleſs thee in this thy vertue and proweſs. But take "thou heed to thy ſelf, leſt by thy fooliſh pity of me, thou loſe that little time which thou haſt to

"and will them all from me in general, to fortifie the City of Rome, and man it well with ſtrong "guards, before the enemy follow the train of victory, and come againſt it. But more particular-E "ly, let Q. Fabius underſtand, that L. Æmylius yet, was mindful of his wholſom precepts, all the "whiles he lived, and now alſo forgat them not at the hour of his death. And ſuffer thou me to
"yeeld unto nature, and let go my laſt breath, even here among the heaps of mine own ſlain ſoul-
"diers, that I may end my days and die neither an accuſed and guilty perſon, nor in my Conſul-
"ſhip ſtand up to accuſe my Collegue, and to defend mine own innocency, and juſtifie my ſelfe,
"by the blaming of another. As the Conſul uttered theſe words, firſt the multitude of his own citizens in the rout, and then the enemies in purſuit, ran over him; and not knowing who he was, overwhelmed him with javelins and darts good ſtore. As for Lentulus, his horſe carried him away to a little hill. Then they fled all amain as faſt as they could, 7000. recovered the leſſer camp, and ten thouſand the greater: and upon two thouſand put themſelves into the village it ſelf of F Canna. But becauſe it was an unwalled and fenceleſs town, they were immediatly environed by Carthalo and the horſemen, and ſo periſhed every one. The other Conſul made no ſemblance, that he was offended or diſpleaſed with the companies that thus fled, were it of purpoſe, or as it chanced; and accompanied with fifty men of arms or thereabout eſcaped to Venuſia. In this battel were ſlain of Romans (by report) 40000. footmen, and 2700. horſemen; and in a manner, as many beſides of Allies, as of natural Citizens. Amongſt whom there was one Conſul, two Treaſurers, L. Attilius and Furius Bibaculus, 21. Colonels: ſome alſo who had been Conſuls, Pretors, and Ædiles. Of which number was Cn. Servilius, and C. Minutius Numitorius, who the year before had been Commander of the Cavalry for ſome certain days. Beſides 80. Senators, or ſuch as were Senators fellows, and had born thoſe dignities, in regard whereof, they were to be choſen Senators.
G Theſe ſerved as voluntaries and were enrolled among the Legions. There were taken priſoners at this field, as the general ſpeech went, 3000. footmen, and 300. men of Arms.

This is that noble battel, ſo famous for the overthrow at Canna, and comparable to that defeat at the river Allia. For like as this was of leſs importance then the other, in reſpect of that which enſued after the conflict, becauſe the enemy ſtayed his hand, and purſued not his victory: ſo if we conſider the loſs of men and defeat of the army, it was the greater, and for the ſhameful flight more diſhonorable. For the running away that was at Allia, as it betrayed the City, ſo it ſaved the Army: but at Canna, when the one Conſul fled, there were ſcarce 50. of his army that accompanied him, and as for the other Conſul, whiles he lay a bleeding and dying, all his forces to ſpeak of, took their heels.

Now there being a number in both camps, half diſarmed, and wholly without their chief Commanders: the Captains of the greater Camp ſent a meſſenger unto the other, willing them to come over thither, that they might march in one entire company together, and depart to Cannſium in the night ſeaſon, whiles their enemies were faſt aſleep; as partly wearied with long fight and partly charged with wine & good cheer after their joyful victory. This adviſe, ſome there were that miſliked altogether and rejected. For why (ſay they) might not they come hither themſelvs to us, as well as ſend for us ſince we may as ſoon ſo join together? Becauſe, I wot, all the ways between are full of enemies, and they choſe rather to hazzard the bodies of others, then adventure their own perſons in ſo great danger. Others were not ſo much diſpleaſed for any diſlike of the motion, as their hearts failed them to take in hand the enterpriſe thereof. Then ſpake P. Sempronius Tuditanus a Colonel. "And will ye rather choſe (quoth he) to be taken captive by a moſt covetous and cruel enemy? And to have your heads valued at a price? And that Chapmen coming "to buy you in open market, ſhould ask every one of you this queſtion, Whether art thou a Roman Citizen, or a Latin Confederate? And ſo by thy diſgrace, reproach, and miſery, another man "ſhall get honor, and thy ſelf none. Ye are not (I ſee well) like to Lucius Æmylius, who made "choice to die valiantly, then to live in ſhame and obloquy; nor to many other ſo brave and "hardy men, who lie about him dead on the ground by heaps. But before day light ſurprize us, "and greater troops of enemies beſet the paſſages, let us break through theſe, that in diſorder and "out of array, make ſo foul noiſe at our gates. The point of ſword and edge of courage, is able to "paſs through enemies, ſtand they never ſo thick and cloſe together. We will make a pointed bat-"taillon in wedg-form, and pierce through their looſe and thin ſquadrons, as eaſily as if nothing "ſtood in our way. Go with me therefore as many of you, as are willing to ſave your ſelves and "the Common-weal. The word was no ſooner out of his mouth, but his ſword was out of ſcabbard, and with a pointed battaillon took his way through the midſt of the enemies: and when the Numidians flanked them, and ſhot hard at their right ſide that lay open to them, they ſhifted their targets to their right arm, and ſo eſcaped, to the number of 600. unto the bigger camp, and forthwith from thence joining to the other greater company, they retired themſelves ſafe to Cannſium. Theſe exploits were performed by men yanquiſhed, more upon a preſent fit of courage, as each mans natural inſtinct guided, or chance led him, then either any ſage adviſe of their own, or command of other.

Now when all the reſt came about Annibal immediatly upon this noble victory to congratulat and rejoice with him, yea, and to adviſe him, that after ſo great a battel performed, he ſhould the reſt of that day, and the whole night following, both refreſh himſelf, and alſo give reſt and repoſe to his wearied ſouldiers: Maharbal, General of the Cavalry, was of mind that it was no giving over thus: Nay (quoth he) that you may know of what conſequence this battel is, you ſhall break your faſt and eat your dinner five days hence in the Capitol. Follow hardly with your horſemen, that they may ſee you are come, before they hear that you are comming. No, ſaith Annibal again, let curriers on Gods name go afore, and ſpare not to carry news thereof: Your words are good, and it is a gay matter and plauſible you ſpeak of: but the way thereto is longer, and more then I I can preſently conceive and comprehend: I give you thanks Maharbal, and I commend your good mind and forwardneſs: but we had need to deliberat and pauſe further upon this point. Ah (quoth Maharbal) true it is, I ſee well, that God hath not endued one man with all gifts. Thou haſt the way O Annibal, to win a victory, but not the grace to uſe a victory. And ſurely, in this one dayes delay, as it was certainly believed, ſtood the ſafety and preſervation of the City & Empire of Rome. The morrow after, ſo ſoon as ever the day began to appear, they minded only and intended the gathering of ſpoils, and to view that great butchery and ſlaughter: a pitiful and lamentable ſight even to the very enemies to behold. So many thouſand Romans lay there along in every place, horſemen and footmen pell mell, one with another, according as their hap was to meet together, and either to join in fight, or die in flight. Some were ſeen to ariſe up all bloody from out of the midſt of the ſlaughtered bodies, ſuch, as the bitter morning cold had nipped their wounds, and made them to ſtart up by reaſon of their ſmart, and were by the enemy knocked down again and killed. Other ſome they found lying along ſtill alive, cut ſhorter by the thighs & hams, who offred their bare necks & throats to be cut & call'd unto them to let forth the reſt of their blood. Divers were found with their heads covered within the earth, who as it appeared had made themſelvs holes & and gutters in the ground for this purpoſe, to inter themſelvs: whereinto they thruſt their mouths & faces, & being buried with mould caſt over them, were ſo ſtifled & choaked. But above all the reſt there was one that drew every mans eye upon him & made them all to wonder, a Numidian with his noſe and ears piteouſly mangled & cropt, but yet alive, lying under a Roman dead. For when his hands ſo wounded as they were, would not ſerve him to handle a weapon for very anger he fel mad & lay (ſo long as he had any breath within him) biting his enemy with his teeth.

After they had ſpent a good part of the day in gathering ſpoils, Annibal marched forward to aſſault the leſſer camp: and firſt and formoſt he turned aſide the arm of the river that flanked them, and ſo excluded them from the water. But they all within being over-wearied with toil, with watching and bleeding of their wounds, yeelded ſooner then he looked for: and, covenanted, Imprimis, to deliver up their armor and horſes: Item, to pay 300. Quadrigate

A peeces of silver, for every Roman: 200. for every one of the Allies: and every bondman 100 a peece. Item, that after this ransom paid, they should depart in their single apparel. Thus they received their enemies into the camp, and were themselves put all in ward: but, Allies and Citizens by themselves, apart one from the other. While they trifled time there, there were about 4000. footmen, and 200 horsemen, even as many as either their strength or hearts would serve, who out of the greater camp fled to Canusium, some marching in order, others scattering abroad over the fields, which was not the worse way of the twain, and less safe. And then the camp was surrendered to the enemy, by those that were hurt and heartless, upon the same conditions that the other was. A rich booty was there gotten: and setting aside horses, and men, and silver, which B they used much in trappings and caparisons of their horses, (for souldiers, be ye sure, occupied very little silver, either in their own apparrel, or at their boord) all the pillage was given to be rifled and ransacked amongst them. Then he gave commandment that the dead bodies of his own men should be gathered together for to be buried. And as men say, they were to the number of eight thousand, all right valiant and hardy men. Some Authors report, that the Roman Consul also was sought up and interred. As for those, which escaped to Canusium, were by the Canusins entertained only within the walls, and lodged in their houses: but a noble Lady and a wealthy, named Busa, relieved them with some victual, apparrel, yea, and money also in their purses for their journey. In regard of which bountiful liberality of hers, after the war was finished, she was highly honored by the Senat of Rome.

C Now, there were amongst them four Colonels, namely, Fabius Max. of the first Legion, whose father had been Dictator the year before; and L. Pullicius Bibulus, of the second Legion, together with P. Cornel. Scipio, and Appius Claudius Pulcher of the third Legion who had been Ædile but lately afore: and by general consent of them all, P. Scipio, a very young man, and Ap. Claudius were chosen to bear the soveraign rule, and to have the absolute command and conduct of the army. But as they sat with some few others, in counsel together about the managing of their main affairs, behold P. Furius Philus, whose father had been a Consul, gave them to understand that all their consultations were in vain, and that they did but foster and cherish a fool ish hope of an overthrown state: for the Common-weal was in a desperate case, past all cure, and remediless. Also that certain noble young Gentlemen, of whom L. Cecilius Metellus was the principal, min-D ded nothing else but to take sea, and were ready to embark, to abandon Italy, and to fly for succor to some King or other. This evil tidings as it was most grievous and heavy in it self: so falling out as it did, presently upon other misfortunes so suddenly and unlooked for, put them into their dumps, and wonderfully amazed and astonied them all. And when they that were present in place laid their heads together, and thought good to call others to counsel upon this point, Scipio a young man, even then predestined to be the fatal Captain of this war, answered: What do we here? (quoth he) it is no time now to sit consulting in so great extremity, but leaving all discourses, presently to proceed to action, and to do some exploit. As many therefore as are willing to save the Common-weal, take arms and go with me forthwith: for no where are our enemies (to say a truth) encamped against us more, then where such designments are plotting and contriving.
E Forth he went with a few following after him, unto the lodging of Metellus: and finding there the young Gentlemen aforesaid, close together in counsel thereabout: he drew his sword and brandisht it naked over their heads, as they sat in consultation. "I swear before you all (quoth he) "and I swear from my very heart, and no man urgeth me thereto that I for my part will neither "forsake the Common-weal, nor suffer any Citizen else of Rome to abandon her. And if I fail wit- "ting and willing, then confound me O Jup. Opt. Max. and bring a most shameful end upon my "house, my family, and all that I have. Swear thou O L. Cecilius after me, as I have done, I ad- "vise thee: and ye all that are here present take the same oath: for whosoever shall refuse know "he assuredly, that upon him I have drawn this sword. Hereat they being no less terrified, then if they had seen the Conqueror himself Annibal in person took the oath every one, and yeelded
F themselves unto Scipio, for to be kept in ward to serve against Annibal.

At the same time, whiles these things were working at Canusium, there arrived at Venusia upon four thousand foot and horsemen together, such as in their flight had been separated asunder all over the fields, and repaired unto the Consul there. The Venusins took order for them all, that they should be gently entertained, and carefully tended, and divided into several houses: and they bestowed upon the horsemen, a side cassock, a coat, and *25. Quadrigates a peece: and gave ten Quadrigates to every footman: and armor besides, to as many as wanted. And in all other courteses of hospitality, both publick and privat, they strove and endeavoured that the people of Venusia should not in any kind of friendly offices, come behind ore woman of Canusium. Howbeit in regard of the great multitude, the burden and charge lay more heavy upon dame Bu- G sa: for now their number was risen to be ten thousand. Then Appius and Scipio having intelligence that the other Consul was alive and well, dispatched a messenger presently to advertise him how many footmen and horsemen there were in all with them: and to know his pleasure withal whether he would command the army to be brought unto Venusia, or abide still at Canusium. But Varro (the Consul) of his own accord brought his forces to Canusium. So as by this time, they made a pretty good shew of a Consular army, and seemed sufficient to defend themselves, if not by force of arms in the field, yet at least wise, with the strength of walls within the town. But the news came to Rome, that there was not so much as this small remnant left of Citizens and Con-

* 15 s. 7 d. ob. ster. A Quadrigate, which is a peece of silver coyn among the Romans, the same that Denarius: called so of Quadriga, i. a chariot drawn with four horses, represented on the one side of the peece.

Confederates together: but that the two Conſuls and both the armies were put all to the ſword H and hewn in pieces to the laſt man. Never was there known ſo great a terrour and turmoil within the walls of Rome (and the City ſtill remaining in ſafety.) I will therefore even at firſt, ſink under my load and ſaying nothing at all: and never will I go about to recount thoſe things by diſ-courſe of words, which in reporting, I ſhould make leſs then they were indeed. For there went not now, a flying rumor firſt of one foil, and then of another; to day of this loſs, and to morrow of that; as the year before when the Conſul and his army were defeated at Thraſymeneas, but manifold overthrows together were multiplied and altogether at once, to wit, how both the Conſuls were ſlain, and two Conſular armies loſt: no camp, not a pavilion of the Romans left ſtanding: neither Leader nor Souldier remaining alive: and how Annibal was now become Lord of I Apulia, of Samnium, and well neer of all Italy full and whole. And verily, there is not (I ſuppoſe) a nation under the cope of heaven beſides, but would have been overwhelmed and cruſhed utterly under the huge heap and heavy weight of ſo great a ruin & overthrow. Should I compare ther-with the defeat and foil that the Carthaginians received at the Iſland Ægates, in a conflict at ſea:
wherewith they were ſo quelled, and their backs ſo broken, that at one clap they loſt Sicilia and Sardinia both, and that which more is, yeelded themſelves tributaries and ſubjects to the people of Rome. Or ſhould I make compariſon of their unfortunate and unhappy battel in Africk afterwards? wherein this very ſame Annibal gave over play, yeelded the bucklers, and confeſſed himſelf vanquiſhed. Nay, they are not any way comparable with this, but only that they were born and ſupported with leſs courage, and valour of mind.

Well, to proceed, P. Furius Philus, and M. Pomponius the Pretors, aſſembled the Senat in the K Court Hoſtilia, for to conſult about the defence and guard of the City; for they made no doubt, but now that the armies were both defeated the enemy would ſpeedily come to aſſault Rome, the only piece of work, and warlike ſervice that remained behind undone. But being to ſeek what counſel to take, and what remedy to deviſe for redreſs of theſe calamities, ſo exceeding great and grievous, and yet not known to the full, and interrupted and ſhrewly troubled beſides with the clamorous noiſes and plaints of women: whiles that in every houſe almoſt, they ceaſed not to mourn, weep, and wail confuſedly, as well for the quick as the dead (becauſe as yet it was not o"penly and for certain known who were alive, and who were ſlain.) Then Fabius Max. gave "his opinion, that certain light horſemen ſhould be made out and ſent forth by the highways Ap- L
"pia and Latina, and to ride along and enquire of them whom they happed to meet with, (ſuch I "mean as fled, and were ſcattered here and there aſunder) if happily ſome of them could report
"upon his knowledge, what was become of the Conſuls, and the armies: and in caſe the im"mortal gods had of their mercy and compaſſion ſpared ſome poor remnant ſtill of this miſerable
"and woful Empire, for the Roman name; where that reſidue of ſmall forces was; what way An-
"nibal took; and whither he was gone after the battel was fought; what preparation he maketh,
"what preſently he is doing, or intendeth for to do. His advice was, I ſay, that to eſpy, hearken
"and learn certainly, theſe premiſes, certain luſty young men, active and induſtrious, ſhould be "imployed. But for the LL. of the Senat thus much, that conſidering there were few Magiſtrates
"at home, and thoſe not able to rid the City of this tumultuous and fearful hurliburly, therefore M
"they ſhould take upon themſelves, to debar the dames and women for coming abroad, and
"force them every one to keep home, and tarry within doors; to reſtrain the plaints and outcries
"of houſholds and families: to cauſe ſilence throughout the City; to take order that all Poſts,
"and meſſengers of news, ſhould be brought before the Pretors; and that every man ſhould at"tend at home the tidings, good or bad, that concerned himſelf, or his own ſtate. Over and be-"ſides, that they ſhould ſet warders at the gates, to ſee that no perſon went out of the City: and "compel every man to hope for no other earthly ſafety for themſelves, but in the preſervation of
"the City, and walls thereof. And when the tumult and hurry is once huſht, then (quoth he) "may the Senators well be called again into the Councel-Houſe, and conſult for the defence and "ſafeguard of the City. When all the aſſembly liked well, and approved of this opinion, and went N every man on Fabius his ſide without contradiction, ſo as the market place, by authority of the Magiſtrates, was cleared and voided of the multitude, and the Senators were divided and gone ſundry ways to appeaſe the uproars: then at laſt, came letters from Terentius the Conſul, importing, that L. Æmylius the Conſul was ſlain together with the army: that himſelf was at Canuſi- um, buſie in rallying the reliques of ſo great an overthrow, as it were after a ſhipwrack upon the ſea: and there were ten thouſand ſouldiers of them, or very nere, and thoſe much out of frame and good order. As for Annibal, he ſat ſtill now at Cannæ, buſily occupied about the ranſoming of priſoners, and intentive to the reſt of the ſpoil and pillage: not meaſuring the victory with the mind and courage of a conqueror, nor yet after the guiſe and manner of a noble warrior and great commander. Then were the privat and particular loſſes alſo divulged and ſpread abroad through O every man his houſe and family, and the whole City was ſo filled with ſorrow and lamentation, that the Anniverſary ſolemnity of ſacrifices to Ceres was forelet, becauſe it was not lawful for thoſe that mourned to celebrate the ſame: and there was not a matron throughout the City, but was in heavineſs and ſorrow for the time. Leſt therefore other ſacrifices likewiſe, as well publick as privat, upon the ſame occaſion, ſhould be neglected and diſcontinued, there paſſed an Act of the Senat, by vertue whereof a term was prefixed, to make an end of mourning within thirty days. Now was the trouble of the City no ſooner allayed, and the Senators called again

A into the Councel-House: but to mend the matter, there were other letters brought out of Sicily from T. Octacilius the Vice-pretor, notifying thus much, That the realm of Hiero was much wasted by the Carthaginian navy: and when he would have succoured him at his earnest suit and petion, there was another Armado ready rigged, decked and furnished, riding by the Islands Ægates, waiting the opportunity of the time, that when the Carthaginians perceived once that he had turned and bent his forces to the defence of the coast and river Syracuse, they might immediatly set upon Lilybæum, and the rest of the Roman province. And therefore in case they were minded to aid and maintain a confederate King, and defend the Realm of Sicily, they must of necessity rig and man another fleet out of hand. When the letters both of the Consul and also of the Vice-Pre-
B tor were read, agreed it was, and thought meet, that M. Claudius, Admiral of the fleet which rid in the harbour of Ostia, should be sent unto the army at Canusium, and letters be dispatched withal unto the Consul, willing him upon the delivery of the army unto the Pretor, to repair unto Rome with all speed possible, and not fail, so far forth as he might, without any detriment and hindrance of the Common-weal. Besides these so great losses and adversities, men were put in fear with sundry prodigious tokens: and among others, in that one year, two Vestal Virgins, Opimia, and Floronia, were detected and attainted of manifest whoredom: the one of them was buried quick, as the manner was, under the ground at the gate Collina the other killed her self. L. Cantilius (a Secretary or Scribe unto the Bishops, whom now they call * Minores Pontifices) the party who had committed fornication with Floronia, was by the chief or high Priest so beaten with rods
C in the Comitium, that he died under his hand. This heinous fact, and enormous offence falling out among so many misfortunes and calamities, was reckoned, I say, (as usually it is) for a portentous sign; and therefore the Decemvirs were commanded to search and perule the Books of Sibylla. And Q. Fabius Pictor was sent to Delphos, to consult with the Oracle there of Apollo, and to learn, by what prayers and supplications they might pacifie the gods, and what would be the end of so great and fearful miseries. In the mean while, out of the learning contained in those books of destinies, there were performed certain extraordinary Sacrifices: among which, a Frenchman together with a French woman; likewise a Grecian man and woman, were let down alive in the beast market into a vault under the ground stoned all about: a place aforetime embrued and polluted with the blood of mankind sacrificed, but not according to the ceremonies and religi-
D on of the Romans. When they had sufficiently (as they thought) pacified the gods, M. Claudius Marcellus sent from the haven of Ostia for the defence and guard of the City, 1500. souldiers; whom he had levied and enrolled for the service at sea. Himself having sent afore the legion belonging to the Armado (which was the third) with Theanius Sidicinus a Colonel, and delivered the fleet unto P. Furius companion with him in commission: within few days after made haste, and with great journeys arrived at Canusium. At Rome, by vertue of the Authority of the Senators, M. Junius was created Dictator, and T. Sempronius General of the horse, who proclamed a muster, and enrolled all the younger sort above 17. years old, yea, and some also under that age, that yet were in their * Pretexta, and were not come to * Toga virilis. Of these were made up four legions E tion, to receive souldiers from thence according to the form of the league: giving commandment, that harness, weapons, and all other habiliments of war, should be in readiness. Also to furnish out the army, they plucked from the Temples, and publick Galleries and walking Places, the ancient spoils and armor of their enemies. And for very need and want of free men, they were compelled to devise a new kind of mustering never used before: for they bought up in open market, with the City money, 8000. lusty strong young men, meer bond-slaves: but they demanded first of every one by himself, whether they were willing to serve in the wars, and so they put them in armor. And they thought it better to take up and levy souldiers thus, then to redeem and buy again their own who were captives, albeit they might have been ransomed for smaller sums F of money. For Annibal, after this so fortunate field fought at Cannæ, setting his mind wholly upon the affairs belonging to an absolute conquest, rather then any more wars; caused his captives to be brought forth, and severed the Roman confederates apart from the rest; and unto them (as he had done aforetime at Trebia, and the Lake Thrasymenus) he spake graciously, and sent them home unransomed. The Romans also he called unto him, and gave them kind and loving words, more then ever he had done before. "What? we and the Romans (quoth he) war not "mortally and deadly one with the other to the utmost: nay, our quarrel is rather for honour "and soveraignty. And as my father and progenitors afore me, were subdued of the Romans, and "yeelded at length to their valor and prowess: so the only thing that I seek for, and indeavor unto "is this, That they likewise in their alternative turn, may give place unto my felicity and vertue "together. And therefore I grant the Romans this favor and liberty, to redeem their prisoners: "and this shall be the ransom, for every man of arms I demand * 500 Quadrigats, 300 for a foot-"man, and 100. for a bondman. And albeit the horsemens ransom was somewhat inhanced, above that sum which they capitulated for, when they yeelded, yet glad they were to accept of any condition and covenant whatsoever. So it was agreed, that ten out of them should be chosen by voices, to go to Rome unto the Senat: and he took no other pledge for assurance of them but their oath, that they would return again. With them was sent Carthalo, a Noble man of Carthage with commission (if he could perceive haply the Romans encline to peace) to offer unto them conditions, and to capitulate with them. They were not so soon gone out of the camp, but one of them (a man of no Roman nature and disposition) made semblance, as if he had forgotten H somewhat behind him, and so to discharge himself (forsooth) of his oath, returned into the camp, and before night overtook his company again. When word was brought, that they were coming to Rome, there was a Lictor sent out to meet Carthalo upon the way, and to warn him in the name of the Dictator, before night to depart out of the confines of the territory of Rome. But the Committees of the Captives had audience granted them in the Senat-house by the Dictator.

And the principal man among them, Marcus Junius, spake in this manner.

The Oration of M. Junius to the Senat.

"Right honourable, and my very good LL. of the Senat, There is not one of you all ignorant,
"that never any City whatsoever, hath been at less charge for redeeming of prisoners taken in I "wars, and made so small regard of them, then ours. But if we be not blinded in our own con"ceit, and think better of our cause, then there is reason: never were there any souldiers that fell "into the hands of our enemies more to be accounted of by you then we are. And why? We yeel"ded not our weapons in battel for cowardize and fear, but after that we had stood well neer un"til night fighting over the dead bodies of our fellows slain, and so maintained the fight to the "very last, then we retired our selves into the camp. The rest of the day and night following,
"notwithstanding we were weary with travel, and faint of our hurts, yet we manfully defended
"our rampart. The morrow after, when we were beset and invested round about by the conque"rors army, yea and excluded from water: and saw no other hope at all to break through our e"nemies, ranged so strong and close together, and thinking it not a matter of reproof, and against "the law of arms, that when 5000. of our Citizens were slain in field, some Roman souldiers K
"should remain alive after the battel of Cannæ; then and not afore, we agreed upon a sum of "money, that being ransomed, we might be set at large, and so we yeelded unto the enemies our "weapons, wherein now we saw no help at all. We have heard likewise, that our ancestors re"deemed themselves from the Gauls with a sum of gold: and our fathers also, notwithstanding
"they were most straight lated, and hardly brought to capitulate and compound for peace, yet "sent Embassadors to Tarentum, for to redeem their captives: and both those battels, first in Ita- "ly with the Gauls, and then before Heraclea with Pyrrhus, were not so ignominious and shame"ful for the losse it self, as for the fright and beastly running away. But the plains of Cannæ are "covered all over with heaps of Roman bodies; and we that be here had not remained alive af"ter them, but that the enemies strength held out no longer, nor their sword would serve to kill L
"any more. And yet there be some of our men also who fled not back in battel: but being left "behind to guard the camp, were taken prisoners by the enemy as well as we, at what time as it "was surrendred into their hands. Certainly, I envy not the fortune, nor repine at the welfare and "good estate of any Citizen or fellow souldier, neither would I be thought the man, who by de"basing another, would seem to advance my self. But even they verily (unless peradventure good "footmanship and swift running deserve reward) who for the most part fled out of the field un"armed, and never stinted before they gat Venusia or Canusium over their heads, cannot justly pre"fer themselves before us nor boast and glory, that they stand the Common-weal in better stead
"then we. Find them you shall (I doubt not) good men and valorous souldiers: so shall you us "too, yea, and more ready to do true service to our country, in that by your bounty and good M "means we have been ransomed and restored again into our country. Ye have levied souldiers of "all ages and degrees, and I hear say, there be 8000. bondmen in arms. We are no fewer in num"ber our selves, and redeemed we may be with as small moneys as they are bought, I say no more
"but so, for if I should make farther comparisons between us and them, I must do wrong to the "Roman name and nation. This is a special thing moreover (my LL.) which in mine advice ye
"are duely to consider in this deliberation, in case ye be so hard-hearted, as to have no regard of "us, or of our desert, namely, in what enemies hand ye leave us. It is with Pyrrhus peradventure,
"who used us being his prisoners, like friends and guests. Nay, is he not a Barbarian and Cartha"ginian? who whether he be more covetous or cruel, can hardly be imagined. O that ye saw the "irons and chains, the nasty filthiness and foul usage of your Citizens. I am assured, you would N
"be no less moved and affected to compassion at the sight thereof, then if ye beheld on the other "side your Legions lying slain all over the plains and fields of Cannæ. Ye may observe and behold
"the sorrowful chear, and salt tears of our kinsfolk standing here in the porch and entry of this "Court, and waiting for your answer. And if they so fare, and are so pensive for us, and for them "that are absent, what heavy hearts have they themselves (think ye) whose liberty and whose "life lieth now a bleeding? And in good faith, if so be Annibal himself would, contrary to his "nature, be respective and merciful to us, yet should we think our lives did us small good, so long "as we are reputed of you unworthy to be ransomed and redeemed. There returned in times past
"to Rome certain captives, sent home by Pyrrhus without any ransom paid, but they returned ac"companied with Embassadors right honorable personages of this City, who had been sent for O
"their redemption. And shall I return unto my country again not esteemed a Citizen worth
"300. Deniers. Every man hath a mind by himself, and a fansie of his own my LL. And I wot
"well that my body and life is in jeopardy. But I fear more the hazard of honor and good name,
"lest we should be thought condemned and rejected by you. For the world will never beleeve,
"that you did it to spare your purse, and to save money.

When he had made an end of his speech, immediatly the multitude who were gathered together in the common place, set up a lamentable and piteous cry, and held out their hands unto the Counsel-

A Councel-house, beseeching the LL. of the Senat to let them have and enjoy their children, their brethren, and kinsfolk again. The very women also, for fear and necessity, thrust themselves among this press of men in the market place. But when all others besides the Senators were voided, they began to debate and consult about the matter in hand. Great variance there was in opinion. Some thought it reason, that their ransom were disbursed out of the common chest: others were of mind, that the City should be at no charge at all for their redemption: marry they would not be against it, but that they might be enlarged and delivered at their own cost and expenses. And in case there were any that had not ready coin enough for present payment, the chamber of the City should lend them money, so as the people might have good security, as well by sureties B bound, as by their good and lands, morgaged for the satisfaction of that debt. And when T. Manlius Torquatus, a man of the old world for precise severity, and as most folk thought too too hard and austere in this point, was demanded his opinion, he spake, by report, to the cause in this wise.

The Oration of T. Manlius Torquatus in the Senat.

"If the Committees (quoth he) had treated and made suit, for the redemption of them only "that are captive in the hands of the enemies, and there staied; it they had not touched the per"son of any other besides, I would in few words have knit up my verdict and judgement of them.
"For what need I to have done else, but put you in mind, and exhort you, to observe the custom "delivered unto you from your ancestors, and to maintain the example, so good and necessary for "the service of war. But now, seeing they have not only justified, but also (as it were) glorified C "themselves, in that they yeelded unto the enemies, and thought it good reason to be preserved,
"not only before them that were taken prisoners by the enemies in the field, but also those that "saved themselves, and escaped to Venusia and Canusium; yea, and before C. Terentius himself the "Consul; I will not hide any thing from you my LL. but acquaint you with every thing that was "done there. And would to God, that the words which I will utter here in your presence, I "might deliver at Canusium, even before the body of the army, the best witness of every mans "cowardise or valour: or at least wise, that P. Sempronius were present here alone whom, if these "fellows would have followed as their leader, they had been souldiers at this day in the Roman
"camp, and not captives at the devotion of the enemies. For whiles the enemies were wearied
"with fight, joyous and jocund of their fresh victory, and most of them retired into their own D "camp; they might have had the whole night to save themselves at their pleasure: and if that were "not, yet being seven thousand strong, they had been able to have made a lane through them, "were they never so thick, and to have broken away in despight of their hearts. But neither at"tempted they so much of themselves, nor yet would follow the leading of another. P. Semproni-
"us Tuditanus ceased not all night long almost, to exhort, to admonish, and encourage them, for
"to follow his conduct, to take the time when but a few of their enemies were about their camp,
"whiles they were at repose and rest, and whiles the night lasted favourable unto them, for to "hide and cover their enterprise: perswading with them, that before day light they might easily "reach unto places of security, and arrive safely at the Cities of their Allies. Like as in the days "of our Grandfathers, P. Decius a Tribun Colonel in Samnium; like as of late time when I was E "a young man my self, in the first punick war, Calphurnius Flamma said unto three hundred his "voluntary souldiers, at what time as he minded to lead them to the gaining of a little Hill, stan"ding in the midst of his enemies: Let us die hardly my souldiers, and by our death save and de"liver our Legions, beset and besieged round about. If P. Sempronius had said so much to you,
"he would never have esteemed you men of valour, nor yet Romans, if no man among you would "have born him company, or seconded him in that singular vertue. But he shewed you a plain and "easie way, leading as well to life and safety, as to honour and glory. He offered himself to be "your guide, to bring you to your native country: to your parents, your wives and children: yet
"would not your hearts serve you to escape and save your selves. Where had your hearts been
"then, if he would have had you to die for your country? 50000. of our Citizens and Confede-F "rates, lay that very day slain at your feet. If so many examples of manhood and vertue could "not move you, nothing in the world will ever move you; it so great a foil and overthrow was "not able to make you despise and set little by this life; none will ever do it. Desire home a Gods
"name, and long after your native country, whiles ye are free and in safety: nay, desire to be in "your country, whiles it is your country, and whiles ye are Citizens thereof. Now your desire "and longing cometh too late, being distranchised, having lost your former estate and right of "Citizens, and made your selves bondslaves to the Carthaginians. Think ye for a peece of money "to recover your liberty again, and to return to your former degree, from which through faint"heartedness and cowardize ye are fallen? You would not hearken nor give ear to P. Semproni-
"us your Citizen, willing you to take weapon in hand and to follow after him: but anon after, ye G "could listen after Annibal, commanding you to betray and render the camp, and deliver up your "armor. But why blame I their lithernes and dastardly fear; when I may reprove and accuse them
"for willful and lewd wickedness; For they not only refused to be ruled by his good counsel and "exhortations, but also attempted to hinder and stay him in his intended enterprize, had not "right hardy and valiant men with their swords drawn, set these dastardly beasts farther off. P.
"Sempronius, I tell you, had somewhat ado, to pass the ranks and squadrons of his own country"men, before he could break through the battaillon of his enemies. Longeth our country to have "these for her Citizens? who if the rest had been like them, should by this day, have had never a one

a one of them that fought at Canna, for her Citizens. Of seven thousand armed souldiers, there H were found 600 that had the heart to break away, maugre the enemies, to escape and return with liberty, and with their armor, home into their country, notwithstanding there were forty thousand enemies to resist them: how easily then and safely, deem you, might a power almost of two Legions, have passed through them and gone their ways? Ye had had this day my Lords twenty " thousand at Canusium, of right brave hardy, and loyal souldiers. But now which way can these " cowards possibly be reputed true and faithful Citizens (for valiant souldiers, I am sure, they will " not think themselves, nor take up on them to be, unless a man could be perswaded and be-" leeve they were such) who would have impeached and withstood the rest for getting away even " when they were at the point to open a passage; or that they rather do not envy now, both the I
" safety and also the honor of others which they have won by prowess; knowing in their own " conscience, that their timorousness and cowardliness was the cause of most ignominious and " shameful servitude. They loved better to close within their pavilions, and to look for the day " light and the enemy together: whenas in the still dead time of the night, they had the oppor" tunity to escape. But how then? Although their hearts failed them to break away out of the " camp, yet to defend the same manfully, they had courage and valor enough. Besieged they were,
" straitly beleaguer'd: invested they were day and night for a good time: and in their armor forced " to stand upon their guard, and manfully they quit themselves within their rampart, and at length
" (God wot) when they had assayed and endured all extremities, when all succors failed them for " sustentation of this life; so pinched with hunger and so enfeebled, that they were not able to " bear their own armor and lift up their weapons; overcome at the last, rather with the necessi- K
" ty of mans frail nature then by the violence of the enemies, they, good men gave over and yeel-
" ded themselves. Nay forsooth, it is neither so nor so. The morrow morning when the sun arose,
" the enemies advanced and approached toward the rampart: and within two hours after, with" out any trial and hazard of skirmish, they delivered up their weapons and themselves. Thus ye " see what their good service was, for two days together. When they should have stood to it in " field, and fought, then they fled back to their tents: when they were to guard and defend their " trench and rampart, they surrendered them to the enemy: good no where, neither in battel nor
" in bastil. I agree to ransom you, you (I say) when you ought to have sallied forth of the camp,
" linger behind and stay still: and when need was, to abide by it and to defend it like valiant men, " surrender camp, give up your weapons, and yeeld your own bodies to the enemy? Nay, but to " speak what I think, my sentence is (my LL.) that these fellows deserve no more to be ransomed,
" then those to be delivered unto Annibal, who issued out of the camp, pierced through the midst " of the enemies, and most valiantly saved themselves, for to do service another day in their coun" try. When Manlius had said, albeit the prisoners were allied neer in kindred to most of the Senators: yet over and besides the precedent of the City it self, which never from the first beginning favoured the redemption of such souldiers, as suffered themselves to be taken prisoners: the ransom it self, which amounted to a good round sum made them to pause: because they were unwilling both to empty the publick treasury; (having already disbursed great sums, in buying up bond-slaves, and arming them for the wars) and also that Annibal (who as the voice went was at a very great stand for money) should be enriched therby. When this their answer was returned, M to wit, No redemption of captives: there was a new fit of weeping and wailing afresh added to the former sorrow of the people, namely for the loss of so many Citizens; and so with many a tear that they shed, with hideous plaints and moans which they made, they accompanied the Committees above bidden as far as the gate. One of the ten went home to his house the same time, who upon a fraudulent and dangerous return made into the enemies camp, as is aforesaid, supposed be had acquitted himself and discharged his conscience of his oath. Which being known and recounted to the Senat, they were all of mind that he should be apprehended, and attended with a good and sufficient guard at the charge of the City, and so carried back to Annibal. There goeth another report of these Captives, that first there came ten of them as Committees: and when it was debated in the Senat, and doubt made, whether they should be admitted into the City or no; N they were at length received, but so, as that they had no audience in the Senat: and upon longer stay made then they looked for, three others followed after them, to wit L. Scribonius, C. Calpurnius, and L. Manlius. Then by mediation of one Tribun of the Com. a kinsman of Scribonius, the matter was propounded in the Senat concerning the ransom of the captives; but granted it would not be: whereupon the three latter Committees returned to Annibal, and the other ten that first came, remained still behind: who upon a colourable occasion, had made an errand back to Anni-bal, when they were well onward on their way, to take a note, forsooth, of the names of the prisoners, and thereby seemed to have discharged their conscience of the oath. Also, that in the Se-nat there was hard hold, much question and variance, about the delivering of them again into the hands of Annibal: and how at last, they who were of opinion to have them rendered and sent back, failed of their purpose, by reason they came short by some voices and opinions, and that the o-other side carried it clean away. But by the next Censors that came in place, they were so marked and branded with all notes of disgrace and shame, that some of them immediatly made themselvs away with their own hands: and the rest forbare, not only the common place and market all their life time after, but also came not abroad, in manner, to be seen in the very street, and never looked out of their doors. Thus a man may rather marvel, that authors should so differ among themselves,

A ſelves, than from any of them pick out and diſcern the truth. But how much greater this overthrow and loſſe at Cannæ was, than any other before time, appeareth by this evident argument, in that thoſe Allies, which ever to that day ſtood faſt and ſure unto them, now fell to ſhrink and fail: and ſurely for no earthly thing elſe, but becauſe they began to deſpair of the main chance of the whole State and Empire. For hereupon there revolted unto the Carthaginians, the Attellans, the Calatins, the Hirpins, a part of the Apulians, all the Samnits, except the Petellins all the Brutii in general, and the Lucans. And more then theſe, the Surrentins, and the whole traſt well-neer of the Greeks along the ſea coaſt. The Tarentins, Metapontins, the Crotonians, the Locrians, and all the Gauls within the Alps. And yet for all theſe defeats, and rebellions of their Allies
B and Subjects, were not the Romans one whit enclined to make any mention of peace, neither before the coming of the Conſul, nor yet after that he was returned, and renewed again the dolorous remembrance of that woful overthrow received. And even at that very inſtant, ſo high minded was the City, and ſo far from drooping and being caſt down, that as the Conſul returned homeward from ſo great a defeat, whereof himſelf only was a principal cauſe, he was not only met upon the way by all the States and companies of the City in great numbers, but alſo highly thanked, in that he deſpaired not of the State of the Common-weal: who, if he had been the General and Leader of the Carthaginians, ſhould have been ſure to have ſmoaked for it, and endured all extremity for torment and puniſhment.

THe Campans revolted unto Annibal. Mago was ſent to Carthage, with news of the victory at Cannæ: and in the entry of the Councel-Houſe, he poured out (on the floor) the golden rings which had been plucked from the fingers of the Romans there ſlain, which by report exceeded the meaſure of a Modius. Upon theſe tidings, Hanno the nobleſt perſonage among all the Carthaginians, perſwaded with the Senat of Carthage, to ſue unto the people of Rome for peace, but he prevailed not, by reaſon of the Barchin ſide and faction, that gain-ſaid him. Cl. Marcellus the Pretor fought fortunatly before Nola, in a ſally which he made out of the town againſt Annibal. The Army of Annibal fell to riot at Capua, E and gave themſelvs to ſuch ſenſuality, while they wintred there, that both in bodily ſtrength, and alſo in courage of mind they became much enfeebled. Caſilinum was beſieged by the Carthaginians, and the inhabitants within were driven by extream famine, to eat thongs and leatherings, plucked from off their ſhields and targets, yea, and to feed upon Miſe and Rats. They lived with Nuts which the Romans ſent unto them down the river Vulturnus. The body of the Senat was repleniſhed by receiving unto them a new ſupply from out of the order of Knights or Gentlemen, to the number of 197. L. Poſthumius the Pretor, was together with his army defeated by the Gauls, and put to the ſword. Cneus and Publius Scipioes, vanquiſhed Aſdrubal in Spain, and had the conqueſt thereof. The remnant of the army defeated at F Cannæ was ſent away and confined into Sicily, and commanded not to depart from thence, before the war was fully finiſhed. A league and ſociety was concluded between Philip the King of the Macedonians and Annibal. Sempronius Gracchus the Conſul, diſcomfited and ſlew the Campans. Moreover, this book containeth the fortunate exploits atchieved by T. Manlius the Lord Deputy in Sardinia, againſt the Carthaginians and the Sardi: who took the General himſelf Aſdrubal, together with Mago and Hanno, priſoners. Claudius Marcellus the Pretor vanquiſhed and defeated in a ſet battel before Nola, the army of Annibal: and was the firſt that put the Romans in ſome good hope of better ſucceſs, after they had been toiled out with ſo many foils and loſſes.

ANnibal after the battel fought at Cannæ, and the winning and ranſacking of both the Roman camps, diſlodged anon, and was removed out of Apulia into Samnium, being ſent unto, for to come unto the Hirpins country by Statius, who promiſed to betray and deliver the City of Conſa into his hands. Now there was a Citizen of Conſa named Trebius, a noble perſonage and of great name in his country. But the bend and faction of the Coſſanes (a family of great power, by favour of the Romans) kept him down and over-weighed him: but after after the fame of the battel of Canna and the coming of Annibal, divulged and blown abroad by the ſpeeches of Trebius thoſe Coſſanes abandoned the City: and ſo was it without any conflict rendered unto the Carthaginians, and received a garriſon. Annibal leaving behind him there, all the pillage and baggage that he had, divided his army into two parts: giving Mago in charge, to poſſeſs himſelf of the towns of that country, which would revolt of themſelves from the Romans: or elſe to force them thereunto, in caſe they denied and refuſed ſo to do. Himſelf took his journey through the land of Campane, toward the nether ſea, intending to aſſault Naples, that he might be Lord of a Port Town alſo, and have it at his devotion. When he was entred the confines of the Neapolitans, he placed ſome of the Numidians in Ambuſh, as cunningly as he could, (and there for the moſt part, the wayes are hollow, and full of cloſe and ſecret nooks and holes) others he commanded to make a ſhew of driving away a booty out of the fields, and to ride out braving before the gates of the City. Againſt whom (ſeeming to be not many, and thoſe diſordered) a troop of horſmen iſſued forth, but the enemies of purpoſe giving back and retiring from them, led and trained them on, to the place of ambuſh: and ſo they were environed on every ſide, and there had not one of them eſcaped alive, but that the ſea was neer, where they eſpied many fiſher boats along the ſhore on the bank ſide, and as many of them as were skilful in ſwimming, gat unto them, and ſaved themſelves: but in that ſkirmiſh nevertheleſs certain young gentlemen were ſlain. Among whom, Hegeas alſo, the Captain of that Cornet of horſemen died in the place, who followed too hotly upon them that retreated & ſeemed to flie. But Annibal after he had viewed the walls, and ſaw they were not eaſie to be won, was diſcouraged and ſcared from giving aſſault to that City. From thence he turned his journey, and took his way to Capua, a City flowing in wealth and ſuperfluity of all pleaſures, by reaſon of long felicity, and the favourable aſpect of gracious fortune. But among all corruptions that there raigned, it was infected moſt with the licentious looſeneſs of the Commons, who exceeded beyond all meaſure, and abuſed their liberty. Pacuvius Calavius, a man of noble race there, and popular withal, but one that by lewd and indirect courſes became rich and mighty, by means thereof, had both Senat & Com. under his girdle, and might do what he would. This man chanced to be head Magiſtrate the ſame year that the Romans were defeated and overthrown at the Lake Thraſymenus: and ſuppoſing that the Commonalty (who had been a long time maliciouſly affected to the Senat and Nobility) would by occaſion of alteration in the State, enterpriſe ſome notable act, to wit, (in caſe Annibal ſhould come with his victorious army into thoſe parts) the murdering of the Senat, and delivering of Capua into the Carthaginians hands. This man I ſay, lewd and bad enough otherwiſe, but yet not ſtark naught and wicked in the higheſt degree: and deſirous to lord it, and domineer with the ſafety of the Common-wealth, rather then with the utter deſtruction of the ſame; as knowing ful wel that no State could remain ſafe, ſpoiled and bereft once of a publick counſel: caſt about and plotted, how he might both ſave the Senate, and alſo oblige the ſame to be at his and the Commons devotion. He aſſembled therfore the Senat one day together, and after he had proteſted with a ſolemn preamble, "That in no caſe he would like & allow of the deſignment and intent "of revolting from the Romans, unleſs it were upon neceſſity and conſtraint: for as much as himſelf had married the daughter of Appius Claudius, and had fair iſſue by her: and beſides affianced "a daughter of his own in marriage unto Livius in Rome: but yet (quoth he) there is a matter of "greater conſequence toward, and a danger like to burſt out more to be feared then that. For the "Commons intend not by way of revolt and rebellion to rid the City of the Senators authority, "but are purpoſed to maſſacre all the Senators, and ſo to deliver unto Annibal and the Carthagi-"nians, the Common wealth clearly void of a Senat. Of which imminent peril (quoth he) I know "how to free you, in caſe you will wholly truſt and rely upon me, and forget all former jars, and "old debates, which have fallen out in governance and managing of the Senat. Now when all "of them in place, for fear were forced to put themſelves into his hands: I will, quoth he, ſhut "you up within the Councel-Chamber, and pretend unto them, as though I were one of their "complices, both privy and party to this intended practiſe of theirs: and ſo by ſoothing them up "under a colourable approbation and allowance of their deſignments, which I ſhould in vain "croſs and gain-ſay, I ſhall find out a ready way to ſave all your lives. And for aſſurance here-"of, ask and have of me what bond and ſecurity ye will your ſelves. Thus having made his faithful promiſe to be faſt and true unto them, he went forth, and commanded the Councel-Houſe dores to be ſhut ſure, and left warders to keep the gate and entry thereof, that no man without his licenſe and commandment, ſhould either enter in, or come forth. Then after he had called all the people together to an audience, in a ſolemn and frequent aſſembly, thus he ſpake unto them. "That which ye have often wiſhed for (O ye Campans, my good neighbors and "friends) namely, to have the power and mean to revenge your ſelves throughly of this wicked and curſed Senat, now lieth in your hands to perform with ſafety at your pleaſure. And ye "need not by way of an uproar to aſſault their houſes one after another, to the great danger and "hazzard of your perſons, conſidering how they are defended with ſtrong guards of their vaſſals, "favorites, and bond-ſlaves: ye have them all faſt and cloſe mued up within the Councel-Chamber: themſelves alone, without company, without armor and weapon: there you may take them. "But ſee that ye do nothing haſtily upon head without pauſe, nor raſhly without adviſement. I "will ſo compaſs and bring about, that ye ſhall give your doom of life and death upon every one "of them, to the end that each one may have his deſert, and ſuffer due puniſhment accordingly.

A "But above all things ye muſt have an eye and look to this, that proceed ye not too much in "heat and choler: but that ye have more regard of your own ſafety and profit, than of ire and re-"venge. For (I take it) they be theſe Senators only whoſe perſons ye hate and deteſt; and your "meaning is not wholly to put down and overthrow the Senat quite: for either ye muſt accept "of a King (O government abhominable) or elſe admit a Senat, the only Council indeed of a free "City and State: and therefore with one buſh (as they ſay) ye are to go ſtop two gaps, and to do "both at once, namely, to aboliſh and depoſe the old Senat, and to elect a new, I will command "that the Senators ſhall be cited by name one after another: and concerning their life and death, "I will demand your opinion and reſolute ſentence: and look what judgment ye give, ſhall ſure-"ly ſtand and be put in execution. But before the condemned guilty perſon be done to death, ye
B "ſhall ſubſtitute in his room a new Senator, ſome good man of valour and courage, and worthy "to ſucceed in his place. With that he ſat him down. And after all their names were thrown in-to a lottery pitcher and ſhuffled together, he cauſed him to be cited and called aloud by name, and the man himſelf to be brought forth of the councill-Houſe whoſe names chanced to be drawn out firſt. He was no ſooner named, but every man cried out, that he was a lewd and wicked per-ſon, and worthy to be hanged. Then Pacuvius ſaid, I ſee (quoth he) what deſtinie ye preſage this man. Rejected he is and caſt out for naught and unjuſt: chooſe now a good Senator, and a right-teous in his room. At the firſt, all was ſilent, and as ſtill as midnight, for default of finding a better to place in his ſtead. Afterwards, when ſome odde groom, paſt all ſhame and reverence, ſeemed to nominate one: by and by they grew to much louder words, and greater clamors: while ſome ſaid C flatly that they knew not the man, others laid to his charge ſundry lewd and naughty vices, and objected againſt him either abject baſeneſs, poverty and beggery, or elſe ſome diſhoneſt kind of trade and occupation, whereby he lived. Thus fared they and much worſe a great deal, when a ſe-cond or third Senator was named: ſo as it was well ſeen, that the men bethought themſelves and repented of that they had done already, conſidering how they failed ſtill and were to ſeek, when they ſhould ſubſtitute another in his place: foraſmuch as it booted not, but was abſurd to nomi-nate the ſame again, ſince that their nomination gained them nothing but either to hear their vi-ces deciphered, or to bear reproachfull terms: and as for all the reſt, they were far more vile and obſcure perſons, than thoſe that came firſt into their remembrance, and were ſooneſt thought up-on. So the people fell at length, and gently came down to this point, and confeſſed, that, Much D better was bad they knew, then bad they knew not; and ſeldome came the better: willing the old Senators to be let out of ward and enlarged. By this policy Pacuvius having bound the Senat to himſelf, more then to the Commons, and even as much as their life was worth; with-out force of arms ruled the roſt and all was at his devotion and command. Hereupon the Senators laid aſide the remembrance of their own dignity, port, and liberty, became affable to the Com-mons and would ſalute them kindly: inviting them courteouſly, and entertaining them liberally at their boords with exquiſite and delicate fare: undertaking and maintaining all their ſuits and cauſes: ready at all times to aſſiſt them, and ſtand by them: and in one word, empanel'ing Juries (to go upon all cauſes and matters in law) of thoſe whom they knew to be gracious and popular, and fitter to win and procure the favour and affection of the common ſort. Thus at the Councel-
E Table all matters were decided, as if the Commons had there ſat, and not otherwiſe.

This Capua was a City ever given to diſſolute life and exceſs in pleaſure, as well by reaſon of the naturall corruption and inſet diſpoſition of the inhabitants, as alſo for the plenteous and flow-ing abundance of all delights, and the alluring inticements of all dainties, that either ſea or land might affoord. But at that time ſuch was the obſequious fawning and the flattery of the Nobles, ſuch was the licentious living of the Commons) they were ſo laviſh, that they exceeded in luſt and ſuperfluity beyond meaſure, and laid it on in expenſe without ſtay. Beſides their contempt of laws, Magiſtrates, and Senat, they grew to this paſs after the overthrow at Canna, that whereas be-fore they had ſome awfull and reverend regard of the Romans, now they deſpiſed and ſet naught by the government and Empire of Rome; and nothing elſe ſtood in the way, but that preſently
F they would have rejected their rule, and ſhaken off the yoak of obedience and allegeance, ſaving only this, That by reaſon of ancient entercourſe of croſſe and mutuall marriages, many noble hou-ſes and mighty families were linked and allied to the Romans: and again, which was the greateſt bond of all, whereas there had ſerved in the Roman wars, certain of them, there were three hundred men of arms, and thoſe of nobleſt birth of all the Campans, choſen out of them and ſent by the Romans to be reſiant in ſundry garriſons of the Cities of Sicily: whoſe fathers and kinſfolk (with much ado) obtained, that Embaſſadors ſhould be ſent unto the Conſul of Rome. They found the Conſul at Venuſia with a few ſouldiers, and thoſe armed by the halves (for as yet he was not gone to Canuſium) being in that poor taking and hard plight, as he could not be in worſe; either to move pity in the hearts of true and well affected allies, or to breed contempt in proud G and hollow-hearted friends, ſuch as theſe Campans were. Contemptible was their caſe, but the Conſul made himſelf and his condition more deſpiſed, by bewraying too much his preſent diſtreſſes, & laying open to the world the nakedneſs of his calamity. For when the Embaſſadors delivered un-to him, That the Senat and people of Capua took it to the heart, and greatly grieved at the ad-verſe overthrow of the Romans, and promiſed therewith, to furniſh him with all things fit and meet for war: "Ye have (quoth he) O Campans, obſerved an order and cuſtom, and for form and "faſhion viſited us your confederats, in willing us to require at your hands all ſupplements of war;

The Oration of Varro to the Embaſſa-dors of Capua.

"rather then ſaid any thing directly befitting the preſent eſtate of our fortune. For what have we H
"left us at all, after this diſcomfiture of Canna, that we ſhould be willing to have that ſupplied
"by our allies which is wanting? As who would ſay, we had ſomewhat already. Should we de"mand of you footmen, as though we were furniſhed with horſe? Should we ſay that we lack"ed money, as if money only were wanting, and nothing elſe? No, no, Fortune hath deal ſo
"hardly with us, that ſhe hath left us juſt nothing, nor ſo much as that, which might be made "up and ſupplied by others. Our Legions of footmen, our Cornets of horſe, our armour and muni"tion, our ſtandards and Enſigns, horſe and man, money and victuals, all is gone, loſt and peri-
"ſhed; either in the battell, or the morrow after in the ruin of our Camp, when we were turned "out of our tents and pavillions. And therefore ye are not, O Campans, to aid and help up in this "war; but in our behalf, and for us, ye ought to take the whole charge of the war upon your I "own ſelves, againſt the Carthaginians. Call to remembrance how in times paſt, when your an-"ceſtors and forefathers were fearfully driven to keep within your wals, ſtanding in dread and "bodily fear, not of the Samnits only your enemies, but alſo of the Sidicins: we took them into
"our protection, and defended them before Sarricula: and how for your ſakes we began war
"with the Samnits, and maintained the ſame for the ſpace of an hundred years, and in great "variety of fortune, giving and taking ſundry foils all the whiles. Over and beſides, call to mind,
"how we concluded an indifferent and equall league with you to the diſadvantage of neither
"parts: how we granted unto you the liberty of living under your own laws: and how at the "laſt (a matter, I wot, of right great importance and conſequence, before this our late over"thrown at Canna) we granted unto a great part of you, the freedom and priviledge of Burge- K "ſie, and parted with you the franchiſes of our own City. And therefore ye ought of right (my
"Maſters of Capua, to repute this loſſe and misfortune now received, to be as well yours as ours:
"and to make reckoning to defend the common ſtate and countrey of both. It is neither Samnit
"nor Tuſcan that ye have to deal with, to whom if we loſt and parted with our Empire, yet it "remained ſtill within the compaſs of Italy: but the enemy that purſueth us, is a Carthaginian,
"drawing after him a train of ſouldiers, who are not ſo much as born in Affrick, but coming "from the farthеſt and moſt remote parts and bounds of the world, from as far as the * ſtreights *Gibraltar. "of the Ocean ſea, even from Hercules his pillars: void of the knowledge of all law, right, and "difference of condition, without reaſon and diſcretion, and (in manner) without commerce of "mans language. Theſe ſouldiers ſo fierce and fell by nature, ſo cruell and mercileſs by uſe and cu- L
"ſtome, their captain hath withall made more wild and ſavage, by making bridges, cauſeys, and
"high wales, over heaps of dead mens bodies: and (which I abhor to ſpeak) by teaching them "to eat mens fleſh. To ſee and endure theſe men to be their LL. whom feeding as they do upon
"ſuch execrable meats and viands, which even to touch and handle without great horror we "may not: to reſort for juſtice as far as into Affrick and Carthage, and to ſuffer Italy to be re"duced into a Province under the Numidians and Moors, what is he that would not deteſt and "abhor, were he but born only within Italy? A worthy honour and immortall glory it will be
"for you, O ye Campans, if the Roman Empire and dominion, thus growing to ruin and falling "down proſtrate under the weight of this late overthrow, might by your fidelity and forcible "power be ſtaid and upheld, and ſet upright again. I ſuppoſe ye have levied and enrolled alrea- M
"dy thirty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, out of the Campain: for coin, for corn, ye have "ſtore and plenty: Now if your faith and truth be anſwerable to your wealth and fortune, nei"ther ſhall Annibal find that he hath won the victory, nor the Romans feel that they have loſt
"a journey. With this Oration thus ended, the Conſul gave the Embaſſadors their diſcharge, and diſmiſſed them. As they returned homewards, one of them, Sabius Virius by name, ſaid thus unto his fellows. "Now is the day come (quoth he) wherein the Campans may be able
"not only to recover again the lands which in times paſt the Romans have wrongfully taken "from them, but alſo obtain and enjoy the ſoveragin rule and Empire of Italy. As for Annibal, we "may conclude, covenant & capitulat with him what articles and conditions as we liſt our ſelves,
"to our beſt behoof and benefit: And it is all to nothing, that Annibal having now diſpatched N
"and finiſhed the war, will of his own accord depart like a Conqueror into Affrick, and with"draw his forces out of theſe parts: ſo as the dominion of Italy ſhall be left wholly to the peo"ple of Capua. Virius had no ſooner delivered theſe ſpeeches, but they all applauded him and accorded thereto. And in ſuch terms they related their Embaſſage, as all men thought no leſs but the Roman Empire and name was utterly periſhed and extinct for ever. Incontinently the Commons and the greateſt part of the Nobility of Capua enclined to revolt and rebell: Yet by the countenance and authority of the ancients and Elders the matter was ſtaid and deferred for ſome few daies. At length the greater part prevailed, whoſe opinion was, that the ſame Embaſſadors which were ſent to the Roman Conſul, ſhould be addreſſed in embaſſie unto Anni-bal. But I find in ſome Annal-records, that before they went, and before their reſolute determi- O nation to revolt, there was an Embaſſage ſent from the Capuans to the City of Rome demanding thus much, That if they meant to have any aid and help from them, one of their Conſuls might be a Capuan. Whereat the Senat of Rome took ſuch ſnuff and indignation that the ſaid Embaſſadors were commanded to void the Council-Houſe, and a Serjeant ſent after them at their heel to ſet them out of the City: charged them at their perill, to take up their lodging that night without the territories of Rome. But becauſe this demand jumpeth too near to the like that the

Latine

A Latines made long before: and both Calius and other Historians have (not without good reason) passed it over and said nothing thereof, I dare not avow it for a truth. Well, Embassadors there came unto Annibal, and concluded peace with him under these conditions, and covenants: Inprimis, That no General, Captain, or Magistrate of the Carthaginians should have any jurisdiction or power over a Citizen of Capua: Item, That no Citizen of Capua should be compelled against his will to serve in any wars, or execute the charge and office of a souldier. Item, That the Campans still enjoy their old Laws and Magistrates of their own: Item, That Annibal deliver unto the Campans three hundred Roman Captives, such as they themselves shall choose; whom they might course and exchange for these three hundred horsemen of the Campans that were in B garrison, and served for pay in Sicily. These were the Articles of the accord. But the Campans stuck not to do more than so, and to go farther than their capitulations: committing divers and sundry outrages. For the Commons suddenly at once apprehended all the Roman Captives over the confederate souldiers, yea, and attached other Citizens of Rome, that were either employed in any military charge, or otherwise occupied in their private affairs: and caused them to be clapt up within the stoves and hot houses, as in ward and safe custody, where their breath being stuffed and stopped up with exceeding heat, and steaming vapours, they were stifled, and died miserably. But there was one Decius Magius, a man who wanted no means of soveraign authority, but only the sobriety, discretion, and wisdom of the Citizens with whom he lived; who withstood all that ever he could such enormous and audacious courses, and endeavoured to hinder the Em-
C bassage sent to Annibal. And so soon as he heard that Annibal was sending a garrison, he recounted unto his fellow Citizens the proud and lordly rule of Pyrrhus, the miserable and wretched thraldom of the Tarentines, as precedents sufficient to give them warning. He ceased not to cry aloud in open place and audience, first, that they should not receive the garrison into the City: then, that being admitted, they should either be thrust out again; or rather if they would expiate and make amends by some valiant and memorable act for that shamefull lend part of theirs in revolting so from their most ancient Allies, yea, and kinsmen by blood, they should fall upon the Carthaginian garrison, and kill them every one, and so reconcile themselves again to the Romans. Annibal having intelligence of these plots (for they were not a forging and contriving in a corner) first sent certain messengers to summon Magius to repair unto his presence within his Camp.
D After that, seeing he stoutly denied to go, (for he pleaded that Annibal had no authority nor right to command a Citizen of Capua) he waxed wroth, and commanded the man to be apprehended, and to be haled perforce bound unto him. But fearing, upon better advice, lest by offering such violence some tumult might arise, and in the heat of blood break forth into an inconsiderate fray, he dispatched beforehand a messenger of purpose unto Marius Blasius, the Prætor or L. Governor of Capua: signifying, that the morrow next following he would be personally in Capua: and so with a small guard about him, he set forth of his Camp, and put himself on his journey. Marius assembled the people together, making proclamation, and warning them to be ready in all frequent solemnity, with their wives and children, to meet Annibal upon the way. They of the adverse side unto Magius and the Romans performed this not only E obediently, but also most effectually, and with great diligence and endeavour. Yea, the common sort likewise were very forward in this action, as desirous especially to see this great General and brave warrior, so noble and renowned for his many victories. Decius Magius neither went forth to meet him, nor yet kept his house, because he would not seem to fear and carry a guilty conscience: but walked up and down idly for his pleasure in the Market place with one of his sons, and a few of his vassals and followers, whiles the whole City besides was busily occupied, and much troubled in the entertaining and beholding of this great Captain and Commander of the Carthaginians. Annibal being entred the City, incontinently required to have audience in their Council-House. Whereupon, the Nobles and principall Citizens of Capua requested him that he would not that day intend any weighty matters of importance, but himself in person solem-
F nize it with joy and mirth, as an high and festivall holiday for his welcome thither. And albeit he was by nature hasty, and ready to fall into fits of anger, yet because he would not seem at his first coming to deny them any thing, he employed a good part of that day in seeing and viewing the City. Entertained and lodged he was and his whole train with the Manii, Celeres, Stenius, and Pacuvius, the most noble and honourable personages, and the wealthiest of all others. Thither unto him, Pacuvius Calavius (concerning whom I spake before, the principal man of that bend and faction, which reduced the City to the obedience and devotion of Annibal) brought his own son a young Gentleman, and said withall, that the youth kept continually with Decius, and that he was fain to pluck him away from his company and train, whose part he took, and stuck most stiffly to him, in maintaining the old society and amity of the Romans, against G the new League with the Carthaginians; and neither the bending and inclination of the whole City to the contrary side, nor yet the reverent majesty of a father, had yet driven him from his obstinate resolution. And for that time the father laboured with Annibal rather by way of prayer and intreaty, than by excusing and clearing his son, that he would not be discontented nor displeased with the young man. So he was overcome with the importunate request and plentifull teares of the father, and gave commandment, that he together with his father should be bidden to supper, at which feast he purposed to have the company of no other guests of all Capua, but only of his hostess that have him entertainment, and one Jubellius Taurea, a famous and brave warrior. To supper they went long before day-light went down, and fared at H the table, not after the guise of Carthaginians nor according to the discipline of souldiers, but after the order of a City and house, which had been used a long time to have the boord furnished with sundry sorts of dainty dishes, and with all delicate junkets to please the palate and taste. Perolla only the son of Calavius, could not be brought to change his mind, and shew himself cheerful and merry at meat, notwithstanding the Masters of the feast, and Annibal himself otherwhiles invited him to bear them company, and sit with them; but he ever made his excuse to his father, that he was ill at ease and sickly whensoever he seemed to examine him, and to know the cause of such wonderful trouble of mind, and vexation of spirit. So, a little afore sun-setting, when his father arose, and was gone out from supper, he followed hard after him: and when they weee come into I a secret place apart, (a garden it was on the back side of the house) "I will tell you a thing father,

"I have in my head a policy, and a ready mean, how we shall not only obtain pardon at the Ro"mans hands for our trespass committed, in falling away from them, and turning to Annibal: but "also how we Campans may be in far greater estimation and favour among them than ever we "were. The father marvelling hereat, was desirous to know what device that might be: and with "that the youth cast his gown from off his shoulders, and shewed him a good blade girded to "his side. I will, quoth he, out of hand, establish and seal sure the Roman League with the bloud "of Annibal. I was desirous (father) to let you know of it aforehand, if peradventure you would "be willing to be out of the way when the deed is a doing. The old man seeing and hearing this, in a great fearfull agony, as if he had been present to see the execution of that which he heard K him to speak of, "Now I beseech thee, my son (quoth he) and pray thee of all loves and bonds "that bind children and parents together, that thou wilt not before thy fathers face either com"mit or suffer this so horrible a part, full of all abominable wickedness whatsoever, and not to be "named. There are not many hours since, that we sware by all the gods and holy hallows in hea"ven, and by joyning hand in hand, made faithful promise, and obliged our selves to communi"cate together with him, and to eat at the holy table of sacred viands. And are we no sooner "departed asunder from our familiar conference and parley, but we arm our selves against him?
"Arisest thou indeed from thy friends guest-boord, to which thou wert thy self a third man bid-
"den of all the Campans, and even by Annibal, and wilt thou stain and pollute that boord with "the bloud of the principal guest? I, thy father, erewhile was able to reconcile Annibal to my L
"son; and can I not pacifie my son likewise, and appease his fierce stomack against Annibal? But "if their be nothing sacred and inviolable, nothing to be trusted in the world, neither faithfull
"promise nor religious oath, nor any piety at all and good nature, things so honest and just: then "adventure hardly, and spare not to put in execution all actions detestable and not to be spo"ken, so that besides the note and infamous mark of wickedness, they bring not upon our own "heads present mischief, and utter confusion. Darest thou alone assail the person of Annibal?
"What will that multitude about him do the while, so many freemen and bondmen both? All "their guard and regard all their eyes upon him alone what serve they for? What will become of "so many hands of theirs? Thinkest thou that they will be benummed and dead at the time of "that frantick enterprise of thine? The grim visage of Annibal himself, whom whole armies of M
"souldiers tremble to behold: who the people of Rome dread, and for fear of whom they quake
"again, wilt thou alone abide to see? And if all other means of help should fail him, wilt thou "endure to strike and wound me thy father, putting my body between for the safegard and de"fence of Annibal? And stab me thou must through the very heart, before thou canst hurt him "or run him through. Suffer therefore thy self here to be frighted from this thy intended mischief, "before thou have the foil there, and miss of thy purpose. Let my prayers take place with thee,
"as once this day they prevailed for thee. With that, he marked his son to weep and shed tears, and embracing him about the middle, and kissing him ever and anon, he left him not, nor gave over to pray & entreat him instantly, untill he got at his hands to lay off his sword, and promise him faithfully, that he would not attempt any such enterprise. Then the youth, seeing how N the case stood, "I will (quoth he) pay unto my naturall father that kindness and love, in which "I am bound as a debtor to my native Country. But alas for you, good father, I am right sorry "for your hard hap; who are to answer before God and the world, for the betraying of your "country no fewer times than thrice already. Once, when you gave counsell and perswaded to "forsake the Romans, and to revolt from them: again, when you were the principall agent, and "advised to make peace with Annibal: and now this day the third time, when you are the only "obstacle and hinderance that Capua is not restored again into the hands of the Romans. O O
"sweet country, and native soil of mine, take here at my hands this sword, wherewith erewhile
"I was girt and armed for dear love of thee and was fully minded to defend this thy chief Castle "and Fortress, and not to spare, but embrue it in the bloud of thy mortall enemy: take it I say,
"since my own father is ready to wrest it from me. This said, he flung his sword over the garden wall into the high way and open street: and therewith, because he would not grow into any suspition, he shewed himself again to the guests within the house, and took part of the banquet.
The morrow after, the Senate in favour of Annibal solemnly met together in great number:
in which frequent assembly, the beginning of his speech was very pleasant and gracious: wherein he gave the Capuans thanks, for preferring his amity before the alliance of the people of Rome:
and among other fair and magnificall behests to them made, he promised that within a while,

A Capua ſhould be the head City and chief State of all Italy, whereunto the people of Rome, together with other nations, ſhould reſort for law and juſtice." Mary, quoth he there is one that hath "no part or fellowſhip in the ſociety and league made between the Carthaginians and you, name-"ly, Magius Decius, who neither was a Campan nor ought of right to be ſo called and reputed: "him I demand to be delivered into my hands, and that in my preſence the Senate ſhould be aſ-"ked their opinion concerning his treſpaſs, and an Act preſently entred thereof. All of them there aſſembled allowed of the motion, and gave their aſſent in the end: albeit a great ſort of them thought both the man unworthy of that hard fortune and calamity, and that this was but an ill beginning and a very overture to the infringing of the right of their freedom. The chief Ma-B giſtrate then went forth of the Council-Chamber, and late in the Judiciall Hall or Temple, and commanded Decius to be attached, and to ſtand before him at his feet, and there to anſwer for himſelf and make his defence. Who perſiſted ſtill in the ſame ſtoutneſs and boldneſs of ſpirit, alledging that by vertue of the covenants in the League compriſed, he might not lawfully be preſſed and forced thus far. Whereupon he had irons clapt upon him, and commandment was given that he ſhould have a Lictor attend upon him, and ſo be conveighed into the Camp of Annibal. All the way as he was led, ſo long as he was bare-headed and open-faced, he went preaching to the multitude that flocked about him, and with a loud voice ſpake and ſaid: "Now Capuans, ye have C "the liberty that ye ſought and longed for. In the open market place, at noon-day, and in your "ſight, lo how I, a man inferior to none in all Capua, am led away bound in chains to die. What "greater violence could be offered if Capua were won by aſſault of the enemy? Go forth, go and "meet Annibal adorn and hang the City with rich cloath of tapiſtry. Regiſter in your Kalender, "among other holidaies, this day of his Entry, that in the end ye may behold this goodly triumph "over one of your own Citizens. Upon the utterance of theſe words, the multitude ſeemed diſcontented at the indignity of this ſight. Whereupon he was hoodwinked, and his head covered, and the Serjeant was charged to have him away quickly, and make haſte out of the gates. So, he was brought into the Camp, and immediatly ſhipped and ſent to Carthage, for fear leſt ſome commotion might ariſe in Capua, upon ſo unworthy and ſhameſull a deed: and leſt the Senat alſo ſhould repent themſelves, that they had delivered and yielded out of their hands a principal perſonage among them: alſo to prevent that no Embaſſage might be ſent unto him for his redeli-
D very, whereby he ſhould either offend his new Allies, in caſe he denied them their firſt requeſt, or ſuffer Capua to have alwaies a buſie and ſeditious Citizen ready ever to ſtir up new troubles, if he granted their ſuit. The ſhip wherein he was embarked, was by a tempeſt caſt upon Cyrene, a port town in the dominion at that time of the KK. There Magius fled for refuge as to a Sanctuary, unto the Image of King Ptolomeus, and was brought by his guard and keepers unto Alexandria to the Kings preſence, and enformed the King, how contrary to the tenor and priviledge of the covenant he was in bonds by Annibal. Whereupon he was looſed from his chains, and put to the choice, whether he would return to Capua, or go to Rome. Magius anſwered, that he could not in Capua remain in ſafety, and if he went to Rome, at that time eſpecially when there was war between the Romans and the Capuans, he ſhould be ſooner lodged there in a priſon like a fugitive runnagate, E than entertained in houſe for a friend and loving gueſt: and concluded in the end, that he would make abode and live the reſt of his daies more willingly in no place of the world, than in his highneſs Realm whom he found already to be the ſaviour of his life, and the redeemer of his liberty and enlargement.

While theſe occurrents fell out abroad, Q. Fabius Pictor, ſent (as is aboveſaid) Embaſſador to Delphos, returned to Rome, and out of a writing he read openly, the anſwer of the Oracle in theſe words (now ye muſt underſtand, that in this Script were certain gods and ſaints named, unto whom they ſhould make ſolemn ſupplication, and the manner alſo with all ceremonies and compliments thereto belonging:) "Then (O Romans) if ye ſhall ſo do, your ſtate ſhall proſper and be F "more happy: your Common-weal ſhall go forward better to your mind, yea, and victory in the "wars ſhall happen unto the people of Rome. But remember that when all things ſhall go well on "your ſide, and your State ſhall be ſaved and preſerved, ye ſend unto Pythius Apollo a preſent, ac-"cording to the merit of a due recompence: and of the ſilver raiſed of the pillage, prizes, and "ſpoils taken from the enemies, do him honour accordingly. After he had rehearſed theſe words, truly tranſlated out of the Greek Original then he ſaid moreover, That ſo ſoon as he was departed from the Oracle, he preſently ſacrificed unto all thoſe gods with frankincenſe and wine. Alſo, that he was commanded by the Prieſt of Apolle, that like as he both came to the Oracle, and alſo celebrated ſacrifices, crowned with a garland and chaplet of Laurel, ſo he ſhould in the ſame man-
G ner adorned take ſhip and be imbarked, and not lay off the ſaid garland before he was arrived to Rome. Finally, that all ceremonies performed moſt preciſely and diligently, which he was commanded to obſerve, he had laid and beſtowed the ſaid chaplet upon the altar before the Shrine of Apollo at Rome. Then the Senate made a decree, That thoſe ſacrifices and ſupplications ſhould with all ſpeed and careſull regard be celebrated.

While theſe things paſſed at Rome and in Italy, Mago the ſon of Amilcar, arrived at Carthage and brought the firſt tidings of the victory at Canne. This Mago was not immediatly and directly ſent from his brother, out of the field where the battel was fought, but ſtaid certain daies about receiving the homage and ſubjection of certain Cities of the Brutii, which revolted from the Romans. Who having audience given him in the Senat of Carthage, related what acts and exploits his brother Annibal had atchieved in Italy: namely, That he had given battell to H six Generals, whereof four were Consuls, and two were the Dictator and Commander of horsemen: That he had fought against six entire Consular armies, in which battels he had slain above 200000 enemies, taken prisoners more than 50000. That of those four Coss. he had killed twain outright: as for the other two, one of them was deadly hurt, the other having lost his whole army, was fled, accompanied scarcely with fifty men: that the General of the Cavalry created with full Consular authority, was discomfited and put to flight: and the Dictator (for sooth) because he never would hazard the fortune of a field, was counted the only warrior and worthy Captain:

That the Brutii and Apulians part of the Samnits, and Lucans, were revolted to the Carthaginians: That Capua, the head City not of Campan only, but (after the Romans defeat and overthrow I in the battell at Cannæ) of all Italy also, was surrendred to Annibal. For these so many and so worthy victories, he required (meet and requisite it was) that there should be a solemn festivall day holden and sacrifices solemnized to the honour of the immortal gods. And for the better assurance of these lucky and fortunate atchievements, and to verifie his words, he caused the gold rings of the Romans, slain at Cannæ, to be poured forth in the porch and entry of the Council-House. The heap of them was so great, that as some authors affirm, when they measured the same, they filled three Modii and an half. But the constant report went, and sounding neerer to a truth, that they were not above one Modius. He added moreover, and said, (and all to prove their overthrow the greater) that none but knights and men of arms, and those of the better sort, who served on horses found at the Cities charges, used to wear that ornament. The drift and conclusion of his K speech was this, "That the sooner that Annibal hoped to make an end of the wars, the more he "ought to be aided and helped with all provision and furniture accordingly. And why? The ser"vice was far from home, in the midst of the enemies land, a huge deal of corn was consumed, a "great mass of money was spent; and as so many battels had utterly swoopt up the enemies ar"mies, so reckning was to be made, that they had in some measure lessened and impaired the for"ces of the conqueror. Therefore, a new supply of men was to be sent over, and money for soul-
"diers pay, yea and corn also was to be transported to so brave souldiers, that had done so singu"lar good service, and deserved so well of the Carthaginian nation. Upon these reports of Mago,
"when all men else were wondrous glad, and took great contentment, Himilco, a man of the "Brachin bend, supposing he had now good occasion and opportunity offered to carp and check L
"Hanno. How now Hanno quoth he, what say you to this gear? Repent you still and misliketh
"war undertaken against the Romans? Let us see now, give your voice and opinion that Annibal
"be yielded: forbid now thanksgiving to be performed to the immortall gods, for this prosperous "speed and fortunate success. Let us hear a Roman Senator now to speak in the Council-House "of the Carthaginians. Then Hanno; "I would have held my peace this day, my LL. quoth he,
"for fear to speak ought that in this common and generall joy might not be altogether pleasant "unto you. But now, seeing a Senator bluntly spurreth me the question, whether I mislike still of "the enterprise of war against the Romans? if I should keep silence and say nothing, I might "seem either proud and insolent, or else faulty and culpable. Whereof the one is the part of a man
"that hath forgot the liberty of other men; the other a property of him, that thinketh not of M
"his own. Well may I therefore answer to Himilco, that I cease not yet to mislike this war, nor "never will give over to blame and challenge this invincible Captain and warrior of ours, be"fore I see the war ended and determined, upon some indifferent hand, and tollerable conditi"on: and nothing else shall stint the mis's I have, and quench the longing desire of the old peace,
"but the making of a new. And therefore these particulars, which Mago erewhile so magnified
"and vaunted of, are for the present joyfull news to Himilco, and other of that crue, and the sup-
"posts of Annibal: and to me likewise in some measure, they may be acceptable tidings in this re"gard, that good success and lucky speed in war, if we will make the right use and benefit of our "fortune, will be a mean to procure us a more easie and honourable peace. For if we let slip this "advantage and opportunity of the time, when as we may seem rather to give than take condi- N
"tions of peace, I fear me, that even this present so goodly a shew of rankness as it maketh now,
"will run up all to straw, and bear no head to yield corn in the end. And yet let us consider now, "what a special matter this is. Slain I have whole armies of enemies; Therefore send me fresh and "new souldiers. What could you (Sir) demand more, if you had been overthrown? Won I have
"by force two strong holds where the enemies were encamped, full and traight (we must needs "think) of prizes and victuals; Allow me more corn and money. What would you have requi"red and craved more, I say, in case you had been rifled, and turned perforce out of your own "Camp and pavilions? But that I may not marvel alone at these strange Enthymemes and conclu"sions (for it is as free and lawful for me to ask some questions, seeing I have already answered to "Himilco) I would fain have Himilco or Mago, I care not whether, to make answer likewise to O
"me. Say, that in the battell before Cannæ, the Roman Empire was wholly defeated and foiled.
"Say also, that certain it is, how all Italy is at point ready to revolt: tell me first and formost whe"ther any one Nation of the Latine people is faln from them to us? Secondly, whether any one "person of the five and thirty wards in Rome, is run away, and fled to Annibal? When Mago said
"nay, and denied both. Why then (quoth he) there be great numbers of our enemy still behind.
"But I would gladly know what courage, what heart, what hope that multitude hath. When "Mago answered, he could not tell. And nothing (quoth Hanno) is more rife & easie to be known.

A "Say man, ſent the Romans any Embaſſadors to Annibal to treat for peace? Nay, had ye any in"telligence brought unto you, that there was ſo much as one word liſped, or mention made at "Rome of peace? When Mago ſaid flatly, nay, to that too. Why then (quoth Hanno) by this ac"count this war will find us work, and keep us occupied as much as it did the very firſt day that "Annibal ſet foot in Italy. How variable fortune was in the former Punick war, how victory
"went and came reciprocally, we are moſt of us yet alive that well remember. We never ſped bet"ter nor had a luckier hand, both by land and ſea, than before Caius Lutatius, and Aulus Poſthu-
"mius were Conſuls. And whiles Lutatius and Poſthumius were Conſuls, were we vanquiſhed B "and utterly overthrown before the Iſlands Ægates. And in caſe now (which God forbid) for"tune ſhould change to change and turn her wheel, hope ye to have peace then, being overcome,
"which now when we are conquerors, no man offreth nor ſeeketh after. For mine own part,
"if any man ſhould ask mine opinion of peace, either to preſent and tender it to the enemies,
"or to accept it at their hands, I wot well what to ſay: but if ye would know what I think con"cerning thoſe demands of Mago, my advice is, that there is no ſence nor reaſon to ſend aid and "ſupplies to conquerors: now if they bear us in hand, delude, and abuſe us with a vain and falſe "perſwaſion of conqueſt and victory, much leſs a great deal. Theſe remonſtrances of Hanno took ſmall effect with many of them: for, both the ſecret grudge and rancor which he bare to the Barchin Houſe much impeached his credit and authority, and alſo by reaſon that their minds C were ſo fully poſſeſſed of the preſent joy, they could admit and abide to hear of nothing, that might ſound otherwiſe to daunt their glad hearts; thinking verily that the war would ſoon be at an end if they now would ſtrain a little and help it forward. And therefore with great conſent, there paſſed an Act of the Senat, That there ſhould be a ſupply ſent unto Annibal of forty thouſand Numidians, forty Elephants, and many talents of ſilver. Alſo the Dictator was ſent before with Mago into Spain to levy and hire twenty thouſand footmen, and four thouſand horſemen for to make up thoſe broken armies which were in Italy and in Spain. But theſe matters (as uſually it hapneth in time of proſperity) were performed but ſlackly and at leiſure. The Romans contrariwiſe made more ſpeed, as being by nature more induſtrious: and beſides, ſuch was their adverſe fortune and extremity, that they might not neglect their affairs and go ſlowly about D their buſineſs. For neither the Conſul was wanting in any affairs that were by him to be managed: and the Dictator M. Jun. Brutus, ſo ſoon as he had performed all the complements concer-cerning ſacrifices and religious ceremonies, propoſed unto the people, That (as the uſuall manner was) he might mount on horſeback. Which done, over and beſides the two legions of Citizens, which in the beginning of the year had been levied and enrolled by the Conſuls, and the bondſlaves that were before muſtred, and certain ſquadrons gathered together out of the Picene and Gauls country, he proceeded to the laſt remedy and ſuccour of a diſtreſſed and well near deſperate ſtate, when as honeſt and direct courſes muſt give place unto commodious and profitable policies and alight from his horſe, and made proclamation, That whoſoever were guilty and condemned of any capital crime, or whoſoever were impriſoned for debt, and would willingly ſerve E under him, he would take order that they ſhould be exempt from all puniſhment, and diſcharged from their creditors. And of ſuch he armed ſix thouſand with the ſpoils of the Gauls, which in the triumph of Flaminius were carried in ſhew. Thus he departed from Rome five and twenty thouſand ſtrong.

Annibal having poſſeſſed himſelf of Capua, and ſollicited the Neapolitans once again, and ſounded their minds, propoſing before their eyes fear and hope, and all in vain, led his forces into the Country of Nola, with this mind, not at firſt to go roughly with them to work, and by way of open hoſtility, becauſe he was not out of all hope that they would willingly come off and yield themſelves: but in caſe they wavered, and anſwered not his hope and expectation in ſome good time, he would ſurely proceed againſt them in all extremity, and put them to whatſoever they could endure or fear. The Senate, and eſpecially the principall of them, continued faſt and F ſure in their alliance with the people of Rome: But the commons (as their manner is, deſirous of alteration and to ſee a new world) enclined wholly to the ſide of Annibal, caſting many doubts, and fears, that their lands and poſſeſſions ſhould be waſted and ſpoiled with ſundry calamities and indignities that follow upon ſiege: neither wanted there heads and ring-leaders of a rebellion. Whereupon the Senate (for fear leſt if they ſhould ſeem to thwart and croſs them, they had not been able to withſtand the violence of the multitude once up and drawn to an head) cloſely diſſembled their intent and purpoſe, and ſo by temporizing, prevented a preſent miſchief.
For they made ſemblance that they liked well, and were reſolved of revolting unto Annibal:
but upon what conditions and capitulations they ſhould enter into new league and amity, they knew not certainly. So having taken a farther time they diſpatched in haſte certain Embaſſadors G unto the Roman Prætor Marcellus Claudius, who remained with the army at Caſinum, adverti-ſing him in how great jeopardy the ſtate of Nola ſtood, to wit That Annibal was already Lord of their lands and the Carthaginians would ſoon be maſters of the City, unleſs they were ſuccoured and relieved: that their Senat were driven to this ſhift for to yield unto the Commons, and grant to revolt whenſoever they would have them; and by that means ſtaid them that they rebelled not over haſtily. Marcellus after he had commended the Nolans willed them with the ſame diſſimulation to protract time and hold off untill his coming: and in the mean while to conceal and keep ſecret to themſelves, the dealings and treaties with him, and in no caſe to be known of any hope they had of aid from the Romans. Himself went from Cannsium, to Calatia, H and from thence passed over the river Vulturnus, and by the way of Satricula and Trebia, journeyed over Sueſſula through the mountains, and arrived at Nola. A little before the coming of the Roman Prætor, Annibal was departed and gone out of the Territory of Nola, and drew downwards to the sea-side near unto Neapolis: his teeth watered at the Port-town, and that out of Affrick his ships might arrive thither, as to a safe and sure harbour. But after that he heard that Naples was held by a Roman Provost, M. Junius Syllanus (sent for thither by the Neapolitans themselves) and had received a garrison: seeing he could not be admitted into Neapolis, no more than into Nola, he went to Nuceria. Having beleaguered it round a long time, and often assaulted it forcibly, and assaied to sollicit as well the Commons as the Nobility, but without effect; at the I length by famine he forced them to yield, and so became master of the Town upon composition, That they should depart every man disarmed in their single garments. Then, as one that would seem ever from the beginning, to use clemency to all Italians, but only the Romans; he made fair promises of great rewards and advancement to honour, unto all those that would tarry behind and serve under him. But no man upon those hopes would remain with him. For they all gave him the slip, and went sundry waies, some to their friends and acquaintance, others at a venture as their mind stood, to divers Cities of Campain, but most to Nola and Naples. Amongst the rest, there were almost thirty Senators, and those (as it fell out) of the best sort, that came to Capua: but being kept out there because they had shut their gates against Annibal, they went to Cumes. The pillage of Nuceria was bestowed upon the souldiers, the City sacked and burnt. K Now kept Marcellus Nola, not presuming more upon the strength of his own garrison, than upon the confidence he had in the great men and chief of the City. But he had the Commons in jealousie, and above all, one L. Bantius, who for that he had complotted to rebell, and therefore stood in fear of the Roman Deputy: one while was pricked and incited to attempt treason, and to betray his Country; another while, in case he shou d fail of that opportunity, and miss his purpose, to make an escape and run away to the enemy. A couragious and lusty young man he was, and the braveſt Cavaleer in those daies of all the Roman Confederats. His hap was to be found lying half dead among the heaps of slain bodies before Cannæ: Annibal took order for the curing of his hurts, and when he was throughly healed right curteously sent him home well and bountifully rewarded. In remembrance of which favour and good turn, and in token of L thankfulness, he was willing to deliver and yield Nola into the hands of Annibal, to be at his devotion. But the Prætor had an eye unto him, and observed how his head wrought, and was busily occupied to bring an alteration. And seeing there were but two waies to deal with him, either by punishment to keep him short, and cut him off; or by some benefit to win his heart: he thinking it a better course, to gain unto himself so hardy and valiant a friend, than only to bereave his enemy of him; he sent for him, and in this manner spake friendly unto him: "You have (quoth "he) amongst your countrymen and fellow-Citizens, I see well, many that envy you, as it appears "well by this, that there is never a neighbour you have at Nola that hath told me of you, and "how many noble exploits and good services in war you have performed. But yet your valour "cannot be unknown and hidden, ever since you served in the Roman army. For many there M "be which were souldiers then with you, which have made report unto me of your proweſs and "what perils you have entred into, and how often you have put your life in hazard, for the safety "and honour of the people of Rome: and namely, how in the battel before Cannæ you gave not "over fight, untill at length having bled well near to death, you were born to the ground and "lay under foot, overwhelmed with men, horse and armour, falling upon you, and so kept down "that you could not rise up again. But be of good chear man, and go on still in this thy vertue and "well-doing: you shall have at my hands all honour and reward that may be possible: and the "oftner you come to me and keep me company, you shall find it will be more for your reputation "and commodity both. The young man was glad at heart for these gracious words and large promises: and so Marcellus gave unto him freely, a good brave courser, and commanded the Trea- N surer to tell him out in money * 500 * Bigats of silver, charging his officers and Lictors to let him have access unto him at his pleasure, whensoever he came. By this curteous usage and humanity of Marcellus, the young mans stoot heart was so dulced, mollified and easie to be wrought, that of all Confederats and Allies there was not one, who bare himself more valiantly, nor maintained more faithfully the State of Rome. When Annibal was approached to the gates of Nola (for he was returned from Nuceria, and came thither again) and the Commons within the town practised afresh to rebell, Marcellus had a little before the coming of the enemies, retired and put himself within the wals: not for fear that he should not be able to keep the field and his hold; but lest he should give advantage and opportunity to betray the City, seeing too many of them within disposed and forward thereunto. After this, they began on both sides to arrange their battels in O array the Romans under the wals of Nola, the Carthaginians before their own fort. Small skirmishes there were between the City and the Camp of Annibal (with variable event of fortune) because the Generals were not willing, either to deny and debar some few that were so eager and forward to call for fight, or yet to give forth the signall of a generall battell. Whiles these two armies temporized thus, and held their Corps de guard, continually, and in manner of a solemn set Assembly, the chief Nobles of the Nolans advertised Marcellus, that there used to be night-meetings and conferences between their own Commons and the Carthaginians: and

* 14 li. 11 s. sh. 6 d.

* Bigatus was a piece of Roman silver coin, so called of Bigia, a chariot drawn with two horses, stucken or stamped upon the one side, and it was the same that Denarius.

A and that it was plotted and ſet down, That when the Roman Hoſt was iſſued in battel-array out of their gates, the Commons in the mean while ſhould fall to rifling their carriages, packs, and truſſes within, and then ſhut the gates upon them, and keep the walls: and ſo having the City and all their goods and baggage under their hands, ſhould from thenceforth receive Annibal into the City inſtead of Marcellus. Upon theſe advertiſements, Marcellus after he had thanked and commended the Senators of Nola, determined before any commotion and mutiny aroſe within the walls to try the fortune of a battel. At thoſe three gates that ſtood toward the enemy he ranged his forces divided into three battaillons, & gave order that all the carriages ſhould follow after: and that the lackies, launders, and other Camp-followers together with the feeble and ſickly per-
B ſons, ſhould carry ſtakes and pales for the rampier. At the middle gate he placed the flower and ſtrength of the legions, together with the Roman Cavalry: at the two gates at either hand he beſtowed the new ſouldiers the light armed, and the auxiliary horſemen of allies. The Nolans were by ſtreight commandment forbidden to approach the gates or the walls. As for the baggage and carriages the ordinary guard was appointed to attend thereupon, for fear, leſt while the Legions were buſie in fight, there ſhould be ſome aſſault made upon them. In this order and array marſhalled they were within the gates. Annibal, who likewiſe ready arranged ſtood with banner diſplaied (as he had done for certain daies together) untill it was well toward noon firſt wondred at it, that neither the Roman army iſſued out of the gates nor any ſouldier appeared upon the wals: and ſuppoſing afterwards, that their uſuall complots and conventicles were diſcovered and reve-
C led, and that for very fear they kept within and ſat ſtill, ſent back part of their ſouldiers into the Camp, with commandment, in all ſpeed to bring abroad into the open field before the vanguard, all the Ordnance and Artillery for to batter the City walls; with aſſured confidence, that if he came hotly upon them, and gave an aſſault, whiles they thus lingred and iſſued not forth, the Commons would make ſome tumult and ſtir within the City. But anon as every man was buſily occupied, running to and fro in haſte about his own charge, before the vanguard and foreſront of his battel, even at the point when he advanced forward to the wals; all upon a ſudden a gate was ſet open, and Marcellus cauſed the trumpets to ſound the alarm, and the ſouldiers to ſet up a ſhout, commanding the footmen firſt, and then the horſe to ſally out, and with all the might and D force they could, to charge upon the enemy. Soon had they terrified their main battell ſufficiently, and made diſorder there, when at the two gates of each ſide, P. Valerius Flaccus and Caius Aurelius, two Lieutenants generall, iſſued forth upon their flanks and wings. The horſe-boies, ſculli-ons and the other multitude aboveſaid, which was ſet to guard the carriages, aroſe up and made a new outcry, and ſhouted, ſo as to the Carthaginians (who contemned them before for their ſmall number eſpecially) they repreſented all at once a ſhew of a mighty army. I dare not avouch that which ſome Authors ſtick not to write, that of enemies were ſlain in this conflict 2300 and that the Romans loſt but one only man. But what victory ſoever it was, either ſo great, or ſmaller, ſurely a doughty piece of ſervice was that day atchieved & I wot not whether I may truly ſay, of the greateſt conſequence that any ever was, during the time of that war. For as the time
E was then, it was a greater matter for the Romans (albeit they were the Conquerors) not to be vanquiſhed of Annibal, than it was afterwards to vanquiſh him. Annibal diſappointed of his hope to win Nola retired to Acerre. And Marcellus immediately having ſhut the gates, and placed the guards and warders to keep the ſame, that no man might go forth, ſat judicially in the market-place to examine thoſe that had uſed ſecret conference and parling with the enemies: and finding above ſeventy guilty of this action, pronounced ſentence of death upon them, as in caſe of treaſon. Thoſe he cut ſhorter by the head, and commanded their goods to be confiſcat. And thus leaving the government of the City to the Senat thereof, he departed with all his forces, and above Sueſſula encamped himſelf, and there abode.

Annibal being come before Acerra, firſt ſummoned the City, to ſurrender voluntarily & without conſtraint: but ſeeing them obſtinate, and willing to relent, he made preparation to lay ſiege F unto the town, and to aſſault it. But the Acerrans had better heart and courage, than might and ſtrength to reſiſt him. Therefore, when they ſaw themſelves like to be intrenched all about, and were paſt hope to defend and keep the town: before the enemies had brought all ends of their trenches and ſconces together, they got between the trenches and rampiers (where they were not finiſhed, and ſtood not cloſe together) in the dead time of the night, and eſcaped through the ſentinels and watches that were ſlendely looked unto, and as well as they could making ſhift through by-waies and blind lanes over hedge and ditch (as either their wits guided them, or their fear carried them) recovered thoſe Cities of Campania, which they knew for certain were not revolted, but perſiſted true and faſt unto the Romans. Annibal after he had put Acerra to the ſack, and ſet it on fire having intelligence, that the Roman Dictator and the Legions were received at Caſili-
G num: and fearing, leſt while the enemy lay ſo near encamped, ſome ſhould have recourſe alſo into Capua, led his army to Caſilinum.

At the ſame time Preneſte was held by 500 Preneſtins, with a few Romans and Latines, who upon the news of the overthrow at Canna, were retired thither. Theſe Preneſtins, by occaſion that they were not levied and muſtered at Preneſte by the day appointed, ſet out from thence ſomewhat too late; and were come as far as Caſilinum, before the rumour was bruited of the defeat before Cannæ: where they joyned themſelves with other Romans and Confederats, ſet forward from Caſilinum, and marched together with a good great company: but meeting by the way with the tidings of that unfortunat field, turned back again to Casilinum. And after they had spent H certain daies there, as well fearing the Campans, as suspected of them again, (for they devised on both sides how to entrap one another, and how to avoid each others trains) and having received also certain intelligence, That in Capua there was treating about a revolt, and that Annibal was there received; they in one night set upon the Townsmen of Casilinum, and killed them, and got that part of the City which is on this side Vulturnus, (a river that runneth through it, and divideth it into two parts) and kept it still. Their number was well encreased by the coming of a cohort of four hundred and sixty Perusins, who likewise were driven to Casilinum, by the same report and news, which a few daies before had turned the Prenestins thither. And surely there was sufficient almost of armed souldiers to man and defend the walls of that part, being of so small a cir- I cuit as they were, considering the town was flanked on the one side with the river. And again, for the proportion of corn (whereof they had small store) they were men but too many. Anni-bal being now not far from thence, sent before him the Getulians, under the conduct of a Captain named Isalca; with direction, that first, if he could come to a parley, he should perswade with the Inhabitants within, and by fair words induce them to open their gates, and receive a garrison: but in case they continued still in their obstinacy, then to assail them by force, and give the attempt to enter into the City one way or other. When they were come under the walls, the barbarous Captain Isalca, supposing (because he heard no noise, and saw no stirring) that they had quit and abandoned the town and were fled, began to assail the gates, break open the locks, & burst the bars.

But all at once on a sudden the gates were set open, and two cohorts well appointed and provi- K ded for that purpose within, sallied forth, with an exceeding great noise and tumult, overthrew a number of the enemies, and beat them down. Thus when the first had the repulse and were set back, Maharbal was sent with a greater power to second them, but was not able to make his par-Casilinum be-sieged. ty good with these squadrons that sallied forth and charged upon him. At last Annibal himself encamped even before the wall, and with all his power and forces put together, made preparation to give assault to this little town, & small garrison. And whiles he pressed hard upon them with fresh and hot assaults, investing it round about, the enemies from off their wals, curtains, and turrets, let flie their shot so lustily upon the assailants, that he lost some of his best & most forward men ther.
Once they issued forth of themselves upon a bravery, and minded to bid them battel, but by a course of Elephants, set between them and home, they had like to have been shut forth and kept L out, and so they made haste in great fear to recover the gates and put themselves within the town again; having lost, considering so small a number, a great sort: and more had died for it, but that the night parted the fray, and made an end of the skirmish. The morrow after, the assailants were all of them sharp set to give a fresh and hot charge, but not before there was a murall Coronet of gold shewed, and promised unto him that first could scale the walls. And the General himself cast in their teeth and reproved them for being so long about the assaulting of a smal and weak sconce, to speak of, seated also upon a plain: whereas before they had won the strong town of Saguntum.
He put them in mind both all and some, of Canna, Thrasymenus, and Trebia. Then began they to set mantlets and pavoises to, and to undermine. Many and sundry enterprises were attempted, and nothing left undone, that either by meer force could be performed, or by art and cunning de- M vised. The Roman associats against these their engins and fabricks raised mounts, and platforms:
yea, and with countermines and cross trenches met with the mines of the enemies; so as both above ground and underneath, they impeached all their attempts; so long, untill Annibal for very shame was fain to give over his design for the present. And when he had fortified his standing Camp and placed there a mean guard for the defence of it, because he would not seem to have relinquished altogether the enterprise, he withdrew himself into Capua, there to winter. There he lodged his souldiers within house for the better part of winter: those souldiers, I say, who many a time and often had endured long, and held out against all travels and hardness that can possibly happen to the body of man; and never had been used to any good keeping, nor acquainted with delights and pleasures of the world. But even these men, whom no calamity, no misery could N tame and overcome, were spoiled and undone with too much wealth and excessive dainties: and so much the rather, as they more greedily fell thereto; and having not tasted thereof before, gave themselves wholly that way, and were deeply plunged and drowned therein. For sleeping on soft beds, wine and delicate fare, wenching and bathing, stews and hot-houses, idleness and taking ease, which by use and custome grew pleasant and delightsome unto them every day more than other; had in such sort weakned their bodies, and made their hearts so effeminate, that from that time forward the reputation and name only of their victories past defended them more than any present strength and vigor they had: insomuch, as expert and skilfull warriors judged their Captain Annibal in more fault, and farther overseen in this action, than in not leading his Army streight forward to Rome, after the battell before Canna. For, that stay might have been O thought to have deferred only the entire and finall victory for a time, but this errour and oversight seemed to disable him for atchieving the victory for ever. So little retained he of his former old discipline that I assure you, he went out of Capua again as if he had led some other Army, and none of his own. For, not only they returned from thence most of them intangled and snared in the love of harlots, but so soon as they came again to lie abroad on the bare earth under tents and pavilions covered with beasts hides, to march long journeys, and to taste of other military toil and labour; their bodies so tired, their hearts so fainted, as if they had been

A raw ſouldiers, new come into the field: in ſuch wiſe, as all the time of their ſummer abode in Camp, many of them without licenſe and paſport, would ſlip out of the way, and depart from their colours: and theſe ſtart-backs had no other place of haunt to lurk in, but Capua. Now when the winter ſeaſon began to be more mild, and draw towards the Spring; Annibal brought forth his ſouldiers out of his winter harbours and returned to Caſilinum: where, albeit the aſſault ceaſed, yet the ſiege had continued ſo ſtreight, that the townſmen and the garriſon within the Fort, were driven to extream neceſſity and want of victuals. Now the Captain over the Roman Camp was T. Sempronius [Gracchus] by reaſon that the Dictator was gone to Rome to take new Auſpices. And as for Marcellus, who was deſirous for his part to relieve and ſuccour the beſieged, was impeached for coming to them partly, by the riſing and ſwelling of the river Vulturnus, & partly,
B by the intreaty of the Citizens of Nola and Acerra, who greatly feared the Campans, in caſe the garriſon was once departed from them. And Gracchus, lying and keeping near unto Caſilinum ſtirred not one foot, by reaſon of the expreſſe commandment of the Dictator, That he ſhould attempt nothing in his abſence: albeit there came daily from Caſilinum into the Camp ſuch news, as would have moved and provoked the moſt patient man that was. For it was conſtantly reported, and for certain known, that ſome of them within the town, no longer able to endure the famine, threw themſelves down headlong; and brake their necks: others ſtood unarmed upon the wals, offring their bare and naked bodies, as a Butt and mark to the ſhot of arrows, and other darts. Gracchus grieved much to hear theſe pitious tidings, yet durſt he not for his life, skirmiſh & fight without the warrant of the Dictator: & he ſaw full well, that if he would convey corn and C victuals unto them openly, fight he muſt, there was no remedy. Having therefore no hope at all to ſend any, but it ſhould be ſpied, he deviſed to fill many tuns and pipes with corn, that he had gotten together out of the country all about: and withall to diſpatch a meſſenger to the chief Magiſtrate of Caſilinum, adviſing him, that he ſhould in the night ſeaſon take up all thoſe veſſels that came down the river. The night next following every man watched at the river ſide according to the hope they conceived by the foreſaid Roman meſſenger, and ſo received thoſe tuns, hulling down the midſt of the ſtream: and the corn was equally divided amongſt them all. Thus did they the morrow after, and the third day alſo. For ever by night theſe veſſels were let down into the water and the ſame night might eaſily come unto them: by reaſon whereof the ſentinels and guard of the enemies were nothing ware of that which was done. But afterwards the current growing more D ſwift and rough, by occaſion of continuall rain that fell, the ſaid tuns were ſome of them driven croſs the channel to the bank ſide, even where the enemies warded: and were eſpied waving and ſticking among the willows and oſiers that grew along cloſe unto the banks: whereof Annibal was advertiſed. And ſo from thenceforward they tended the watch more ſtrieghtly that nothing ſent down the river Vulturnus could eſcape them, and paſs to the City. Afterwards there was powred into the water great ſtore of nuts from the Camp of the Romans; were floated down the Channel unto Caſilinum, and with grated skimmers of wicker were taken up. But at the laſt they within the Town were driven to this poor ſhift and extremity, for to take their thongs and bridle rains, to pluck off their leather from their ſhields, and buckles, and make them ſoft in ſcalding water, and prove how they could eat them. Nay, they ſpared not ſo much as mice, and rats, nor E any other like vermin. Nor there was not a weed nor a root that they could come by, upon the banks and terraces under the wals, but they gathered and digged up. And when the enemies had turned up with a plough all the green-ſord of the counter-ſcarp without the wals, they within caſt turnip-ſeed upon the mould. Whereupon Annibal made a hout at it, and cried aloud: What? ſhall we ſit here about Caſilinum ſo long, untill theſe rapes be come up and grown. And whereas before that time, he would never vouchſafe to hear of any compoſition & agreement, now at laſt he was contented to take reaſon, and be conferred withall about the ranſom of as many as were freemen within the Town. And it was covenanted between him and them that they ſhould pay for their redemption * ſeven ounces of gold apeece. So upon faithfull promiſe made, and ſecurity given they yeelded themſelves: and were kept bound in priſon untill they had made full payment of the * 12 lib. ſter.
F gold aforeſaid. After which, they were ſent back under ſafe conduct to Cumes. For this is more like to be true, then the report which goeth, That there was ſent out after them certain horſemen, who fell upon them and ſlew them in the way. Moſt of them were Preneſtins. And whereas there were of them in all five hundred and ſeventy in garriſon the one half well near, were either by ſword or hunger conſumed: all the reſt together with their Prætor Manitius, (one who afores time had been a Scribe or Notary) returned ſafe to Preneſte. In memorial and teſtimony of this, his ſtatue was erected in the Market place of Preneſte, armed in his cuiraſſe, clad in a long robe, with his head covered: and three other images, with a title or inſcription engraven in a plate of Braſſe, with this tenor: That Manitius had made a vow for the ſouldiers who lay in garriſon with him at Caſilinum. And the ſame title alſo was engraven under three other images, ſet up in G the Temple of Fortuna. The Town of Caſilinum was reſtored again to the Campans, with a ſtrong garriſon of 700 ſouldiers, deducted out of the army of Annibal: for fear leſt when he was departed once from thence, the Romans ſhould aſſail them.

The Senat of Rome by vertue of a decree, granted unto thoſe ſouldiers of Preneſte double wages, with five years vacation and reſt from warfare. And when to gratifie them farther for their valiant ſervice they made offer unto them, of the Burgeſſie and freedom of Rome, they choſe rather to remain ſtill at home, and would not change their own country. But what befell unto the Perſins, rusins is not recorded so plainly: for neither appeareth evidence by any publicke monument and memoriall of their own, nor yet decree extant of the Romans. At the same time the Petellins (who alone of all the Brutii remained in friendship and amity with the Romans) were assaulted not only by the Carthaginians, (that were possessed of a great part of the Countrey about them) but also by the other Brutii with whom they would not joyn in the complot of their rebellion. The Petellins not able of themselves to hold out and endure these dangers, sent their Embassadors to Rome, for to crave their aid and assistance: whose humble prayers and pitious tears (for after an answer received, That they should provide and shift for themselves, they fell into lamentable moans and complaints, and lay prostrate upon the Earth, before the porch of the Councell-House) wrought exceeding compassion and pity in the hearts of the Senators, and also of the people: whereupon the LL. were moved again the second time, by M. Æmylius the Prætor to deliver their opinion. And when they had cast all about, and well weighed and considered, their present state, and what they were able to do; being forced to confess, that it lay not in their power to help their Allies, so far distant and remote from them: they willed them to repair home again; & since they had performed their fidelity to the full, according to covenant, they gave them leave in this calamity of theirs to take that course that they thought best for themselves. When they were returned with this answer unto the Petellins, their Senat all on a sudden was strucken into such sorrows, dumps and fearfull maze, that some of them were of mind, and gave advice to abandon the City, and fly every man whersoever he could: others were of opinion and perswaded, that seeing they were forsaken of their old friends, they should joyn with the other Brutii, and by their means, turn to Annibal, and come under his protection. Howbeit a third side prevailed, who would in no wise that any thing should be done over hastily and rashly: but that they might meet again, and sit in councell about the matter. And so it was put off, and respite given unto the next day. Then after more mature diliberation, and their former fear somewhat aswaged, the principall personages there assembled grew to this resolution, namely, To convey all things out of the Teritory about them into the City, and to fortifie both it and the wals.

Near about one and the same time, there came Posts with Packets of Letters to Rome, from out of Sicily and Sardinia. Those out of Sicily from Otacilius the Vice-prætor, were read first in the Senat-House, importing these news: That L. Furius the Prætor was come out of Affrick, and with his fleet arrived at Lilybæum: himself sore hurt, and lying at point of death: that neither the souldiers, nor sailers and marriners had their money or corn duly paid at the day; neither indeed was there any to be had, for to keep touch and make paiment: moving and advising them earnestly, to send supply thereof with all convenient speed: and if they thought so good, one also of the new chosen Prætors to succeed after him. To the same effect in manner wrote Cornel. Mammula the Pro-Prætor, out of Sardinia, as touching that point of money and corn. Answer was returned to the one and the other, that they had it not, and therefore they were to look themselves both to their Armadoes and Armies, and to provide for them. Otacilius, who addressed Embassadors unto K. Hiero (the only refuge and stay of succour that the people of Rome had received for souldiers pay, as much silver as was needfull, and corn to serve six months. The confederat Cities likewise in Sardinia contributed liberally unto Cornelius, and served his turn. At Rome also for want of silver, there were (by a law published by Minutius, Tribune of the Commons) created three Bankers, called Triumviri Mensarii, to wit, L. Æmylius, who had been Consul and Censor: M. Attilius Regulus, twice Consul aforetime; and L. Scribonius Libeo, a Tribun of the Commons for the time being. Two Duumvirs also were chosen, M. and C. Attilii, who dedicated the Temple of Concord which L. Manlius Prætor had vowed before. Three high Priests also were consecrated, Q. Cecilius Metellus, Q. Fabius Max. and Q. Fulvius Flaccus, all to supply the rooms of P. Scantinius late deceased: of L. Æmylius Paulus the Consul, and Q. Ælius Pætus, slain both in the journey of Cannæ.

Now when as the LL. of the Senat had fulfilled other wants, and made up all decaies and breaches, which fortune by continuall calamities and losses had wrought and brought upon them, so far forth, as by any wisdom and policy of man, they could provide for: at length they had respect and regard unto themselves also, even to the desolate estate of the Councel-House and the unfrequented number of Senators assembling to the publicke Councell of the City. For since that L. Æmylius and C. Flaminius were Censors, there had been chosen no new Senators, notwithstanding that in five years space, what with unfortunat battels, and what with other particular chances, so many of them had miscarried. And when M. Æmylius the Prætor, in the absence of the Dictator (who after the loss of Casilinum was now gone again to the host) had at the request of them all propounded this matter: then Sp. Carvilius, after he had in a long oration complained, not only of the penury, but also of the small choice of those Citizens, who were capable of Senators dignity, spake unto the point, and said, "That he held it a matter of good importance both for the "full repairing and restoring of the decayed body of the Senat, as also for to bind the Latine Na-"tion in a more fast bond of amity, that two Senators out of every State of the Latines (if the LL. "of the Senat of Rome would agree unto it) should be infranchised Citizens of Rome, and taken "into the Senat in place of those that were deceased. This opinion of his the LL. of the Senat could abide to hear with no better ear then in times past they accepted the motion and demand of the Latines themselves in that behalf. And there being throughout the whole House a great muttering

A muttering, for very indignation and diſdain of thoſe his words, Manlius above the reſt brake out into this ſpeech, and ſaid; "That they were not all dead, but one man yet was left alive of that "houſe and line, out of which a Conſul (when time was) threatned in the Capitol, that he would "kill with his own hand, that Latine whomſoever he ſaw ſitting in the Councel-Houſe of Rome. With that, Q. Fabius: "Never was there a thing, quoth he, propounded and mentioned in the "Senat-houſe, in a worſe and more unſeaſonable time, than at this preſent, when as the hearts and "affections of our Allies being ſo wavering, their faith and alleageance ſo doubtful, the very break-"ing and broaching of ſuch a matter as this, were enough to ſet them farther out. And therefore "this inconſiderat ſpeech of one fooliſh vain perſon, is to be ſuppreſſed and buried preſently with B "the ſilence of all men, and never once to be ſpoken of again. And if ever there were uttered at "Councel Table, any ſecret and myſtery, which were to be concealed, this of all other ought moſt "to be kept cloſe, hidden and ſmothered in oblivion, and reputed as never ſpoken at all. So this "matter was daſht, and dyed there in the very birth. Then they proceeded and agreed, to creat Dictator for the chooſing of Senators, one that had been Cenſor aforetime, and of all thoſe who had been Cenſors, and were then living, the moſt ancient: and thereto they gave order, that C. Terentius Varro the Conſul ſhould be ſent for, to the nomination of that Dictator. Who being returned out of Apulia, leaving the camp there with a good guard, and taking long journeys, until he was come to Rome: the night next following (as the manner was) created by authority of an act of Senat, M. Fabius Buteo, Dict. for ſix moneths, without a General of Horſe. When he was C mounted up with his Serjeants to the Roſtra, [which is the place of publike audience] for to make a ſpeech unto the people, he ſaid: "That he neither allowed of two Dictators at one time, "(a precedent never ſeen and known afore) nor yet could take himſelf for a Dictator, ſo long as "he was without his General of Cavalry. I miſlike alſo (quoth he) that the entire authority and "power of Cenſors, ſhould be put into the hands of one and the ſelf-ſame man, twice: and that a "Dictator ſhould have the rule and government for ſix moneths, unleſs he were created for the "managing of wars. And therefore (ſaid he) I will my ſelf limit and gage thoſe things, which "fortune, occaſion of the times, and neceſſity have made exceſſive and beyond all meaſure pow-"erful. Neither am I minded to depoſe or diſplace any of thoſe from his Senators dignity, whom "C. Flaminius, and L. Æmylius late Cenſors, have admitted into the Senat: but only, that a D "tranſcript and reheatſal be made of their names, for that I would not have it lie in the power of "one man alone, to cenſure and give judgement of the fame and behavior of a Senator: but this "courſe will I take in ſubſtituting new Senators in the room of the dead, that it may appear, and "be ſaid; That this Order and degree is preferred before that, and not one perſon before another. So after that the names of the old Senators were copied out and read, then he choſe firſt into the place of them that were deceaſed, thoſe who after the time of L. Æmylius and C. Flaminius Cenſors, had born any Magiſtracy of State, and of the chair, and yet were not elected Senators. And according as they had exerciſed their office one before another in order of time, ſo were they choſen firſt Senators in their courſe. This done, he made a ſecond election, of thoſe who had been Ædiles, Tribuns, Pretors, or Queſtors: and laſt of all, ſuch as could ſhew the ſpoils taken from the E enemies of Rome hanging in their houſes: or had been honoured and rewarded with a Civick garland. Thus after he had with right great approbation and contentment of all men, taken into the Senat 177. forthwith he reſigned up his office, deſcended from the pulpit a private man again, diſcharged and put from him the Serjeants, and came and ſtood beneath among the other multitude that attended their own private buſineſs: trifling out the time for the nonce and of purpoſe, becauſe he would not have the people to leave the common place for to wait upon him. Howbeit, for all that lingering and ſtay which he made, the peoples affection cooled never the more, and ſo with a goodly train of men he was accompanied, and conducted home to his houſe.

The next night following, the Conſul returned toward the army, without making the Senate F privy and acquainted with his departure, for fear he ſhould have been detained ſtill in the City for the ſolemn election of new Magiſtrats. The morrow after the Senate decreed, upon a motion propounded by M. Pomponius the Pretor, to write unto the Dictator, that if he thought it were for the good of the common-weal, he would together with his General of the Cavalry, and M. Marcellus the Pretor, repair to Rome to ſubrogate and chooſe new Conſuls, to the end that when they were all together in place, the LL. of the Senate might by them take knowledge in what ſtate the Common-wealth ſtood, and conſult how to provide for every thing. They all came that were ſent for accordingly, leaving behind them their Lieutenants for the government and conduct of the Legions. The Dictator ſpake of himſelf but little, and with much modeſty, aſcribing the greateſt part of the honor unto T. Sempronius Gracchus, and then ſummoned the general aſſembly G for the Election: in which were choſen Coſſ. L. Poſthumius the third time (who then was abſent, and as L. Deputy ruled the Province of Gallia) and T. Sempronius Gracchus, who at that time commanded the Cavalry, and repaired to Rome with ſpeed. Then were elected Pretors M. Valerius Levinus, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and Q. Mutius Scævola. The Dictator after the chooſing of theſe Magiſtrats, returned to Theanum, where the army wintred: leaving the General of the Horſe behind at Rome, to the end that he being to enter into his government, within few dayes after, might conſult with the LL. of the Senat as touching the levy and enrolling new armies againſt the year enſuing.

Whiles they were in their buſieſt and deepeſt conferences about theſe matters, news came of a freſh overthrow: ſuch was the fortune of that year to heap one calamity in the neck of another: to wit, that L. Poſthumius the Conſul elect, was himſelf ſlain, and the army together with him in Gallia, utterly defeated and deſtroyed. The manner of which misfortune was this. There was in thoſe parts a wide and huge forreſt (which the Gauls call Litana) through which Poſthumius was to lead his army. The trees there growing on either hand of the paſe, the Gauls had ſo cut, that they might ſtand upright of themſelves ſo long as they were not ſtirred, ſo, being forced never ſo little, they muſt needs fall down. Now had Poſthumius the conduct of two Roman legions; and of aſſociats beſides, from the high coaſts of the upper Sea, he had enrolled ſo many ſouldiers, as that he came into the enemies countrey 25000 ſtrong. The Gauls who had beſtowed themſelves in ambuſh round about the skirts of the wood, ſo ſoon as the army was all engaged within the ſtreights of the paſe, ſhoved from them the trees (ſo guilded) which ſtood next unto them, and they fell one upon another (ſtanding as they did, ſo tickliſh of themſelves, and ready to totter and come down on both ſides of the way) and in the fall overthrew withal and covered over and over both horſe and man, with their armour and munition, ſo as ſcarce ten of them eſcaped alive. For as moſt of them were felled and ſtrucken ſtark dead, either with the bodies of the trees, or the broken arms and boughs; ſo the reſt of the multitude, affrighted with this unexpected and unhappy accident, were killed by the Gauls that beſet all the ſtreights and paſſages of the wood: and of that great number, they took few priſoners, who making towards a bridge ſtanding over the River, were intercepted by the way, and ſtopped by the enemies that kept the advenue of the bridge: in which place Poſthumius was ſlain, for he ſtrived all that ever he could, not to be taken alive. The ſpoils of this General Captain, together with the head cut off from the reſt of his body, the Boians with great joy and ſolemnity brought into the Temple that amongſt them was reputed moſt holy and ſacred. And after they had cleanſed the head, as their manner is, they enchaced and garniſhed the skull with gold, and that ſerved as well for an holy veſſel to ſacrifice and Divine withal, upon high and feſtival dayes, as alſo for an ordinary drinking mazar for the high Prieſt, and other Prelats of that Temple. The booty alſo which the Gauls gained of their enemies, was of no leſs importance than the victory: for although a great part of the beaſts and living creatures was cruſhed and ſqueaſed to death with the fall of the wood, yet all other things, by reaſon that nothing was ſcattered and loſt by flight, were found wholly on the ground, as the ſouldiers lay along in that order as they marched.

Theſe woful tidings being reported, the City was for many dayes in ſuch fear and perplexity, that all ſhop windows were ſhut up, and no ſtirring at all in the ſtreets throughout, from one end to the other, as if it had been night continually. Then the Senat gave the Ædiles in charge to walk all about, and command the ſhops to be ſet open, and to make no more ſhew in the City of publick ſorrow and heavineſs. Then T. Sempronius aſſembled a Senate, ſpake comfortably to the LL. of the Councel, and exhorted them, that "as they were not diſmayed with the overthrow "and diſcomfiture at Cannæ, ſo they would not be caſt down and daunted with lighter and ſmal- "ler loſſes and calamities. For if it might pleaſe the Gods to bleſſe them, and give them good "ſpeed (as they hoped no leſs) againſt the Carthaginian enemies and Annibal, the war with the "Gauls might without danger and inconvenience either be laid aſide clean, or put off and defer- "red. As for the revenge of this deceitful practiſe, it ſhould reſt ſtill in the power either of the "immortal Gods, or of the people of Rome, to be performed one time or other. But for the preſent, they were to conſult and reſolve concerning Annibal their grand enemy, and to grow to ſome point and concluſion of ſuch forces as were meet for that war. And firſt himſelf diſcourſed and laid down what companies of foot and Horſe, what number of citizens, and how many confederats were in the army of the Dictator. After him, Marcellus ſhewed and recounted the proportion of his own power and their ſtrength. Alſo, what forces, and of what quality, were with C. Terentius the Conſul in Apulia, they were required to declare, who might ſpeak upon their knowledge. Then they proceeded to caſt and examine, whether two Conſular armies well appointed and furniſhed, were ſufficient to go through ſo great a war. Thus for that year they let France alone, albeit they had good cauſe to be angry, and were provoked that way to follow revenge. The Dictator his army, was appointed unto the Conſul. As for the forces under the leading of Marcellus, conſiſting of them that fled out of the field at Cannæ, thoſe they ordained to be ſent over into Sicily, there to remain in ſervice ſo long as the war continued in Italy: and that thither alſo ſhould be poſted over out of the Dictator his Legions, all thoſe ſouldiers who were able to do leaſt ſervice, there to abide in ſouldiery, without any other limitation of time than that, which the * Laws in that caſe provide for. For the other Conſul, who ſhould be ſubſtituted in ſtead of L. Poſthumius, there were aſſigned two Legions of Roman Citizens: and order was given, ſo ſoon as the Auſpices would permit, he ſhould be elected with ſpeed. Likewiſe it was agreed upon and ordained, to ſend for two legions beſides out of Sicily: out of which, the Coſſ. unto whom thoſe Legions aforeſaid of the City were allotted, ſhould take what ſouldiers he thought needful. Finally, C. Terentius the Conſul, had his commiſſion of command continued for another year, without empairing one jot of the army, which he had in his conduct for the guard and defence of Apulia.

* i. The term of ten years.

Amids theſe affairs and preparations in Italy, the war went forward nevertheleſſe in Spain, and ever to that day proſpered on the Romans ſide. P. and Cn. Scipios divided their forces ſo, as

A as Cn. should serve by Land, and Publius at Sea with the navy. Asdrubal the chief Colonel and Commander there of the Carthaginians, distrusting his own strength both by Sea and Land, kept himself aloof, and far from the enemy, in sure places of safety; Unto whom, after long suit and instant prayers, were sent 4000 foot, and 500 horse out of Affrick for supply. Having thus at length, with new helps gathered fresh hope, he encamped neerer to his enemy, and gave order and direction withal, that the Armado should be rigged and decked for the defence of the Islands, and the Sea-coasts. And whiles he was thus beginning hotly to make war again, he was suddainly distempered and disquieted with the revolt of the Admirals and great Captains of the navy: who for their fearful abandoning of the fleet upon Iberus, having been sharply checked and rebu-
B ked, were never after trusty and sure, either to the Colonel himself, or to the State of Carthage. These fugitive renegats had first practised to raise troubles and insurrections in the Land of the Carpesii, and by their soliciting and instigation, certain Cities were procured to rebel, and one of them they had forced by assault. Whereupon, Asdrubal turned his forces from the Romans, and bent them wholly against that Nation: and with a cruel army entring the frontiers of the enemies, determined to give the charge upon Galbus, a Nobleman and renowned chieftain of the Carpesians, even before the City, that some few dayes before was left where the said Galbus with a puissant power kept himself strongly encamped. Having therefore sent out before, certain vancurriers lightly armed, to train forth and draw the enemies to skirmish, he made out withal cer-
C tain Companies of his Infantry sundry wayes to over-run and spoil the country, and likewise to catch up and meet with all straglers, dispersed in the fields. Whereupon, at one time there was a skirmish before the camp: and likewise in the fields, they were either slain or put to flight. But afterwards, having by divers wayes from all parts recovered again the camp, suddainly they shaked off all fear, plucked up their hearts, and thought themselves good enough, not only to defend their fort and hold, but also to bid the enemy battail. They sallied out therefore of the camp in good array, shouting, dancing and hopping after their manner: so as this unexpected boldness and courage of theirs, terrified the enemies, who a little before had challenged them to fight. Whereupon Asdrubal himself withdrew and retired his power for more security to an hill of good D height, and situat for his advantage, with a River likewise between him and his enemies. The light armed vancurriers also, and the forlorn hope, together with the Horsemen that rode scattering abroad, he caused thither to repair for their better safety. And because he trusted neither hill nor river, he fortified himself with a trench and rampier besides. In this alternat and interchangeable fear on both sides, there passed some bickerments; and blows were dealt between. In which, neither the Numidian Horsemen were able to match the Spaniards in that kind, nor the Moores archers could make their part good with the light Carpesians targetiers, who in nimbleness and swiftness were as good as they; and for courage and bodily strength, far better. These Carpesians seeing they neither could provoke Asdrubal to a battail, with all their braving hard under his camp, nor yet easily by assault win it, they took by force the City Asena, into which Asdrubal when he first invaded the Frontiers of his enemies had conveighed store of corn and other E victuals: yea, and became LL. of all the country thereabout. And they grew so lusty and audacious, that neither in their march and array nor within their camp they would be ruled and ordered by any mans command. This secure and careless negligence of theirs, when Asdrubal perceived to arise (as usually it doth) upon good success and prosperity; after an exhortation made to his souldiers, to charge upon the enemies, roving abroad without their colours, he descended from the hill, and marched in battail array against the camp. So soon as the Spaniards were advertised by those who came in great hast, and fled from the Sentinels and corps de guard, that he was coming, and neer at hand, with a great outcry they gave the alarm. And as every man could get F weapon in hand they ran upon the head to battail, without direction and commandment of Captain, without signal, ensign, and order confusedly. When the formost in the vanguard were joyned in conflict and come to hand-fight, some of their fellows were seen running on heaps and by troups, and others were not well come forth of the camp: At the first the enemy was terrified with their bold adventure. Afterwards as they encountred, thin and loosely raied, with the enemies thick and closely ranged together, seeing themselves too weak, and not sufficient, so few in number to defend themselves, they looked back one upon another for succour: and being on every side put back, and forced to retreat and lose ground, they cast themselves into a ring, and thus thrust (as they were) close together, body to body, and armour to armour they were so pent and pestered in so narrow a ground, that they had scarce room enough to wield their weapons: so they were compassed and environed round with the enemy, and for a good part of the day
G hewen in peeces and massacred. Some few of them that brake through by dint of sword, escaped to the woods and mountains. With like fear the camp was abandoned: and the day following, the whole nation yeelded, and came under the subjection of the Carthaginians.

Long they continued not quiet. For within a while news came from Carthage, that Asdrubal should make what speed he could with his army into Italy. Which rumour being blown abroad through Spain, turned in manner all their hearts away unto the Romans. Whereupon Asdrubal addressed his Letters immediately to Carthage, shewing what hurt the fame of his departure had done already: and in case he should set forward on his journey, and go out of those parts, all Spain would turn to the Romans, before he were passed the river Iberus. For over and besides, that he had not strength enough to leave behind for a garrison, nor a sufficient commander in stead of himself, the Generals of the Roman armies, who had set foot in Spain, were so strong, as he might hardly make head against them with equal puissance. And therefore, if they had any regard of Spain, he advised them to send one to succeed him with a strong power: for he should have his hands full, and enough to do in the Province, fail out things as fortunately as they could. These letters, albeit at the first sight they greatly troubled the Senat, yet because the Italian affairs seemed of more moment and greater importance, they wrought no alteration in their intended course, either for Asdrubal himself, or his forces. Howbeit Himilco was sent with a complete and competent army, and a greater Armado, both for the holding of Spain in their allegeance, and also for their defence by Sea and Land. Who having passed over with all his power as well for Land-service as the Sea, fortified his camp, drawn his ships ashore, laid them up in drie Land, and empaled them strongly all about; himself in person with his elect and most choice men of arms, made what hast possibly he could, through nations partly enemies, partly doubtful and untrusty, and staied not either in one place or other (but evermore standing upon his guard) until he was come to Asdrubal. After he had declared unto him the order decreed by the Senat, and what he had in commission, and taken himself direction likewise from him, in what manner the war in Spain was to be managed, he returned back again to his own camp. In which voyage to and fro he travailed safely by no one thing more than by speedy expedition. For he was ever gone from a place, before the people could agree together and make head against him. Now Asdrubal before that he dislodged and set his army on foot out of those parts, levied sums of money of all the Cities and states under his jurisdiction: for well he knew, that Amilcal had paid sweetly before him for his passage through certain countries: and as well he wist besides, that the Gauls he was fain to wage: for amongst them no money no men. And if he undertook and entred upon that great expedition, poor and bare of treasure, he had never reached so far as the Alps. Thus having in great hast raised and collected his monies he came down to the river Iberus.

When the Romans heard of the proceedings and designments of the Carthaginians and likewise of the journey of Asdrubal: both the Generals (laying all other matters apart) prepared to joyn their whole forces together, to oppose themselves, and to withstand such intended attempts: supposing and considering, that if Amilcal (who by himself alone was an enemy to Italy hardly supportable) were once seconded by Colonel Asdrubal and the Spanish army, the Empire of Rome would soon be at an end. Upon these careful cogitations being grieved and perplexed they after-hied all their power over to Iberus; and after they had passed over the river, and long consulted whether they should encamp themselves and abide the coming of the enemies to fight them battail: or by invading and assailing the associats and subjects of the Carthaginians, to stay the enemy and hinder his intended journy: they resolved at length and made preparation to assault Iberia (so named of the river near by) the richest and most wealthy City at that time, of all others in those parts. Whereof when Asdrubal was advertised, he for to help his friends, advanced himself likewise to set upon another City lately yeelded to the Romans, and reduced under their subjection. And so the Romans after they had begun to lay siege to Ibera, gave over that enterprise, and made head against Asdrubal himself. And for some few dayes they lay incamped five miles asunder one from the other, not without some light skirmishes: but never came to pitch a set fair field. At length upon one and the same day (as if they had been so agreed afore) they happened on both sides to set out the signal of battail, and to come forth with all their power into the plain ground. The Romans stood arranged in three battailons: one part of the Infantry was placed before the standards in the vanguard, another Regiment bestowed behind in the rereguard: the men of arms flanked the sides like wings. On the other part, Asdrubal strengthned his main battel with Spaniards: in the right point he marshalled the Carthaginians, in the left the Africans. As for the auxiliar and mercenary Horsemen, whom he waged and hired; such as were Numidians, he ordained afront the Carthaginians footmen to guard them: the rest that were Africans, he distributed and disposed about the skirts and edges of the battailons. Neither were all the Numidians placed in the right flank, but such as after the guise and manner of Vaulters, led two Horses apeece: and used often times in the mids of the hottest conflict, to leap armed as they were from their wearied horse to another fresh one. So nimble are they themselves, and so tractable and well taught to their hands are their Horses. Thus stood they arranged on both sides in order of battail. The Captains of either part for hopes in manner nothing unequal: for neither in number or quality of souldiers, was there any great oddes between them: Mary, for courage and heart there was great difference and inequality in the souldiers themselves. For the Romans (notwithstanding they fought far from home) were so perswaded by their leaders, that they fought for Italy and the City of Rome: and therefore as if the whole hope of their safe return into their country were to be tried and decided in this one battail, they resolved either to win the day or to dye for it. On the other side, the souldiers were not so resolute, for most of them being Spaniards, would have chosen rather to be conquered and overcome in Spain, than with conquest and victory to be drawn into Italy. And therefore at the first shock, when scarcely the darts and javelins were launced and let flye, their main battail retreated: and so soon as the Romans with great violence redoubled the charge, they turned their backs and fled. Howbeit in both flanks the fight was hot enough. The Carthaginians of the one side, the Africans on the other, charged the Romans very hard, and fought sore against them, as if they had them invironed round about within their battailons. But when as the whole power of the Romans were once rallied and gathe-

A red together in the mids, they were ſtrong enough to remove and ſet back the wings of the enemies. So they maintained fight in two divers places at once. But both in the one and the other, the Romans (after they had diſcomfited the main battail in the mids) were no doubt, much better, as well in number, and alſo in ſtrength and vigour of men. Many a tall fellow was there ſlain. And had not the Spaniards at the firſt when the battail was ſcarce begun, fled amain by heaps, very few of the whole battail had eſcaped and remained alive. The Horſemen fought little or not at all. For the Moors and Numidians, ſo ſoon as they eſpied the battail to ſhrink and loſe ground, preſently all on a ſuddain fled as faſt as they could, and left the ſides and flanks of the ſaid battail naked, driving afore them the Elephants withal. And even Aſdrubal himſelf, who maintained the skirB miſh to the very laſt, eſcaped with ſome few out of the thickeſt maſſacre and execution. The Romans took their camp and rifled it. This battail was of ſuch import and conſequence, that it cauſed all the Spaniards, who were before but wavering, to turn wholly to the Romans: and left Aſdrubal no hope at all, to paſs with his forces into Italy, nor ſo much as to make abode with ſafety in Spain. The news hereof being bruited abroad and ſent to Rome, by the letters of the two Scipio's, great joy there was, not ſo much for the victory, as becauſe Aſdrubal was tied by the foot, and ſtaied for coming into Italy.

Amids theſe exploits in Spain, * Petelia (a City of the Brutii, having endured the ſiege and many aſſault for certain moneths) was finally won by Himilco, one of Annibal Captains. But that victory coſt the Carthaginians much blood, and many a ſore wound. No force nor violence overC came the beſieged Petelians more, than very famine. For having conſumed and eaten up all food of corn, all fleſh of four footed beaſts whatſoever: they were driven at length to feed and live upon ſhoomakers lether, weeds, and roots, tender barks of trees, and the crops of briers and brambles: and they gave not over ſo long as they were able to ſtand on their legs upon the walls, and bear their armour. * Belicastro.

Annibal after the winning of Petelia conducted his army againſt * Conſentia, which being not ſo valiantly defended, was within few dayes ſurrendred up into his hands. Neer about the ſame time, a power of the Brutians alſo, laid ſiege unto Croton, a City built and inhabited by the Greeks, and in times paſt, mighty in men and munition: but now at this time ſo diſtreſſed with manifold and grievous calamities, that of all ages one with another, they were not able to make twenty D thouſand men. And therefore no marvail, if the enemies were ſoon maſters of the City, being ſo deſtitute as it was of Citizens to defend it. Only the Caſtle they kept ſtill, into which there were ſome that eſcaped in that tumult when the City was taken, out of the mids of the maſſacre. The Locrians likewiſe revolted unto the Bruti and the Carthaginians, by reaſon that the common multitude were fraudulently betrayed by the chief and principal Citizens. The Rhegines only of all that country, continued both true unto the Romans, and alſo at their own liberty to the very laſt. The ſame diſpoſition to revolt, was to be ſeen even in Sicily, in ſo much as the very houſe of Hiero was not cleer and free in all parts from rebellion. For Gelo his eldeſt ſon, having in contempt both the olde age of his father, and alſo (after the overthrow at Cannæ,) the ſociety and friendſhip of the Romans, turned unto the Carthaginians. And he had, no doubt, made a general alteration E in Sicily, but that his death came between and cut him off; which hapned ſo jump, even when he was arming the multitude, and ſolliciting his friends to rebellion, that his very father himſelf was drawn into deep ſuſpition that he took his life away. Theſe were the occurrents that fell out that year with variable event, in Italy, Affrick, Sicily, and Spain. * Cosenza.

In the end of the ſame year, Q. Fabius Maximus moved the Senat, and made requeſt, that the Temple of Venus Erycina, which he had vowed being Dictator, might now be dedicated. And the Senat made a decree. That Titus Sempronius, Conſul elect, ſhould ſo ſoon as he was entred into his office, propoſe unto the people, that they would creat two Duumvirs for the dedication of Temples. And in honour of Æmylius Lepidus, who had been Conſul twice, and Augur, his three ſons, Lucius, Marcus, and Quintus, exhibited certain funeral games for three F dayes ſpace; and a ſhew in the Common place likewiſe for three dayes together, of two and twenty pair of ſword-ſenſers, to fight at ſharp to the death. The Curule Ædiles, C. Lectorius, and T. Sempronius Gracchus, now Conſul elect, who in his Ædileſhip had been General of the Horſemen, ſet out the Roman games, which were renewed and continued ſtill for three dayes. Likewiſe, the Playes of the Commons, were thrice exhibited by M. Aurelius Cotta, and M. Claudius Marcellus. Now after three years expired of the Punick war, T. Sempronius the Conſul, began his government upon the * Ides of March. As for the Prætors, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, who had afore-time been Conſul and Cenſor, obteined by lot the juriſdiction of the Citi- * 15 of March.
zens: and M. Valerius Corvinus, of the ſtrangers and aliens. To Appius Claudius Pulcher was G alotted the government of Sicily: and to Q. Mutius Scævola of Sardinia. M. Marcellus was by the people allowed to have the authority of a Vice-Conſul, in regard that he above all the Roman Captains, after the defeat of Cannæ, mannaged his affairs and warred proſperouſly in Italy.

Now the very firſt day that the Senat was aſſembled in the Capitol, they decreed upon the firſt motion, that within the compaſſe of that year, there ſhould be levied a double tax or tribute: and that one ſingle tribute ſhould be forthwith gathered, for preſent pay to all the ſouldiers, ſaving thoſe that ſerved at Cannæ. Then concerning the armies this order was ſet down: Imprimis, that T. Sempronius the Conſul, ſhould appoint the two legions of Citizens a certain day to meet at Cales. Item, that six legions should be conducted to the camp of Claudius above Suessula. Item, that the legions which there were (and those consisted for the most part of the re- H sidue of the Cannian army) Ap. Claudius Pulcher the Pretor, should put over Sea into Sicily: and as for those that were in Sicily, they should be transported to Rome. Item, unto that army which was appointed to meet by a day, at Cales, M. Claudius Marcellus was sent: and he was commanded to conduct the legions of the Citizens to the camp of Claudius. Last of all, to receive the charge of the old army, and to lead it into Sicily, T. Metilius Croto Lieutenant, was sent by Ap. Claudius. Men looked at first, and yet they said nothing, that the Consul should call an assembly for the creating of a Colleague unto him. But after that they saw that M. Marcellus was sent out of the way (as it were of purpose) whom above all others they were desirous to be the Consul for I that year, in regard of his notable good service whiles he was Pretor, there arose much muttering in the Senat house. Which the Consul perceiving: "My LL. quoth he, it was for the good of "the Common-wealth, that both M. Claudius should go into Campain to exchange the armies: "and also that the Election of Consuls, should not be proclaimed, until that he were returned again "from thence, with dispatch of that business which he had in charge: that ye might have a Con- "sul, such a one as the present condition of the State required, and your selves most desired. So there was no more speech of the election, until Marcellus was come back again. In this mean time were two Duumvirs created, Q. Fabius Maximus for the dedication of one Chappel to Venus Erycina, and T. Octacilius Crassus, of another to the Goddess Mens. Both stand upon the Capitol hill, divided asunder no more than with one only conduct of water passing between. And K as concerning the three hundred Campain Horsemen, who had served out their full time of warfare faithfully, and were come to Rome, a motion was propounded to the people, that they should be enfranchised Citizens of Rome: and in like manner, that they should be reputed as free Denizens of Cumes, from the day afore that the Capuans revolted from the people of Rome and rebelled. The chiefest cause of proposing this act, was this, because themselves denied flatly that they knew, to whom they did appertain, seeing they had abandoned their old native countrey: and as yet were not enrolled and incorporat into that state, unto which they had retired. After that Marcellus was come again from the army, the solemn day of election of a Consul in place of L. Posthumius, was published. And with exceeding great consent of all men, Marcellus was cho- L sen: and forthwith he was to begin his Magistracy. At whose first entrance, it hapned to thunder: and the Augurs being called to give their opinion of it, pronounced, that they thought he was not rightfully created. And the Senators gave it out commonly and bruited abroad, that the Gods were not well pleased therewith, because (forsooth) two Cossi. were elected of the commonalty (a thing never seen before.) Whereupon Marcellus resigned up his place, and in his room was substituted Fabius Max. the third time.

That year the Sea burned. At Sinuessa a cow brought forth a horse sole. And at Lanuvium in the Temple of Iuno Hospita, certain statues or images dropped with bloud: and about that Temple it rained stones. For which showr, there was solemnised, according to the customable manner, a Novendial sacrifice. The other prodigious signs likewise were expiat with great care and heedful regard. The Consuls then, parted their armies between them. Fabius took charge of those M forces which had been commanded by M. Junius the Dictator. Sempronius had the conduct of all the voluntary souldiers, and besides of 25000 of Auxiliaries sent from the confederats. M. Valerius the Pretor had the legions appointed for him, that were returned out of Sicily. M. Claudius the Vice-consul, was sent unto that army, which lay in garison at Nola, above Suessula. And the Pretors took their journey into Sicily and Sardinia. The Consuls, whensoever they would assemble the Senat, proclaimed that the Senators, and all others that had lawful authority to speak their mind and deliver their opinion in the Councel-House, should meet at the gate Capena. The Pretors, those that were Judges in the Court, and to whom the civil jurisdiction appertained, erected their Tribunal seats and places of Assizes at the publick Fish-pool, and thither they commanded all writs to be returned, and apparence there to be made. And for that year all pleas and N judgements of causes passed there.

In this mean time news came to Carthage (from whence Mago the brother of Annibal was minded to transport and set over into Italy 12000 footmen, and 1500 horsemen, 20 Elephants, and 1000 talents of silver, together with a guard and supply of 60 gallies) That in Spain things went untowardly: and that all the Cities of Spain (in a manner) were revolted unto the Romans. Some there were of opinion, to withdraw Mago with that fleet and power of his, from the enterprise of Italy into Spain. Considering there was good hope shewed of a suddain, recover again Sardinia, for that there was but a small power of Romans there; and Cornelius the old Lord Deputy, well acquainted with the State of the Province, was now upon his departure from thence, and a new expected in his turn. Over and besides, that the Sardinians were weary already of the Ro- O mans government, which they had so long endured, as who the year that past was, had tyrannised over them cruelly, and exercised their authority with oppression, covetously imposing upon them hard exactions and tributs, and levying of them a most unjust taxation and contribution of corn: and finally they wanted nothing but an head, upon whom they might relie themselves. To this effect there was an Embassage sent secretly from the Lords and Princes of the Island. And the principal actor and procurer hereof, was Hersicora, a man in those dayes of greatest authority and power among them. Upon these tidings aforesaid, hapning so just at one time, they were both dis-

A disquieted and also refreshed. So they sent Mago with his fleet, and other forces into Spain: and they chose for the expedition into Sardinia, Asdrubal surnamed Calvus, for the L. General, furnished and appointed with as great a power almost, as Mago had.

At Rome likewise, the Consuls having dispatched the affairs of the City, addressed themselves to the war. T. Sempronius appointed Sinnessa to be the Rendez-vous, where the souldiers should meet at a certain day. And Q. Fabius, by an order and direction from the Senat, made an Edict, That all men should before the first day of July next ensuing, gather all their corn out of the countries, and convey the same into the principal walled strong Towns: proclaiming that whosoever did not accordingly, their fields he would lay wast; sell their servants in port sale at the spear, and B set their farms and villages a fire. Not so much as the Pretors themselves (created for civil jurisdiction and to decide law matters) were freed and exempted from the conduct of war. As for Valerius the Pretor, he was appointed to go into Apulia, for to receive the army of Terentius: and when the legions were returned out of Sicily, to imploy them especially for the guard and defence of that country; and that the army of Terentius should be sent with some one of the Lieutenants. And M. Valerius had 25 sail allowed him, to keep and defend all the Sea coasts between * Brundusium and * Tarentum. The like number of ships was assigned to Q. Fulvius the City Pretor, for to guard the River side, neer adjoyning to the City of Rome. C. Terentius the Proconsul had in charge to take up by commission souldiers in the Picene country, and to guard those quarters. And T. Ostacilius Crassus, after that he had dedicated the Temple of Mens in the Capitol, C was sent into Sicily, as Lord Admiral of the Armado there.

Upon this war between two of the mightiest Cities, and most puissant states of the World, there was not a King and Prince, no, nor a Nation under Heaven, but was amused. Among whom Philip King of the Macedonians, had an eye thereto, and was more intentive, in that he was neerer unto Italy, and only divided from thence by the Jonian Sea. He at the first, when the bruit came to his ears, That Annibal was passed beyond the Alps: as he joyed much, that there was war kindled between the Romans and the Carthaginians, so, as long as it was uncertain, whether nation was the stronger, he wavered in mind and was in suspence, whether of the twain he should wish to have the victory. But after that he heard once, that in three several battails one after another, Annibal and the Carthaginians had gotten the better hand, he enclined to the fortunat side, and D sent Embassadors unto Annibal: who sailing off, and desirous to avoid the Havens of Brundusium and Tarentum, which were guarded and kept by the Romans fleet, arrived and landed at the Temple of Juno Lacinia: and so through Apulia, travailing toward Capua, chanced to light upon the mids of the Romans corps de guard, and were brought before M. Valerius Levinus the Lord Deputy, being then encamped before Nuceria. Where Xenophanes, the principal of the Embassadors, bashed not to say, That he was sent from King Philip, to treat and conclude a league and amity with the people of Rome, and had commission and direction to the Consuls, to the Senat likewise and people of Rome, to that effect. Valerius taking great contentment to hear of this new society and friendship with so noble a King, especially upon the rebellion of so many old allies, courteously intreated and friendly entertained this false hearted enemy, in stead of a trusty friend: and E appointed diverse to accompany him forward, to guide him carefully in the wayes, and to shew him what places, what passages and streights were held and kept, either by the Romans, or the enemies. Xenophanes with these instructions passed through the midst of the Roman guards into Campania, and so the next way arrived at the camp of Annibal, and made a league and amity with him, under these conditions and capitulations. Imprimis, That King Philip should with a right puissant Armada (for that he was supposed able to set out 200 sail) pass over into Italy, wast and spoil all the Sea coasts, and to his power maintain war by Sea and Land. Item, That when the war was finished, all Italy, together with the very City of Rome should be possessed by the Carthaginians and Annibal, and unto him all the pillage and booty likewise should belong. Item, When Italy was thus subdued, that they should sail into Greece, and wage war with what Princes F there they pleased, and that all the Cities of the main, and the Islands which lay to Macedony, should fall unto Philip, and be annexed to his Kingdome. In these terms, and upon these Articles, in manner, was the league concluded and confirmed between the General Annibal, and the Embassadors of the Macedonians: and with them were sent back unto the King for the better ratifying of the said covenants, certain Legats, to wit, Gisgo, Bostar, and Mago, who arrived together at the same Temple aforesaid, of Juno Licinia, where there rid closely a ship at anchor, expecting their return. From whence being departed, they were not so soon lanched out into the deep, and had taken the open Sea, but they were descried by the Roman fleet that guarded the coasts of Calabria, Q. Fulvius Flaccus made out certain Corcyreans, to pursue and fetch in that ship. Whereupon, the Macedonians began to flie, but seeing themselves overmatched in swiftness of sail, and G not able to make way with them, they yeelded themselves unto the Romans, and were presented unto the Admiral; Who demanded what they were, from whence they came, and whither they were bound. Xenophanes who had already sped so well by making of a lye, began to cog again, and say, That he was sent from Philip unto the Romans: that he came unto M. Valerius, because to him only he was able to pass in safety, but could not possibly get beyond Campania, being so strongly kept with garisons of the enemies. But afterwards, upon the sight of the Carthaginian habit and apparel, they began to suspect the Embassadors of Annibal: and they being questioned withal, their speech and language bewrayed them. Then was their retinue taken apart, and threatned to conconfeſs. Letters alſo were found upon them, ſent from Annibal unto Philip, concerning the peace between the King of the Macedonians and Annibal. Upon theſe matters thus detected and certainly known, it was thought good to convey the Embaſſadors and their Company with all ſpeed priſoners to Rome, unto the Senat there, or unto the Conſuls whereſoever they were. To this purpoſe were choſen five Pinnaſſes that were moſt ſwift, under the conduct of L. Valerius Antias, who had his direction and charge to part theſe Embaſſadors in ſeveral ſhips, and keep them ſure aſunder: and to take good heed, that they neither talked nor conferred together.

About the ſame time it hapned at Rome, that Au. Cornelius Mammula, upon his departure out of the Province Sardinia, made report in what ſtate the Iland ſtood; namely, that they all enclined to rebellion and war: that Mutius who ſucceeded after him, preſently upon his firſt coming, by reaſon of the ill air and unwholſom water, was fallen into a ſickneſs, not ſo quick and dangerous, as chronick and tedious, and would not be able long to endure the ſervice of war: that the army there, as it was ſufficient to guard and keep in good order a quiet and peaceable Province, ſo it could not hold out with the war that was like to enſue. Whereupon the LL. of the Senat gave order, that Q. Fulvius Flaccus, ſhould levy and enrol 3000 foot, and 400 horſe, and provide that this legion ſhould paſs over with all ſpeed into Sardinia: and ſend therewith whom it pleaſed him to conduct and manage the war until Mutius were recovered of his diſeaſe. For this intent was T. Manlius Torquatus ſent Governour; one, who had been twice Conſul and Cenſor, and in his Conſulſhip and ſubdued the Sardinians.

Neer about the ſame time, there was an Armado ſent out from Carthage unto Sardinia, under the leading of Aſdrubal ſurnamed Calvus, and being ſore toſſed and beaten with tempeſts, was caſt upon the Balear Ilands: where (ſo far out of order was not only the ſhip-tackling, but alſo the very keels and bodies of the ſhips ſo ſhaken) they drew up the ſhips to ſhore, and whiles they ſtayed there about calking and trimming them again, they ſpent much time.

In Italy whiles the wars began to ſlake and wax cold, by reaſon that after the battail of Canne, the ſtrength of the one part was much abated, and their force decayed, and the courage of the other, well allayed and made effeminat: the Campains upon their own heads began to contrive, how to reduce the State of Cumes under their obedience, firſt ſoliciting them to revolt from the Romans: and ſeeing that courſe would not ſpeed and take effect, they deviſed by a fraudulent practiſe to compaſs and entrap them. The Campans uſe yeerly to ſolemniſe a ſet feaſt and ſacrifice in a certain place called Hamæ: and they gave notice unto the Cumans, that the whole Senat of Capua would reſort thither: requeſting the Senat of Cumes likewiſe to meet them there, for to confer and conſult together in common, how both Cities, the one and the other, might have the ſame friends and the ſame enemies, and no other: giving them withal to underſtand, that they minded there to have a good guard about them of armed men, for fear of ſome ſodain and dangerous attempt from the Romans. The Cumans, albeit they ſuſpected ſome treachery, denied nothing, ſuppoſing thereby to colour and cover their own crafty intended deſignment. Now all this while, T. Sempronius the Roman Conſul, having ſurveyed and purged his army at Sinneſſa, at which place he had made proclamation, that his forces ſhould meet together: paſſed over the river Vulturnus, and encamped neer unto Linternum: where becauſe the Souldiers in the ſtanding camp had nothing elſe to do, he exerciſed them to run often the race and skirmiſh in aray, to the end that the raw Souldiers (for ſuch were the voluntaries for the moſt part) might by uſe and practiſe learn how to follow their colours in good order, and in the time of battail know their own ranks and enſigns. In theſe kinds of training, the ſpecial care that the General had, and the only thing that he aimed at, was their concord and good agreement. And for this purpoſe, he charged the Lieutenants, and the Colonels and Captains, that they ſhould not caſt in any mans teeth one or other, their fortune and condition aforetime, thereby to breed any diſcord and heartburning among the companies: and that the old experienced ſouldiers ſhould ſuffer themſelves to be but equal in eſtate to the new learners: and thoſe that were born free unto the voluntaries, who had been ſlaves: reputing them all of birth good enough, and of gentle bloud deſcended, unto whom the people of Rome had vouchſafed to commit their armor and enſigns: ſaying, that the ſame fortune which had driven them ſo to do, forced them likewiſe to maintain the ſame, and make the beſt of it, now it was done. The Captains were not more careful in giving theſe good leſſons and inſtructions, but the ſouldiers were as diligent to obſerve the ſame: and within a while their hearts and affections grew to be ſo linked and united together, that they forgat generally, in what degree and of what condition each ſouldier entred into ſervice. Whiles Gracchus was buſied hereabout, the Embaſſadors of Cumes certified him, what kind of Embaſſage came unto them from the Campans, a few dayes before, and what anſwer they had returned: advertiſing him that their feſtival day was to be holden three dayes after: that not only the whole Senat would be preſent, but alſo the camp and army of the Campans. Gracchus having commanded the Cumanes to convey all that they had out of the fields and territories about, into their City, and themſelves to keep within their walls: himſelf the day before the ſolemnity aforeſaid of the Campans, removed his power to Cumes, and there incamped. Now Hamæ is three miles off from thence. The Campans by this time were aſſembled there in great number, according to appointment: and not far from the place, Marius Alfius the chief head Magiſtrat of Capua, was incamped cloſely with fourteen thouſand ſouldiers. He, what with preparation of the ſacrifice, and

A and contriving withal, the deceitful train of treachery, was more busy and careful thereabout, than either in fortifying his camp, or in any other military action. Thus for three dayes continued this festival sacrifice at Hama. And ever in the night season it was performed: so, as before midnight all was done and finished, Gracchus supposing that a good time for his ambush to be employed, having set certain warders before the gates, that no man might go forth to give intelligence, caused the souldiers betwixt the sixt and tenth hour of the day, [from noon until four of the clock] to refresh themselves and take their sleep: that in the beginning of the dark night, they might assemble togather at the watch-word or signal given them. And about the first watch he commanded to display their Ensigns and advance forward: and thus with a still march, he ar-
B rived at Hama by midnight; surprised the hold of the Campans, and entred all the gates at once, being negligently guarded, by reason of their overwatching. Some he killed lying along fast asleep: others, as they returned unarmed from the sacrifice. In this night-tumult there were slain more than two thousand, with Marius Alfius himself their leader: and 43 Ensigns taken and carried away. Gracchus with the losse of fewer than one hundred of his souldiers, having won the camp, retired speedily to Cumes, for fear of Annibal, who lay in fort encamped upon Tifata over Capua. And (as he was a provident man and of great forecast) nothing was he deceived in his opinion. For so soon as this defeat was reported at Capua, Annibal supposing that C he should at Hama find the army of the Romans (consisting for the most part of raw souldiers, and those, bondslaves) jocund and lusty above measure, and insolent upon their fresh victory, busie in rifling their dead enemies thus conquered, driving away booties, and charged with pillage; removed his forces in hast, and marched apace beneath Capua: and encountred with some of the Campans that were fled, whom he caused between two guards to be conducted safe to Capua, and such as were hurt and wounded, to be set in waggons and carried thither. Himself found at Hama the camp empty and void of enemies, and nothing there but the tokens of a fresh massacre, and the dead bodies of his friends and allies lying here and there scattered. Some there were that advised him presently to advance forward to Cumes, and to assault the Town. And albeit Anni- bal was willing enough thereto, and passing desirous (seeing he could not come by Naples) to D have Cumes at least, a maritime port-Town, as well as the other; yet because his souldiers had brought nothing with them but their weapons, as being led forth to march in such hast, he retired back again to his fort and camp upon Tifata. From whence, at the importunat prayers of the Campans, the day following he furnished himself with all the Ordinance and Ensigns meet for the assault of a City, and returned toward Cumes: and having wasted the territory thereof, he encamped himself a mile from the Town. Then Gracchus, more for shame, that he might not seem to leave his associates in such necessity, (who craved protection and recommended themselves to him, and to the people of Rome) than for any confidence and trust that he reposed in the strength of his army, stayed in Cumes. Neither Fabius the other Consul, who was encamped at Cales, durst set his army over the River Vulturnus: as having been busied first at Rome in renewing the Auspices and bird-flights: and after that, troubled also about the fearful
E prodigious signs which were reported one after another. And when he sought expiation thereof by sacrifices, the Sooth-sayers made answer and said, That they could not perceive that the Gods were appeased and pacified for all that he did. Thus whiles Fabius upon these occasions was kept back, Sempronius was besieged, yea, and by this time assaulted, with fabricks and engins of battery. One mighty great Towre of wood there was erected against the Town. Against which, the Roman Consul raised another from the very wall somewhat higher than it: for that he used the wall (which of it self was of good height) in stead of a ground-work, and planted thereon strong posts and piles of timber to bear up the foresaid frame. From thence, at first the souldiers within, defended the Town and Walls with stones, with long poles and perches and other instruments to lance against the assailants. But at length seeing the other turret co-
F ming forward even close to the Town wall, they flung thereon at once much firework, and burning matter: at which fires the multitude of armed men for fear leapt headlong down the turret: and withal, they of the Town issued out at two gates at once, discomfited the guards of the enemies, and drave them into their camp: so as that day Annibal was more like one besieged himself, than laying siege unto others. There were of Carthaginians slain about fourteen hundred; forty wanting one were taken prisoners alive, such as about the walls and their Corps de guard stood careless and negligent, fearing nothing lesse than a sally out of the Town, and were suddainly at unwares taken and surprised. Gracchus sounded the retreat, and caused his men to retire within the Walls, before the enemies after their suddain fright could be rallied together. The morrow after, Annibal (supposing that the Consul in his ruff for this happy hand, would come into the field to fight a set battail) arranged himself in array between his Camp G and Cumes. But after that, he saw no stirring at all from the usual guard and defence of the City, and nothing put to the rash hazard of doubtful hope, he retired to Tifata, without any good at all done.

At the very same time that the siege was raised before Cumes, Titus Sempronius surnamed Longus, fought fortunatly in Lucania before Grumentum, with Hanno the Carthaginian: slew more than two thousand of his enemies, lost himself two hundred and eighty men, and went away with 41 ensigns. Hanno thus driven out of the confines of Lucania, retired himself back into the country of the Brutii: And M. Valerius the Pretor, recovered by force from the Hir-

pins, three Towns that had revolted from the Romans. Vercellius and Sicilius the movers and H Captains of that Rebellion were cut ſhorter by the head. More than one thouſand captives were ſold at the ſpear in port-ſale, to who that would bid moſt. All the pillage beſides was given to the ſouldiers, and the army brought back to Cumes.

Whiles theſe things hapned in the Countries of the Lucans and Hirpins, thoſe 5 ſhips above-ſaid (wherein were embarked the Embaſſadors of the Macedonians and Carthaginians as pri-ſoners) having fet a compaſs from the upper Adriatick Sea unto the nether Sea of Tuſcan, round about (in a manner) all the Sea coaſt of Italy, hapned to ſail along neer the City of Cumes: and being not certainly known whether they were friends or enemies, Gracchus put forth out of his fleet two Pinaces to encounter them. When as by demanding and queſtioning one with another, I it was once certified unto them, that the Conſul was within Cumes, and the ſhips there arrived in the haven, the priſoners were brought to the preſence of the Conſul, and all the letters delivered. The Conſul after he had read over the letters, both of Philip and Annibal, ſealed them up again ſure, and ſent them by Land unto the Senat of Rome, but commanded the Embaſſadors themſelves to be conducted thither by Sea. When as both letters, and alſo the Embaſſadors were arrived at Rome, in a manner, all in one day, and that (after due examination) words and writings agreed together in one: at the firſt the LL. of the Senat were penſive and plunged deeply into cares, conſidering in how great danger they ſtood of a new Macedonian war, who were hardly able to endure the Carthaginian. But in concluſion, ſo far were they off from being utterly diſmayed hereat, and ſinking under the water, that forthwith they began to treat and de- K bate, how they might begin themſelves to war with theſe enemies firſt, and ſo ſtop them from their entrance into Italy. The captive Embaſſadors they laid up faſt in irons: their train and retinue were ſold in open market: and beſides the five and twenty ſhips, whereof Q. Fulvius Flaccus was Admiral, they took order for twenty more to be rigged and decked: which being provided, furniſhed and ſhot into the pool afloat, together with thoſe five barks wherein the priſo-ners were conducted: there were 50 ſail in all, that looſed from Oſtia and arrived at Tarentum.
Quintus Fulvius had commiſſion to embark the ſouldiers of Varro, who had been under the leading of L. Apuſtius the Lieutenant at Tarentum, with his fleet of fifty ſail, not only to defend the Sea-coaſt of Italy, but alſo to hearken and have an eye after the Macedonian war: and in caſe he could learn, that the deſignment and intent of Philip was ſutable to thoſe letters and in- L formations of the Embaſſadors, then he ſhould by his letters certifie M. Valerius the Pretor ſo much; and that leaving with L. Apuſtius his Lieutenant the charge of the army, he ſhould go to the Armado at Tarentum, and with all ſpeed poſſible ſet over into Macedony, and there endeavour to keep Philip play at home within his own realm. As for that money which was ſent unto Appius Claudius into Sicily for to be repayed unto King Hiero, it was appointed unto him for the maintenance of his Armado, and managing of the Macedonian war. This mony was by L. Apuſtius the Lieutenant brought to Tarentum, and with it, there were ſent from Hiero * 200000 Modii of wheat, and 100000 of barley.

Whiles theſe preparations and doings paſſed at Rome, one ſhip of thoſe priſoners which were ſent to Rome, chanced to ſingle it ſelf from the other, and to eſcape away to Philip: whereby M he was advertiſed, that the Embaſſadors or Commiſſioners were taken, and the letters intercepted. But he not knowing what covenants had paſſed between Annibal and his legats, and what anſwer they ſhould have brought unto him, ſent forth another embaſſage with the ſame commiſſion. The Embaſſadors ſent unto Annibal, were Heraclitus ſurnamed Scotinus, Cicero of Berea, and Soſitheus of Magneſia. Theſe went to and fro between in ſafety, theſe caried and recaried their errands fortunatly. But the ſummer was come and gone, before the King could enter into action, or execute any enterpriſe. Of ſo great moment and importance was the boording of that one ſhip at the firſt with the Embaſſadors, for the deferring of that imminent war intended againſt the Romans.

When Fabius had paſſed over the River Vulturnus, after the expiation at length of the prodi- N gious tokens aforeſaid, both Conſuls together made war about Capua. Fabius by aſſault won theſe Cities, Combulteria, Trebula, and Auſticula, which had revolted unto the Carthaginians:
and within them he ſurpriſed the gariſon ſouldiers of Annibal. Many of the Campans likewiſe were taken priſoners. At Nola (like as in the year before) the Senat held with the Romans, but the Commonalty took part with Annibal, and plotted ſecretly, how to murder the Nobility, and to betray the City. But to ſtop the proceedings of theſe miſchievous deſignments, Fabius led his army between Capua, and the camp of Annibal upon the hill * Tifata, and fortified himſelf upon the mountain * Veſuvius, in that fort where Claudius had encamped before. From thence he ſent M. Marcellus the Vice-Conſul with thoſe forces which he had, into Nola, there to lie in gariſon. O

Likewiſe in Sardinia, T. Manlius the L. Deputy, began to adminiſter thoſe affairs, which had been forelet, by occaſion that Q. Mutius the Pretor was fallen ſick, and lay of a long and ling-ring diſeaſe. Manlius after he had drawn the Gallies aſhore at Caraleis, and put the mariners and rowers in arms for Land-ſervice, and received of the Pretor his army, was able to make 22000 foot, and 1200 horſe. With this power of men of arms and footmen together, he entred into the enemies countrey, and not far from the camp of Herſicora, pitched his tents. Herſicora himſelf was by chance gone then, into the country of the Pellidians (a people of Sardinia) to arm

A arm the youth there, for the mending of his ſtrength; and left his ſon named Hioſtus, Ruler over the camp in the mean time. He a luſty hot youth, raſhly joyned battail, and quickly was diſcomfited and put to flight: thirty thouſand Sardinians in that field were ſlain, and upon 1030 taken priſoners alive. The reſt of the army firſt fled ſtragling aſunder over the fields, and through the woods; but afterwards, hearing by the voyce that went, how their captain was fled to *Cornus the head City of that region, they retired thither alſo. And ſurely they had in that one battail, made an end of all war in Sardinia, but that the Armado of Carthage, under the leading of Aſdrubal (which by tempeſt had been caſt upon the Baleare Iſlands) came in time to entertain the Iſlanders, in hope to rebel. Manlius, after it was noiſed abroad, that the Carthaginian fleet B was arrived, retired himſelf to Caraleis: which gave Herſicora good opportunity and overture to joyn with Aſdrubal. Who having landed his ſouldiers, and ſent the ſhips back again unto Carthage, went forward by the guidance of Herſicora, robbing and ſpoiling the Lands of the Roman confederats: and had come as far as Caraleis, but that Manlius with an army encountred him upon the way, and reſtrained him from ſo laviſh over-running and robbing the countrey. At the firſt they encamped one againſt the other not far aſunder: afterwards, they began to put out certain bands and companies, and to maintain light skirmiſhes with variable event, until at laſt they pitched a ſet field, and in full battail fought for the ſpace of 4 hours. The Carthaginians held out conflict a good while, and the victory ſtill remained doubtful (for the Sardinians were ever uſed to have the foil) but at laſt, ſeeing every quarter full of the Sardinians either lying along C dead, or running away, they alſo were diſcomfited: and as they turned their backs and were about to flie, the Romans wheeled about with that wing, wherewith they had defeated the Sardinians, and encloſed them round, and ſo they fell rather to killing than fighting any longer, 12000 enemies were there ſlain of Sardinians and Carthaginians together, about 3700 were taken priſoners, and 27 military enſigns won. This was a noble and famous battail, memorable eſpecially above all, for taking of theſe priſoners; namely, Aſdrubal the L. General, Hanno and Mago, two noble men of Carthage. Mago was of the Barchine houſe, neer of kin and in bloud to Annibal. Hanno was the ſollicitor of the Sardinians to rebellion, and no doubt, the principal Author of that war. Neither was this field leſs famous for the overthrow of the chief commanders of the Sardinians: for both Hioſtus the ſon of Herſicora was ſlain in fight: and alſo Herſicora D himſelf, as he fled with a few Horſemen, hearing beſides other calamities and loſſes, of the death of his ſon, in the night ſeaſon, becauſe he would have no man come between to ſtay his purpoſed intent, killed himſelf. All the reſt eſcaped to the City Cornus, as they had done afore, and there as in a place of refuge ſought to ſave themſelves. But Manlius following the train of his victory, came againſt it, and within few dayes was maſter of it. After this, other Cities alſo which had revolted, and turned to Herſicora and the Carthaginians, gave hoſtages, and yeelded by compoſition. And when Manlius had levied of them certain money for the ſouldiers pay and corn likewiſe, according to the power and ability or treſpaſs of each of them, he led his army back to Caraleis: and there having put the Gallies on the water, and embarked the ſouldiers that he had brought with him, he ſailed to Rome, and recounted unto the LL. of the Senat the utter ſubduing E of Sardinia. The money he delivered to the Treaſurers, the corn to the Ædiles, and the priſoners unto Fulvius the Pretor.

Much about that time, T. Octacilius the Pretor, having ſailed from Lilybæum into Affrick, and waſted the territory of the Carthaginians, as he was bound from thence and ſet ſail for Sardinia, whither Aſdrubal as the news went had lately croſſed over from the Baleare-Ilands, he met with the Armado returning back into Affrick: and after a skirmiſh made upon the Sea by his ſouldiers lightly armed, he took therewith ſeven Gallies with their oars and mariners: the reſt for fear were ſcattered, as it had been with a tempeſt, all over the Sea. And it hapned about the ſame time, that Bomilcar with certain companies of ſouldiers ſent from Carthage for a ſupply, and forty Elephants, and good ſtore of victuals came to Locri. For the ſurpriſing and ſetting upon him on F a ſudden, Ap. Claudius leading his army in haſt, and marching to Meſſana, under a colour of viſiting the Province, put over to Locris with the tide. Now was Bomilcar paſſed already from thence into the Brutians country to Hanno, and the men of Locris ſhut the gates againſt the Romans. So Appius, after much ado and preparation, having effected nothing, returned back to Meſſana. In the ſame ſummer, Marcellus made many rodes from Nola (which he held with a garriſon) into the Hirpins country, and the Samnits, about Caudium, and made ſuch waſt there, with fire and ſword, that they in Samnium called into their freſh remembrance the old loſſes and overthrows which they had received: whereupon there were ſent immediately from both nations Embaſſadors together, unto Annibal, who in this wiſe delivered their ſpeech unto him. "We "have been enemies, O Annibal to the people of Rome, firſt of our own ſelves, and in our own G "quarrel, ſo long as our armor & forces were able to defend us: but after that our hope therein be- "gan to fail us, we drew to a ſide, and took part with King Pyrrhus. And when he forſook us "once, we accepted of peace for very neceſſity: wherein we continued for fifty years almoſt, even "until the time that you entred into Italy. Neither was it your proweſs, vertue and fortune, ra- "ther than your ſingular courteſy and benignity extended toward our country-men and fellow "Citizens (whom being taken priſoners, you releaſed and ſent unto us back again) which hath "cauſed us to entertain your amity: in ſo much, that ſo long as you remain our friend, alive and "ſafe, we would not ſtand in dread of the people of Rome, no, nor of the very Gods themſelves (if "it

"it be lawful so to say) were they never so angry against us. Howbeit assuredly, for this summer H
"season, we have been divers and sundry times so spoiled and wasted, not only whiles you are a"live and safe, but also (which is more) present in place, where you might both hear, in manner,
"the wailing and weeping of our wives and children, and also see our houses on a light fire: So it
"seemeth it was M. Marcellus and not Annibal that had the victory at Cannæ. And the Romans "boast and say, That you are good at the first push only, and when you have once let flie and lan"ced the Javelin (as it were) out of your hands, you are clean done, and can abide no longer. We
"warred almost an hundred years with the people of Rome, without help either of forein Cap"tain, or army of strangers: save that for two years only, Pyrrhus with the aid of our souldiers, "rather increased his own strength, than by any power of his defended us. But we list not to make I
"vaunt and boast of fortunat successes and brave victories, namely, how we subdued and put under "the yoke two Consuls, and two consular armies: nor of other noble exploits which hapned to "our joy and honor. And as for the crosses and adversities that befell us during that time, we may "report them with lesse grief and indignation, than those that this day light upon us. Then in "those dayes, mighty great Dictators with their Generals of Horsemen, two Consuls at once,
"with their two royal hosts, entred our territories, having sent out before hand their espials and "scouts, and led forth their souldiers to make spoil, under their colours and ensigns, aranged in "good order of battail, and seconded strongly behind. Now are we exposed as it were to be a "prey of one only garrison, and that but a small one, left for the guard and defence of Nola. For,
"now they overrun all our confines and borders, not by bands and companies in warlike wise, but K
"like Theeves and Robbers, more carelesly and negligently, than if they ranged about for their "pleasure in the Roman territory. The only cause is this, because your self make no reckoning to "protect us: and all our own youth (which if they were at home were able to defend us) serveth
"under your banner and standard. But I know neither you, nor your army at all: if I should not be "perswaded and believe that he whom I wot well to have discomfited and put to fight so many "Roman armies, were soon able to defeat and suppress these robbers that wander about our coun"try, straggling without leaders, and without their colours disordredly whither they list, according "to the vain hope of pillage that haleth them here and there, and, as every one gapeth for prize,
"which they shall never get. No doubt but if you put forth a few of your Numidians, they will "soon fall into their hands: Send but unto us a garrison to succour us, you shall quickly displace L
"that other at Nola; in case you judge not us (whom you have thought worthy to be your con-"federats) now, unworthy to be defended after you have received us into your protection. Here-

"made complaint that they were neither guarded by him, nor regarded of him. Whereas they "should have first made declaration of their harms: after, sued for help: and last of all, if they "might not obtein, then and not afore they should have complained, that they had besought his "helping hand in vain. Howbeit he promised, that he would not bring his army into the territory,
"either of the Hirpins or the Samnits, lest himself also should be chargeable and troublesome unto "them, but into the next quarters belonging to the allies of the Romans: by spoiling and wasting y
"whereof, both he would fill his souldiers hands, and also with the terrour thereof, set their ene"mies far enough off from them. And as for the managing of the Roman war, like as the battel
"of Thrasymenus, was more noble than that of Trebia; and the field of Cannæ more memorable
"than that of Thrasymenus: even so would he make the memorial of Cannæ dim and obscure, in "regard of one greater victory yet, and more renowned than the other. With this answer, and with honourable rewards besides, he dismissed the Embassadors, and gave them their dispatch.
And leaving a small guard to keep the Hill Tifata, he marched in person with the rest of his army against Nola. Thither also was Hanno come, out of the country of the Brutii, with the supply that he brought from Carthage, and the Elephants. Where, after Annibal had pitched his Tents not far from the Town, and made diligent enquiry, he found, that the case was far otherwise, than it was reported by the Embassadors of his associats. For Marcellus bare not him- N self in any of his actions, so as it might be truly said, that he blindly committed ought to the hazard of fortune, or rashly adventured upon the enemy. For he never went a plundring without his scouts and espials, without setting strong guards in due places, whereunto he might retire himself in safety: but had a good eye afore him, and a wary regard and heedful forecast, as if he were to encounter with Annibal in person. And even then at that time, when he perceived, that the enemy approached and was coming, he kept his forces within the City: commanding the Senators of Nola, to walk up and down upon the walls, and to survey all over, and espie what the enemies did, or were about. Amongst whom, it hapned, that Hanno being come under the very wall, espied Herennius Bassus, and Herius Petrius, whom he called out to a parle. And O when they were gone forth unto him by the permission & leave of Marcellus, thus he spake unto them by his interpreter. First, he highly extolled the vertue and fortune of Annibal, debasing and treading, under foot the dignity and Majesty of the people of Rome, growing now old in time, and decaying in force and strength. "Which if they were (quoth he) on both sides equal, as some-"of the Romans was to all their Allies, and again, how indulgent & gracious Annibal is, even to all

"the captives of the Italian nation and name, they should wish rather to be in league & amity with
"the

A "the Carthaginians, than with the Romans. If both Coss. were with their armies at Nola, they "were no more able to match with Annibal, than they were at Canne: much less might one Prætor with a few raw and new souldiers hold out and keep Nola against him. And as for the Nolans themselves, it concerned them much more than it did Annibal, to consider, whether he "should win Nola by force, or enter upon it by surrender and composition. For to be Lord thereof "he made no doubt, like as he was Master already of Capua and Nuceria: but what odds and difference there is between the state of Capua and of Nuceria, the Nolans know best themselves, who "are seated (as it were) in the mid way between both. Loath he was to prognosticate so much unto Nola, what calamities might befall the City, if it were conquered by assault: rather yet would B "he give his word and promise, That if they would deliver Marcellus with his garrison, and yield "up Nola into Annibal his hand, they should themselves, and none but they set down and capitulate under what conditions they would entertain alliance & friendship with Annibal. To this motion Herennius Bassus framed his answer in this sort." For many years already there hath been "continuall amity between the people of Rome and Nola, and neither of both to this day hath "repented therof. As for the Nolans themselves if they had been disposed to turn with the wind, "and to change their faith and alleageance, together with their fortune, they would have done it "long before this: for now it was too late to start & alter. If they had minded to yield themselves "unto Annibal, they would never have sent for a garrison of Romans: but since they were now "come to protect and defend them, they had imparted & communicated all their state with them
C "already, and would take such part as they, so long as they had an hour to live. This emparl put Annibal clean besides all hope of gaining Nola by treason. Therefore he beleaguered the town on every side, and invested it round about like a garland, to the end, that in one instant he might give the assault on every part of the walls. When Marcellus saw him under the walls he set his people first in battel aray within the gate, and then with a great noise and tumult he suddenly sallied out. At their first shock and onset divers of the enemies were beaten down and slain: but after that, they ran from all parts to battel, and were come together with equall forces, the fight began to be hot and sharp, and a memorable conflict it had been and few like it, but that it rained and poured down so fast, and with so many storms and tempests, that it parted both the battels, and staid the fight. So for that day, having with that smal skirmish kindled their courages, and set their bloud in D heat, they retired back, the Romans within the City, and the Carthaginians to their Camp. Howbeit, of the Carthaginians there were slain, upon the first sally and charge given, not above thirty, and of the Romans not one man. This tempestuous shower of rain lasted all night long, and continued still, and never gave over untill nine of the clock before noon the next day. And therefore, albeit they were sharp set, and their fingers itched on both sides to be a fighting, yet for that day they kept within their hold and strength. So the third day Annibal sent out certain companies into the territory about Nola, for to forrage and fetch in booties: which, so soon as Marcellus understood, he presently set his men in array, and entred the field, neither was Annibal for his part behind. Now there was a mile distance, or very near, between the City and the enemies Camp. In this space between (for all about Nola is plain and champian) they encountred and joyned battel.
E The shout that they set up on both sides, reclaimed and caused to return unto the fight already begun the nearest of those cohorts and bands which were gone a forraging into the country. The men of Nola likewise came unto the Romans, and mended their battel: whom Marcellus commended for their forwardness, and gave them in charge to abide in the rereward, to help as occasion served, and to carry forth of the skirmish those that were hurt and wounded, and to forbear fight in any case, unless they had a signall and token given them by him. The fight was doubtfull, for both the Generals gave encouragement effectually, and also the souldiers did their best, and fought right manfully? Marcellus was earnest with his men to press hard and charge still upon their enemies, whom they had defeated not three daies ago, who not many daies past were put to flight, and driven from Cumes, and who the year before were beaten from Nola under his con-
F duct by other souldiers, saying, " That they were not all there in the field, but many of them gone "ranging abroad in the country, for to hale booties, and get prizes. As for them that fought they "were such as were decayed with rioting and following their delights in Capua, such as with "wine-bibbing in every tavern, whore-hunting in every Stews and Brothel-house, all the whole "winter, were become enfeebled in body, spent and wasted utterly. As for that lively strength and "vigour of theirs, it was clean gone: those able and lusty bodies were decaied, those couragi-"ous hearts abated, wherewith they passed over the Pyrenean mountains, and the high cliffs of "the Alps. There remained now nothing but the reliques and shadow of those men to fight, who "are scarce able to bear their very armour, to lift up their arms, and carry their own bodies. "Adding withall, that Capua was another Canna unto Annibal: there died his warlike proweſs, G "there, lost he his military discipline; there was the glorious fame of former daies buried; there "the hope of future time for ever suppressed and stifled. As Marcellus by reproving these and such like things in his enemies, animated his own souldiers: so Annibal rebuked his men with more sharp words and bitter checks. "I know these to be (quoth he) the same arms and weapons, "the very same ensigns and standards which I saw and had at Trebia, at Thrasymenus, and last "of all at Canne. But sorely me thinks, when I went to Capua there to winter, I caried with me "thither, other manner of souldiers than I have brought again from thence. Have ye indeed so "much ado to maintain fight with a Roman Lieutenant, Leader of one only Legion and cornet;

"to withſtand and abide the violence of a few? Ye ſpake big, and gave out great brags and "proud words, that if any man would lead you, you would win Rome, that you would. Behold, "now, a ſmaller piece of ſervice. Here I would have you prove your ſtrength, and make triall of I
"your valour. Let us ſee now, win me Nola, a City ſcituate in the Champian, on a plain, defen"ded neither with ſea nor river. O out of this ſo wealthy a City, will I be ready to lead you, la-

"have me. But nothing availed either his chearfull words, or his checking rebukes, to encourage and confirm their hearts. For the Carthaginians being forced on every ſide to retreat, (whiles the Romans grew more and more animated, not only through the comfortable ſpeeches of their own Captains, but alſo the Nolans themſelves, who with their loud ſhou-ting in token of their love and affection, enkindled their courages to hot fight) turned their backs, and were driven into their hold. And when the Romans were deſirous to aſſail the ſame, Marcellus reconducted them to Nola, with great joy and congratulation even of the Com- K mons there, who before, were more enclined and affected to the Carthaginians. There were of the enemies ſlain that day above one thouſand, ſixteen hundred were take priſoners, nineteen military enſigns won, two Elephants gotten alive, and foure ſlain in the conflict. Of Romans there were not killed all out one thouſand. The morrow after they ſpent (upon a truce concluded) in burying the dead that were ſlain on both ſides. Of the ſpoils of the enemies Marcellus made a great fire, upon a vow pronounced unto Vulcan. On the third day, 1272 horſemen of Numidians and Spaniards, one with another (upon ſome ſpleen and anger I be-leeve, or elſe for hope of more liberall entertainment and commodious gain) fled from Anni- bal and turned to Marcellus: whoſe valiant and faithfull ſervice ſtood the Romans in very good ſtead oftentimes during that war. And after the war was ended, the Spaniards in Spain, and L the Numidians in Affrick, in reward of their vertue and proweſs, were endued with fair lands and large poſſeſſions. Annibal ſent Hanno back from Nola to the Brutii, together with the forces that he came with: himſelf went to the wintring harbours of Apulia, and lodged about

Quintus Fabius ſo ſoon as he heard that Annibal had taken his way into Apulia, conveyed all the corn from Nola and Naples into his Camp, which he had pitched above Sueſſula: and having well fortified the hold, and left there a ſufficient garriſon to guard the place for that winter time, removed himſelf nearer to Capua, and there encamped: and ſo waſted the Campan Territory with fire and ſword, that the Campans little truſting in their own forces, were conſtrai-ned to iſſue forth of their gates, and fortifie themſelves in Camp before the City, in the open M plain. Six thouſand they were in all. Their footmen were weak and not for ſervice: their horſemen were far better and more able: ſo that oftentimes they charged their enemies with their horſe, and provoked them to fight. Among many brave men of arms that the Campans had, one Jubellus, ſurnamed Taurea, a Citizen of Capua, was the worthieſt and beſt horſeman of them all, by many degrees: inſomuch, as when he ſerved under the Romans, Claudius Aſſellus only, a Citizen of Rome, was able to match him in glory of good horſemanſhip, and horſe-ſervice. This Taurea when he had ridden all about the troops of his enemies, caſting his eye every way, to ſee if he could eſpy Claudius Aſellus, enquired at length cloſely, after ſilence made, where about he was, and made this challenge unto him, That ſeeing he was wont in words to contend with him for valour and proweſs, he ſhould now determine the queſtion by the ſpear-point and N dint of ſword, and either be deſpoiled of his glorious armour, if he were overcome, or elſe gain the ſame with the victory. Which defiance being brought into the Camp to Aſellus his ears, he made no more to do, but went preſently to the Conſul, to know whether he might with his good leave and licence out of his rank fight extraordinarily with his enemy that bad him combat. After leave obtained, he armed himſelf immediatly, mounted on horſeback, and rode before the enemies corps de guard, oftentimes calling upon Taurea by name, and bidding him come forth to encounter whomſoever he durſt. Now were the Romans by this time gone forth of the Camp in great number to behold this combat: the men of Capua likewiſe filled not only the rampier of their hold but alſo the walls of the City to ſee this fight. When as they had made ſome goodly flouriſh afore hand with brave ſwords and ſtout ſpeeches, to ſet out the O action: they ſet ſpear in reſt, and put ſpurs to horſe, and juſtled together amain. Afterwards, having gotten the liberty of the ground they dallied one with another, trifling out the time, and making a long peece of work of it, without giving or taking wound. Then quoth the Campan Knight to the Roman, This will be but a fight of horſes, and not of horſemen, unleſs we ride out of the open plain ground here into this hollow way, where having no ſuch ſcope to prick out at large, we ſhall ſoon come to hand gripes, and cloſe together. The word was not ſo ſoon ſpoken, but Claudius turned his horſe head, and rode into the foreſaid way. But Taurea a ſtoutter champion

A champion in word than deed: Oh take heed of all things (quoth he) how you ride a gelding in a ditch: Which grew afterwards to a by-word, uſed among the country people. Claudius after he had rode in and out, up and down, a long time in the lane, and never met with his enemy, returned again into the open plain: and rating the cowardice of his enemy, with great joy and gratulation, rode back as conquerour into the Camp. Some Annals and Chronicles do record and add to this combat of horſemen, a ſtrange and wonderful thing (no doubt) if it be true, as by the common opinion it is reputed no leſs: namely, that when Laurea fled back into the City Claudius followed hard after him in chace, entred with him at one gate ſtanding open, and rode out clear at the other unhurt, to the great wonder and aſtoniſhment of the enemies. Upon this the B ſtanding Camps were quiet on both ſides: and the Conſ. removed backward farther off from the City, that the men of Capua might ſow their grounds: neither did he any harm unto their fields, before the corn was come up and ſo well grown that the blade thereof yielded good forrage and food for the horſes; which he gathered and brought into the ſtanding Camp and hold of Claudius above Sueſſula, and there he built winter harbors for to make his abode. And he gave order to M. Claudius the Vice-Conſull to keep ſtill at Nola a competent garriſon for defence of the City; and to diſcharge the reſt of the ſouldiers, and ſend them to Rome, that they ſhould neither be cumbrous to their Allies, nor chargeable to the Common-weal. Tib. Gracchus alſo whiles he led his Legions from Cumes into Apulia to Luceria, ſent M. Valerius the Prætor from thence to Brundiſium, with that army which he had at Luceria, commanding him to keep the ſea-coaſt of the C Salentines Country, and to provide for all things neceſſary againſt Philip and the Macedonian war.

In the end of this ſummer, wherein theſe acts were atchieved, whereof I have written, there came a packet of Letters from P. and Cornel. Scipios, importing how great and how fortunate exploits they had performed in Spain: but there wanted money for pay: and apparell and corn to ſerve both ſouldiers and mariners. And albeit all theſe things were away, yet as concerning money, if the City Chamber and common Treaſure were not ſtored, they would make ſome ſhift to raiſe it of the Spaniards: but for all the reſt, needs it muſt be ſent from Rome, for otherwiſe neither could they keep the Army together nor hold the Province in their allegeance. When the letters were read there was no man there but acknowledged that they wrote a truth, and demanD ded that which was reaſonable. But they conſidered withall, what great armies both on land and at ſea they maintained: and what a mighty Armada they muſt prepare and ſet out anew, in caſe the Macedonian war went forward. As for Sicily and Sardinia, which before the wars began, paid tribute, were hable to find and keep the garriſons, that lay there for the guard of the Provinces: and that they were to truſt upon their own revenues and tribute for the maintenance of the charge they were at. But as the number of them that paid rent and conferred tribute, was greatly diminiſhed by ſo great overthrows of the armies, both at the pool Thraſymenus, and alſo at Canne: ſo thoſe few that remained if they were burdened with many exactions and payments, ſhould be plagued and undone another way, therfore it was concluded, that unleſs the Commonweal maintained not her ſelf by her credit and borrowing money, ſhe were not able to be ſuſtaiE ned by her own wealth and riches. So it was agreed, That Fulvius the Prætor muſt needs aſſemble all the people together, and lay abroad and declare unto them the neceſſity and exigent that the Common-weal was driven unto, and to exhort all them that had enriched themſelves and encreaſed their livings, by renting and taking to farm the revenues and commodities of the City, ſhould now do good to the Commonweal for a time, by which they were grown to that wealth, and undertake the proviſion at a price, and furniſh the army in Spain, with all neceſſaries thereto belonging, to be contented and paid therefore with the firſt, out of the common Cheſt, when it were ſtored with money. Thus the Prætor made declaration of theſe matters in the open aſſembly of the people, and withall determined and ſet down a certain day, whereupon he minded to put forth the ſouldiers liveries and apparel, and corn to be provided for the Spaniſh Army, F and all things elſe requiſite for the mariners. When the day was come, there preſented themſelves unto him three companies of nineteen men, for to take this bargain. Who made two requeſts and demands, the one, that for that three years next enſuing, there ſhould be no other Publicans or farmers of the City: the other, that whatſoever they ſhipped, the Common-weal would make good againſt all force of enemy, or violence of tempeſt. Both being granted, they took upon them the matter, and ſo the Common-weal was ſerved by the money of private perſons. This was the demeanor, this was the loving affection to their country, that went through all degrees of men (as it were) after one ſort and manner. And like as they undertook with great courage to ſerve the army ſo with ſingular fidelity they performed every thing, in ſuch ſort, as there was nothing at all wanting, no more than if they had been maintained from a rich treG ſury, as in times paſt. At what time as this proviſion came the town of * Illitargi was aſſailed by Aſdrubal, Mago, and Amilcar the ſon of Bomilcar, becauſe it revolted unto the Romans.

* Aldea el rio, or Anduiar el rio.

Amidſt theſe three ſeverall Camps of the enemies, the two Scipios paſſed into the City of their Allies, that made reſiſtance againſt, and with great loſs of men; and brought corn with them whereof there was great want: and after they had encouraged and exhorted the townſmen that with the ſame reſolution they would defend the walls as they had ſeen the Roman army to fight for them and in their quarrell: they led forth their power to give an aſſault upon the greateſt Camp, whereof Aſdrubal was the General. Thither alſo repaired the two Captains and two Armies of the Carthaginians, when they ſaw that the whole triall of the matter was there to be determined, and ſo they iſſued out of their tents and fought. Threeſcore thouſand enemies were that day in field, and about 16000 Romans: and yet the victory went ſo clear with the Romans, that they ſlew more of their enemies than they were in number themſelves, took priſoners more than three thouſand men, and not many under a thouſand horſe; and withall won 60 military enſigns wanting one, and killed five Elephants in the battel: and to conclude, were Lords that day of three Camps. After that the ſiege was raiſed from Illiturgi, the Carthaginian armies were led to the aſſault of the town * Incibili, having their companies made up and ſupplied again out of the Province, (as being a nation of all others moſt deſirous and eager of war, ſo there be hope of piilage or good recompence) and at that time eſpecially full of young and luſty men. Where there was a ſecond field tought with like fortune of both ſides as before. There were ſlain above thirteen thouſand enemies, and more than 3000 taken priſoners, beſides two and forty military enſigns, and nine Elephants. Then in a manner all the Cities of Spain revolted to the Romans. And far greater exploits were that ſummer performed in Spain, than in Italy.

The four and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

HAnno was not ſo ſoon returned out of Campane, into the country of the Brutii, but by their help and guidance he tollicited to rebellion the Greek Cities which continued the more willingly in league and alliance with the Romans, becauſe they ſaw that the Brutii, whom they both hated and feared ſided with the Carthaginians. And firſt he aſſaied and went in hand with Rhegium, where he ſpent certain daies to little or no purpoſe. In this mean time, the Inhabitants of Locri were buſie in carrying away with great haſte the corn, wood and fewel, and all things elſe, neceſſary for the uſe of man, out of the country into the City; becauſe they would leave nothing for the enemy to prey upon. And daily more and more of them went out of the gates by heaps, ſo as at laſt there was no more left in the City, than thoſe that were compelled to repair the breaches of the walls and the gates, and to bring into the turrets and bulwarks ſtore of darts and other ſhot. Againſt this multitude and confuſed mixture of all ages, ſexes, and degrees ranging over the fields, whereof moſt were altogether unarmed Amilcar the Carthaginian ſent out his Cavalry, giving them direction, and charging them to hurt no perſon. Theſe horſemen oppoſed their troops between them and home, only to exclude them out of the City, when they were ſcattered one from another in flight. The General himſelf in perſon encamped on a high ground from whence he might view the country and the City. And gave commandment to a cohort of the Brutii to approach the walls to call forth the principall Citizens of Locri to parle, and by making promiſe of Annibal his friendſhip, to perſwade and exhort them to yield up the town. At the firſt they gave no credit at all unto the Brutii, whatſoever they ſaid: But afterwards, when they diſcovered Hanno and the Carthaginians upon the hils, and heard by ſome few

A few of their own Citizens that were fled back & escaped, how all the rest of the multitude were faln within danger of the enemies, they made answer, that they would confer and consult thereupon with the body of the people. So immediatly they were assembled together. The most light headed persons were desirous of a change and new alliance: they also, whose kinsfolk and friends were by the enemy intercepted and kept out of the City, had their minds engaged and bound sure enough, as if they had put in hostages: and some few who were well affected inwardly in heart, & liked of constancy and true loyalty, yet durst not be known thereof, and shew themselves to stand to it: so as, they all agreed in outward appearance, to surrender themselves to the Carthaginians. And after they had closely conveighed into the haven, and embarked L. Atilius the Captain of the B garrison, and all the Roman souldiers that served under him to the end, that they might be transported to Rhegium, they received Amilcar and the Carthaginians into the City, with this condition, that presently there should be concluded a league upon equall and indifferent covenants and capitulations between them. But the promise in this behalf (when they had once yielded themselves) was nothing well performed: whiles Amilcar charged the Locrians, with fraudulent dismissing and letting go the Romans: and they again alleaged for their excuse, that they fled away, and made an escape. The horsemen also followed hard in chase by land, if haply either the tide might cause the ships to stay in the current within the straight, or drive them a land. But those whom they pursued, they could not overtake: marry, other ships they espied, crossing the streights from Messana to Rhegium. Roman souldiers they were sent from Claudius the Prætor, to lie in C garrison there, and to keep the town. Whereupon they presently departed from Rhegium.

As for the Citizens of Locri, they had peace granted them by expresse order and direction from Annibal upon these conditions: Imprimis, That they might live free under their own laws: Item, That both the City and the haven should remain still in the hands of the Locrians. The substance of the covenant rested and was established upon these terms, That the Carthaginians and Locrians should aid and assist one another mutually, both in peace and war. So the Carthaginians retired from the streights notwithstanding the muttering and murmuring of the Brutii, because they had left Rhegium and Locri untouched, which two Cities they made full account to have sacked and rifled. And therefore they of themselves having levied and put in arms a power of fifteen thousand of their own youth, marched forward to assail Croton, a Grecian City likewise, and sea-D ted upon the sea. Assuring themselves, much to better their estate, if they could be possessed of a port and sea-town, fenced with strong wals and Bulwarks. This only troubled and perplexed their minds, that they durst not, but send unto the Carthaginians for aid: fearing lest they might seem to have entred into action and war, without regard of the common good of their confederats, if they called them not: and doubting besides, that if the General of the Carthaginians should prove again, rather an arbitrator of peace, than a coadjutor in war, they should fight in vain against the liberty of Croton, as they had done before against the City of Locri. Whereupon they thought best to send Embassadors unto Annibal for his warrant, and to be secured from him, that if Croton were recovered by the Brutians, it should be subject unto them. Annibal made answer, that this matter required consultation of men present with them in place, and therefore E he put them over to Hanno, from whom they received no certain answer to trust unto. For willing they were not, that a noble and rich City as it was, should be spoiled: and besides, they were in good hope, that in case the Brutians should assail it, and the Carthaginians all the while not seen, either to allow or help them in their enterprize, the Citizens would the more willingly revolt unto them. The Inhabitants within Croton were not of one mind, and affected alike. For there was one malady that had infected all the Cities of Italy, namely, the dissention between the Commons and the Nobles. The Senators inclined to the Romans, the Commoners on the other side took part with the Carthaginians. This division within the City, the Brutii were by a fugitive runaway advertised of in these terms: namely, that Aristomachus, the ring-leader and head of the Commons, minded to betray the City: that it was a wide, vaste, and desolate town taking a F great circuit of ground: and all the walls being decaied and in sundry places broken down, the Senators and the Commons kept their severall guards and watches in sundry quarters far asunder. And look (quoth he) where the Commons ward, there ye may enter at your pleasure. Upon this intelligence and direction given by the fugitive, the Brutii environed the City round about: and being let in by the Commons at the first assault were masters of all places, saving the Castle. The Nobles held that piece foreseeing what might happen, and therefore provided themselves of a sure refuge. Thither fled Aristomachus also, pretending that he meant to deliver the City to the Carthaginians, and not to the Brutii. Now this City Croton had a wall (before Pyrrhus coming into Italy) twelve miles in compass; but after it was laid waste by that war, scarce the one half of the town was inhabited. The river that was wont to run through the midst of the town passed now G along the wals without those streets where the houses stood thick and well peopled, far from the parts inhabited.

Six miles without the town there stood a noble Temple of Lacinia Juno, more renowned than the City it self, as being honoured with great religion and devotion of all the Cities and nations thereabout. A sacred grove there was in that place compassed with a thick wood, of tall fir trees, having in the midst within it divers pleasant and fruitfull pastures, wherein were fed beasts consecrated unto the goddess, of all sorts, without any keeper and pastor. And albeit the cattell went forth in the morning by herds and flocks of their own kind, severed by themselves, yet at night they used to return back again to their own pens and stalls, without harm received either by the wait-laying of wild and ravenous beasts, or by deceitfull fraud of men. Great encrease therefore H and much commodity accrued by those cattel, insomuch as thereof was made a massie Column or pillar of beaten gold, and consecrated in that place, so as the Temple was famous, as well for riches, as holiness and devotion. And many times it falleth out, that to such notable places there are attributed some strange miracles. For the report goeth, that there standeth an altar in the very porch of the Temple, the ashes lying whereupon, no wind was ever known to blow away.

But to return to Croton. The Castle thereof on the one side standeth upon the sea, on the other side it bendeth and looketh toward the land. Defended in times past it was only by the naturall situation of the ground, but afterwards fortified also with a wall; on that part whereas Dionysius the Tyrant of Sicily, having gained the back rocks and cliffs behind, by craft and guile sometime I won it. This Castle at that time supposed to be strong and safe enough, the Nobles seized and kept, notwithstanding the Brutii and their own Commons besieged them. At length the Brutii seeing the Castle impregnable, by all the forces and assaults that they could make of themselves, were driven of necessity to crave aid of Hanno. Who having assaied to draw and urge the Crotoniats to yield, upon these conditions, To suffer a Colony of the Brutii thither to be brought, and there planted; and that thereby a City lying so waste and desolate, might be replenished and peopled again, as in ancient time: could not move and perswade any one of them all, but Aristomachus.
For all besides, protested and said, they would die before they would be intermingled with the Brutii, to change their own rites and manner of life, their customes, their laws, and within a while their language also, for others that were strange and forrain. Aristomachus alone, seeing that he K could not prevail neither by perswasions to induce them to yield, nor find any means to betray the Castle like as he had done the town before, fled away to Hanno. Shortly after, certain Embassadors from Locri, by the licence and permission of Hanno, entred the Castle, and perswaded them to be content for to be translated to Locri, rather than to abide and stand out the extremity: saying, that they had sent Embassadors already to that intent unto Annibal, and had got a grant at his hands, that they might so do. So they abandoned Croton, and the Crotoniats were brought down to the sea side and embarked, and the whole multitude departed to Locri.

In Apulia, the very winter season was not quiet between the Romans and Annibal. Sempronius the Consul wintred at Luceria, and Annibal not far from him in Arpi: and as they could spy opportunity, or take their vantage, of the one side or the other, there passed some light skirmishes be- L tween them. But the Romans had alwaies the better, and every day more than other, became more wary and secured from all trains and deceitful snares of the enemy.

In Sicily the Romans found a great change, and all out of order, by reason that King Hiero was dead, and the Crown translated to his Nephew, or sons son, Hieronymus: being yet a child, not like to use his own liberty with moderation, and much less to sway the Kingdom and Scepter with discretion. His guardians and friends gladly entertained the protection and government of such a nature, and were ready enough to plunge him headlong into all vice and wickedness. Which King Hiero foreseeing, was willing (by report) in his latter daies, to have left Syracusa free and at liberty, to the end that so noble a kingdom, acquired and established by good means, should not under the Lordly dominion of a child to the great obloquy and shame of the world, be ruinate M and come to nought. But his daughters with tooth and nail crossed this his designment, and made full reckoning, that the child should only bear the name of a King, but the government of the whole State should wholly rest in them and their husbands, Andronodorus and Zoilus: who were the principall guardians, left to oversee the young Prince. And an easie matter it was not, for an aged man, now fourscore years old and ten, so hardly laid at day and night, by the fair speeches, and feminine flatteries of his daughters, to keep his mind free, and to apply and convert it to intend private regards, and the publike consideration of the State. "And therefore he left fifteen tu"tors to oversee and govern the child, whom he besought upon his death-bead, even when he "was going out of this world, to maintain entire and unspotted, the faithfull alleageance to the "Romans, which he had kept and observed inviolate for the space of fifty years: and to set to N
"their helping hand willingly, to direct the young Prince above all, to tread in his steps, and to "follow that discipline wherein he had been nurtured and taught. After he had given this charge, and yielded up his breath, the guardians came abroad, brought forth the Kings last will and testament, and shewed the young Prince in the open assembly of the people (and well near fifteen years of age he was.) Where some few, such as were bestowed here of purpose within the press of the assembly for to shout and shew testimony of their joy and good liking, approved with open voice, and allowed the Kings will: whereas all the rest fared as Orphans in a City bereaved of their King, and (as it were) become fatherless, and feared all things that might ensue. The King was interred, and his funerals solemnized, with the love and kind affection of his people and subjects, more than with any studious care and diligence of his own friends that were neerest to him. O After this, Andronodorus removed from about the Prince all other guardians but himself, giving out oftentimes that Hieronymus was past a child, and able to govern of himself as King. Thus by deposing the Protectorship, which was common to him and many others, he took upon him and usurped the power and authority of them all. Hard it was even for a right good King and well governed, that should succeed after Hiero, to find favour and win grace among the Syracu-sians: so heartily they affected and loved King Hiero. But Hieronymus, as if he had been willing and desirous, that by his vicious and wicked life, they should have a great misse of his grandfather, and wish again for him; at the very first sight, when he [illegible]ed himself abroad in open place,

A place, declared unto the world, what difference and great odds there was. For they who ſo many years together had never ſeen Hiero, nor his ſon Gelo, either in habit of apparel, or in any other ornaments and port, differing from all other Citizens, now beheld him in his purple robes, with his regall Crown and Diadem, attended with his guard and train of armed penſioners: yea, and otherwhile, after the manner of Denis the Tyrant, riding forth of his Court and Palace, in a Chariot drawn with four white ſteeds. This proud pomp and ſtately array was accompanied and ſuited with ſemblable qualities and conditions. He contemned and deſpiſed all men: he ſcorned moſt proudly to give audience to humble ſuppliants: and ſent them away with reproachful terms and taunts. And not only ſtrangers, but alſo his very guardians hardly might have acceſs unto B him: and to conclude, his luſts and delights whereunto he gave himſelf, were new and ſtrange: his cruelty that he exerciſed outragious and inhumane. So dread and terrible was he to all, that ſome of his Tutors, either by making themſelves away, or by voluntary exile were driven to prevent and avoid the danger of cruell torments. Of whom, three only, who alone had more familiar recourſe into the Court, to wit, Andronodorus and Zoilus, the ſons in law of King Hiero, that had married his daughters, and one Thraſo, had little or no ear given unto them in other matters; but whiles two of them drew toward the Carthaginians, and Thraſo to the Roman alliance: with their arguing, debating and diſpute, they otherwhile turned the mind of the young King to hearken and give audience to their opinions. Now it hapned that there was a conſpiracy intended againſt the life and perſon of the Tyrant, and the ſame detected by one Calo, the companion
C and playfellow of Hieronymus, and of the ſame age: one who ever from his childhood had been familiarly acquainted with him, and inward to all his ſecrets. This revealer of the conſpiracy, could appeach and nominate all the conſpirators, only Theodorus, by whom himſelf was made privy to the treaſon, and ſollicited to be a complice therein. The party was apprehended incontinently, and delivered unto Andronodorus to be tortured; Who at the firſt without delay, confeſſed himſelf to be guilty, but concealed all the reſt that were acceſſaries. At the laſt, when he had been torn, mangled, and diſmembred, with moſt dolorous torments, and intolerable for any man to endure: pretending and making ſemblance that he could abide no longer pains; diſcloſed not for all this the guilty perſons indeed, but accuſed the innocent, and ſaid falſly, that Thraſo was D the firſt deviſer of the whole plot: and unleſs they had born themſelves, and relied upon ſo mighty an head, to ſet them on work, they would never have attempted ſo dangerous an enterpriſe. He appeached alſo ſome other of the Tyrant his guard and houſhold ſervants and daily waiters: even ſuch as came into his mind during the time of his dolours and paines, and whom amidſt his groans he imagined to be ſuch, as whoſe lives might be beſt ſpared, and deaths leaſt lamented. The naming of Thraſo eſpecially made the Tyrant to beleeve, that the detection founded to be a very truth indeed: whereupon the man was immediatly led to execution and put to death; and the other innocents, as clear as himſelf, taſted of the ſame cup, and ſuffered with him for company. As for the conſpirators themſelves, albeit one of their fellows was a long while put to bitter and extream torture, there was not one of them that either hid his head or made an E eſcape: ſo aſſured confidence had they in the reſolute conſtancy and faithfull promiſe of Theodorus: and ſuch power and ſtrength had Theodorus himſelf to keep cloſe the ſecrets committed unto him. Now when Thraſo was once diſpatched out of the way, who only was the means to hold them in, and to bind them to their alliance and alleageance to the Romans: then forthwith they began openly to encline to rebellion, and ſent as Embaſſadors for the ſame purpoſe, two noble young Gentlemen, Hippocrates and Epicides unto Annibal; From whom alſo they were ſent back again in Embaſſage. Theſe were both born at Carthage, but deſcended in bloud from the Syracuſians by their grandfather, that was from thence baniſhed: and were themſelves by the mothers ſide meer Carthaginians. By entercourſe of theſe two Embaſſadours, a League was concluded between Annibal and the Tyrant of Syracuſe. And Annibal was content that they ſhould abide ſtill as Leigers
F in the Tyrants Court.

When Appius Claudius the Prætor and Lord Deputy of the Province of Sicily heard theſe news, he addreſſed ſtraightwaies Embaſſadors unto Hieronymus: who ſaying, that they were come to renew the alliance which they had with his grandfather, had ſcornful audience given them to deliver their meſſage, and were diſmiſſed and ſent away by Hieronymus with a frump, demanding of them by way of a ſcoff, "How they had ſped at the battel of Canna. For I can hardly beleeve "(quoth he) that all is true which the Embaſſadors report of that field: and I would gladly "know the certain truth & thereupon deliberate and take counſel, which ſide I were beſt to take. The Roman Embaſſadors ſaid, they would repair again unto him when he could begin once to give audience with gravity and in good earneſt to their embaſſage: and ſo after they had warned & admoniſhed, rather than praied and entreated him, not to change, but to ſtand to the firſt covenant and promiſes, they departed. Then Hieronymus ſent his Legates to Carthage, for to confirm the League with the Carthaginians, according to the alliance and amity made with Annibal. In which it was capitulate and covenanted, that when they had expelled the Romans out of Sicily (which would ſhortly come to paſs, in caſe they ſent thither ſhips and a power of men) the river Himera, which (as it were) divided the Iſland in the midſt, ſhould confine and limit, both the Syracuſian kingdom and the dominion of the Carthaginians. After this, being puffed up with the fair flattering ſpeeches of ſuch as were about him, who ſuggeſted unto him, to remember and call to mind that not only King Hiero was his grandfather, but alſo King Pirrhus by the mothers ſide: he ſent Embaſſadors unto the Carthaginians, to give them from him to underſtand, That he deemed med it right and meer, that all Sicily wholly ſhould lie unto his dominion: and that the Empire H of Italy only belonged properly to the Carthaginian people to acquire and conquer. This levity and vain-glorious humour they neither wondred at, as a ſtrange thing in a giddy-brained young man; nor yet greatly blamed and found fault with, ſo long as they might eſtrange him wholly and alienate him altogether from the friendſhip of the Romans. But all things in him turned to his overthrow and utter confuſion. For whiles Hippocrates and Epicides were ſent afore with two thouſand ſouldiers for to ſound and ſollicit the Cities rebellion, that were held by the garriſons of the Romans: and himſelf in perſon entred the country of the Leontins, with all the reſt of the forces, which amounted to fifteen thouſand foot and horſe together: certain conſpirators, who chanced all to be his own ſouldiers, and bare arms under him, poſſeſſed themſelves of a vake I houſe ſtanding over a narrow lane, through which the King was wont to go down into the market place of the City: there, when other ſtood armed and well appointed, and waiting when the King ſhould paſs by, one of the conſpirators (whoſe name was Indigemines) had given him in charge, becauſe he was one of the ſquires of the Kings body, when the King approached near unto the door of the ſaid houſe, to find ſome occaſion or other, in that ſtraight paſſage, to ſtay the troop and train that followed behind. And ſo he effected indeed, and put in execution, as it was agreed and contrived. For Indigemines, lift up his foot, making as though he would looſe and ſlack a ſtraight knot of his ſho-latchet, which hindring his going, whereby he ſtaid the company that followed after, ſo long, that the King paſſing by alone without his guard of armed men about him, was aſſaulted mean while, and recieved ſundry ſtabs and wounds, before they could K come to reſcue and ſave him. Hereupon aroſe an outcry and tumult, and divers of the guard let flie at Indigemines, who by this time was ready to oppoſe himſelf, and to award all venues: howbeit he was hurt only in two places, and ſo eſcaped. The guard ſeeing the King there lying dead, fled away as they could. The murtherers, ſome of them betook themſelves into the market-place unto the multitude, that rejoiced for the recovery of their freedom: others repaired to Syracuſe, to intercept and prevent the deſignments of Andronodorus, and other favourits and followers of the late King.

Whiles things ſtood in theſe uncertain and doubtful terms, Appius Claudius foreſeeing war like to enſue, and that very ſhortly, addreſſed his letters unto the Senat of Rome, certifying them that Sicily enclined already, and was at hand to ſide with the people of Carthage, and with Anni- L
bal. Himſelf in the mean time bent all his forces toward the frontiers of the Province and confines of that Kingdom, to withſtand and hinder all the proceedings and enterpriſes of the Syra-cuſians.

In the end of that year, Q. Fabius, by order from the Senate, fortified Puteoli, a town of merchandiſe, and which in time of wars began to be much reſorted unto and frequented, and there he placed a garriſon. From whence as he was in his journey toward Rome againſt the grand Election of Magiſtrates, he proclaimed the ſolemn aſſembly of the people for that purpoſe, to be the next Comitiall day that followed upon his arrivall thither: and ſo it fell out, that he went along the City ride immediatly upon his journey, and came down into Mars field before he entred the City. Upon which day, when it hapned that the Century of the younger ſort was drawn out by M lot, and had the prerogative, and by their voices nominated T. Octacilius, and M. Æmylius Regillus for Conſuls, then Q. Fabius after ſilence made, roſe up, and delivered this or ſuch like ſpeech.

The Oration of Q. Fabius to the people of Rome.

"If either we had peace in Italy, or war at leaſtwiſe with thoſe enemies, with whom if we dealt
"neither negligently or unadviſedly, the matter were not much, nor importing great hazard and "danger: I would think, that whoſoever diſturbed and croſſed your favours and free affections
"which ye bring hither with you into this ſolemn place of aſſembly, to beſtow honours and dig-
"nities upon whom ye pleaſe, had but ſmall and no regard of your liberty and freedom. But ſince
"that in this war and with this enemy never any General of ours faulted in the managing of his "affairs, but it coſt us dear, and we had ſome great foil and overthrow; it behoveth you, that
"with what mind and careſull regard ye enter the field to combat in your armour, in the ſame ye N
"ſhould come hither into this Mars field in your gowns, and ſo proceed by your ſuffrages to "elect your Conſuls: and that every one of you ſhould thus ſay to himſelf, I am to nominate a "Conſul to match with General Annibal. No longer ſince, than this very year, when as before
"Capua, Jubellius Taurea, the braveſt horſeman and Cavalier of all the Campans defied the Ro"mans, and challenged them to fight man to man, Aſellus Claudius, the nobleſt Knight of all the "Romans, and beſt man at arms, was choſen to encounter him. In times paſt, againſt a Gaul
"that offered combat upon the bridge over Anio, our anceſtors ſent out Manlius, a couragious, "reſolute, and puiſſant Champion. Neither can I deny, but upon ſuch another occaſion not ma"ny years after, the like truſt was repoſed in M. Valerius, who took arms likewiſe againſt ano"ther Gaul that challenged ſingle fight. And even as we are deſirous, & wiſh to have our foot and O
"horſemen both, more valorous and hardy than our enemies, or if that will not be, at leaſtwiſe "equall unto them, and able to countermatch them: even ſo let us be carefull to find out a Gene"rall of our own comparable every way to the chief commander of our enemies. And when we "have choſen the beſt warrior and Captain in the whole City, then preſently without any longer "delay, being elect and created for one whole year, he ſhall be ſent to match with an old captain,
"that hath ever continued in the field, one who is not encloſed within compaſs of time, nor re-
"ſtrained & gaged within the ſtraight bounds of law, but that he may order & manage every thing,
"according as the occaſions and preſent occurrences of war do require: whereas, by that time that

A "that we can make all ready, and diſpoſe every thing in order, and ſet in hand to begin our affairs,
"the year is come about and clean gone. Now foraſmuch as enough hath been ſaid, what manner
"of Conſuls ye ought to create: it remaineth to ſpeak ſomewhat of them, whom the preroga"tive Century ſo highly favoureth, and is ſo much affected unto. As for M. Æmylius Regillus, he "is the Flamin of Quirinus, whom neither we may take from his miniſtry of Sacrifice, nor yet "retain and keep him ſtill, but we ſhal neglect either the ſervice of the gods, or the due care and "regard of the wars. Octacilius hath married my ſiſters daughter, and hath fair iſſue by her. But "your favours and good turns ſhewed both to me, and alſo to my anceſtors, are not of ſo ſmall "account and reckoning, but that I ought to prefer the Common-weal before all private re-B "gards and alliances whatſoever. Every mariner, yea, and any paſſenger is able to ſteer and rule
"a Ship in a calm water: but when a bluſtering tempeſt is up, and the veſſel toſſed in a troubled
"ſurging ſea, and carried away with violent force of the winds, then there had need to be a man
"indeed, and a skilful Pilot to ſit at the ſtern, and to guide the helm. We ſail not now in a ſtill
"and quiet ſea: but we have been drenched, and in a manner drowned, with ſome ſtorms alrea"dy: and therefore we ought to have exceeding great care and be well adviſed aforehand, whom "we have to be the ſteers-man. In a matter of leſs conſequence and importance, we have made "triall, O T. Octacilius, of your knowledge and ſervice: and you have not given us yet ſo good
"proof of your vertue and proweſs therein, that we ſhould put you in truſt with the managing "of greater affairs. A Navy whereof you were Admiral, we rigged and trimmed to your hands C "this year for three cauſes: firſt, to annoy and ſpoil the ſea-coaſt of Affrick: ſecondly to defend "and keep to our behoof the ports and havens of Italy: laſt of all, and above all, to empeach and
"ſtay all ſupplies and new ſuccours, together with money munition, and victuall, for being tranſ-
"ported unto Annibal from Carthage. If Octacilius have performed, I ſay not all theſe things,
"but in any one quit himſelf well, to the good and benefit of the State, Elect him Conſul hard"ly, and good leave have you. But if it appear, that while you had the rule of the Armada, all "things (that a man would have) paſſed out of the country unto Annibal, with as great ſafety
"and ſecurity, as if the ſeas had been open and void of enemies: If, I ſay, the ſea coaſt of Italy
"hath all this year been more in danger, and ſubject to ſuſtain harm, than that of Affrick: what
"reaſon can you alledge, wherefore the people of Rome ſhould chooſe you above all others, to D "oppoſe as Captain, to confront their enemy Annibal. If you were Conſul in place already, we "would judge it requiſite and good to nominate and create a Dictator, according to the exam"ple of our foreſathers: neither could you take ſnuff or be offended, that there ſhould be found "in the City of Rome a better warrior, and more ſufficient than your ſelf. And ſurely it concerneth
"no man more than you, O Octacilius, to ſee that there be not impoſed a burden upon your "ſhoulders, under which you ſhould fail and fall down right. Wherefore I adviſe and exhort you
"all, as much as poſſibly I can, in electing of Conſuls this day to carry that mind, and uſe that care-
"full providence, as ye would, in caſe ye were ſtanding armed in battel array; and to chooſe out
"of hand two Generall Captains, under whoſe conduct and government ye ſhould preſently
"fight a field: and make choiſe of ſuch Conſuls, unto whom our children were to take the oath E "of allegeance: at whoſe commandment, they ſhould come and aſſemble together, and under "whoſe charge and protection they might willingly ſerve as ſouldiers. The pool Thraſymenus, the "plain before Cannæ, are heavy examples for us to remember: but yet they ſerve for good prece"dents unto us to teach us how to avoid the like miſchief another time. So the prerogative Century of the younger and puny ſort, was called again to a new ſcrutiny, and to give their voices again. Whereat when T. Octacilius began to cry out aloud and ſay very ſtoutly, that Fabius his drift was to continue Conſul ſtill, and therewith grew to be clamorous and troubleſome to the aſſembly: the Conſul commanded the Lictors to go unto him, and to lay hold upon him. And foraſ-much as yet he had not entred into the City but came down ſtraightwaies into the Mars field pre-ſently from his journey, he put them in mind, that the knitches of the rods together with the axes F within them ſhould be born before him. And in the mean time the prerogative Century began afreſh to give their voices: and by it were nominated Conſuls Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Marcellus the third time: and all the Centuries beſides without any jarring and variance elected the very ſame. One of the former Prætors likewiſe was choſen again namely *Q.
Fulvius Flaccus*. And other new created, that is to ſay, T. Octacilius Craſſus the ſecond time, *Q.
Fabius* the Conſul his ſon, who at that time was Ædile of the chair and P. Cornelius Lentulus. After the Election of the Prætors was ended and finiſhed, there paſſed an Act and decree of the Senate that Q. Fulvius ſhould extraordinarily have the charge of the City, and be Prætor there: and that he above all other, when the Conſuls were gone forth to the wars ſhould be Preſident and Governour of the City of Rome. There fell great rain and much ſnow that year, whereby the Tiber G overflowed the fields, overthrew many houſes, and overwhelmed much cattel and people, ſo as they utterly periſhed,

Thus in the fifth year of the ſecond Punick war, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and *M.
Claudius Marcellus* the third time, when they entred their Conſulſhip, ſet the City on thinking and muſing of them more than uſually had been known. For in many years there had not been the like couple of Conſuls. And old men would talk and ſay, that even ſo were Max. Rullus and
P. Decius declared Conſuls againſt the Gauls war: and after them likewiſe, Papyrius and Carvilius againſt the Samnits and Brutii; againſt the people alſo of Lucania and Tarentum. Mar-

cellus was created Consul in his absence, whiles he was with the Army abroad and Fabius being H himself present and president of the Election, was ordained to continue still in his Consulship. The occasion of the time, the necessity and occurrence of the wars, and the peril and hazard of the whole state were such, as no man looked nearly into the example and precedent to find fault withal, nor had the Consul in any jealousie of ambition and desire of rule: but rather every man commended his noble and hauty mind, who seeing that the Common-wealth stood in need of an excellent Captain, and knowing himself without all question to be the man, made less reckoning and account of the envy and ill will of men, that thereby haply might accrue, than of the good and profit of the Common-wealth. The same day that the Consuls began their office, they assembled the Senators in the Capitoll: and the first thing they did, was a decree, that the Con- I suls should either cast lots, or agree together between themselves, whether of them two should assemble the people for the election of Censors, before he set forward to the army. After this, all they had their authority prolonged and continued still, who were employed abroad with the forces; and their commissions were renewed and sealed again, for to abide in the government of their Provinces: to wit, T. Gracchus at Luceria, where he abode with the army of the Voluntaries: C. Terentius Varro in the Picene country: M. Pomponius in the Province of Gaul (on this side the Alps.) It was enacted also, that of the Prætors of the former year, Q. Mutius as Vice-Prætor should govern Sardinia: that M. Valerius at Brundusium should scoure the river, look to the sea-coasts, and have an eye to all the attempts and enterprises of Philip King of the Macedonians. P. Cornelius Lentulus, the new Prætor, was appointed to rule the Province of Sicily: and T. K Otacilius to be admiral of the same Navy, which the year before he had the charge of against the Carthaginians.

Many prodigious and strange signs were reported that year and so much the more as they were beleeved to be true of the simple and superstitious sort of people. Namely that within the happel of Sospita Juno in Lanuvium the Ravens builded their nests. In Apulia a green palm tree was on a light fire. At Mantua a pool maintained by the overflowing of the river Mincius appeared red with bloud. At Cales it rained chalk, and at Rome in the beasts market it rained bloud. In a village, called Istricus a spring under the ground, brake out and yielded such abundance of water, that it overturned, tumbled up and down and carried away (as it had been the stream of a river) divers vessels as pipes tuns, barrels and tercs that were in the place. The open and publike hall L within the Capitoll the Temple of Vulcan in Mars field a nut-tree in the Sabins country: the high street, the wall, and a gate at Gabii, were all blasted with lightning and fire from heaven. And by this time other miraculous and monstrous signs were commonly blown abroad, to wit, that the spear of Mars in Preneste of its own accord, stirred and moved forward: that an oxe was heard speak in Sicilia: that the Infant within the mothers womb, in the Marrucins country was heard to cry Io Triumphe, at Spoletum, a woman turned to be a man. At Hadria there appeared an Altar in the skie, and apparitions or shews of men discovered about the same, arraied in white. At Rome also within the City was seen, now the second time, a swarm of Bees in the very market-place: a thing wondred at because it was rare and seldom known. Some there were also, that avouched how they descried armed Legions on the hill Janiculum; Whereupon the City rose up M in arms and when they were come into the Janicle, they said plainly, that there were none there appeared but the ordinary inhabitants of the hill. These prodigious sights, by direction from the Aruspices [i.e. the Soothsayers] were expiate, and the gods pacified with greater sacrifices: and a solemn procession and supplication was proclaimed unto all the gods that were shrined at Rome, and had their chappels there.

After all complements performed, that belonged to the pacification of the gods, the Consuls proposed unto the Senat concerning State-matters, and especially about the managing of the wars, Namely, what forces should be prepared, what numbers of souldiers levied, and where they should be bestowed severally. And agreed it was That there should be eighteen Legions employed in the wars. Whereof the Consuls were to take unto them two apiece: the Provinces likewise of N Gaul, Sicily and Sardinia, should be guarded each of them with other twain. Q. Fabius the Lord Deputy of Apulia, was to have two Legions under his hand to command the Province: and T. Gracchus other two of voluntaries, to keep the country about Luceria: and C. Terentius the Pro-Consul, to have the charge of one in the Picene country: and M. Valerius another, for the Navy about Brundusium: and last of all, twain were left behind for the guard and defence of the City of Rome. For to make out this full number of Legions six of necessity were to be levied new. And the Consuls were appointed with all convenient speed to enroll them: and likewise to provide an Armada that year of 150 Gallies, together with those ships which ride in the river along the coasts of Calabria for the defence of that Country. When the muster was done and the new ships haled and shot into sea, Q. Fabius assembled the Centuries for the election of Censors: wherein were O created M. Attilius Regulus and P. Furius Philus.

The rumour still encreased, that Sicily was out and up in arms. Whereupon T. Otacilius was commanded to go thither with his fleet. And because there wanted sailers and mariners the Consuls, by vertue of a decree of the Senat published an Edict, That as many as in the time of L. Æmylius, and C. Flaminius Censors, either themselves or their fathers were assessed in the Subsidy book from 50000 Asses unto 100000 in goods, or who afterwards grew to that worth should find one mariner, and six months pay. Item, That whosoever were rated above 100000 unto 300000

A should be charged with three marriners, and one years pay. Item, That whosoever were valued in the Censors book between 300000 and 1000000, should allow five marriners. Item, That those above that proportion should set out seven. And every Senat should provide eight mariners, and furnish them with a whole years pay. According to this Edict, the mariners were set out well armed and appointed by their Masters, and having with them aforehand meat dressed and sodden to serve them thirty daies, they were embarked. This is the first time that ever the Roman Navy was furnished with sailers and mariners, at the proper charges of private Citizens.

This extraordinary preparation more than usuall, terrified the Campans most of all other, for B fear lest the Romans would begin war that year, with laying siege to Capua. Therefore they dispatched Embassadors unto Annibal, requesting him to come nearer unto Capua with his forces. For why? at Rome there were new armies levied, for to assail that City: and the Romans were not discontented more with the revolt of any than of them. And forasmuch as this message was delivered in such haste and fear, Annibal thinking it good to make speed, lest the Romans prevented him, dislodged and removed from Arpi, and encamped upon Tifata over Capua, in the fort, where he kept of old. Then, leaving the Numidians and Spaniards behind him both to guard the Camp, and also to defend Capua, he went down with the rest of his army to the Lake Avernus, pretending in shew there to sacrifice, but in very deed to sound and solli it Puteoli and the garrison there for to rebell. Maximus was no sooner advertized that Annibal was departed from Arpi, and in his C return to Campania; but he journied night and day, and never staid, untill he was come again, and repaired to his army. And withall, he gave order and direction unto T. Gracchus, to remove with his power from Luceria, and to draw near to Beneventum: likewise unto Q. Fabius the Prætor, (who was the Consul his son) to supply the room of Gracchus at Luceria. At the same time the two Prætors took their journey, and went into Sicily, P. Cornelius to the army there on land, and Ostacilius to keep the sea-coast, and to be admiral of the Navy: and the rest spred them every one into their several Provinces. They also who had their authority and government continued, ruled the same countries that they did before.

Whiles Annibal abode at the Lake Avernus, there came unto him from Tarentum, five noble young Gentlemen (Roman associats) which had been taken prisoners, some at the pool Thrasymenus, D others at Cannæ, whom he had sent home in the same manner of curtesie, as he had shewed ever to all the Allies of the Romans. These Gentlemen, in remembrance of his favours and benefits, made report vnto him, "That they had perswaded and induced a great part of the youth of "Tarentum, to entertain rather the amity and alliance of Annibal, than of the people of Rome: "and for this intent they were sent Embassadors from them, to request in their name, that it "might please him to come nearer with his forces to Tarentum. For say they, if they might but "once see from out of Tarentum his standard and ensigns, and himself near encamped, the City "would without delay be surrendred up into his hands. For the younger people had the com-"mons at their beck and commandment, and the commons ruled the whole state of Tarentum "at their pleasure. Annibal after he had commended and thanked them, and withall loaden them E with many fair and great promises, willed them to return home, to hasten and set forward, and effect these intended designments, saying, that he would be there in good and convenient time. With these hopes the Tarentins took their leave, and departed. Annibal himself was wonderfully desirous to be Master of Tarentum. He saw it was a noble City and a wealthy, seated also by the sea-side, and a very commodious Port, looking and lying toward Macedonia: and well he wist that King Philip (if he should pass over into Italy, seeing the Romans were possessed of Brundusium) would arrive at this haven. When he had performed the Sacrifice for which he thither came, and (whiles he made his abode there) forraged all the Territory of Cumes, even as far as the Cape of the Promontory Misenum: suddenly he turned his army and marched to Puteoli, for to surprise F and give a camisado to the fort and garrison there. There were six thousand of them within the town: and the place not only by naturall situation strong, but also surely fortified by industry of man. Annibal having staied there three daies, and assaied the fort and the garrison on every side, seeing he could not prevail nor effect any thing, went forward from thence, and proceeded to the wasting of the Territory of Naples, upon anger, rather than any hope of gaining the City. The Commons of Nola, who long time were discontented with the Romans, and at deadly fewd with their own Senators, upon his coming into the territory and confines so near unto them, began to rise in a commotion. Whereupon, there came Embassadors unto Annibal, requiring him to advance to Nola, upon assured promise, that the town should be delivered into his hands. But G Marcellus, who was sent unto by the Nobles, prevented this their plot and designment: and in one day he reached to Suessula from Cales, notwithstanding he made some stay to ferry over the river Vulturnus. And so the next night he sent into Nola 6000 footmen and 300 horse, for to aid and defend the Senat. And like as the Consul bestirred himself with all speed and diligence, to make Nola sure to him aforehand, so Annibal contrariwise temporized, being not so ready now to credit the Nolans; as having twice before given the like attempt, and to no purpose in the end, and therefore he trifled out the time, and made small haste.

At the same time also, Q. Fabius the Consul came against Casilinum, which was kept by the garrison of the Carthaginians, to see if he could surprise it. And to Beneventum at one time (as if they had been so agreed) came on the one side, Hanno from the Brutii, with a great power of foot and horse; and on another side, Gracchus from Luceria: who entred the town first. From whence so

ſoon as he heard that Hanno lay encamped within three miles of the City, by the river Calores, H and there waſted the Country, he himſelf iſſued, and pitched his tents within a mile of the enemy: where he aſſembled all his ſouldiers together, purpoſing to make a ſpeech unto them. He had with him the Legions that conſiſted moſt of voluntaries, who already two years before, had been more willing to deſerve their freedom in ſilent manner, than to challenge and demand it with open mouth. Howbeit, he perceived when he departed out of the winter harbors, that they began to murmur and grumble in the army when they marched: and to complain in this wiſe. What? ſhal we never ſerve in the quality and condition of freemen? Whereupon he had written unto the Senat, and ſhewed unto them, not ſo much what they deſired, as what they deſerved to have: certifying them, that unto that day they had done him good and valiant ſervice: and wanted nothing I ſave only their freedom, but they might go for true and lawful ſouldiers. Whereupon the Lords of the Senat had put it unto his diſcretion for to do by them what he thought was expedient for the Common-weal. Thereupon, before that he ſhould join battell with the enemy, he pronounced theſe words before them all, and ſaid: "That now the time was come, of obtaining and acqui- "ring that liberty, which ſo long they hoped after. For the next morrow they were to affront "their enemies with banner diſplaied, and to fight in a plain and open ground, where without "fear of any ambuſh the triall might be made with meer force and true valour: Whoſoever there- "fore can bring me the head of an enemy, him my pleaſure & will is, to make free immediatly: and "who ſo loſeth ground and retreateth, him will I chaſtiſe as a bondſlave ought to be puniſhed. "Now every man hath his ſtate and condition lying in his own hands: and of your freedom K "not only my ſelf will aſſure you, but for further warrant, ye have the allowance of M. Marcellus "the Conſul, and generally of all the LL. of the Council, whoſe advice I ſought, and who committed "unto my hands the ordering of your liberty. And withall he read the Conſuls letters, and the decree of the Senat in that behalf. Whereat they ſet up a mighty cry, in token of their aſſent and approbation, and called for battel, and earneſtly urged to give the ſignal out of hand. Then Gracchus having pronounced the next day for battel, diſmiſſed the aſſembly. The ſouldiers were joyous eſpecially ſuch as were to have their freedom in reward of one daies ſervice, and beſtowed the reſt of that day in making their armor and weapons ready. The morrow after, ſo ſoon as the trumpets began to ſound: they were the firſt of all other that preſented themſelves before the General his pavilion, well appointed and ready to fight: and by the ſun riſing Gracchus led forth his men into L the field in order of battel. The enemies for their parts were nothing behind, but forward to encounter them. They were in number ſeventeen thouſand of footmen moſt of them Brutii and Lucans: of horſemen, twelve hundred: among whom there were very few Italians, the reſt were in manner all Numidians and Moors. The fight was ſharp, and continued long, and for four hours it was not ſeen which ſide had the better. No one thing elſe troubled the Romans more, than their enemies heads, which were the prizes to redeem the ſouldiers liberty. For as any had killed their enemies luſtily, they were fain firſt, with much ado, to cut off their heads, within the troubleſome preſs and tumult, and ſo to loſe time: and after that, by reaſon that their right hands were employed and occupied with holding the ſame heads, it fell out, that the beſt ſouldiers gave over fighting, and the feeble daſtards and fearfull cowards only were to maintain the conflict. Which when the M Marſhals of the field and Colonels reported unto Gracchus and namely, that there was not a ſouldier of the enemies ſtanding that was wounded and hurt any more: but they that lay along were hacked and hewed as it were by butchers: and that his own ſouldiers inſtead of ſwords, held their enemies heads in their hands: he commanded in all haſte, that upon a ſignal given, they ſhould fling away their heads from them, and charge afreſh upon the enemies. For their valour and proweſs (ſaith he) was well enough ſeen already, and evidently teſtified, and ſo long as they were ſo hardy men, and bare themſelves ſo manfully, they ſhould not need to doubt of their liberty. Then the conflict began to be renewed and withall the horſemen charged the enemies whom the Numidians received with equall valour: inſomuch as the fight of the Cavalry was as bravely performed, as the other of the Infantry: whereupon once again the victory ſeemed doubtfull to N which part it would encline: whiles in both hoſts the Generals reproached and debaſed the adverſe part. Gracchus ſaid that the Brutii and Lucans were ſo often vanquiſhed and ſubdued by the Roman anceſtors: and Hanno again girded at the Romans, calling them bondſlaves, and ſouldiers let looſe out of priſon and houſes of correction. At the laſt, Gracchus declared aloud, and ſaid, They were not to hope at all for their liberty, unleſs that day their enemies were diſcomfited and put to flight. This one word of his at length ſet their bloud in ſuch an heat, that they raiſed a freſh ſhout, & as if they had been caſt again in a new mould, they charged upon the enemies ſo violently that they could no longer be reſiſted and withſtood. Firſt, they that fought in the vangard of the Carthaginians were put out of order: then they about their ſtandards and enſigns: and laſt of all, the whole battel was driven back and gave ground. Whereupon they fairly turned their backs, and O fled ſo faſt one upon another into their Camp, in ſuch fear and fright, that not ſo much as at the very gates, nor upon the rampier, they ſtaid once, and turned again to make head: ſo as the Romans following them hard at the heels into their camp as it were in one train pel-mel made a new skirmiſh even within the rampier of their enemies. Where the fight was not ſo cumberſome by reaſon of the ſtreightneſs of the room wherein they were pent, but the maſſacre and execution was as cruell and bloudy. The priſoners alſo that were among the enemies, in this confuſed conflict and tumult joyned themſelves and ſtuck cloſe together: and having caught up ſome weapons,

helped forward the victory: and either charging upon the backs of the Carthaginians slew them, or else hindred them in their flight and running away. So of that great army, there were not all out two thousand (and the most part of them horsemen) that escaped with the Generall himself: all the rest were either slain or taken prisoners: and of military ensigns were carried away forty save twain. Of the Victors there died fast upon two thousand. All the spoil, but only the prisoners, was granted to the souldiers. The cattell also was reserved, as many as within thirty daies the right owners could justly make claim unto for their own. When they were returned laden with booties and pillage into the Camp there were almost 4000 of the voluntary souldiers, who had fought but faintly, and brake not into the Camp with the rest: who for fear of punishment seized a little hill not far from the Camp, and kept it for their hold. But the morrow after being set from thence by the Colonels, they repaired again to the camp, at what time as Gracchus had summoned his souldiers to an assembly. Where, after that the Pro-Consul first had rewarded his old souldiers with military gifts, according to each one his prowess and good service in that battell; then as concerning the voluntaries, he said thus much, That he had rather they were all commended by him good and bad, one with another, than that one of them that day should taste of any punishment: and therefore he pronounced them all free in the name of God, to the benefit, happiness, and felicity, both of Common-weal, and also of themselves. At which word, they lifted up their voices aloud with exceeding cheerfulness and alacrity: and one while they clipped and embraced one another in their arms, with gratulation and great joy: another while again, they held their hands toward heaven, wishing and praying at the gods hands, all good blessing for the people of Rome and for Gracchus especially. "Then (quoth Gracchus) Before that I had made you all alike, "and to have equall part in the right and priviledge of freedom, I would not set upon any of you, "either the mark of a stout and hardy souldier, or the note of a faint-hearted and beastly co-"ward. But now that I have discharged my self of the trust committed unto me by the Common-"weal to the end, that all difference between prowess & cowardise, should not be forgotten al-"together and perish; I will take expresse order that the names of them whose conscience accused "them of faint fighting, and avoiding the hazard of battell, and therefore erewhile withdrew "themselves apart, be brought unto me. And when they are cited and called forth every one by his "name, I will compell them to take a corporall oath (quoth he) that unless it be upon sickness, so "long as they shall continue in souldiery they neither eat nor drink but standing upon their feet. "And this punishment (I am sure) you will willingly take in good part: when ye shall consider bet-"ter of it, and see that you could not have had an easier note of disgrace and shame, for your false "hearts and slender service. Then he gave the signall to truss up bag and baggage, and sounded the remove, and so dislodged: and thus the souldiers carrying and driving before them their booties, all the way disporting themselves so merily and jocund, returned to Beneventum as if they had come from some great dinner, upon a solemn and festival day, and not from fighting a bloudy battell. All the people of Beneventum came forth in great numbers to meet them at the gates, welcomed the souldiers, bad them joy, embraced them and invited them to their houses, to give them entertainment and lodging. The boords were spread in every mans court-yard, and furnished with store of viands: they willed them to come and make merry with them, and requested Gracchus to give his souldiers leave to feast and make good chear. And Gracchus was content, but upon this condition, that they should all eat their meals abroad in the open street. Then all things were brought forth, and set upon the tables at every mans door. The voluntaries took their repast and refection either with their caps on their heads, or else covered their crown with white wooll, some sitting, some standing: waiting and serving one another at the table, and eat their meat, and fed with them together. This was such a worthy sight and solemnity that Gracchus after he was returned to Rome, caused the representation and resemblance of the celebration of this day, to be drawn and portraied in colours and the picture to remain in the Temple of the goddess Liberty, which his father caused to built in the mount Aventine, of certain fines and forfeits, and afterwards there dedicated it.

Whiles these matters thus passed at Beneventum, Annibal having spoiled and harried the territory about Naples, removed toward Nola, and there encamped before the town. Whom when the Consul understood to be coming, he sent for Pomponius the Pro-Prætor, together with that army which lay encamped above above Suessula, and provided to meet with the enemy, minding presently to bid him battell. He sent out Claudius Nero with the strength of his horsemen in the dead time of the night at a back gate, that was farthest from the enemy, giving him in charge to cast about closely, and fetch a compass, and fair and softly to follow the enemy, as he marched: and when he perceived the battell was begun, then to come forward, and set upon him behind on his back. But whether it were that Nero missed of the way, or having not time enough, could not put this policy in execution, I know not. In his absence the armies joyned battell, wherein (no doubt) the Romans had the better hand. Howbeit, for default that the horsemen were not there in due time, the order of the direction failed, and took not effect. And notwithstanding that the enemies gave ground and retreated, yet Marcellus durst not follow hot upon them, but sounded the retreat to his own men, being in a good way of victory. Yet were there by report above 2000 of the enemies slain that day, but of Romans under 400. And about the sun set, Nero who all the day and night past had tired horse and man, and done no good, and now returned, without so much as a sight of the enemy, was sharply rebuked of the Cos. insomuch, that he gave him this check to choak him, That it was long of him and none else, that they had not cried quittance H with the enemy, for the overthrow & loss received at Cannæ. The day following Marcellus came down again into the field, ready to give battel. But Annibal, as one that secretly confessed himself to be overcome, held himself close within the strength of his Camp. And on the third day, giving over all hope to get Nola, (an enterprise that never sped well) he departed in the still time of the night toward Tarentum, upon a better and more assured hope to gain it by treason.

The civill affairs at Rome were managed with no less courage at home, than the wars in the field abroad. For the Censors, who by reason that the City treasure waxed low, were eased of their care of setting out the publike works of the City by the great: and having nothing else to do, employed themselves in reformation of mens manners and chastising of vices and enormities, which I sprung upon war: like as mens bodies, which by long and lingring sickness grown weak, ever and anon breed new diseases. And first they convented before them those Citizens, who after the battel at Cannæ, were (by report) minded and disposed to leave the Common-weal, and to depart out of Italy. The ring-leader of them all was L. Cecilius Metellus, who hapned then to be Treasurer of the City. He, with the rest of that crue, who were culpable in the same crime, were commanded to make their answer, and plead their causes: but when they were not able to clear and quit themselves, the Censors charged them openly, that they had given out certain words, and made speeches against the State, tending to a sedition and conspiracy, for to abandon Italy. Next after them were cited to appear those cunning and crafty companions aboveseid, who with their over-subtill interpretation and construing of words, would seem to avoid their oath: those captives, I mean, K who being on their way to Rome, came back secretly into the Camp of Annibal, and took themselves freed and discharged, because they had sworn to return again. But these and the others afore rehearsed, as many as served upon the City horses, had their horses taken from them, were displaced out of their Tribe, and condemned all to lose their voices, and to serve without City pay. Neither were the Censors carefull to correct the Senat, and reform the degree of the Knights only, but also they proceeded to rase out of the publike checkroll of the younger Citizens, the names of all those, who for four years space had not served in wars, as many, I say of them, as could not justly plead and alledge, either ordinary immunity by law, or sickness for their excuse. And of these were found guilty above 2000: who were awarded to be Ærarii, and all of them to be removed out of their tribe. And besides this shamefull disgrace and note of ignominy awarded by L the Censors, there passed a heavy decree of the Senat against them, to wit, That all they whom the Censors had thus scored and noted, should be bound to serve on foot in the wars, and be confined and sent over into Sicily, to the residue there of the army that remained at Cannæ. And no other time of service and warfare was limited unto this sort of the souldiers, but untill the enemy were driven clean out of Italy.

Whiles the Censors, as is aforsaid, upon occasion that the Cities stock was so decayed, gave over and forbare to bargain for the repairing and maintenance of the Churches and holy Temples, and for the finding and provision of chariot horses for the State, and such like; there resorted unto them a great number of those that were wont at the spear to take these bargains at their hands by the great, and for a gross sum of money: who exhorted the Censors to deal in those matters M still, and to set, let, and enter into bargain with them, as if the City Chamber wanted no money: making this offer that none of them all would demand paiment out of the common Chest, before the wars were fully ended.

Then repaired unto the Censors the Masters of those bondmen, whom T. Sempronius had manumised and set free at Beneventum, saying, that they were sent by the Triumvirs, out of the office of the Bankers, called Mensarii, for to receive again their monies, according as they prized and valued their slaves: howbeit, they would not, before the war was finished. And as the hearts of the Commons were thus favourably affected, to sustain and support the poverty of the treasure-house; so the stocks of money also that belonged first to Orphans, and afterwards to widows, began now to be bestowed in the Chamber of the City: and they that presented and brought in N those moneys, beleeved assuredly, that they could not lay them up more sure and safe, than in the publike credit and security of the City. And whatsoever out of these stocks was disbursed and defraied, for to buy and provide any thing for the Orphans or widows aforesaid, the treasurers kept a book thereof, and noted it down in a register. This kindness and benevolence of private persons unto their country, extended it self from the City, even as far as to the Camp: insomuch, that neither horseman nor Centurion would take their wages, but rebuke and rate them, that could find in their hearts to receive their pay, terming them no better than mercenaries and hirelings.

Now Q. Fabius the Consul lay in Camp before Casilinum, which City was kept with a garrison of two thousand Campans, and seven hundred of Annibal his souldiers. They had for their Captain and Commander, one Statius Metius, sent thither by Cn. Magius Atellanus; who for that O year was * Mediastuticus of Capua. He put the bondslaves and Commons in arms, intermingled one with another, for to enter upon the Camp of the Romans, whiles the Consul was busie in assaulting Casilinum. Fabius was nothing ignorant of all these things, and therefore he sent unto Nola to his Collegue there, signifying unto him, that there was need of a second army to make head against the Campans, whiles the other was employed about the assault of Casilinum: and telling him besides, that either he must himself come in person, leaving a mean garrison behind him at Nola: or else if he might not be spared from thence, for fear of danger from Annibal,

* The head Magistrat, as Lord Maior.

A Annibal, he would send for T. Gracchus the Pro-Consul, from Beneventum. Upon this message, Marcellus having left in Nola a guard of two thousand souldiers, with the rest of his forces, presented himself before Casilinum: upon whose coming, the Campans who were ready to set forward, staid themselves and were quiet. So both Consuls together jointly began to assault Casilinum: where the Roman souldiers that rashly came under the walls received much hurt: and Fabius seeing little good done, judged it best to surcease and give over the enterprise, being a service of small consequence, and nevertheless very dangerous: and to depart from thence, seeing there was business toward of greater importance. But Marcellus contrariwise was of opinion and said, that as there were many things which great warriors were not to attempt: so if they were once B taken in hand and the adventure given, they were not lightly to be given over and laid aside; forasmuch as in it lay matter of great consequence, for fame and reputation, both waies: and so he prevailed, that the enterprise was not neglected and abandoned. Whereupon there were mantilets and all other kinds of fabricks and engines of battery and assault, bent against the City: so as the Campans besought Fabius, that they might depart to Capua in safety. And when some few were gone forth, Marcellus possessed himself of that gate whereout they went: & then they fell to kill and slay one with another, first about the gate: and after they had rushed once in, they put to like execution those also within the City. Fifty there were or thereabout of the Campans that first got out of the town, and fled for mercy to Fabius: and they by his guard and safe conduct arrived at Capua. But see Casilinum, through the lingring slackness of the Inhabitants that craved C protection, was (by advantage taken of their long parley, and temporizing) won by the enemies. The captives, so many as were either Campans or Annibal his souldiers, were sent to Rome, and there clapt up fast in prisons. But the multitude of the townsmen were distributed into sundry Cities adjoyning, and there kept in ward.

At the very same time that the Consuls after their conquest, retired from Casilinum, Gracchus being in the country of the Lucans, and having gathered and enrolled certain cohorts and companies of souldiers out of those parts, sent them out a forraging, under the conduct of a Captain of Allies, into the territories of the enemies. Hanno encountred them as they straggled in scattering wise out of order, and set upon them, and paid his enemies again with the like defeat and loss, or not much less than that which he had received at Beneventum: and in great hast withdrew himD self into the country of the Brutii, for fear lest Gracchus should overtake him.

The Consul Marcellus returned back to Nola, from whence he came, and Fabius went forward into Samnium, to spoil and waste the country, and to recover by force of arms the Cities which had revolted. The Samnits about Caudium were pitiously and grievously damnified: their villages in all places set on fire, their fields laid waste and destroyed, and great booties both of cattel and people driven away. Six towns forced by assault, namely, Compulteria, * Telesia, Cossa, Melæ, Fuisulæ, and Orbitanium. In the Lucans country, the town of * Blandæ: and in Apulia, the City * Ancæ was assaulted. In these towns and Cities, there were taken prisoners and slain 25000 of the enemies: of fugitives and runnagate traitors there were recovered 370, whom the Consul sent home again to Rome, and being thither come, they were all beaten and scourged with E rods in the Comitium, and then pitched down headlong to the earth, from the rock Tarpeia. These exploits were atchieved by Q. Fabius, within the compass of a few daies. But Marcellus by occasion that he lay sick at Nola, was hindred from performing any feats of arms. The Prætor likewise Q. Fabius, who had the charge and jurisdiction of the province about Luceria, won by force about the same time the town Accua, and fortified a standing camp planted before Arpos. Telese. * Belvedere. * Callipoli.

Whiles the Romans were thus employed about these affairs in divers other places, Annibal was come unto Tarentum, to the exceeding great damage and detriment of all places where he journeyed: but being once arrived in the territory of Tarentum, he began to march and lead his army most peaceably. There he did no harm at all, made no havock, nor once went out of the F high way. And it was evidently seen that all this was done not upon any modesty that appeared either in souldier or Captain, but only to win unto him the hearts of the Tarentins. But when he approached the walls of the City, and saw no commotion, nor insurrection from thence upon the discovery of his Vanguard, as he thought he should, he pitched his Camp almost a mile from the town. Now had M. Valerius the Vice-Prætor, who was Admirall of the Fleet at Brundusium, sent T. Valerius his Lieutenant unto Tarentum, three daies before that Annibal shewed himself before the wals. He had mustred and enrolled the flower of the Nobility, and so bestowed at every gate, and about the walls where need required, good guards for defence: with such vigilant diligence both day and night, that he gave no opportunity and advantage either to the enemies to adventure any assault, or to the doubtfull and untrusty friends to practice any treaG son. So Annibal, having spent there certain daies in vain, and seeing none of them who repaired unto him at the Lake * Avernus, either to come themselves, or to send messenger or letters: and perceiving now that he had rashly and foolishly followed vain promises, and so was deluded; dislodged and removed from thence. And even then also he spared the territory of Tarentum, and did no hurt at all: and albeit his fained and counterfeit lenity and mildness hitherto took no effect: yet he hoped still thereby to corrupt their faithfull alleageance to the Romans: and so he went to Salapia. And (by reason that midsummer was past, and he liked well of that place for a winter harbour) he conveyed thither all the corn from out of the Territory of Metapontum * Lago di Tripergula.

and Heraclea. Then he sent out the Numidians and Moors, to fetch booties and prizes from out H of the Salentine country, and all the woods and chases next unto Apulia, from whence they drave of other cattell small store: but of horses especially they brought away great numbers, of which there were four thousand divided amongst the horsemen to be handled, broken, and made gentle.

The Romans seeing there was like to be war in Sicily, & the same not lightly to be regarded: & that the death of the Tyrant there, rather gave the Syracusians good Captains, than wrought any change in their minds, or alteration in the cause: assigned unto M. Marcellus, one of the Consuls, that Province to govern. Presently upon the murder of Hieronymus, first the souldiers in the Leontin country, began to mutine and make an uprore, and boldly spake and said, That the Kings I death should be expiate, and his obsequies solemnized with sacrificing the bloud of conspirators.
But afterwards, when they heard often iterated the sweet name of liberty and freedom restored unto them: and that there was good hope that the souldiers should have a largess dealt amongst them out of the Kings Treasure, and be under the command of Captains of better quality, and having besides all this, a bedroll rehearsed unto them of the Tyrant his cruelty and foul facts, and of more filthy and loathsome lusts: their affections were so altered, that they suffered the body of their King to lie above ground unburied, whom a little before, they so greatly desired and wished for.
Now as concerning the conspirators, whiles the rest of them remained behind to assure and pos-sesse themselves of the army, Theodorus and Sosis took the Kings horses and rode post, as hard as ever they could to Syracusa, for to surprize upon a sudden all his followers and favourites (who K knew nothing of that which was done) and fall upon them at unawares: but they were prevented not only by the fame (which above all other things in such cases is most swift) but also by a courrier one of the Kings servants. Whereupon Andronodorus had seized beforehand of that part of the City which is called the Island, together with the Castle, and all other places that he could come at which were thought of any good importance; and them he fortified with good guards.
* The City of Syracuse was divided into four parts, Hexapylos Tiche, Acradina and Insula.
* In other authors called, Tyche, or Tuke Fortuna, whose Temple there stood.
* Archradine of others.
Theodorus and Sosis being entred within the City at * Hexapylos after sun-setting, in the twy-light and shutting in of the evening: and shewing the Kings royall robes all embrued with bloud, and the ornament and attire likewise of his head, he passed through * Thica, and called aloud unto the people to fight all at once for their liberty, and to arm themselves, and willed them to repair into * Acradina. The people some of them ran out into the streets, others stood in their entries and L porches, divers looked out at the windows from within their houses, and asked what the matter might be? Every place shone with torch and cresset-light, and was filled with sundry garboils and hurlyburlies. As many as were in arms gathered together in the open places of the City: those that were unarmed, took down off the Temple of Jup. Olympius the spoils of the Gauls & the Illyrians, which the people of Rome had given as a present to K. Hiero, and which he set aloft for a memori-all: praying unto Jupiter that he would vouchsafe them this gracious favour, as to bestow those sacred weapons & harness upon them that meant to arm themselves therewith, for the defence of their country, or the maintenance of the Churches and shrines of the gods, & for the recovery of their liberty. This multitude also joyned with the corps de guards, that in the principal quarters of the City, were bestowed in places convenient. But Andronodorus amongst other places that he fortified made sure also with strong guards of armed men the publike garners of the City within the M Island. There was a place enclosed round about with four-square stone, and built strongly like a forress; this was possessed by the youth that had been appointed for to guard and defend that quarter: and they sent messengers into Acradina, to signifie that the garners and the corn were kept by them to the behoof of the Senat. And on the morrow at the break of day, the whole people, as well armed as unarmed, assembled together in Acradina, within the Palace. And there before the altar of Concordia which in that place stood erected, one of the principal and chief Citizens, named Polyneus, made an Oration unto them all, with frankness of speech enough, tending unto liberty and yet seasoned with modesty & moderation, in this wise: "Men (quoth he) that have ex"perience of servitude and other indignities, fall to abhor the same, and their stomacks rise a- N "gainst them as known evils. But as for civill discord, what calamities & miseries it bringeth with "it, the Citizens of Syracuse have heard their fathers tell, and not seen and tasted themselves. That "ye have been so ready to take up arms and weapons in hand, I commend you for it: but I would "con you more thank, if ye used them not, unless ye be driven thereto by extream necessity.
"For the present, I hold it good, and my counsel is, that Embassadors be sent unto Andronodorus,
"to intimate unto him, yea, and to require and charge him, to submit himself unto the Senat and
"people, and by them to be ordered: to set open the gates of the Island, to put away from about "him his guard, and deliver up the castle and garrison. But in case he intend under the pretence "of being guardian or protector to the kingdom of another, thereby to usurp it to his own use;
"he must be given to understand, by mine advice, that we will seek to recover our liberty out of the O
"hands of Andronodorus, more fiercely and forcibly than from Hieronymus. And so presently upon this assembly, embassadors were sent. Then the Senat went together and sat in Council: for, as during the raign of Hiero, there was set an ordinary publike Councill of State: so after his death unto that day, the Senators were neither called together, nor their advice taken or sought in any matter. When the Embassadors were come unto Andronodorus, and had delivered their message, he was himself (verily) for his own part moved with the generall consent of the Citizens; but especially when he considered, that among other quarters of the City possessed by the adverse

A verſe ſide, that one part alſo of the Iſland, which was the ſtrongeſt, was betraied (as it were) and held out againſt him. But when the Embaſſadors called ſtill upon him to come forth, his wife Demarata, daughter of King Hiero, puffed up ſtill with the proud mind and haughty ſtomack of a Prince, and full of the vain humour and ſpirit of a woman, put him oftentimes in mind of a ſaying, that Denis the Tyrant had evermore in his mouth, namely, "That a man ſhould not ride on horſe-
"back to be depoſed from his royall dignity and eſtate of tyranny, but be led fair and ſoftly a foot-
"pace, and go to that as a bear to the ſtake. An eaſie matter (quoth ſhe) it is for one to yield and "forgo the poſſeſſion of high place and honour, and a thing that may be done in the turning of an "hand, whenſoever one will: but to compaſs and attain thereto is a right hard matter, and of all B "other moſt difficult. You were beſt therfore to borrow ſome reſpit of time of the Embaſſadors,
"for to take farther deliberation of this main point, and in the mean while, to uſe the advantage
"thereof, to ſend for the Souldiers out of the Leontin country: unto whom, no doubt, if you "would promiſe a reward out of the Princes treaſure, you ſhall be Lord of all. This perillous unhappy counſel of a woman Andronodorus neither deſpiſed and rejected altogether, nor yet preſently accepted and embraced: ſuppoſing it a better and ſafer courſe, if he meant to aſpire unto high dignity and great puiſſance, for the preſent to temporize and give place unto the neceſſity of the time. And therefore he willed them to carry back unto the Senat this anſwer from him, That he ſubmitted himſelf, and would be ordered & ſet down by the Senat and the people. The morrow after, ſo ſoon as it was day-light, he cauſed the gates of the Iſland to be ſet open, & ſhewed himſelf C in the market-place of Acradina: where he aſſended up unto the altar of Concord from which the day before, Polyneus had made a ſpeech unto the people. He began his Oration with an excuſe of his late coming and long ſtay behind, and craved pardon therefore: alledging, "That he had kept
"the gates ſhut, not becauſe he meant to ſeparate his own affairs from the State, and not to take
"ſuch part as the City took: but when ſwords were once drawn he feared what would be the end
"and iſſue of murders and maſſacres, and whether men would ſtay their hands, when there was "aſſurance of liberty effected, (as being contented with the death only of the Tyrant) or whether,
"as many as either in bloud and kindred, or in affinity and alliance, or in other offices or ſervice,
"were toward the K. and his Court, ſhould be counted culpable in the fault of another & ſo like-"wiſe have their throats cut. For after that (quoth he) I underſtood once, that they who had de-D "livered and ſet free their country, were minded and willing to ſave & preſerve it, thus enfranchi-
"ſed: and that there was conſulting on all hands indifferently for the good of the ſtate, I made no "longer doubt of the matter, but to yield both mine own perſon, and alſo all that ever was under "my hand (as committed unto me upon truſt and fidelity) unto my native country: now that he,
"who put all into my hand, is through his own folly & outrage overthrown and brought to con-"fuſion. Then turning to the murderers of the tyrant, and by name calling unto Theodorus and So-
"ſis. A noble and memorable piece of ſervice ye have already done, (quoth he) but truſt me truly,
"your glory in this behalf is begun only, and not throughly finiſhed and performed: nay, a great "danger is yet behind, unleſs ye ſee to the generall concord and unity of all parts, that the com"mon liberty of the City, turn not into pride and inſolency beyond all meaſure.

The Oration of Andronodorus.

E After this ſpeech ended, he laid down the keys of the gates, and of the Kings treaſure, at their feet. And ſo for that day, when the people were diſmiſſed from the aſſembly, with joy and mirth they went in proceſſion and ſupplication with their wives and children, round about all the Churches & Chappels of their gods. The day following, the ſolemn election was held for the creation of Prætors. And firſt, before all others, Andronodorus was choſen, and the reſt for the moſt part, the very murderers of the Tyrant. They elected alſo two that were abſent, to wit, Sopater and Deomenes. Who being advertized of all matters that paſſed at Syracuſe, delivered up the Kings treaſure which lay in the Leontins country, and was now brought unto Syracuſe, into the hands of the Treaſurers: who for the ſame purpoſe were created. Likewiſe that which was in the Iſland, and in Acradina, was committed over unto their cuſtody. That part alſo of the wall, which divi-F ded the Iſland from the reſt of the City, and was ſuppoſed too ſtrong a bar between, was by common conſent caſt down and raſed. And as their minds were thus affected and enclined to procure and maintain liberty, ſo all other matters ſorted ſutable and followed after accordingly.

Hippocrates and Epicides, when tidings came of the Tyrants death (which Hippocrates would fain have had concealed, and therefore ſlew the meſſenger that brought news thereof) being for-ſaken of the ſouldiers, returned to Syracuſa; ſuppoſing for the preſent, that to be the ſafeſt courſe they could take. Where, becauſe they would grow into no ſuſpition, nor to be noted to ſeek for ſome opportunity and occaſion of change and alteration in the State, firſt they preſented themſelves before the Prætors and Governors of the City, and ſo by their mediation, they had acceſs to the Senat. They gave out, "That they had been ſent from Annibal unto Hieronymus G "as unto a friend and confederate, and had yielded obedience unto him, as they were willed by "their own Generall and Commander. Now their deſire was, to return again unto Annibal. But "foraſmuch as they might not travell in ſafety, for the Roman forces, that ranged all over
"Sicily, they craved a convoy and ſufficient guard to conduct them, as far as to Locri in Sicily:
"aſſuring them, that by this ſmall curteſie and deſert of theirs, they ſhould reap great thanks of "Annibal, and come into high favour with him. The ſuit was ſoon obtained. For deſirous they "were, that thoſe Cavalies that uſed to lead the King, and were expert and skilfull beſides in war,
"and therewith needy and audacious, ſhould be ſent away: but they made not ſo good ſpeed to put this their desire in execution, as they should have done. For in the mean season, these young and lusty matiall men, and such as ever had conversed with the souldiers, went up and down, one while to them, another whiles to the fugitive strangers that were revolted, (who for the most part were sailers and sea men that came from the Romans) yea, and sorted themselves with the basest and most abject persons of the Commoners, spreading tales, and whispering into their ears sundry suspitious matters of crime against the Senators and great men of the Nobility, saying, that they plotted and practised closely under hand nothing else, but that Syracusa, under a colour of reconciliation and accord, should be reduced to the obedience of the Romans: and then, the side and faction and some few with them that are of councell to renew the association, might be Lords, and tyrannize over the rest. By this means there flocked multitudes, every day more than other to Syracusa: whose ears were tickled, and itched still to hear such surmises, and were apt enough to give credit thereto. And they gave not only Hippocrates and Epicides, but Andronodorus also good hope of an alteration, and a new world. For he (being at length overcome with the importunate suggestions of his wife, who ever put into his head, That now was the only time to usurp and take upon him the rule of the State, whiles all things were troubled, and in a confusion, upon their new and unknown liberty; whiles the souldiers were presented in their way, to be dealt withall, and daily maintained and fed out of the Kings Exchequer; and whiles those captains sent from Annibal, by reason of their acquaintance with the souldiers, were present to set forword, and further his designments) first therefore acquainted Themistius, who had married Gelo his daughter, with his complot: and after a few daies (full unadvisedly) imparted his mind also, unto one Aristo, an Actor of Tragedies, whom he used aforetime to make privy unto his other secrets. This Aristo was well born, and descended of a worshipful house, a man in good place and of honest reputation: and his profession (for among the Greeks it is reputed no matter of shame to play either in Tragedies or Comedies) was no blot either to his birth, or disgrace to his calling: and therefore as one who made more reckoning of his duty to his country, than of private friendship, bewrayed & disclosed all the treason unto the Prætors. Who finding by good proofs and certain evidences that this was no forged and counterfeit information, after consultation had with the Ancients of the Council, by their warrant and direction, set a guard of armed men about the door of the Senat House, and so soon as Themistius and Andronodorus were entred in place, slew them outright. And when there began some uprore upon this fact, which in shew seemed very horrible and hainous (especially to all the rest that knew not the cause:) at length they appeased the tumult and caused silence, and brought the informer into the Council House, that had detected the intended treason: who declared all things orderly in particular: namely, that this conspiracy was devised and sprung first from the marriage of Harmonia the daughter of Gelo, who was wedded unto Themistius: that divers auxiliary souldiers of Affricans and Spaniards were appointed and provided to massacre the Prætors, and other principal Citizens: that their goods were promised unto the murderers to be ransacked and rifled: that besides, there was a band of mercenary souldiers (such as were wont to be at a beck, and ready to execute the commandment of Andronodorus) set in a readiness to seize the Island again, and keep it to his use. And when he had laid every thing abroad in order, with all circumstances, what the practises were and by whom they were to be performed and executed, and shewed before their eyes most plainly the whole conspiracy: & namely, what persons and what forces should have been employed. Then the whole body of the Senat were likewise verily perswaded that they had deserved such an end, and were as justly murdered as Hieronymus. But without the Councel-House door, the confused multitude, composed of all sorts of people who were doubtfull of the matter, and knew not what to make thereof, cried out. And albeit they menaced and threatned before the entry and porch of the Senat, yet at the sight of the dead bodies of the Conspirators, lying before their face, they were affrighted and soon husht: so as with great silence they followed the whole body of the Commons to the publike place of assembly. Unto whom, Sopater, by order from the Senat, and his fellow Prætors, was commanded to make an Oration.

Sopater his speech to the people of Syracusa.

He began formally to inveigh against Andronodorus and Themistius, (as they that accuse men at the bar) and ripped up their former life past, charging them with all the wicked deeds and impious facts, committed since the death of Hiero: "For what (quoth he) did Hieronymus, nay, "what could he do of himself, so long as he was but a child and stripling, and scarcely come all "the while he lived to have any hair on his face? His officers and guardians, were they that ruled "all, and managed the kingdom at their pleasures, but so, as the blame and heavy load lay upon "him. Who if they had perished either before Hieronymus, or at least wise together with him, they "had been but well enough served. But they, who long ago had deserved to die, and for whom the "gallows had already groned, ceased not still, after the death of the tyrant, to devise and plot new "mischiefs, one in the neck of another. At the first, openly in the sight of the world, Andronodo-"rus by shutting the gates of the Island, entred by way of inheritance upon the kingdom, and "sought to seize in his own right, and immediat heir apparant, upon those things that he held "under the Prince, only during his nonage. Afterwards, being betrayed by them that were in the "Island, & besieged round about by the whole City (which was possessed fully of the Acradina) "seeing that in vain he had attempted to be King by apert and open force; he sought means now "to aspire thereto secretly, and by cunning sleights. Neither could he be so much as reclaimed "and won by any favours and honours done unto him: who being himself a traitor to the free-

A "dom of the ſtate, was notwithſtanding advanced to be Prætor, among other redemers of the li"berty of their country. But no marvel it was (quoth he) that theſe men were of this haughty
"ſpirit, and longed to be Kings; for they had to their wives two princely dames, the daughters,
"one of King Hiero, and the other of his ſon Gelo.

At theſe words, the people from all parts of the aſſembly began to cry out with one voice, that neither of them both were worthy to live, nor any one beſides of the Kings ſtock and linage ought to remain upon the face of the earth. See the nature and diſpoſition of the multitude; Either they ſerve baſely, or rule proudly. Liberty that is the mean between, they have neither the B skill to deſpiſe with reaſon, or the grace to entertain in meaſure. Now, there wanted not (ye may be ſure, as at all times elſe) ready inſtruments and firebrands, to help forward, and kindle more anger, ſuch, as ſeeing the Commoners diſtempered already, and bloudily minded of themſelves, put them forward to murder and maſſacre. As it appeared then; For immediatly, as the Prætors put up a bill, that all the Kings ſtock ſhould be rooted out, and the whole line utterly extinguiſhed: before in manner that it was all read out and publiſhed, it paſſed clear, and was granted. And preſently there were ſent out certain perſons from the Prætors, that murdered Demarata and Harmonia the daughters of King Hiero and Gelo, the two wives of Andronodorus and Themiſtius. Now there was another daughter of Hiero, named Heraclea, wife to Soſippus, who having been ſent as Embaſſador from Hieronymus, to King Ptolomeus, choſe a life in voluntary exile, and lived not with C his wife. She having an inkling given her aforehand, and knowing that the murderers were coming alſo toward her, took her two daughters, virgins: and together, with their hair looſe hanging down their ſhoulders, and in other moſt poor array and rufull habit, able to have moved pity and compaſſion, they were fled into a privat Oratory or Chappell unto their houſe-gods, to ſave themſelves. The mother ſeeing the murtherers fell to entreating them moſt pitiouſly, and recommended unto them the late remembrance of her father Hiero, and her brother Gelo: "Beſeech- The pitifull words of dame Heraclea.
"ing them not to ſuffer her (an innocent and guiltleſs perſon) to fare the worſe, and be puniſhed
"upon hatred that was born unto her nephew Hieronymus. As for me (quoth ſhe) I reaped no "good by his Reign and Kingdom, unleſs it were the baniſhment and abſence of my husband:
"and as by the life of Hieronymus, my fortune was not ſo good as my ſiſters; ſo after he was mur-D "dred and dead, my cauſe is not ſo bad, nor like unto hers. Moreover, and beſides, in caſe Andro-
"nodorus had effected his deſignments, my ſiſter ſhould have been a Queen, and reigned together "with her husband: but as for me, I muſt have been a ſubject and ſervant with the reſt. Again,
"if there were any meſſengers ſent unto Soſippus, to report the death of Hieronymus, and the re-
"ſtitution of Syracuſe to liberty: who can make doubt, but that forthwith he would be embar"ked and take the ſeas, and return again into his country? But how much are men put beſides
"their hope, and deceived of their expectation? And who would ever have thought to have ſeen
"in a freed ſtate his wife and children in danger to loſe their lives? For wherein do we hinder the "common liberty, or the courſe of laws? What danger can come to any perſon from us, one de-"ſolate lone woman, and in manner a widdow, and two young maidens livings as Orphans fa-"therleſs? And if it be ſaid again that there was indeed no fear of hurt to be imagined from us; E "but only the Kings bloud and kindred was odious in the eyes of the people: Then, quoth ſhe,
"let us be ſent away far from Syracuſe and Sicily, and confined over to Alexandria, the wife to "her husband, the daughters to their own father. But when they would neither give ear to her words, nor encline their hearts to pity and compaſſion: then becauſe ſhe would not ſpend longer time in vain (for now ſhe ſaw ſome of them drawing their ſwords forth) ſhe gave over all entreating for her ſelf, "and beſought them inſtantly to be good yet, to the young ſilly girles, and "ſpare their lives, unto whom being of that age, even the very enemies in their heat of anger for-
"bare to offer violence: and that ſeeing they were to be revenged of tyrants, they would not play
"the tyrants themſelves, and commit that wickedneſs, which they ſeemed to hate in others. A- The tragicall midſt theſe words the murderers (ſent from the Prætors) pulled her forth of the inward and moſt murder of La-F ſecret place of the chappell, and cut her throat: and when they had ſo done, they aſſailed and fell dy Heraclea and her two upon the the maidens, beſprent with the bloud of their mother: who for ſorrow of heart and fear daughters, together being paſt themſelves and out of their wits, and as it were in a furious fit of frenzy, ran young virgins.
againſt them, and got out of the Chappell: minding, if they could have eſcaped forth, and recovered the ſtreet, to ſet the whole City on an uprore. And ſo ſhifted for themſelves, poor wenches, by running to and fro within the houſe, (which was not large and ſpacious) that for a good while they eſcaped amongſt the thickeſt of ſo many armed men, and oftentimes avoided their reaches, and caught no hurt: yea, and when they had caught hold of them, notwithſtanding they were to ſtruggle with ſo many hands, and thoſe ſo ſtrong, yet they wound away from them all: untill at length after they had received many a wound, and filled every place with bloud, they fainted and G ſunk down, and yielded up their innocent ſpirits. This murder, no dout, was of it ſelf pitious; but much more lamentable, by occaſion of a preſent accident. For ſtraight after came a meſſenger with expreſs commandment, to ſpare the women, and not to kill them: for that upon a ſudden the hearts of the people relented, and enclined to mercy. But when they heard there was ſo quick diſpatch made of execution, that neither they had time to bethink themſelves and repent, nor ſpace to cool upon their heat, they fell pity and compaſſion into an extream fit of anger and choler. The multitude thereupon began to mutter and murmur, and called to have an election of Prætors in the room of Andronodorus and Themiſtius (for they were both of them Prætors) which

new election was not like to fall out in the end to the good liking and contentment of the other H Prætors in place. So a day was set down, and proclaimed for this election. At which time, it happened that beyond all mens expectation, one from the farthest part of the assembly nominated Epicides: and then another from thence named Hippocrates. After which, the same voices came thick and threefold still, so as it seemed the multitude would wholly go that way. The people there assembled, were a confused sort intermingled, as well with a number of souldiers, as of a company of Citizens and Commoners; yea, and many of them were strangers fugitive, shuffled among, such as rather than their life desired a generall change and alteration. The Prætors at first dissembled all, and would seem to take no knowledge thereof: but thought it best to put off the matter to a farther day: yet overcome at last with the common accord and consent of the people: and I fearing withall a mutiny and sedition pronounced and declared the men aforenamed for Prætors. Neither would they, at first hand so soon as they were created, set that abroach which was in their mind and desire to effect: notwithstanding they were displeased and discontented much, both for that there had been Embassadors dispatched unto Appius Claudius, about a truce for ten daies: and also when it was obtained, that there were others addressed to treat for the renewing of the ancient league with the Romans.

At the same time (Ap. Claudius) the Roman Generall lay at Murgantia with an Armada of 100 gallies, waiting there to hear what was the event of the troubles which arose upon the murder of the tyrants: and how far forth men would proceed upon this their new and unwonted liberty. And much about those daies, when as the Syracusian Embassadors were sent from Appius unto K Marcellus now coming into Sicilia, Marcellus himself after he heard the conditions of peace, thought they would grow to some good agreement and conclusion in the end: and therefore sent other Embassadors to Syracuse, personally to debate and confer in the presence of the Prætors, concerning the renewing of the League aforesaid. But by that time, they found not the City in the same quiet tune and peaceable state. For Hippocrates and Epicides, after news came that the Carthaginian Navy was arrived and rid at anchor under the bay of * Pachinus, confidently, and without all fear buzzed in the ears one while of the mercenary souldiers, another while of the fugitive traitors, many false surmises against their brethren in Office, and namely, that they went about to betray Syracuse to the Romans. But Appius began to keep his Armada at anchor in the very mouth of the river, listning to know what heart and hope they of the contrary faction had, L to effect that which they intended. Much credit was given (as it should seem) unto those slanders and lewd suggestions: insomuch as at the first, the multitude ran to the waters side in a great hurry and tumultuous manner to hinder their landing, if haply they attempted it. In this troublesome confusion of all things, it was thought good, that the people should meet together to deliberate what was best to be done. In which assembly, whiles some drew one way, others haled and pulled another way, and were at the point to mutine and grow to a sedition, Apollonides, one of the principall and chief Citizens, made a speech to very good purpose for preservation of the publike peace, and thus he said: "Never was there any City nearer, either to hope of assured safety, or to "fear of utter destruction than this of ours at this present. For if all would go one way together, "and with one accord either encline to the Romans, or bend to the Carthaginians, there were M "not a City under the cope of heaven, whose state were more happy and fortunate than ours. "But in case we de distracted, and the Common-weal go divers waies, there would not be more "bitter and cruell war between the Syracusians and the Romans, than among the Syracusians "themselves: when within one and the same walls, there should be banding one against another, "and each side have their forces, their armor, and their Cr Captains of their own. And therefore "we ought of all hands to endeavour what we can, that all may be of one mind and draw in the "same line. As for the main point now in question, Whether society and alliance be the better "and more commodious, the Romans or the Carthaginians, is a matter of far less moment and "importance than to be consulted and studied long upon. Howbeit, in choosing our friends and "allies, we are to be directed by the authority and act of Hiero, rather than of Hieronymus: and N "to prefer that amity which we have tried for fifty years in much felicity, above a friendship for "the present unknown, and sometime heretofore found unfaithfull. It maketh somewhat also, to "resolve upon this course, that in case we should deny peace and alliance to the Carthaginians, "we need not presently go to war with them: but with the Romans we must out of hand make "account either of peace, or else of hot wars. This speech of his the less that it savoured of factious partiality and affection, the more authority and sway it carried with it. And besides the deliberation of the Prætors and choice Senators, the advice also of the martiall men were taken. And therefore the Captains of all their own ensigns and companies, yea, and the great Commanders of the auxiliary forces of their allies were willing to sit in Council together with them. When the matter had been often debated, and much contention and hot words passed between, at the last, O because there appeared no colourable reason or cause to make war with the Romans, they agreed that a peace should be concluded, and that together with their Embassadors, there should be others also from them to ratifie and confirm the thing.

* Porto Longobardo, or Cabo Passaro.

The Oration of Apollonides, to the people of Syracuse.

There passed not many daies between, when out of the Leontins country there arrived certain Orators, to crave help and succour for the guard and defence of their marches. This Embassage seemed to come very fitly and in good time, for to exonerate and rid the City of the unruly and disordered multitude, & likewise to send out of the way their Captains and ringleaders.

So

So Hippocrates the Prætor was commanded to lead thither the fugitive ſtrangers. Many alſo of the mercenary ſouldiers, that were waged to help them in their wars, accompanied them: ſo as in all, the number amounted to four thouſand. This expedition and journey contented greatly as well the ſenders and ſetters of it out, as alſo the parties themſelves that were ſent forth. For theſe of the one ſide had a good occaſion and opportunity now offered them, to contrive a change in State (the only thing that ſo long they had deſired) and thoſe of the other, were right glad, that the ſink (as it were) of the City was now well ſcoured and voided away. But this was like the palliative cure of a ſore, and a lightning for the preſent of a ſick body: whereby it might ſoon after by relapſe fall back, as it were, into a recidive, and a worſe diſeaſe and more dangerous than the other. For Hippocrates began at firſt to make rodes by ſtealth into the confines bordering upon the Roman Province, and there to waſte & ſpoil: afterwards when Appius had ſent a power of men to defend the frontiers of his confederats, he charged with his whole power upon that guard that was oppoſed againſt him, and ſlew many of them. Whereof, when Marcellus was advertized, he diſpatched Embaſſadors incontinently to Syracuſe, to charge them with the breach of peace: and to give them to underſtand, that there would never be wanting ſome occaſion or other of quarrell and war, unleſs Hippocrates and Epicides were removed, and ſent far enough out of the way, not only from Syracuſe, but alſo quite out of Sicily. Epicides for fear leſt if he remained preſent in the City, he might be charged and brought in queſtion, for the fault and treſpaſs of his brother abſent, or be wanting for his part, in the raiſing of new war; went himſelf alſo in perſon into the Leontins country: and ſeeing them there forward enough of themſelves, and provoked already againſt the Romans, began alſo to alienate and turn their hearts from Syracuſe. For in theſe terms he ſuggeſted and informed againſt the Syracuſians: namely, "how they had capitulated with the "Romans, that all the Cities and Nations which were under the Kings, ſhould be ſubject unto "them and within their juriſdiction: ſo as now they cannot be content (quoth he) with their li"berty, unleſs they rule alſo like Lords and Kings. I would aviſe and counſell you therefore, to "ſend word unto them and give them to underſtand, that the Leontins likewiſe deem it good "reaſon, that they ſhould themſelves be free: in regard either that the tyrant was killed within the "ground of their City, or becauſe the firſt alarm for liberty began there. For they leaving and a"bandoning the Captains there that followed the King ran at once from thence to Syracuſe. And "therefore they are (ſaith he) to raſe that aforeſaid article out of the inſtrument of the covenants, "or not to accept at all of peace with that condition. Soon were the multitude perſwaded hereunto. And therefore when the Embaſſadors of the Syracuſians came to the Leontins, both to make complaint for killing of the Roman Corps de guard, and alſo to command peremptorily, that Hippocrates and Epicides ſhould depart either to Locri, or to what other place they would rather chuſe, ſo they went their waies and voided clean out of Sicily: they returned unto them this ſtout anſwer again: that neither the Syracuſians had any commiſſion and warrant from them, to make peace with the Romans in their name, neither would they be tied and obliged to any confederacy made by others than their own ſelves. This anſwer the Syracuſians made report of to the Romans, and ſaid plainly, "That the Leontins were not under their juriſdiction, to be ordered and "cenſured by them: and therefore, any thing compriſed in the league with them notwithſtanding, the Romans might war againſt them without breach of any covenant: and in that war they "would not for their parts fail them, but do their beſt: upon condition, that when they were once "ſubdued, they might be reduced again under their obedience, according to the covenant comprehended in the League. Whereupon Marcellus with his whole power went forth againſt the Leontins, and ſent for Appius alſo, to aſſail them on the other ſide: and ſo hot were his ſouldiers in this ſervice, and bare themſelves ſo reſolute, for anger that the guard was ſlain, during the time that there was treaty of peace between that at the very firſt aſſault they won the City. Hippocrates and Epicides, after they ſaw the wals ſcaled, and the gates of the City broken open, betook themſelves for their ſafety, with ſome few into the Caſtle, from whence by night they made a ſecret eſcape, and fled to Herbeſus.

As the Syracuſians marched from home with a power of eight thouſand armed men, and were come forward as far as to the river Myla, they met with a meſſenger, who told them that the City Leontium was forced. They reported other news beſides, as well lies as truths, one with another, namely, that townſmen and ſouldiers indifferently without reſpect were put to the ſword; that he thought verily, there was not left one alive of fourteen years of age and upward; that the City was put to the ſack, and all the rich mens goods were given away. At this ſo fearful and horrible news, the army ſtaid and went not forward. And when they all were greatly troubled, their Leaders Soſis and Diomenes, conſulted what to do. This loud lie aroſe not upon nothing, but was occaſioned by miſtaking of a matter. For there were ſcourged and beheaded of fugitive traitors to the number of two thouſand. But of Leontins and other ſouldiers, there was not one hurt after the City was loſt. And every man had all his own goods reſtored unto him again: ſaving that only which in the firſt hurlyburly of a City newly won, hapned to miſcarry and periſh. Howbeit upon this bare report, they neither could be induced to go forward to the Leontins, complaining and grieving that their fellow ſouldiers were ſo betrayed and murdered, nor yet to abide there ſtill for to expect and hear more certain tidings. The Prætors perceiving their minds diſpoſed to revolt, and yet hoping that this mutinous fit of theirs would not continue long, in caſe the Captains and heads of their fury and folly were once rid out of the way led the army to Megara: and went

themſelves in perſon with a few horſemen toward Herbeſus, hoping to gain the City by treaſon, H whiles they all there were affrighted. But ſeeing that enterpriſe would not prevail, they minded to uſe forcible means. The morrow after they diſlodged and raiſed their Camp from Megara, purpoſing with all their forces to aſſail Herbeſus. Hippocrates and Epicides ſuppoſing this to be the only way for them, although at the firſt ſight not the ſafeſt, (conſidering all hopes beſides were cut off) namely, to put themſelves into the hands of the ſouldiers, who were for the moſt part acquainted with them, and beſides, upon the bruit of the execution and maſſacre of their fellow ſouldiers, throughly chafed, went out to meet the army. The formoſt enſigns in the forefront, happed to conſiſt of thoſe ſix hundred Cretenſians, who in the wars of Hieronymus had ſerved under them, and received a favour and benefit at Annibal his hands. For being taken priſoners at Thraſymenus, I among other auxiliaries that came to aid the Romans, they were ſet at large and ſent away without ranſom. Whom when Hippocrates and Epicides knew by their colours, habit, and faſhion of their armour, they held out branches of olives and other vails and tokens of ſuppliants, beſeeching them humbly to receive them, and being once received, to vouchſafe to protect them, and not to deliver them into the hands of the Syracuſians: by whom they ſhould ſoon be yielded unto the people of Rome, for to be murdred and cut in peeces. At this they all cryed aloud with one voice, and willed them to be of good chear, for they ſhould fare no worſe than their own ſelves. Upon this communication the enſigns ſtaid, and the army ſtood ſtill and marched not forward: but the generall Captains wiſt not as yet what the cauſe might be of this ſtay. After the rumour was ſpread that Hippocrates and Epicides were come, and that all the hoſt throughout by a generall applauſe K ſeemed to like well of their coming: the Prætors incontinently ſet ſpurs to horſe, and rode forward apace to the foreſront of the vanguard, demanding of the Cretenſians, what manner and faſhion this was of theirs? and how they durſt be ſo bold, as to parl and talk with enemies? and without licenſe of their Prætors to entertain them within their companies? And herewith they gave commandment, that Hippocrates ſhould be apprehended and bound ſure with chains. At which word the Cretenſians ſet up ſuch a cry, and the reſt ſo anſwered it again with the like, that it was well ſeen, in caſe they had proceeded forward as they began, they ſhould have incurred themſelves no ſmal danger. And thus in great perplexity, and fear of their own lives, they commanded to turn enſigns, and retire unto Megara, from whence they came; and diſpatched meſſengers preſently to Syracuſe, to ſignifie in what terms they ſtood. Hippocrates ſeeing the ſouldiers gi- L ven to be ſuſpitious and ready to beleeve every thing, deviſed a cunning ſhift beſides in this manner. After he had ſent out certain of the Cretenſians to beſet the waies between them and Syracuſe, he pretended that they had intercepted ſome letters from thence, which he read unto the ſouldiers, and were indeed framed and indited by himſelf. The tenor of the letters ran in this form: "The Prætors of Syracuſe, to M. Marcellus their friend, greeting. After theſe ſalutations and com- "mendations premiſed, as the manner is it followed written thus: you have done well and or- "derly in ſparing none at all of the Leontins. But all other mercenary ſouldiers beſides are in the "ſame Predicament: neither will Syracuſe be ever in quiet, ſo long as any forrain aid be either in "the City, or in your army. And therefore our advice and counſell is, that you would endeavour "to get them into your hands, who with our Prætors are encamped before Megara, and by exe- M "cution of them to deliver and ſet Syracuſe free in the end.

The contents of theſe letters were not ſo ſoon read, but with ſuch an outcry and alarm they ran to their weapons on all hands, that the Prætors amidſt this garboil were fain to ride away as faſt as they could gallop toward Syracuſe. But although they were fled, the mutiny nevertheleſs continued and was not appeaſed: for the ſouldiers fell upon the Syracuſians that were in the camp amongſt them, and they had all drank of the ſame cup, and not one eſcaped, but that Epicides and Hippocrates came between, and oppoſed themſelves againſt the multitude in this their furious rage not upon any pitifull compaſſion that was in them, or regard of common humanity, but becauſe they would not cut themſelves from all hope of return: and beſides, they were not only deſirous to have the ſouldiers themſelves affectionate unto them and faithfull, and withall inſtead N of hoſtages: but alſo purpoſed, by this ſo great deſert, firſt to gain and win unto them the kinſfolk and friends of thoſe ſouldiers, and afterwards to oblige and bind them faſt by ſo good a pawn and gage, remaining ſtill among them. And having good experience, with how ſmall a puff and gale of wind the common people turneth every way, they ſuborned a ſouldier, one of them who was beſieged within the City of Leontium, to carry news to Syracuſe, ſuting with thoſe faiſe tidings that were reported at the river Myla: yea, and to aver the ſame confidently upon his own knowledge, and tell things that were doubtfull, as if they were moſt certain, and by himſelf ſeen and known: thereby to ſtir up men to anger and indignation. This fellow was not only credited of the common multitude, but alſo being brought into the Council-Houſe, he greatly moved the Senat: inſomuch as ſome of them, more light of beliefe than others, gave it out openly and ſaid, O "That it was happy, that the avarice and cruelty of the Romans was thus diſcovered among the "Leontins. And god bleſs us from them here. For if they ſet foot once within Syracuſe, they "would commit the like outrages, yea, and worſe too a great deal, and more horrible; as they "ſhould find there greater matter to work upon, and to ſatisfie their covetous and greedy appe- "tite to the full. Whereupon they agreed in generall, to ſhut the gates, and to ſtand upon their guard, and defend the City. But they all feared not alike, nor hated the ſame perſons. For the martiall men, in a manner every one, and a great part of the common people abhorred the name of the

A Romans: the Prætors, and ſome few of the principal Citizens, albeit they were in the huff, and poſſeſſed with the falſe report aforeſaid, yet they had more regard to provide for a miſchief that was more imminent and near, and ready preſently to fall upon their heads. And now by this time Hippocrates and Epicides were come before Hexapylos. Within the City, the kinſfolk and friends of thoſe Citizens whith were in the army, drew together in conventicles, conferred among themſelves to ſet the gates open, and agreed to have the common country of them all, to be defended againſt the violence of the Romans. Now, when one only wicket of Hexapylos was opened, and they ready to enter in thereat, the Prætors came upon them in the manner. And firſt they com-B manded by word of mouth, and threatned them; after that, by vertue of their place and authority they ſeemed to fright and terrifie them: and laſt of all, ſeeing nothing could prevail, forgetting their own dignity and majeſty of their calling, they fell to pray and entreat them not to betray their country to thoſe, who aforetime were the inſtruments and ſuppoſts of the Tyrant, and now the corrupters of the army. But ſo deaf ear gave all the multitude in this their rage and furious fit unto the Prætors, that they within, as well as without, ſet their hands to, by all forcible means, to burſt down the gates, and ſo when they were all broken open, the army was let in ſafe, and received within the Hexapylos. The Prætors fled for refuge with the youth and ſtrength of the Citizens into Acradina. The mercenaries, the fugitives, and all the ſouldiers that were left in Syracuſa (of them who ſerved the King) joyned to the army, and augmented their forces. And C ſo Acradina alſo, was upon the firſt aſſault won. All the Prætors, but thoſe that eſcaped by flight, and ſaved themſelves in the midſt of this hurry, were ſlain: and the night coming upon them, ſtaid the maſſacre. The day following, all bondſlaves were called to receive the cap, and made free: the priſons were ſet open, and the priſoners let go at large. And this confuſed rabble and multitude of all ſorts created Hippocrates and Epicides Prætors. And thus Syracuſe, having for a ſhort time liberty ſhining favourably upon it, fell again into her old ſervitude.

When news hereof came to the Romans, incontinently they diſlodged and removed the camp from Leontium, and marched directly towards Syracuſe. It hapned the ſame time that the Embaſſadors ſent from Appius by the way of the haven, were embarked in a galleace of five banks of oars: but another galley of four banks which was ſent before, was not ſo ſoon entred into the D mouth of the harbour, but it was taken: and the Embaſſadors hardly, and with much ado eſcaped in the other. And now, the world there was grown to this paſs, that no laws of peace, no, nor ſo much as the very laws of arms were obſerved, but broken clean: at what time as the Roman army lay in camp a mile and an half from the City, at Olympium, the Temple of Jupiter. For when it was thought meet to ſend Embaſſadors from thence, Hippocrates and Epicides with their followers encountred them without the gate, and charged them upon their perill not to enter the City. The Roman Orator alledged, and ſaid, "That he came not to proclaim war againſt the Syracuſi-
"ans, but to bring aid and help, as well unto thoſe, who having eſcaped out of the midſt of the "ſlaughter fled unto the Roman Camp, as alſo unto them, who being kept under with fear, en"dure bondage and thraldom more miſerable than baniſhment, yea, and death it ſelf. Neither will E "the Romans (ſaith he) put up that ſhamefull and cruell murder of their Allies without due re"venge. And therefore, if thoſe perſons who were fled for ſuccour unto them, may return home
"ſafely into their country: if the authors of that maſſacre aboveſaid, be delivered into their hands:
"and if the Syracuſians may enjoy again their liberty, together with their laws, there ſhall not "need any hoſtility or war. But in caſe theſe conditions be not performed, they would perſecute "with fire and ſword, all ſuch as ſhall hinder and ſtand againſt the ſame, whoſoever.

To this Epicides framed his words in this wiſe: "If (ſaith he) ye had any meſſage and commiſ"ſion to parl with my brother and me, we would return you an anſwer accordingly. In the mean
"while ye were beſt be gone for this time, and return again when the City and ſtate of Syra-"cuſe ſhall be under their governance, unto whom ye were ſent. As for war, if the Romans think "it good to deal that way, they ſhall find and know by experience, try when they would, that it is F "one thing to aſſail Syracuſa, and another to ſet upon Leontium. And ſo leaving the Embaſſadors,
"he made the gates faſt againſt them.

From this time forward the Romans laid ſiege unto Syracuſe, and began to beleaguer it both by ſea and land at once. On the land ſide at Hexapylos, by water at Acradina, upon the walls whereof the ſea beateth. And like as they won the City of the Leontins, by terrifying them at the firſt aſſault, and therefore diſtruſted not, but that they ſhould force and enter this alſo, one ſide or other, being ſo large and vaſt as it was, not compact, but built ſo ſcattering, one part far aſunder from another, they approached with all their fabricks, engins, and ordnance of battery againſt the walls. Which enterpriſe of theirs, ſo reſolutely begun, and ſo hotly and forcibly followed, had ſped well and taken effect, if one man at that time had not been in Syracuſe, Archimedes was he, a ſingu-G lar Aſtronomer. A rare man for contemplation and beholding the ſky with the Planets, and other ſtars therein fixed: but a more wonderfull engineir for deviſing and framing of artillery, ordnance, fabricks, and inſtruments of war, whereby he would with very little ado, and at eaſe, check and fruſtrate all the inventions which the enemies with ſo great difficulty had prepared for to give the aſſault. This cunning artificer and admirable workman had planted engins of all ſorts upon the curtain of the wall, which ſtood on certain hills, and thoſe not of even height: and having for the moſt part high places that yielded hard acceſſe, and ſome other low again, whereunto men might come on even & plain ground, he fitted and furniſhed every place accordingly. Now Mar- cellus from out his gallies of five ranks of oars, assaulted the wall of Acradina, which (as is above-H said) is washed and dashed upon, with the sea. And from the other gallies, the archers, slingers, yea, and the light armed darters (called Velites) whose javelins are of that fashion, that they be unhandsome to be lanced back again (by those that have not the cast and skill of it) so assailed the defendants, that they hardly suffered any one to stand upon the walls without hurt and danger; These I say kept their gallies far distant fron the wall, because archers and darters had need of some space and compass to lance and let drive their shot. But unto the gallies of five course of oars, there were adjoyned other two of either side: for which purpose the oars within were taken away that they might close larboord to starboord and so be coupled one unto the other. And thus being rowed as one entire gally, by the help of the utmost oars without, they carried upon I them platforms of timber, framed with floores and lofts of planks, and other engins and instruments within them to batter and shake the walls. Against this artillery from the gallies, Archi- medes bestowed and disposed upon the walls counter-engins of sundry sizes, some greater, some smaller. Against those gallies that were furthest off he weighed and discharged stones of exceding main weight and those that were nearer he annoyed with lighter bullets, but those he shot far thicker upon them. And last of all, to the end that his own Citizens might, without taking harm, make a counter-battery against the enemies, and so annoy them, he caused certain barbacans or loop-holes almost a cubit deep to be pierced through the walls, and to stand thick from the foot the eof, to the parapet; and all to flank the enemy, through which overtures, they within shot closely against the enemies some arrows out of bows, some quarrels out of scorpions and K brakes of mean and indifferent bigness. And against those gallies, which approached more close and near under the wals (because they would be within the shot, and that they within might carry and levell over them) he devised a crane or swipe to be planted aloft upon the walls, having at the one end, which hung over the sea, a drag or grapling hook of iron like an hand, fastned thereto with a strong chain: which took hold upon the prow of a galley, and when the heavy counter-poise of lead at the other end weighed it down to the ground, and therewith drew with it the prow up on high, whiles it hung thus aloft in the air, the galley stood in a manner endlong upon the poop. And then the swipe being let go again all at once suddenly with a sway, dashed the galley tumbling (as it were) down from the top of the wall, with such a swinge and violence against the water (to the exceeding fear of the mariners) that if it had faln directly downright upon the L keel, yet needs it must have received good store of water into it. Thus all their provision for assault by the sea-side, was deluded and made void: and then they turned their whole forces from thence, to give assault by land. But even that part of the wall likewise, was as well furnished with all manner of engins and ordnance, provided at the great charge of Hiero, and by his carefull forecast for many years together: but devised and framed by the artificial cunning and skill only of Ar- chimedes. Besides, the naturall scituation of the ground was a great help: for that the rock, upon which the foundations of the wall stand, is for the most part so steep and bending forward, that not only the shot levelled out of an engine, but also whatsoever was but rolled & tumbled down, with the very own weight and poise, came with a great force & violence upon the enemy. Which foresaid cause made the assailants to have difficult climing up, and as unstedfast footing and kee- M ping of their hold. Whereupon they went to counsel. And considering well, that all their attempts and enterprizes were thus deluded and mocked by the enemy: it was thought good to give over assault, and only by long and continuall siege, to cut them off from all victuals both by land and sea. In the mean while Marcellus with one third part (well near) of the army, went forth in expedition, to recover again those Cities, which taking occasion upon these troubles, were revolted to the Carthaginians. And he gained Pelorus and Herbesus, which yielded on their own accord. As for Megara, which he won by assault, he rased it down to the ground, and sacked it, to the fearfull example of the rest and especially of the Syracusians.

And much about that time, Himilco also, who had a long time rid in the Bay of the Cape Pa- chynus with his Armado disbarked and set aland at Heraclea (which they call Minoa) 25000 foot- N men, 3000 horsemen, and twelve Elephants. He had not all this power of men when he lay with his fleet under Pachinus. For after that Hippocrates had taken and held the possession of Syracusa, he went to Carthage, where being sent unto both by Embassadors frgm Hippocrates, and also by letters from Annibal (who moved him and remonstrances, That now the time was come to recover Sicily again with much honour and glory: and being himself there present in person no bad sollicitor by word of mouth to further and follow the cause) he easily perswaded the Carthaginians and prevailed that as great a power both of horse and foot as might possibly be raised, should pass over into Sicily. Being arrived at Heraclea, within few daies after Agrigentum was delivered up into his hands. And all other Cities, which had banded and taken part with the Carthaginians, were put in so good hope to drive the Romans out of Sicily: that even they who were besieged O within Syracuse, to take heart unto them; and were so in their ruff, that supposing part of their forces sufficient enough to defend their City, they parted between them the charge and managing of the whole war in this manner: That Epicides should remain behind for the guard and defence of the City, and Hippocrates joyn with Himilco, and war joyntly against the Romans. He with 10000 foot, and 500 horse, set out by night: and passed between the Corps de guard, where none at all warded, and encamped about the Acerræ. As they were fortifying their Camp, Marcellus came upon them as he retired back from Agrigentum, possessed now by the adverse part: whither he

A he had made great haſte, but in vain, in hope to prevent his enemies, and get thither afore: but little thought he (and nothing leſs) than in his return from thence, at that time and in that place, to meet with an army of Syracuſians that ſhould make head againſt him. Howbeit, for fear of Himilco and the Carthaginians, whom he knew to be abroad, and with whom he was not able to make his part good with that power which he had about him, he marched as circumſpectly as he could, having his eye on every ſide, and led his army in good order of battell againſt all occurrences whatſoever might happen by the way. And ſo as good hap was, that carefull forecaſt and diligence, which he was provided with againſt the Carthaginians, ſerved him in very good ſtead againſt the Sicilians. Finding them therefore buſie in pitching their tents, without order, and ſcat-
B tered aſunder, and moſt of them unarmed, he environed ſoon all the Infantry that they had, and put them to the ſword. But the Cavalry after a ſlight skirmiſh begun, fled with their leader Hippocrates to Acræ. Marcellus after he had by his flight repreſſed and kept in the Sicilians, who were at hand to fall away and revolt unto the Romans, returned to Syracuſe: and after ſome few daies, Himilco joyned with Hippocrates, and encamped about eight miles from thence, upon the river Anatis.

Likewiſe about the ſame time, or very near, it hapned that 55 war-ſhips of the Carthaginians, under the conduct of Bomilcar, Admirall of the Armado put into the great haven of Syracuſe out of the deep and main ſea: and alſo the Roman fleet of thirty Gallies, with five ranks of oars, arrived at Panormus, and landed the firſt Legion there: and thus the war was turned and diverted
C from Italy. So wholly ſeemed both nations, as well Romans as Carthaginians, amuſed upon nothing now but Sicily. Himilco making full account to prey upon the Roman Legion which was ſet a land at Panormus, as they ſhould come to Syracuſe; miſſed of the right way to meet with them: for he marched and led his power far within land higher in the country, but the Legion coaſted along by the ſea ſide, accompanied as it were with the fleet which flanked them: and came to Pachinus unto Appius Claudius, who with part of his forces went out to meet them on the way. But the Carthaginians made no long ſtay about Syracuſe. For Bomilcar having ſmall truſt and confidence in his ſhips, conſidering that the Romans were coming toward him with a fleet, and were twice as many in number: and withall ſeeing, that by ſojourning there, he did no other good but with his company impoveriſh and eat out his friends, ſpred and hoiſed up ſail, and with a merry D wind paſſed over into Affrick. Himilco alſo, who had dogged and followed after Marcellus in vain as far as Syracuſe, to eſpy ſome good opportunity and vantage to bid him battell, before he joyned with a greater power: ſeeing that he was hereof diſappointed, and the enemy lying about Syracuſe ſafe and ſecure, as well in regard of their fortifications as their forces: becauſe he would not ſpend any longer time to no purpoſe in ſitting there ſtill, to look upon their Allies how they were beſieged, he diſlodged and removed from thence: attending, whereſoever there were any hope and likelihood of revolt from the Romans, thither to come with his army, and ſhew himſelf in perſon, to encourage and animate by his preſence thoſe that favoured his part. And firſt he recovered Murgantia, where the Roman garriſon was betrayed by the inhabitants, and delivered unto his hands. Into which City the Romans had conveyed great ſtore of corn, victuall, and pro-
E viſion of all ſorts. Upon this revolt, other Cities alſo took heart unto them, and the Roman garriſons were either thruſt and driven out of the Caſtles and Fortreſſes, or elſe were treacherouſly betrayed, ſurpriſed, and deſtroyed.

The City Ænna, ſeated upon an high hill, and on every ſide inacceſſible as it was by naturall ſituation of the ground impregnable, ſo it had a ſtrong garriſon within the Caſtle, and a Captain of that garriſon, one, that was not ſo eaſie to be compaſſed and over-raught by deceitfull trains. His name was Pinarius, a witty man, and hardy withall, who repoſed more truſt in his own diligence to prevent, that he might not poſſibly be deceived, than in the truth and faith of the Sicilians. And at this time more than ever before, he ſtood upon his guard, and took heedfull care of himſelf and his charge, by occaſion that he heard of ſo many treacheries and treaſons, ſo many revolts
F of Cities, and maſſacres of garriſons: and therefore as well by day as night, he looked that the Caſtle was well provided and furniſhed of good watch and ward continually, & the ſouldiers never departed from their armour nor their appointed place. Which when the chief Citizens of Ænna perceived, who already had covenanted with Himilco, and promiſed to betray the fort and the garriſon: and ſaw that the Roman Captain was ſo wary, that he lay not open unto the opportunity of any fraudulent and guilefull courſe, they reſolved by apert and open means to effect this their deſigned enterpriſe. They alledged therefore unto Pinarius, "That the City and Caſtle "both ought to be in their power, ſince that they entred into leagne and amity with the Romans "as freemen, and were not yielded as ſlaves to be kept in dureſs and priſon. Reaſon would there-"fore, and meet it was (as they thought) that all the keys of the gates were delivered unto them.
G "With good and truſty allies, their own faith and truth is the ſureſt bond. And no doubt, the "people and Senate of Rome would con them greater thank, and eſteem more dearly of them, if "ſo be they of themſelves, not by conſtraint, but of willing mind, would abide and continue in "their ſound allegeance and faſt friendſhip. Pinarius made anſwer again, "That he was by his "General placed there Captain of the garriſon: at his hands he received the keys of the gates, and "the Conſtableſhip of the Caſtle, and the ſame to hold and keep neither at his own will, nor at "the pleaſure of the men of Ænna, but at his diſpoſition, who ſealed him his Commiſſion. Now "for a Captain to abandon his fort (quoth he) is a capital crime among the Romans, by vertue of "a law, which our fathers themselves have confirmed, even by the exemplary punishment & death H

"of their own children, who have transgressed the same. And seeing the Consul Marcellus is not "far off, ye may, if it please you, send your Embassadors unto him, of whom you may be certified,
"under whose power, commandment, and government I am." Tush, say they, we will never send "unto him. But if words and reasons may not prevail we will work some other means to reco-Pinarius his speech to his souldiers. "ver our liberty again. Then quoth Pinarius to them, If ye think much to address your messen"gers to the Consul, yet do me this favour, as to call a Common Councill of the people for my "sake, that I may know whether these demands proceed from some few, or from the whole "body of the City. So it was accorded and agreed, that a generall assembly should be proclaimed against the morrow. Then Pinarius after that he was departed from this parly, returned into the I fortress, and calling his souldiers together, spake unto them in this wise: "I suppose ye have heard
"already (my souldiers) in what sort the Roman garrisons have, these daies past, been betrayed
"and murdred by the Sicilians. That treachery hitherto ye have avoided and escaped; first & prin"cipally through the goodness of the gods: next and immediatly by your own valour and pro"wess, & by continuall watch & ward, standing in your armor both day & night. And I would to "God ye might pass as well the time to come, without falling into this hard choice either to en"dure and suffer such horrible mischief: or to execute and commit a fearfull example of cruelty.
"This intended treason of theirs hath been carried and conveyed closely and cautelously all this "while, & seeing they cannot as yet meet with any advantage to surprise us, they would seem now
"openly and without dissimulation, to demand for to have all the keys of the gates under their K
"hands. Which we should not so soon part with & render unto them, but presently Ænna would "turn to the Carthaginians, and more cruelly should we here be murdered and hewn in pee-
"ces, than the garrison was at Murgantia. Much ado I had to obtain of them respit of this ore
"night to take further counsel: that I might advertise you of the present danger, wherein both I &
"you stand. To morrow morning by day-light, they purpose to hold a solemn assembly of the "people, and to make a speech unto them, to accuse me, and to stir them up against you. And "to morrow is the day that the City Ænna shall overflow either with the blood of you, or of the "Inhabitants. And be ye well assured, that as ye shall lose all that you have if they surprise you:
"so in case you prevent them and begin the fray there shall no peril at all betide you. Look who "first laieth hand on his sword and draweth it, he shall carry away the victory clear. Therefore yeL "must be there prest in your armor, and attentive to expect a signal from me. I my self will be "present in the assembly, and with parling and debating temporise and draw out the time until "ye be all in readiness and every thing in order. And so soon as I shall give you a sign with my "gown, then let me hear you set up an outcry, then let me see you fall upon the multitude: down
"with them and spare not, and put them all to the sword. See in any case there be not one of them
"escape your hands and remain alive, from whom ye may fear any harm, either by fraud or "force. And now I beseech thee O Dame Ceres, and thy daughter Proserpina, and all other gods
"in heaven above, or in hell beneath, who inhabit this City, these holy lakes and sacred grores,
"wherein ye are honoured and worshipped, to vouchsafe to be propice and favourable unto us;
"in case we enter into this action and enterprise, for the avoiding of treachery intended against M
"us, and not to offer mischief unto other: and not otherwise. I would use more words unto you
"my friends and souldiers, for to animate and encourage you, if it were that you had to deal
"with men in arms: but since they are naked unarmed, & unwarned, you shall kill and slay them
"at your pleasure, and satisfie your selves with their blood. And to the end that you need not fear "any harm from Himilco and the Carthaginians, loe the Consul himself lieth encamped near "at hand. After this exhortation they were dismissed, to take their refection and rest. The next day, they were bestowed in sundry parts of the City, some to beset all the streets; others to stop the passages and the waies against the townsmen, that they might not escape. But the most of them stood upon and about the Theatre, and were nothing suspected as being used heretofore to behold and see the assemblies of the people. The Roman Captain Pinarius was by the Magistrates N brought forth and presented before the people: where he pleaded, That it lay not in his hands but in the power and authority of the Consul, to dispose of that which they demanded: and he iterated for the most part the same allegations that he shewed the day before. At first they began gently, some few by little and little; afterwards more and more of them, required him to deliver up the keys; and so consequently all with one voice, charged and commanded him so to do: and when he seemed to make some stay and defer the matter, they menaced and threatned fiercely, yea, and seemed as if they would no longer forbear but proceed to extream violence. Then the Captain made a sign with his robe, according to the former agreement: and with that the souldiers who had their eyes upon him, waiting wistly for the signall and were ready for execution, set up a loud cry and ran some from aloft upon the multitude assembled over against them; others stood thick O at every corner of the Theatre, where the people should go forth, and opposed themselves against them. Thus the men of Ænna, shut up and penned within the Theatre were massacred and lay tumbled one upon other; not they only that were killed, but such also as fled one over anothers head: the sound fell upon the wounded, the quick upon the dead, one with another, by heaps.
Then there was running from thence sundry waies, and as if the City had been taken upon assault by the enemy, there was nothing but murdering and flying away in every place. And as hot and furious were the souldiers in the execution of this unarmed multitude (whom they judged worthily

A thily and justly to be killed) as if like danger presented unto them, or choler raised in set battel had provoked them thereto. Thus Ænna was held still for the Romans by this means: were the deed simply ill, or by circumstance needfull and necessary; Marcellus misliked not of the fact & granted the pillage of the Citizens of Ænna to the souldiers: supposing that the Sicilians throughly frighted by this fearfull example would betray no more garrisons. The calamity and hard fortune of this City, (standing, as it did, in the very heart of Sicily) was in one day divulged and noised thoughout the Island, from one end to the other. And otherwise, a famous and renowned town it was, either for the natural situation so exceeding strong: or because all places in it were accounted sacred and holy, in remembrance of Proserpina: who in times past left her footing & traces there at
B what time as she was stoln away & ravished [by Pluto.] Now it was generally thought by the Sicilians, that this cursed and detestable massacre had defiled and polluted not only the habitations of men, but also the temples of the gods: whereupon even they likewise, who stood but doubtful and indifferent before, fell now away from the Romans, and turned to the Carthaginians.

Then Hippocrates retired to Murgantia, and Himilco to Agrigentum: who were sent for by the conspirators and traitors within Ænna, and approached with their forces, but to no purpose. Marcellus returned to the Leontins country: and after he had brought into the Camp corn and other victuals, and left there a mean guard, he presented himself to the siege that lay before Syracuse. And when he had sent Appius Claudius to Rome to sue for the Consulship, he committed the charge in his room of the Armado there, and the old leaguer unto T. Quintius Crispinus. Himself
C erected and fortified his wintring harbours five miles from Exapylos, at a place which men call Leontia. And these were the affairs of Sicily unto the beginning of winter.

In the same summer the war began likewise with King Philip which long before had been suspected. For there came Embassadors from Oricum to M. Valerius the Prætor Admiral of the fleet, for the defence of Brundusium, and the sea-coast thereabout of Calabria, and made report that Philip first assayed to win Apollonia, and was come up the river with one hundred and twenty light gallies, or foists with two ranks of oares against the stream: and afterwards, seeing he could not effect his purpose so speedily as he hoped, privily by night he approached with his army to Oricum: and that the City, situate upon a plain, neither strongly fenced with walls nor well manned with souldiers, nor yet furnished with armor and munition, was at the first assault surprised D and won. And as they recounted these news, so they besought him to grant aid and succour: and to make head against this undoubted enemy of the Romans, either by Land or forces at Sea, and to chase him away from them: who for no other reason were by him assailed, but because they were neer neighbors to Italy. M. Valerius leaving the guard of that place to L. Valerius his Lieutenant General, with a fleet of ships well rigged, furnished & appointed: and having embarked these souldiers (which the gallies for war would not receive) in the merchants ships of burden, arrived at Oricum on the second day after: and finding that City kept with a small and slight garrison, which Philip when he departed from thence had left there, recovered it without much resistance. Thither repaired to him embassadors from Apollonia, who brought word that they were besieged, because they refused to revolt from the Romans: and were not able to hold out any longer against E the forcible attempts of the Macedonians, unless a garrison of Romans were sent unto them. He promised to effect whatsoever they desired, and so shipped a thousand elect and choice souldiers in gallies, and sent them to the mouth of the river, under the conduct of a Captain of Allies Nævius Crispus, an industrious man, and an expert souldier. He having landed his men, and sent the gallies back to Oricum (from whence he came) to the rest of the Armado, conducted his souldiers higher in the country, far from the river side, by a way that was not beset nor held by the Kings forces: and in the night-season, unawares to all the enemies, entred the City. The day following they rested, only the Captain took a survey of the youth and able men of Apollonia, of their armor and the munitions and forces of the City. When he had seen and perused all, thereupon he was well appaid and encouraged to fight, and withall he had learned by the scouts and spies, how retchless, F idle, and negligent the enemies were without. So at midnight he went forth of the City without any noise, and entred the Camp of the enemies so carelesly guarded as it was, and lying so open: that by credible report, there were above one thousand men got within the trench and rampier, before that any one was ware thereof: and if they had held their hands, and not fain to killing, they might have passed on still even as far as to the Kings Pavilion. But by reason that they slew the warders next the gates, the enemies were raised: whereupon, they were all so frighted and terrified that not only there was never a souldier took weapon in hand, and went about to repulse the enemy out of the Camp: but even the King himself, half naked as he was, and newly wakened out of his sleep, clad in simple apparell, scarce decent for a common souldier, much less I wot, for a King, was fain to run toward the river side to his ships. Thither also the other multitude fled dis-
G ordered in heaps. There were not many under three thousand either slain or taken prisoners in the camp. Yet there were more by odds of the enemies taken than killed. In the rifling of the camp the Apollonians met with Catapults and Balists, and other engins provided for the assault of the City, which they conveighed all to Apollonia, to serve for defence of their walls against the like occasion of needfull service. All the booty besides of the camp was granted unto the Romans.

Tidings hereof being come to Oricum, M. Valerius presently set forth the Armado as far as to the mouth of the river, that the King might not flie away and escape by sea with his ships: whereupon Philip distrusting his power as well by sea as shore, and doubting he was not able to match the Romans, drew up ſome of his ſhips to land, ſet fire upon the reſt, and ſo by land went into Macedony, with a great part of his ſouldiers diſarmed and ſpoiled. The Roman fleet wintered at Oricum with M. Valerius. H

The ſame year in Spain the affairs went variably on both ſides. For before that the Romans paſſed over the river Iberus, Mago and Aſdrubal deſeated a mighty hoſt of Spaniards, ſo as, all the farther part of Spain had faln from the Romans, but that P. Cornelius made haſte to tranſport his army over Iberus, and came in good time to ſettle the wavering and doubtfull minds of the allies. At the firſt the Romans encamped at * Caſtrum Album, a place memorable for the death of great Amilcar. The Caſtle was well fortified, and thither afore they had conveyed corn. But becauſe all thoſe quarters thereabout were full of enemies, and ſundry times their Cavalry had charged the Roman footmen, and gone clear away without any harm, whereby there had been ſlain at times upon two thouſand of them, which either made ſmall haſte away, and ſtaid behind, or ſtraggled looſely over the fields: the Romans departed from thence, nearer unto places of more ſecurity and peace, and fortified themſelves in camp upon the mount of Victoria. Thither came Cn. Scipio with all his forces, and likewiſe Aſdrubal the ſon of Giſgo, the third Captain of the Carthaginians, with a full army. And they all encamped beyond the water, over againſt the fort of the Romans aboveſaid. P. Scipio, accompanied with certain light armed ſouldiers, was gone out cloſely to diſcover and take view of the places thereabout: howbeit, not ſo covertly, but he was eſpied by the enemies, and (no doubt) they had put him to a ſhrewd foil in the open plain champian, but that he took a little hill thereby for his vantage. Where he was environed and beſet round about: but by the coming of his brother Cneus, he was delivered out of that danger. I K

Caſtulo, a famous and ſtrong City in Spain, and ſo near linked in affinity to the Carthaginians, that Annibal from thence married his wife, ranged to the Romans. The Carthaginians came againſt Illiturgum and began to aſſault it, becauſe a garriſon of the Romans lay there: and like they were to be Maſters of the town, by occaſion eſpecially of a great dearth and ſcarcity of victuals within. But Cn. Scipio for to relieve his friends and the garriſon, went out with a legion lightly appointed with carriages, and marching between the two camps of the enemies ſkirmiſhed with them, ſlew many of them, and entred the City. The morrow after he ſallied out, joyned in fight with the enemy, and ſped as well: ſo as in both battels there were ſlain of them above twelve thouſand in the place, more than ten thouſand taken priſoners, and 36 military enſigns carried away. Thus the ſiege brake up at Illiturgum. After this, the Carthaginians began to lay ſiege unto Bigerra (a City alſo confederat with the Romans.) But Cn. Scipio at his coming raiſed that ſiege without any conflict. Then the Carthaginians from thence went forward againſt Munda, and the Romans followed them thither ſtraight after. There they encountred together and fought a ſet battel with banners diſplayed, for the ſpace well-near of four hours. And as the Romans bare themſelves bravely, and had got the better, and were at point of the victory, the retreat was ſounded, by occaſion that Cn. Scipio was hurt ſore in his thigh with a barbed javelin, and the ſouldiers about him were greatly afraid that the wound was deadly. But no doubt, if it had not been for that ſtay and hinderance the very camp of the Carthaginians might that day have been forced. For not only the ſouldiers, but the Elephants alſo were driven already ſo far as the trench, and even there upon the very bank, 39 of them were ſticked with darts and pikes. In this battell likewiſe were killed (by report) twelve thouſand men, almoſt three thouſand taken priſoners, and 57 military enſigns won. Then the Carthaginians retired back to the City Aurinx, and the Romans followed upon them, becauſe they would give them no time to reſt and breath themſelves after their fright. Where Scipio being brought into the field in a litter, gave them battel the ſecond time, and got the victory clear: but fewer of the enemies were ſlain by the one half than afore, becauſe there were not ſo many in number left to fight. But (as they are a nation given naturally to renew war, and to be ever fighting, and cannot give over) they ſoon repaired and made up their forces. For Aſdrubal had ſent his brother Mago, to levy and gather new ſouldiers: whereupon they took freſh heart again to try another field. Theſe, being for the moſt part other ſouldiers (new come) fought as it were in revenge, and to uphold that ſide which in few daies ſpace had ſo often taken the foil, and demeaned themſelves as courageouſly as they before, and ſped as untowardly. For there were ſlain of them above eight thouſand, not many under one thouſand taken captives, with military enſigns 58. In rifling of them there was found very much ſpoil of the Gauls, as rings of gold, carkanets, collars, and bracelets great ſtore. Over and beſides, two great Lords and Princes of the Gauls, whoſe names were Mœnicaptus and Civiſmarus, were ſlain outright in that conflict. Eight Elephants taken alive, and three killed. L M N

Now when as the affairs in Spain went thus fortunatly with the Romans, they began at length for very ſhame to thinke of Saguntum, a town that was the cauſe of all theſe wars, and had now five years already been in the hands and poſſeſſion of the enemy. Whereupon by force of arms they recovered it, drave out of the town the garriſon of the Carthaginians, and reſtored it again to the ancient inhabitants, as many as remained alive, and had eſcaped theſe broils of war. As for the Turdetans, who were the occaſion of the wars between the Saguntins and the Carthaginians, they ſubdued them, and brought them under their ſubjection, ſold them in port ſale, and deſtroyed their City utterly. Theſe were the atchievances in Spain, during the time that Q. Fabius and M. Claudius were Conſuls. O

At Rome, when the new Tribunes of the Commons were once entred into their office preſently

A L. Metellus one of the Tribunes aforesaid, arrested the Censors P. Furius and M. Attilius, peremptorily to make their appearance and answer before the people. These Censors had taken from him being Treasurer the year before, his horse of service allowed him by the City, cassed and displaced him out of his Tribe, deprived him of liberty to give his voice, and made him Ærarius, and all, for being a party with them at Canna, who complotted to abandon Italy. But by the means and mediation of the other nine Tribunes, they were discharged: for they would not suffer, that the Censors should come to their answer whiles they were in office. And the death of one of them, namely, P. Furius, was the cause that they could not accomplish the sessing and numbring of the Citizens. And when M. Attilius surrendred up his Magistracy. Qu. Fabius Max. held the solemn B assembly and Parliament of the people for the election of Consuls, wherein were created Q. Fabius Max. the Consul his son, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time, both absent. For Prætors, there were elected M. Attilius, and with him, they who at that time were Ædiles of the chair, to wit, P. Sempronius Tuditanus, Cn. Fulvius Centimalus, and M. Æmylius Lepidus.

This year, as it appeareth in old Records, were the Stage-plaies first set out by the Ædiles of the chair, and continued four daies. This Ædile Tuditanus above-named was he, who at Canna (when all besides him for fear were astonied, in that wofull calamity) brake forcibly through the midst of the enemies, and escaped. When Q. Fabius the old Consul had finished the Election, then the new Consuls Elect were sent for, to repair unto Rome, and they entred their Magistracy. Then they assembled the Senat for to consult and take order for the war, for the Provinces as well their own, C as those that were under the Prætors: also concerning the armies, and the disposition of every charge and place of command. So the Provinces and armies were divided in this wise: The war with Annibal, whersoever it fell out, was committed to the managing of the Coss. with the charge of one army, which Sempronius himself had before under his conduct: and of another, commanded by Fabius the Consul. And those were two legions. M. Æmylius the Prætor, whose lot it was to have the jurisdiction over the forreiners, had committed his authority unto his Collegue Atilius, the Prætor of the Citizens of Rome, that he might govern the Province about Luctria, and those two legions, over which Q. Fabius, now Consul, had the command, whiles he was Prætor. To Sempronius the Prætor befell the Province of Ariminum. To Cn. Fulvius was allotted Suessula, with two legions likewise: so as, Fulvius should have the leading of the legions D of Citizens, and Tuditanus receive his from M. Pomponius. The government of the forrein Provinces continued still in the former deputies. M. Claudius ruled Sicily, so far as the dominion of King Hiero extended: and Lentulus the Vice-Prætor, had the charge of the old Province. T. Octacilius was high Admiral of the Navy, without any new supply or augmentation of forces. M. Valerius was employed in Greece and Macedony, with one legion, and the Armado which he had before. Q. Mutius was L. Deputy in Sardinia, having under him the old army, consisting of two legions. And C. Terentius had the administration of the affairs in Picenum, with that one legion which long time he had been Captain of. Moreover, it was decreed and agreed upon, that there should be mustred and enrolled two new legions of Citizens, and twenty thousand men besides levied of Allies and Associats. With these Captains and these forces aboveaid, they provided for E the defence and maintenance of the State and Empire of Rome, against many wars at once, either in hand already, or suspected shortly. The Consuls having enrolled two legions of Citizens, and chosen a supply to make out the rest, before that they set foot out of the City, procured the pacification of the gods, for the fearfull and prodigious tokens that were reported. For the wall and gates of Rome were blasted and smitten with lightning from heaven: and likewise the Temple of Jupiter at Aricia. Other vain objects and illusions also of the eyes and ears, which men imagined they saw and heard, were beleeved for truths. Namely, there appeared in the river of Tarracina certain resemblances and shews of Gallies, whereas indeed there were none such. And in the Temple of Jup. Vicilinus, which standeth in the Territory of Cossa, there was heard, forsooth, rustling of armor: and the river of Amiternus seemed to run with bloud. When satisfaction was F made for these strange signs, the gods pleased, and all well again, according to the direction set down by the Priests and Prelates, then the Consuls set forward in their expedition, Sempronius into Lucania, and Fabius into Apulia. Where it fell out, that Fabius the father repaired into the Camp at Suessula, as Lieutenant and assistant unto his son. And when Fabius the younger went forth to meet him, and his Serjeants or Ushers marching afore, said not a word to Fabius the father, nor put him aside to give way, for very reverence of his person, (such majesty he carried) the old man rode forward, and passed by eleven of the said Lictors with their bundles of rods. Then the Consul commanded the Serjeant that was next himself to do his office: and with that said Usher called upon old Fabius, to alight from his horse back: and at last, he set foot aground: I did all this but to try, quoth he, my son, whether you knew well that you were a Consul or no.

G "There came that night secretly to the Consul while the Camp lay there, one Cassius Altinius, "an Arpinate, with his three bondslaves, promising, that if he might have a good reward for his "service, he would betray Arpos into his hands. Fabius then proposed this matter unto his "Councill, to be debated of. Some were of opinion, that Altinius was to be whipped and put to "death, fugitive runnagate and false knave as he was: a common enemy, and a dangerous to either "part, and playing with both hands, like a double-hearted hypocrite. Who first, after the over-"throw at Canne (as if he might turn with the wheel of fortune, and go from his word and faith-"full promise, and change ever as she changeth) ranged himself unto Annibal; and by his exam"ple, drew with him Arpos to revolt and rebell: now after that he seeth the Roman estate to rise H

"again and hold up head (and that, beyond his hope, & contrary to his desires) he would play the "villain and turn-coat again, and come with a new practice of a more shamefull treason than be"fore: as if treachery and falshood were of the nature and quality of a judgment passed in Sep-
"temviral court: and as if he might be allowed to carry two faces under a hood, and alter every "hour. Faithless friend, that he is, not to be trusted, and slippery enemy, not to be regarded. A "good deed it were, that together with that same traitor of Falerii, and the other of King Pyr-
"rhus, he made a third, and were punished accordingly for exemplary justice, to teach all rogues
"and runnagates hereafter how they run from their Lords and Matters. On the other side, old Fa-
"bius (the Consuls father) replied, and said, That men now adaies had forgot how to make diffe"rence of seasons, and in the very heat & midst of wars, reasoned and gave their opinion and cen- I "sure of every thing and person, as in a free time of open peace: when, as indeed, we are to think,
"consider, and deliberate of this point, that (if possibly it might be) no more of our allies re"volt from the people of Rome, rather than invite and incite them thereto: and after one is star"ted aside, and upon repentance returned again to the ancient amity, to fall a reviling and rebu-
"king of him, and bitterly to say that he deserveth to be made an example to all others. For if it "may be lawfull for one to turn from the Romans, and held unlawfull to return again unto the "Romans no man need doubt, but shortly the Roman Empire will be forsaken of all her confe-
"derats and allies, and we shall see within a while all the Cities of Italy linked and confedered in "fast league and friendship with the Carthaginians. And yet (quoth he) I am not the man that
"thinketh Altinius worthy to be trusted in any thing for all this, but I would take a mean course K "& middle way between both extremities. My opinion is therefore, that for the present he should "be taken neither for enemy nor friend, but commanded to ward, and to have the liberty of a "prisoner, and only be kept forth-coming in some confederat and trusty City, not far from the "Camp during the time of the war. And when the war is once finished and ended, then I hold it
"good to deliberate and consult, whether that his former revolt hath deserved more punishment "than this his present return meriteth favour and grace. Every man liked well of this advice of old Fabius, and gave their assent. So he was bound with chains, and both himself and his company delivered over and put in custody, and a good roun sum of gold, which he then had brought with him, was by commandment reserved for his use. At Cales he made his abode: where all the day time he used to walk at liberty, with his keepers following him, but in the night they kept him L close prisoner. But at Arpi, where his home was, they of his own house began first to miss him, and seek for him: afterwards, when it was noised throughout the whole City, that he was out of the way, and could not be found: the same hereof caused a tumult, for the loss of a principall person as he was, thus revolted to the enemy. And for fear of an alteration in the State, presently the news thereof was sent to Annibal. Who was nothing offended thereat, both because long afore he had the party himself in jealousie and suspition as one neither fish nor flesh, a man of no credit, and hardly to be trusted: and also for that he found a good occasion and quarrel to seize upon the goods of so rich and substantiall a Citizen and to make sale thereof. But to the end that the world might think that he was more angry against his person, than greedy of his substance, he joyned with cruelty, a grave course also of judiciall severity, that the one might serve as a file to M give lustre to the other. For having sent for his wife and children into the Camp, first he examined them straightly, for to know whither he was fled, and what store of silver and gold he had left behind him at home in his house: and when he had learned enough of them touching every particular, and as much as he desired, he burnt them quick to ashes.

Fabius being departed from Suessula purposed the first thing that he did to assail Arpi. Where he lay encamped a mile from the town: and after he had well viewed by near approach, the situation of the City, and considered the wall, look where he saw it was most strong and sure, and therefore guarded most slightly and negligently, there especially he purposed to give the hottest assault. And when he had sufficiently provided and got together all ordnance and engins, requisite for the battery of Cities, he made choice of the most hardy and valiant Centurions of the N whole army, and set over them certain Tribunes and Marshals, valorous and doughty good men, and appointed unto them a Regiment of six hundred souldiers (for so many he thought sufficient for the present service) with direction and commandment, that when the trumpet sounded the relief of the fourth watch, they should bring scaling ladders to that place aforesaid. Now there stood a gate low and narrow, answering to the street not much used and frequented, by reason that quarter of the City was not inhabited, but stood void. That gate he gave them order first to scale and clime over, and then to go forward on the wall, and from within-forth to break down the bars, and level the said gate, and when they were Masters of that quarter of the City, then to wind the horn, and give signall to the rest of the forces for to approach and come hard to the town, saying, That he would have all things in readiness, and in good order. This direction was O performed accordingly with great diligence, and that which was thought and feared would have been an hindrance and let unto them in the action, was the only thing which helped them most, that they were not descried. And that was a smoaking shower of rain that began after midnight, which caused the warders and watchmen to quit their standings, forsake the Sentinels, and to flie into the houses for covert. The first noise of the storm pouring down with such a force, made that the rumbling of the souldiers could not be heard, as they were breaking down the gate; and

A as it grew after to rain more ſoftly, and ſo kept ſtill at one, it ſounded gently and ſweetly in their ears, untill it brought a good many of them faſt aſleep. Now after they had ſeized the gate, the Marſhals gave order, That the Cornettiers ſhould be beſtowed in that void ſtreet aforeſaid, diſtant equally aſunder, and to wind their horns, for to waken and raiſe the Conſul. Which being done, according as it was before agreed, the Coſ. commanded the ſtandards and enſigns to be brought forth, and ſomewhat before day-light entred at the ſaid broken gate into the City. With that, the enemies at length began to rouſe themſelves, for now the ſhower and ſtorm was paſt, and the day approached. There was a garriſon in the City at hand of five thouſand of Annibal his ſouldiers, armed and well appointed: and the Arpins of themſelves were 3000 ſtrong. Thoſe
B the Carthaginians put in the forefront, as a forlorn hope, and oppoſed them againſt the enemy, for fear of ſome treacherous prank that they might play behind their backs. Firſt, they began to arrange themſelves to fight in the dark, blind, and narrow lanes. For the Romans had filled and taken up not only all the ſtreets, but alſo the houſes that were next the gate to the end, they might not be gauled with ſhot, and wounded from aloft. Some Arpins and Romans fell at length to meet, to take knowledge and acquaintance one of another, and to began to commune and talk together. The Romans asked what the Arpins meant to rebell; for what offence and harm given of the Romans, and for what deſert and benefit received from the Carthaginians ſhould they (being naturall Italians) maintain war for Aliens, ſtrangers, and barbarous nations, againſt the Romans their old friends and ancient Allies; and ſo to bring Italy in ſubjection to Affrick, to do ho-C mage and fealty, yea, and to become tributary, and to pay penſion unto it? The Arpins excuſed and cleared themſelves, ſaying, that they (ſimple men and ignorant in all things) were bought and ſold by their great rulers and principall Citizens, and lived in manner as captives and ſlaves under the command of ſome few perſons that might do all. Upon this beginning, more and more of them grew to parling and conference. At length the Prætor of Arpi himſelf was by his own people and Citizens brought and preſented before the Conſul: where, after faithfull promiſe paſſed between the enſigns and the battels; the Arpins immediatly bent their forces on the Romans ſide againſt the Carthaginians. The Spaniards likewiſe (who were not many under a thouſand men) after they had capitulat and agreed with the Roman Conſul, nothing but this one article, That the garriſon of the Carthaginians might be ſent forth and paſs away ſafe without harm:
D came with their colours to the Conſul. Then all the gates were ſet open for the Carthaginians to depart: and being ſent away upon ſafe conduct, without any harm at all or damage unto Annibal, arrived at Salapia. Thus Arpi was reſtored again to the Romans, without the loſs and detriment of any one man, but one only old traitor and new fugitive revolt. The Spaniards were appointed to have double allowance of victuals: and they performed good, faithfull, and valiant ſervice many times after to the Common-weal.

When one of the Conſuls was in Apulia, and the other in Lucania, one hundred and twelve men of arms, Gentlemen of the Nobility of Capua, having licence granted by the Magiſtrates to go out of the City, pretending to make a rode into the enemies country, and to fetch in booties and prizes, came directly into the Romans Camp, lying about Sueſſula. And meeting with the E Corps de guard, declared who they were, and that they would parl with the Lord Deputy. Now Cn. Fulvius was the General and Commander of the army there: who being advertized and certified hereof gave order that ten only of all that number ſhould be brought before him unarmed. When he heard their ſuit and demand, which was nothing elſe, but that when Capua was recovered by the Romans, they might have their goods reſtored unto them: he received them all into his protection. The other Prætor alſo Sempronius Tuditanus, won by force the town Cliternum: where there were taken priſoners above ſeven thouſand men: and a good deal of copper and ſilver coin gained beſides. At Rome there chanced a fearfull and pitifull fire, which continued two nights and one whole day. All between Salina and the gate Carmentalis, together with the Æquimelium and the ſtreet Jugarium, were burned down, and made even with the ground. Likewiſe
F without the gate the fire ſpred far all about, and in the Temples of Fortuna and Dame Matuta, and Spes, conſumed much, as well hallowed as prophane.

The ſame year, when all things proſpered well and had good ſucceſs in Spain, P. and Cn. both Scipios having recovered many aſſociats and thoſe of ancient league that came in again to him and yielded themſelves; and beſides, gained ſome new confederats: conceived good hope, and took heart to proceed farther, even into Affrick.

Syphax King of the Numidians, on a ſudden fell out with the Carthaginians, and became their profeſſed enemy. Unto him the Scipios addreſſed three Centurions as Embaſſadors, to treat with him about a league and alliance: and to promiſe withall, that if he went on ſtill to trouble and moleſt the Carthaginians, by making war upon them, he ſhould do an high favour to the Senate and people of Rome: that they would endeavour and bring about, that in good time and place, G he ſhould be well requited for that kindneſs, and receive at their hands a double recompence with thanks. This embaſſage pleaſed the barbarous King right well. And after he had conferred and reaſoned with the Embaſſadors, concerning military affairs, and the knowledge of warfare: and heard thoſe old & experienced ſouldiers talk of war, he ſoon found his own wants, and how unskilfull himſelf was in many points and feats of arms, in compariſon of that methodicall and orderly diſcipline, whereof they had diſcourſed. "The firſt thing then that he requeſted at their "hands, was this: That as they were good friends and faithfull Allies, two of them would go

" back with their Embaſſie unto their Generals, and that the third might remain with him, to H
" read unto him a lecture in the military ſcience of warfare. Saying, that the nation of the Numi-
" dians were raw and altogether unskilful in footmens ſervice, and only nimble and practiſed in " fight on horſeback. So (quoth he) from the firſt beginning of our nation have our anceſtors uſed
" to war: & ſo have we from our childhood been enured to fight. Mary, an enemy I have, truſting
" and preſuming much upon his Infantry, whom I would gladly be able to match every way in all " kind of ſervice. Footmen I am able to ſet out as well as another: for why? my Realm is po" pulous, and yieldeth abundance of men: but altogether ignorant we are, how to fit them with " armor, how to marſhall them, how to order and ſet them in battell array: inſomuch as all my " people in battell go to it pell-mell, and are as a multitude hudled and thrumbled together at a I " venture without skill, without diſcretion and adviſement. The Embaſſadors anſwered and ſaid, That for the preſent they would do according to his will and pleaſure: but withal, they had his faithful promiſe & word of a Prince that he ſhould immediatly ſend back their companion again, in caſe their Generals approved not their deed in that behalf. Q. Statorius his name was, that ſtaid behind with the King. So Syphax ſent by the two Romans his anſwer to the foreſaid Embaſſage into Spain: and beſides, with them other Numidians, Embaſſadors of his own, to receive farther aſſurance and ſecurity from the Roman Generals: unto whom he gave in charge, that forthwith they ſhould ſollicit, perſwade, and entice all the Numidians that were auxiliary ſouldiers unto the Carthaginians, and ſerved in any Camp, City, or garriſon Town of theirs, for to abandon them and come to him. And Statorius for his part, having muſtered a great multitude of ſerviceable young K men, choſe forth and enrolled a power of footmen, to ſerve in the Kings wars: and when he had ſorted them into bands and companies, and ordred them in battell array, as near as poſſibly he could, to the manner of the Romans: he trained them in their running to follow their colours: he taught them to keep their places in their ranks, and to double their files: and likewiſe he accuſtomed them to travell and do work: and ſo acquainted them with other military orders and exerciſes, that within ſhort time, the King repoſed as good confidence, and was as mighty in his new Infantry, as in his old Cavalry: and in a ſet pitched field on even ground, was able to meet the Carthaginian with banner diſplaied, and give him the foil in a full battell. The coming of the Kings Embaſſadors into Spain, was to the Romans alſo a matter of great conſequence and importance: for upon the rumour and fame that went thereof, the Numidians began to fail away apace, L and to come thick unto the Romans. Thus were the Romans joyned in amity and friendſhip with King Syphax.

When the Carthaginians had intelligence of this new alliance, they addreſſed immediatly their Embaſſadors to Gala, who raigned in another part of Numidia, over a nation called Maſſyla. This Gala had a ſon named Maſaniſſa, of ſeventeen years of age, but a youth of ſuch towardneſs, and ſo forward in vertue, that even then he made good and apparant ſhew, that he would another day enlarge his dominion, and make a more flouriſhing and mighty Kingdom than his father ſhould leave it unto him. Theſe Embaſſadors declared unto Gala, " That foraſmuch as Syphax
" had entred league, and was banded with the Romans, to the end that by their alliance and ſo-
" ciety, he might be more mighty and puiſſant againſt other Kings and nations of Affrick: it M " were alſo better for him and much more commodious to joyn with the Carthaginians in all " convenient ſpeed: before that either Syphax paſſed over into Spain, or the Romans into Affrick:
" And Syphax (ſay they) may ſoon be defeated and overthrown now, while that he hath gained " naught yet but the bare name of the Roman League. Gala was ſoon perſwaded to ſend a power of men eſpecialy at the earneſt inſtance of his ſon, who was very deſirous of that war, and to have the managing thereof. He with the help of the Carthaginian legions vanquiſhed Syphax, and gave him a great overthrow. So as at that field there were ſlain, by repoort, in one day thirty thouſand. Syphax himſelf in perſon, with ſome few Numidian horſemen, fled back to the Mauriſians, that inhabit the fartheſt coaſts, hard upon the Ocean over-againſt Gades. But the barbarous people at the fame of his coming ſo reſorted in great numbers to him out of all parts, that in a ſhort ſpace N he was able to arm a mighty hoſt. And before he could with them croſs over into Spain, which was divided from Affrick with a narrow arm of the ſea, Maſaniſſa was come with his victorious Army: who in that place, of himſelf, without any help or aid of the Carthaginians, gave Syphax battell to his great honour and ſingular glory. In Spain no memorable exploit was atchieved, but that the Roman Generals allured and drew to them the able and ſerviceable manhood of the Celtiberians, for the ſame hire and ſtipend that they bargained for with the Carthaginians: and ſent from thence above three hundred Spaniards of the nobleſt parentage into Italy, to ſollicit their countrymen, who ſerved under Annibal as auxiliaries to follow them and take part with the Romans. This only, touching the affairs of Spain that year, is a thing worthy to be noted and remembred, That the Romans never waged ſouldier to ſerve in their war before that time, when O the Celtiberians began to be their mercenaries, and firſt received pay.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the five and twentieth Book.

Publius Cornelius Scipio, ſurnamed afterwards Africanus, was made Ædile, before he was of lawfull years. Annibal won the City Tarentum (all but the Caſtle, into which the Roman garriſon was retired) by means of certain young Tarentine Gentlemen, who had made ſemblance, that they went by night a hunting. The ſolemn plaies in the honour of Apollo, were now firſt inſtituted, upon occaſion of certain prophetical verſes of Martius, wherin the overthrow at Cannæ had been foretold. Q. Fulvius and Ap. Claudius Conſul, fought fortunately againſt Hanno, a Duke or Captain of the Carthaginians. T. Sempronius Gracchus the Pro-Conſul, was by a Lucan (his hoſt that gave him entertainment)
C trained into the danger of an ambuſh, and ſlain by Mago. Centenius Penula, who had ſerved in the wars as a Centurion, having made ſuit unto the Senat, to have the leading of an army, and promiſed, if this petition were granted, to win the victory of Annibal, and to vanquiſh him, took the charge of eight thouſand footmen, and gave battell to Annibal: but he was ſlain himſelf, and his whole army defeated and put to the ſword. Cn. Fulvius the Prætor fought unfortunately againſt Annibal, and loſt the field: in which fight there died ſixteen thouſand men. Himſelf, with two hundred horſemen fled and eſcaped. Capua was beſieged by Q. Fulvius, and Appius Claudius, the Conſuls. Claudius Marcellus in the third year of the ſiege won Syracuſe, and bare himſelf in that ſervice like a worthy and noble Knight. In that tumult and hurly-burly when the City was taken, Archimedes, whiles he was buſily occupied D about certain Geometricall figures and forms that he had drawn in the duſt, was killed. The two Scipios, Publius, and Cornelius, after ſo many and ſo worthy exploits performed fortunately in Spain, came to a wofull and heavy end, being themſelves ſlain there, with the loſs well-near of their whole Armies, in the eighth year after that they went into Spain. And the main poſſeſſion of that Province had been quite loſt, but for the ſingular manhood and induſtry of L. Martius, a Knight of Rome, who having rallied and gathered together the remnants of the armies, ſo encouraged them, that by their valiant ſervice two ſeveral encamped holds of the enemies were won, ſeven and thirty thouſand of the enemies ſlain, and eighteen hundred taken priſoners, and a great rich booty obtained. Whereupon he was called Captain Martius.

The five and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

WHiles theſe affairs thus paſſed in Affrick and in Spain, Annibal emploied the ſummer ſeaſon in the territory of Tarentum, in hope by treaſon to be Maſter of the City of the Tarentins. In which mean while, certain baſe Cities of the Salentins, and towns of no importance revolted unto him. And at the ſame time, of thoſe twelves States of the Brutii, which the year before had turned, and banded with the Carthaginians, the Conſentins and Thurins were rallied wholly again to the devotion of the people of Rome. And more of them had returned likewiſe, but for L. Pomponius Veientanus Captain of the Allies: who after he had made certain rodes into the country of the Brutii, and ſped his hand
F well with many booties, took upon him the countenance of a ſufficient Colonel, and was no leſs reputed: and having gathered a power of men, ſuddenly in haſte, without good adviſement, fought with Hanno. In which conflict, a mighty multitude of his men were either ſlain or taken priſoners. But, as good hap was, they were but a diſordered unruly rabble of ruſtical clowns and bondſlaves: and the leaſt loſs of all other, was the Captain himſelf, who amongſt the reſt was taken captive: a man as then, the author of a raſh and fool-hardy fight, and had been aforetime a Publican or farmer of the City revenues, and alwaies (through his naughty practiſes and cunning fetches and ſhifts wherein he was become skilful) a diſloyal perſon, and dangerous both to the publike State, and alſo to thoſe private companies and ſocieties, with whom he had commerce and dealing. Sempronius the Conſul, lying in the Lucans country made many light skirmiſhes, but not G any one worth remembrance, and won certain poor towns, and of ſmal regard, belonging unto the Lucans.

The longer that this war continued lingring, whiles proſperous ſucceſs and adverſe miſhap interchangeably wrought much variety and alteration as well in the inward minds of men; as in their outward ſtate and fortune; ſuch religious zeal and ſuperſtition (and the ſame for the moſt part in forrein ceremonies) had ſo ſeized & poſſeſſed the City, that either the men or gods therof, were ſuddenly all at once become clean altered and transfigured. Inſomuch as now the Roman rites and holy obſervations were contemned, not only in ſecret, & within doors at home in their

private houſes, but abroad alſo in the open ſtreets, yea, and in the common place and Capitoll: where there flocked alwaies a ſort of women that neither offered ſacrifice and oblations, nor ſaid their praiers, and did their devotions according to the uſe and cuſtome of their native country and City. Certain odd Prieſts and Chaplains, yea, and doting wizards and blind Prophets, had inveigled the minds and conſciences of men: whoſe number was the greater by reaſon firſt of the rurall people and peaſants of the country, who for need and poverty, and for fear together, were driven to quit their lands which they had not tilled and husbanded, by reaſon of the long wars, and many invaſions and rodes that laid all waſte, and ſo retired into the City: afterwards by the eaſie occupation and ready means of gain which they found by the errour of others, whom they ſoon ſeduced and abuſed: which trade they uſed and practiſed openly, as if it had been a lawfull art and myſtery. At the firſt, divers good and honeſt perſons began ſecretly to grieve and be offended herewith, yea, and to mutter and utter their griefs in private: but afterwards in proceſs of time the matter was preſented before the LL. of the Councill, and brake forth to open complaint in publike places. The Ædiles and Triumvirs Capitall were blamed much, and ſharply rebuked of the Senate, for not redreſſing theſe diſorders: and when they went in hand to rid the common place of this multitude, and to caſt down, over-turn, and fling away the preparation and proviſion for their ſacrifices and oblations, they had like to have been miſuſed and miſchieved by the people. When this malady and miſorder ſeemed now to be greater than might be remedied and reformed by the meaner and inferiour Magiſtrate, M. Æmylius, Prætor of the City for the time being, received Commiſſion by order from the Senate, to ſee that the people were eaſed and delivered from this new religion and ſuperſtition. He not only read unto them in a publike aſſembly the decree of the Senate in that behalf, but alſo made proclamation, Imprimis, that whoſoever had any books of propheſies or prayers, or treaties written of this art and ſcience of ſacrifices, ſhould bring in all thoſe books and writings unto him before the Calends of April next enſuing. Item, that no perſon ſhould ſacrifice either in publike place, or ſacred Church, after any new form or forrein rights and traditions. And in that year there died certain publike Prieſts, to wit, L. Cornelius Lentulus the Arch-Prelate, or high Prieſt: and C. Papyrius Maſſo, the ſon of Caius a Biſhop. Alſo P. Furius Philus an Augur, and C. Papyrius Maſſo the ſon of Lucius, a Decemvir deputed for holy myſteries. In place of Lentulus and of Papyrius, were M. Cornelius Cethegus, and Cn. Servilius Cepio ſubſtituted high-Prieſt and Biſhop. For Augur there was created L. Quintus Flaminius: and L. Cornelius Lentulus was choſen Decemvir over ſacred ceremonies and divine ſervice.

Now the time drew near of the ſolemn election of new Conſuls: but becauſe it was not thought good to cal the old away, (buſied as they were in the wars) T. Sempronius one of the Conſuls nominated for Dictator, to hold that election aforeſaid, C. Claudius Cento, who named for his General of the Cavalry Q. Fulvius Flaccus. This Dictator, the firſt comitiall day following, created for Conſuls Q. Fulvius Flaccus abovenamed, his Generall of horſemen, and Ap. Claudius Pulcher, who in his Prætorſhip had the juriſdiction and government of the Province of Sicily. Then were the Prætors elected, Cn. Fulvius Flaccus, C. Claudius Nero, M. Junius Syllanus, and P. Cornelius Sulla. When the Election was ended, the Dictator reſigned up his place.

That year was Ædile Curule, together with M. Cornelius Cethegus, one P. Cornelius Scipio, whoſe ſurname afterwards was Africanus. When he ſtood and made ſuit for the Ædileſhip, and the Tribunes of the Commons were againſt him, objecting that he was not eligible and capable of that office for that he was not of lawfull age to be a competitor, and to put in for it: If (quoth he) all the Quirites and Citizens of Rome will chooſe me Ædile, I have years enough on my back. Whereupon, in favour and furtherance of his ſuit, there was ſuch running and labouring on all hands to the Tribes for their voices, that the Tribunes ſuddainly ſurceaſed their purpoſe to hinder him. And this was the largeſs and donative that the Ædiles beſtowed. The Roman Games were, according to the wealth of that time, exhibited and ſet out with great ſtate and magnificence and continued one day longer than ordinary: and for every ſtreet throughout the City, was allowed a Congius of oyl. L. Villius Tappulus and M. Fundanus Fundulus Ædiles of the Commons, accuſed certain dames and wives of the City before the people, of diſhoneſt and incontinent life: and ſome of them being condemned, they forced into baniſhment. The Games called Plebeii, were renewed for two daies: and by occaſion of theſe games a ſolemn feaſt or dinner was kept for the honour of Jupiter.

* About a wine gallon.

Then Q. Fulvius Flaccus the third time entred the Conſulſhip, together with Appius Claudius: and the Prætors caſt lots for their Provinces. It fell unto P. Cornelius Sulla his lot to have the juriſdiction both of Citizens and ſtrangers, which before was executed by twain. To Cn. Fulvius Flaccus fell Apulia: to C. Claudius Nero was allotted Sueſſula: and M. Junius Syllanus his hap was to have the rule of the Tuſcans. The Conſuls were appointed by decree of the Senate to war with Annibal, and to have under their command two legions apiece: and that one of them ſhould receive his legions of Q. Fabius, the Coſ. of the former year: and the other take his at the hands of Fulvius Centimalus. As for the Prætors, Fulvius Flaccus had Commiſſion for the conduct of the legions at Luceria, which ſerved under Æmylius Prætor there: and Nero Claudius was to have the leading of thoſe that were under the hand of C. Terentius in Picenum: and that they ſhould provide themſelves of ſupply to make up the full number of the Companies. M. Junius had the charge of the legions of Citizens muſtred the year before to ſerve in Tuſcany: T. Sempronius Gracchus,

A Gracchus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus continued ſtill in the government of their Provinces, the one of Lucania, the other of Gallia, and kept their own forces. Likewiſe P. Lentulus governed the old Province in Sicily: M. Marcellus was Lord Deputy of Syracuſe, and ſo far as the Realm and Dominion of King Hiero reached. T. Otacilius Admirall of the Navy. Greece was governed ſtil by M. Valerius. Sardinia by Q. Mutius Scævola. Spain by P. and Cornelius Scipios. To the old armies before, there were other two new legions levied and enrolled by the Coſſ. So as in all, the whole forces for that year amounted to 23 Legions.

When the Conſuls ſhould muſter the ſouldiers, they were hindred by occaſion of a lewd prank
B plaied by one M. Poſthumius Pyrgenſis, to the great trouble and diſquiet of the State and publike peace. This Poſthumius was by his vocation and calling a Publican, who many years together for craſty and deceitfull dealing, for avarice and covetouſneſs, had not his fellow in all the City, but it were L. Pomponius Veientanus again; the ſame man, whom the year before as he forraged the territories of the Lucans raſhly and unadviſedly, the Carthaginians by the conduct of Hanno had taken priſoner. Theſe two (foraſmuch as it was covenanted and indented before, that the tranſporting of thoſe things which were for the proviſion of the armies beyond ſea, ſhould be warranted by the City againſt all danger of tempeſt; and that all dammage and loſs of goods that way miſcarrying, ſhould not lie upon the ſhoulders of the Publicans, who had undertaken by great to ſerve the armies, but be made good again out of the common Cheſt and Treaſure:) theſe publicans (I C ſay) not only gave falſe information of certain ſhipwracks, but alſo if they brought word at any time truly of ſome ſhips that were periſhed, they were ſuch only as were loſt by their own fraud and deceit, and not caſt away by chance or violence of weather. For they would fraight & charge certain old veſſels and ſhaken bottoms, with ſome few wares of ſmall or no worth at all, and ſuffer them to ſink for the nonce in the deep ſea, and ſave the mariners and ſailers with ſmall pinaces and cockboats prepared aforehand for the purpoſe: and when they had done, lie ſhamfully and ſay that they had loſt merchandiſe and commodities in thoſe ſhips of ſundry ſorts, and of great value. Theſe cunning parts of theirs had been the year paſt revealed and notified to M. Æmylius the Prætor, and the Senat by him made acquainted therewith: howbeit there was nothing done, nor any act of Senat deviſed for the chaſtiſement of the offender: becauſe the L.L. of the Coun-
D cill in no caſe would offend the company and ſociety of theſe publicans and farmers, in ſuch a time eſpecially, when there was ſome need of them. Then the common people took the matter into their own hands, for to proceed with more ſeverity againſt theſe lewd and fraudulent practiſes. At length, two of the Tribunes of the Commons, Sp. and Lucius both Carvilii aroſe up and ſhewed themſelves. For ſeeing how odious and infamous an indignity this was, and not to be ſuffered, they brought M. Poſthumius in queſtion, and laid an action and ſet a fine upon his head, of two hundred thouſand * Aſſes. When the day of triall was come, whether the fine aforeſaid * 625 lib. ſter.
ſhould ſtand and be paid, or taken off and remitted; and that the Commons were aſſembled in ſo great number, that the great Court-yard of the Capitol would ſcarcely hold the multitude: the defendant ſpake for himſelf and pleaded at large. But the only hope that he ſeemed to have was E this, in caſe C. Servilius Caſca a Tribune of the Commons, a friend and near kinſman of Poſthumius, would by vertue of his place come between and ſtop the courſe of law for proceeding farther, before that the tribes and wards were called forth, to go together and to give their voices. The two Tribunes abovenamed, having brought forth the witneſſes to depoſe, and their depoſitions being taken, commanded the people to void and make way: And the lottery casket or foſſer was brought forth to caſt lots in what Tribes the Latines ſhould give their voices. All this while the Publicans were earneſt with Caſca, to diſſolve the aſſembly by one means or other, and put off the Court for that day. The common people on the other ſide called on hard and gainſaid it. And as it fell out, Caſca ſat formoſt in one of the points and corners of the aſſembly. He wiſt not what to do, his mind was ſo perplexed for ſhame of the one ſide, if he did not help his friend and kinſman, and for fear on the other ſide, becauſe he ſee the people ſo eagerly bent. The Publicans ſeeing F ſmall hope of help in him, with full intent to make ſome ſtir, and to trouble the Court, put forward forcibly and advanced themſelves through a void way, ſeized upon an high place, and between the Tribunes and the people, ruſhed in upon them, and fell to quarrell and braul both with the people of the one ſide, and alſo with the Tribunes on the other: inſomuch as they were like to go together by the ears. Whereupon Fulvius the Conſul, "See ye not (quoth he to the Tri"bunes) how baſely ye are accounted of, and made of no better reckoning among them, than pri"vate perſons? See ye not a riot and mutiny toward, unleſs ye make haſte and break up the aſ-"ſembly? So the Commons were diſmiſſed, and a Senate called: Where the Conſuls made relation unto the Lords of the Councill, and complained how the ſolemn Seſſion and Court of the The complaints of the Conſuls to the Romans.
Commons, was by the audacious violence of the Publicans diſturbed: "That Court (I ſay) G "wherein M. Furius Camillus, upon whoſe exile enſued the deſtruction of the City, ſuffred
"himſelf to be condemned by ungrateful Citizens: wherein the Decemvirs afore him by vertue
"of whoſe laws the City is governed, and we live at this day: and wherein many principall Ci"tizens afterwards have been content to be ſet down and judged by the people. Moreover how "Poſthumius Pyrgenſis by force wreſted from the Commons, the liberty of their voices and ſuffra-
"ges: ſubverted and made void the judiciall Seſſion of the Commons: curbed the Tribunes and "had no regard of them: came as it were in warlike manner againſt the people of Rome: and got
"for their vantage the higher ground, to keep the Tribunes from coming unto the Commons:

"and

"and to ſtop the tribes for being called to ſcrutiny and to give their voices: and nothing elſe it H
"was that kept men from committing a fray, and ſhedding bloud, but the patience of the Magi-
"ſtrates themſelves: in that for the preſent, they gave place to the furious rage and malepart ſauci-
"neſs of a few: and for his will and pleaſure brake up the aſſembly, before they could go together "about the matter they were met for: (which the defendant himſelf with force & arms was rea"dy to ſtop and hinder for going forward) becauſe they might have no occaſion given them to "quarrel, which was the only thing that they ſought for. When this matter with all the circum-ſtances was throughly ſcanned of, and the beſt men there had ſpoken their minds, and given their opinion according to the outragiouſneſs and indignity of the thing: and thereupon the Senat decreed, that this violence tended to the breach of common peace, and the hazard of the State (a I moſt dangerous precedent to be ſuffered) then without more ado, the two Carvilii Tribunes of the Com. laid aſide clean all debating about the penall fine aforeſaid, and indited Poſthumius of a capitall crime: and commanded him to be attached by a principall Serjeant, and to be led to priſon, unleſs he put in good ſureties for his appearance to anſwer the cauſe, ſuch as would be bound for him body for body. Poſthumius put in bail: and made default at his day. The then Tribunes called the Commons together, preferred a bill unto them, which they granted to paſs as an act, in
* 1 of May. this form: That if M. Poſthumius came not forth & made appearance before the * Calends of May, and being cited and called that day, anſwered not to his name, and no lawfull excuſe alleaged for his abſence, they judged him to be a baniſhed man, and therefore awarded his goods to be ſold in port-ſale and himſelf to be excommunicate, and interdicted the uſe of water and of fire: and to I loſe the benefit of a Citizen for ever. This done, they began alſo to endite all thoſe, one after another, of a capitall crime, who were his abettors, and the movers and ſtirrers of a ſedition and commotion of the people and to call for perſonal pledges. At the firſt they committed as many of them as could find no ſuch ſureties: and afterwards, thoſe alſo that were ſufficient to put in bail. For the avoiding of which danger, moſt of them departed into voluntary exile. This was the end of the Publicans fraudulent dealing: and this was the iſſue of their audacious enterpriſe, in defence and maintenance of their guile and deceit.

After this, a ſolemn Court was called for the creation of the Arch-Prelate, and M. Cornelius Cethegus newly elected Prelate, was the Preſident of this election. Three competitors there were, who ſued for that Prelacy, and ſtrived earneſtly one againſt the other: namely, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, L Conſul for the time being, who alſo had before been twice Conſul, and Cenſor beſides; alſo T. Manlius Torquatus, a man of great reputation, for that he had been likewiſe dignified with a double Conſulſhip, and one Cenſorſhip; and laſt of all P. Licinius Craſſus, who as yet, was to ſue for the Ædileſhip: howbeit, this young man in that ſute and contention was ſuperiour, and carried it away from thoſe grave, ancient, and honourable perſons. Before him, for the ſpace of an hundred and twenty years, there had not been created any one, the higheſt Prieſt, (ſave only P. Cornelius * Caluſſa) but had ſit before in the Ivory Chair and born office of State. The Conſul had * Scapula rather. much ado to go through with the Levy, and to enroll the full legion of ſouldiers, by reaſon that the ſmall number of young and able men would hardly afford both to furniſh out the new legions of Citizens, and alſo to ſupply and make up the old. Howbeit the Senate would not ſuffer M them to give over their enterpriſe which they were about, but agreed that there ſhould be choſen two Ternions of Triumvirs: the one ſort of them to be ſent out, within the compaſs of fifty miles every way from Rome, the other to go farther; with commiſſion, to take good view and ſurvey, both within that precinct and without, in all through-fares and market towns: in boroughs and places of frequent aſſemblies; of all perſons of free condition that they could ſet eye on: and ſo many as they thought able men of body to bear arms, although they were not come to the lawfull age for ſervice, to preſs them for ſouldiers. Alſo it was decreed, that the Tribunes of the Commons, if they ſo pleaſed, ſhould put up a bill, that all under ſeventeen years of age, who had bound themſelves by military oath, ſhould have as good pay, as if they had been enrolled ſouldiers at ſeventeen years or upward. By vertue of this decree, the two Ternions aforeſaid of the N Triumvirs being choſen, made diligent ſearch, and viſited all the country over for free-born men accordingly.

At the ſame time letters came from M. Marcellus out of Sicily, concerning the demands of thoſe ſouldiers who ſerved under P. Lentulus, and they were read in the Senate Houſe. That army conſiſted of the reſidue which remained after the field loſt at Canna, and was confined into Italy (as hath been ſaid afore) with this condition, not to return back into Italy before the Punick war ſhould be ended. Theſe ſouldiers obtained licence of Lentulus to ſend as Embaſſadors unto Marcellus (where he lay in winter harbour) the principall men of arms, ſuch as ſerved on horſes allowed by the City, the chiefe Centurions alſo and the braveſt ſouldiers and choice flower of the Legions. One of theſe in the name of the reſt, having liberty granted them for to ſpeak, made O
The Oration of one of the Embaſſadors of the confined ſouldiers unto Marcellus. his oration in this wiſe. "We had come to you into Italy, O M. Marcellus, when you were Conſul, "immediatly upon that decree made againſt us (which if it were not unjuſt and unreaſonable,
"yet ſurely it was heavy and rigorous enough: but that we hoped to be ſent into this Pro"vince (ſo generally tronbled and out of order by the death of the KK. there to be employed "in ſome dangerous and cruell war againſt the Sicilians and Carthaginians both at once,
"and ſo with out bloudſhed and grievous wounds to make ſatisfaction for our treſpaſs unto the "Magiſtrates and rulers of Rome. Like as in our fathers daies, they which were taken priſoners

"by

A "by King Pyrrhus before Heraclea, made amends for their fault by their good ſervice againſt the "ſame Pyrrhus. And yet, I can not ſee, [my LL. of the Senat] for what ill deſert of our parts, ye "either have been diſpleaſed aforetime, or are offended at this preſent with us. For me thinks,
"I ſee both Conſuls, and the whole body of the Senat of Rome, when I behold your face, O Mar-
"cellus: whom if we had had to our Conſul at Canna, it would have gone better both with the "Common-weal, and with our ſelves, then it did. For I beſeech you, ſuffer us now, before I
"I make moan, and complain of our hard ſtate and condition, to purge our ſelves of that crime
"for which we are blamed. Set caſe, that neither the wrath of the Gods, nor deſtiny and fatal
"neceſſity (upon the Law and decree whereof dependeth the immutable order and infallible B "courſe and conſequence of all things in the world) was the cauſe that we were defeated & over-
"thrown at Canna, but our own ſelves, and our default was the occaſion: let us ſee then, whoſe
"fault it was, the ſouldiers, or the Generals? For mine own part, I remember I am a ſouldier, "and of my Captain and General I will never ſpeak but well; of him eſpecially, unto whom I "know the Senat rendred thanks, for that he deſpaired not of the common-wealth; and whoſe
"government ever ſince his flight and running away, hath been prorogued from year to year, and "who hath had the conduct of armies continually. Neither will I ſay ought of the reſt likewiſe,
"who eſcaped that unfortunat ſoil and deſeat, I mean our military Tribuns and Colonels, who
"(as we hear ſay) ſue for dignities, bear honourable offices in City, yea, and rule whole Provin"ces as LL. Preſidents in forein parts. It is ſo indeed my LL? do ye ſo eaſily pardon and forgive C "your own ſelves and children? and deal ye ſo hardly, ſo rigorouſly and cruelly, againſt us baſe ab"ject perſons, and vile wretches? And was it no ſhame and diſhonor imputed to the Conſul and "other great perſonages of the City to flie, when there was no other hope? and were the poor
"ſouldiers ſent by you into the field with this intention, to be all killed up, and none to eſcape? At "the battail of Allia, the whole army in a manner fled away: Alſo at the ſtraights of Caudium
"(to ſay nothing of other ſhameful foils of our armies) the hoſt yeelded up their armor to the "enemy, before they joyned battel, and fought one ſtrok. Yet, ſo far off it was, that thoſe armies
"ſuſtained any infamy and ſhameful reproach therefore, that both the City of Rome was recovered
"again by the means of thoſe Regiments which fled from Allia to Veii, and alſo the Caudine le"gions which returned to Rome naked, were ſent again into Samnium well armed: who ſubdued D "and brought under the yoke of ſubjection the very ſame enemies, who had taken ſuch pride and
"joy in that diſhonour and ignominy of theirs. And now, for the army before Canna, is any man
"able to come forth and charge them juſtly, that either they fled, or for cowardly fear behaved "themſelves unſeemly, and not like ſouldiers? Where were ſlain in field above fifty thouſand men:
"from whence the Conſul fled with fifty Horſemen, and no more: and of which company there is "not one remaineth alive, but whom the enemy, weary with killing, ſpared and left. I remember,
"at what time as the priſoners taken there, were denied money to pay for their ranſome, then
"every man commanded and praiſed us, for ſaving and reſerving our ſelves againſt another day, to "be employed in the ſervice of the Common-weal: for returning unto Venuſia to the Conſul, "and for making a good ſhew of a compleat army. But now, in worſe caſe are we, than in our E "fathers dayes, captives have been that were taken priſoners. For they only had their armor and "weapons changed for worſe, their rank in the battel ſhifted, their place in the camp where "they ſhould quarter, altered: which notwithſtanding, they recovered again all at once, by per"forming their good devoir to their country, and winning a victory in one fortunat battel. Not "one of them was ever confined (as it were) to a place of exile: none put beſide hope to be diſ-
"charged from ſouldiery by ſerving out his full time: and to be brief, they were ſet to fight with
"ſome enemy or other, where they might once for all, either loſe their life, or end their diſhonor.
"And we, againſt whom nothing can be objected at all, unleſs it be this, that we were the cauſe,
"and none but we, that ſome citizen of Rome might be ſaid to remain alive of all thoſe that were
"at the battel of Canna: we I ſay, are ſent far enough off, not only from our native country, and F "Italy, but alſo from all enemies: where we wax old in exile, to the end, that we ſhould have no "hope, no occaſion and opportunity to wipe away and cancel our diſgrace, to mitigate and paci-"fie the anger of our fellow-citizens, and finally to die with honor. But it is neither end of "ſhame, nor reward of vertue and valour, that we deſire and crave: but only that we might be "permitted to make proof of our courage, and ſhew our proweſs. Pains and perils we ſeek for,
"and to be employed in dangerous adventures, like hardy men and brave ſouldiers. Two years
"already there hath been ſharp and hot war in Sicily. Some Cities the Carthaginians won by "force, other ſome the Romans took likewiſe by aſſault. Whole Regiments of foot, many troops "and cornets of Horſe encounter together, and aſſail one another. At Syracuſe there are great "enterpriſes and worthy feats of arms, both by Sea and Land. The ſhouts of them that fight, the G "very clattering and ringing again of their armor and weapons, we can hear where we are, and
"we ſit ſtill like idle luſks, and do nothing, as if we had neither hands nor weapons to fight with.
"T. Sempronius the Conſul, with legions of bond-ſlaves, hath bidden battel to the enemies, "and fought with them in plain field ſo oft, that they are well recompenſed for their labour with "gaining their freedom firſt, and then the Burgeoſie of the City. Let us yet, in place and quali"ty at leaſtwiſe, of bondſlaves taken up and bought for money againſt theſe wars, fight with
"thoſe enemies, as well as they have done, and by our fight trie, whether we can regain our en"largement and liberty. Wil you your ſelf, O Marcellus, make tryal of us, and of our valour, by Sea,

" by Land, in pitched field, and battel ranged, or in giving assault and winning of walled Towns? H
" Put us to it, and spare not. The hardest adventures, the most painful and dangerous enterprises, " are they which we require most gladly: that we may have that betimes, and at once which we " should have come unto at Cannæ: seeing that all the time we have lived since, hath been destined " to our ignominy and disgrace.

At these words they fell down prostrate at Marcellus his feet. Marcellus answered them, that he had neither power of himself, nor commission otherwise, to content them, and satisfie their request. Howbeit, write to the Senat he would: and according as the LL. should give advice and direction, so he would do and not fail. These letters (as I said before) were brought to the Consuls, and by them read in the Senat-house. And after deliberate consultation about their contents, the Senat passed this decree: That as concerning those souldiers, who had forsaken their I fellows fighting before Cannæ, the Senat saw no reason, why they should be put in trust any more with the affairs of the Common-wealth: but if M. Claudius the Proconsul thought it good otherwise, he might do according to that which he judged convenient, and to stand with his own credit, and the safety of the State. Provided alwayes, that not one of them be dispersed with, and freed from service or charge of souldiery: nor rewarded with any military gift in testimony and token of his valour: nor yet reduced home again into Italy, so long as the enemy made abode there.

After this, the Pretor for the City, by vertue of a decree from the Senat, and an act of the Commons, assembled the people together. In which Session were created five Commissioners K called Quinqueviri, for the reedifying and repairing of the turrets and the walls: Likewise two other fraternities of Triumvirs, the one for taking an inventary of all sacred things, and to sign and note all offerings and oblations: the other for reedifying the Temples of Fortune and dame Matuta, within the gate Carmentalis, and likewise of Spes without the gate, which the year past were consumed by fire. Great and fearful tempests hapned this year. On the Alban mount it rained stones continually for two dayes. Many places were blasted and smitten with lightning from Heaven; and namely, two Chappels in the Capitol, and the Rampier about the camp and fort above Suessula in divers places thereof: and two watchmen in their Sentinels stricken stark dead. The wall and certain turrets thereon at Cumes, not only smitten but also shaken down and overthrown with lightnings and thunder-bolts. At Reate there was seen an huge stone to flie to L and fro in the air. The sun also appeared more red than it useth to be, and like to bloud. In regard of these prodigious sights, there was a solemn Procession and supplication all one day; and the Consuls for certain dayes together, attended only upon Divine service of the Gods: and the Novendial Sacrifices were devoutly celebrated nine dayes together.

Now whereas a long time already both Annibal hoped, and the Romans also suspected that the Tarentins would revolt: there fell out between, an occurrence and outward accident, which hastned it the rather. There was one Phileas a Tarentine, who having abode long at Rome under colour of an Embassador leger, a busy headed man, and of an unquiet spirit, one that of all things could not away with rest and peace, in which so long as he lived he thought every day a year, and that now he was waxen old and aged therein, found means to have access unto the hostages of the Tarentins. Kept they were in the Close belonging to the Temple of Liberty, with M the less attendance and careful eye because it was expedient and good neither for themselves, nor for their City, to make an escape, and deceive the Romans. These hostages he had oftentimes sollicited and perswaded by much talk and many reasons, and at length having bribed and corrupted two sextons and warders of the said Temple, he trained them forth in the evening out from the place where they were in safe custody: and when he had accompanied them onward on the way as a guide, and directed them how to pass secretly, he fled himself and they together. By day break the next morning they were missed, and their escape was noised throughout the City: Whereupon, men were sent out after them from all parts, to fetch them in again: who having overtaken them at Terracina, laid hold of them, and brought them back to Rome: where in the N Comitium, they were by the consent of the people, beaten with rods, and then thrown down headlong from the cliff Tarpeia.

The cruel rigor of this punishment, caused much anger; and provoked two of the noblest and most famous Grecian Cities in Italy to indignation, not only in publick generally, but also in private particularly: according as any man was either in bloud joyned, or in alliance and friendship linked to them who were thus foully and shamefully put to death. Amongst whom there were about thirteen noble Gentlemen of Tarentum, conspired together and the chief of them were Nico and Philomenes. These conspirators before they would stir and enter into any action, thought best to speak and confer with Annibal first: and so having gone forth of the City under a pretence as if they went to the chace a hunting, by night they came unto him. But when they drew neer unto O the camp, the rest hid themselves within a wood neer unto the high way: Nico and Philomenes only went forward to the watch, and there being taken (as they requested themselves) were brought before Annibal. Who when they had delivered unto him their complot and upon what occasions they entred into that designment they were highly commended, and promised great rewards, and willed and charged by him, that to the intent they might bear their contry-men in hand, how they ever went out of the City to fetch in some booties, they should drive afore them into the City, certain cattel of the Carthaginians, which were put out to pasture and feeding

A and herewith gave them his word to do it ſafely, and without any impeachment and reſiſtance whenſoever. Thus theſe yong Gentlemen were ſeen to bring in good ſtore of cattell: and as they were known to make this adventure the ſecond time and oftner ſtill, men marvailed the leſſe at the matter, and ſuſpected nothing. Now upon a new parling and communication with Annibal, they covenanted with him upon his faithful promiſe in theſe terms. Imprimis, for the Tarentins themſelves, to enjoy freely their Lands and goods, and live under their own laws. Item, to pay no penſion nor tribute unto Annibal, nor be forced to receive a garriſon againſt their wills. And laſt of all, to betray the garriſon ſouldiers of the Romans, and all their fortreſſes and places of ſtrength deliver up into the hands of the Carthaginians. When theſe conditions and capitulations B were agreed upon, then Philomenes uſed much oftner to go forth and come in again in the night: and as he was known to be a great hunter, and much delighted in that exerciſe, he had his hounds following him hard at his heels, and all other furniture about him fit for huntſmen: and lightly ever he took ſome wild beaſt or other with his hounds, or elſe got ſomething from the enemy, that of purpoſe lay ready for his hands: and alwayes as he brought home ought with him, he would beſtow it either upon the Captain of the Roman garriſon, or deal it among the warders of gates. And they all, verily believed and were perſwaded, that his going out and in thus, moſt by night, was only for fear of the enemies. Now, when he had uſed this ſo accuſtomably that he had made it an ordinary practiſe, in ſo much, that at what time of the night ſo ever he had but once lured or whiſtled, the gate was ſtreight ſet open for him: then Annibal thought it time, to put the C plot aboveſaid in execution. Three dayes journey he was off; Where became he would have men the leſſe marvail, why he kept a ſtanding camp ſo long ſtill in one place he feigned and made himſelf ſick. The Romans alſo, that lay in garriſon at Tarentum gave over to ſuſpect his long abode and leaguering there. But after that he was determined and reſolved to advance toward Tarentum, he picked out ten thouſand foot and horſemen together, whom he ſuppoſed for nimble bodies, ſwift footmanſhip, and lightneſs of armor to be moſt meet for expedition: and with them at the fourth watch of the night, he marched forward with his enſigns. And having ſent out afore-hand fourſcore Numidian light Horſes, he commanded them, to ride about and ſcour all the wayes on every ſide, and to caſt their eye to eſpie and diſcover all the coaſts, that no country people a far off might deſcry and view the army on foot, but they ſhould be ſeen: and withal to D bring in, as many as were gone before, and kill all them they met and encountred: to the end that the Peaſants there inhabiting, might think they were Theeves and Robbers, rather than the vantcurriers and fore-riders of an army. Himſelf in perſon marching with great ſpeed and celerity, pitched his camp almoſt 15 miles from Tarentum. Neither would he there, be known unto his men of his purpoſe, nor tell them whither they ſhould go: only he called his ſouldiers together, and charged them to hold on the direct way, and not ſuffer any one to turn aſide, nor in the march go out of his rank or file: and above all things, to be ready for to receive their charge and commandment from their Captains, and do nothing without their warrant and commiſſion. As for himſelf, he would when he ſaw his time, let them know his mind, and what the ſervice was that he would have done. And about the ſame very hour and inſtant, news came as far as Tarentum that E ſome few Numidian Horſemen forraged the country, and had put the villagers in great fright all about. At which tidings, the Captain of the Roman garriſon was no more moved, nor made any other haſt, but only gave order, that ſome of the Horſemen the next morning by day light ſhould ride forth, to keep the enemy from farther excurſions. In the mean time, they that had this charge, bare themſelves ſo careleſly in providing themſelves to execute that which they were commanded, that contrary-wiſe, they took thoſe outrodes of the Numidians for a good argument, That Annibal with his army was not diſlodged, but abode ſtill in leaguer where he lay firſt. Annibal when it was once dark and dead night, began to ſet forward. Philomenes was there ready to be his guide, loden with his game hunted as his manner was. The reſt of his conſpiracy waited their time to execute their ſeveral charges, as it was agreed among them. Now it was ordred between F them afore, that Philomenes coming in at the uſual little wicket, with his veniſon that he had hunted, ſhould bring in with him ſome armed men: and Annibal on another part, come to the gate called Temenis, which looked toward the Eaſt, and ſtood on the Land ſide of the City, a good way within the wall, as it were in a nook. When Annibal approached the ſaid gate, he made a fire, in token that he was come (as it was deviſed between them before) and it flamed forth and gave a ſhining light. The like did Nico again. Then the fires on both ſides were put out, that they made no more blaze. And Annibal in great and ſtill ſilence, led his army cloſe to the gate. Nico came ſuddainly at unawares upon the watchmen faſt aſleep, killed them in their beds, and opened that gate. Annibal entred with his Regiment of footmen, and commanded the cavalry to ſtay behind, to the end they might have liberty of open ground to ride, whitherſoever there was need, G and as occaſion required. Now by this time, Philomenes alſo was come neer to that little gate on the other ſide, where he uſed to make his egreſs and ingreſs to and fro. And when he had raiſed the watchman with his voyce ſo wel known, and with his whiſtle wherewith now he was familiarly acquainted, & ſaid withal, that he was troubled with tugging and lugging of a foul & heavy beaſt: therewith the wicket was ſet open. Two luſty fellows there were carrying in the wild bore between them, and he himſelf followed with one of the huntſmen, lightly & nimbly appointed, and whiles the watchman his eye was upon the two porters that carried the beaſt, wondring at the bigneſs of the bore, and took no heed to himſelf, Nicom. thruſt him through with his ſpear. Then tred in after them, about thirty men armed, who killed the reſt of the watch, and brake down the great gates withal: and immediatly there entred the companies with banner diſplayed: and ſo, forth from thence they were conducted and brought to the market place, without making any noiſe, and there joyned themſelves to Annibal. Then Annibal divided two thouſand Gauls into three Regiments, whom he ſent into ſundry parts of the City: and gave order to the Tarentins and the Affricans, to get poſſeſſion of the moſt principal and populous places of the City; and when the cry and ſhout was once up, to kill all the Romans whereſoever, and to ſpare the Townſmen. But to the end that this might be orderly done, he gave direction to the yong Gentlemen aforeſaid of Tarentum, that ſo ſoon as they eſpied a far off, any of their own Citizens and Country-men, they ſhould bid them be quiet and ſtill, to hold their peace, to be of good cheer and fear nothing. By which time, they began to ſet up a ſhout and cry, as men uſe to do in a City taken by aſſault, but what the matter ſhould be, no man of the Town or garriſon could certainly tell. For the Tarentin inhabitants ſuppoſed verily, that the Roman ſouldiers of the garriſon were riſen up to ſack the City: the Romans on the other ſide, thought that the Townſmen mutined, and they were in doubt of ſome traiterous practiſe. The Captain himſelf awakened and raiſed at the firſt tumult, eſcaped to the key, where he took a ſmall Barge or whirry-boat, and fled to the Caſtle. The Trumpet alſo that ſounded from the Theatre, made the greater terror: for it was both a Roman Trumpet, provided aforehand for the purpoſe by thoſe Traitors, and a Grecian blew it, one who had no skill; and ſo it was doubtful, both who he was that ſounded, and who they were that he gave ſignal unto. When day appeared, and the Romans ſaw the armour of the Carthaginians and Gauls, then they wiſt well in what door the wind was, and how the World went: and the Greeks ſeeing the Romans lying along every where ſlain, were ſoon aware that the City was taken by Annib. l. But after it was broad day light, and that the Romans who remained unkilled, were fled into the Caſtle, and the noiſe and hurliburly began by little and little to ſlake and give over: then Annibal commanded the Tarentins to be called to a general aſſembly, and to preſent themſelves without arms. When they were all come together, but only thoſe who with the Romans were fled for company into the Caſtle, there to abide ſuch fortune as they; Annib. l ſpake kindly unto the Tarentins, gave them good and friendly words, rehearſed with great proteſtation what favors he had ſhewed to all their Citizens, whom he had taken priſoners either at Thraſymenus, or at Cannæ: and withal, after he had bitterly inveighed againſt the Lordly and proud rule of the Romans, he commanded every man to repair home to his own houſe, and ſet his own name upon his dore: for that ſo many houſes as had not the name written upon them of the Maſter thereof, he would preſently upon ſound of Trumpet, command to be rifled. Over and beſides, that if any one ſhould hap to write his own name, and ſet it on the door or lodging-houſe of a Roman (for he ſaw divers of their houſes empty) he would take him for an enemy, and deal with him accordingly. After this ſpeech ended, and the aſſembly diſſolved, when the doors were marked with their titles and inſcriptions aforeſaid, whereby the houſes of friends and enemies were known diſtinctly one from another: the ſignal was given by ſound of Trumpet: and then there was running every where from all parts to ranſack the lodgings of the Romans. And ſome prety ſprinkling of pillage they met withal. The next day after, he advanced againſt the Caſtle to aſſault it, which after he ſaw impregnable and not poſſible to be won, either by forcible aſſault, or by artificial devices of fabricks and engins, by reaſon that both the Sea came to it, wherewith the greater part therof was compaſſed, in manner of a demy Iland, and alſo fortified beſides on another part with exceeding high and ſteep rocks: and withal, fenced from the City with a ſtrong wall and deep ditch: therefore, becauſe he would neither let nor hinder himſelf from atchieving greater affairs, whiles he was carefully buſied onely about defending the Tarentins nor yet leave them without a ſtrong guard, for fear leſt the Romans from out of the Caſtle, might at their pleaſure come upon them, he determined to raiſe a rampiar for a partition between the Caſtle and the City, for their defence againſt the ſaid garriſon. And he was not out of hope, but that when the Romans ſhould offer to iſſue forth to hinder the ſaid work, they might alſo be fought withal: and in caſe they adventured raſhly to run on, and engage themſelves too far, they might be cut off in their heat, & the forces of the garriſon might be ſo diminiſhed & abated by ſome great ſlaughter & execution, that the Tarentins of themſelves ſhould be able with eaſe to defend their City againſt them. The ſaid work was not ſo ſoon begun, but the Romans all of a ſuddain, ſet open the Caſtle gate, ſallied forth & charged upon the pioners as they were labouring about their bulwark. The guard that attended for the defence of the workmen, and ſtood before their work, fell off and ſuffered themſelves to be put back, to the end that the enemies upon their firſt ſucceſs, ſhould be more adventurous: ſuppoſing that the further they gave ground, the more of the other would follow after and chaſe them. Which being perceived, the Carthaginians whom Annibal had kept cloſe for this purpoſe, and had in readineſs very wel appointed, roſe out of all parts, and made head again. Neither were the Romans able to abide their forcible violence. And flie they could not in multitudes by occaſion that the ſtraightneſs of the place would give no leave: and beſides, many things lay in their way: partly, the work that was begun, and partly, other proviſion of ſtuffe brought for the ſame, which mightily hindred and impeached them. Moſt of them fell headlong into the trench: and to be ſhort, more periſhed in their flight, than were killed in the fight. After this, the fortification went in and again, and none durſt venture to hinder it. So he caſt a mighty deep ditch, & raiſed an high rampier within it. Alſo behind it, a prety diſtance off, he went in hand

A to build a mure or wall to it, in the very ſame quarter; that they might be able even without any guard at all, or ſtrength of men, to defend themſelves againſt the Romans. Howbeit, he left them an indifferent band of ſouldiers, which might withal help out ſomewhat in making of the wall. Himſelf then departed with the reſt of his army as far as the River Galeſus (five miles off from the City) and there encamped. From which ſtanding camp, he came back once again to ſurvey the work: and finding that it went better forward than he looked for, he began to conceive ſome good hope that the citadel alſo might be won by aſſault. For why it was not defended ſurely by ſituation on high ground, as others are, but ſeated on a plain, and divided from the City, by a wall only and a ditch. Now when as it began to be aſſailed with fabricks, and artillery deviſed of all B ſorts, there hapned a new ſupply to be ſent from Metapontum to aid the garriſon: whereby the Romans took heart unto them, in ſo much as in the night time of a ſuddain, and before they were looked for, they ſet upon the fabricks and ordinance of the enemies planted thereupon: ſome they caſt down and overthrew, others they fired and conſumed. And there an end of Annibal his aſſault of the Caſtle from that ſide.

The only hope behind now, was in continual ſiege: and yet that hope promiſed no great effect, becauſe they that held the Caſtle, had the Sea free at their command, all that ſide, whereas the ſaid fort (ſtanding as it were in an half Iſland) overlooketh the mouth of the haven: and the City contrary-wiſe, was wholly ſecluded from al entercourſe of paſſage and commodities coming in by Sea, and liker were they that beſieged the fortreſs, to feel the want and ſcarcity of victu- C als than thoſe that were beſieged within it. Then Annibal after he had called together the principal citizens of Tarentum, laid open unto them all, the preſent difficulties, ſaying; "That he "neither ſaw any way to win by force the Caſtle ſo ſtrong and fortified as it was, nor had any "hope at all to gain it by ſiege, ſo long as the enemies were Lords of the Sea. But if they had "ſhips once, whereby they might hinder and ſtay the coming in of their victuals and other "commodities, the enemies immediatly would either quit the peece, or yeeld themſelves. The "Tarentins held well with that, and approved the device. But (ſay they) he that giveth us that "counſel, muſt alſo affoord us means to effect the ſame. For the Carthaginian ſhips if they were "ſent for, and ſet out of Sicily might well do the feat: mary, as for our own which lie ſhut up "as it were, within a little creek and bay, conſidering that the enemy keepeth the mouth and en- D "try of the haven, how is it poſſible that they ſhould get out from their harbour into the open "Sea, and paſs without danger? Paſs (quoth he?) Paſs they ſhall, make no doubt of that. "Many things, I tell you, conſidered in their own nature are cumberſome and difficult, but by "pollicy and wit of man are eaſily welded and wrought with a ſleight. Ye have a City here ſeated "upon a plain and champain ground, the wayes anſwering to every ſide of it are even, large, and "broad enough, yea, and open to all quarters. I will chuſe that way which croſſeth the midſt of "the City, and paſſeth along to the haven and the Sea, and ſo will carry and tranſport the ſhips "upon wains, with no great ado and trouble. And ſo, both the Sea ſhall be ours clear, which "now the enemies keep, and alſo we ſhall beſiege the Caſtle round, as well by Sea as by Land: "nay, more than that, within ſhort time we ſhall either enter it, being abandoned of the ene- E "mies, or elſe be maſters both of it and them together.

Theſe words not only put them in good hope, that the enterpriſe would be effected, but alſo ſet them in a wonderful good conceit and admiration of the Captain himſelf. Then out of hand, all the wains and carts were taken up from all places as many as could be had, and were put together, and coupled one to another. Divers cranes and other inſtruments were ſet to, for to draw up the ſhips to Land the way made plain and level, that the carts might go more eaſily, and paſs away with leſs trouble and more expedition. After this they got together draught oxen, cart jades and other labouring beaſts, yea, and men alſo for to draw: and thus the work was luſtily begun, inſomuch, as within few dayes, the fleet well rigged, appointed, and dreſſed, was brought about the Caſtle, and rid at anchor even in the avenue & entry of the haven. In theſe terms ſtood Taren- F tum, when Annibal left it, and returned back to his wintering harbours. But authors write diverſly of this revolt of Tarentum, whether it hapned the year paſt, or at this preſent. But the greater number of them, and thoſe that lived neerer to that time, when the remembrance of theſe matters was freſh, affirm that it was this very year.

At Rome, the Conſuls and Pretors both remained ſtill, until the *fifth day before the Calends of May, by occaſion of the Latin holy-dayes, upon which day, when they had performed a ſolemn ſacrifice, with all complements thereto belonging, on the Alban Hill, they departed every one to his ſeveral charge and Province. After this, there crept into the minds of men a new ſcrupuloſity of conſcience upon certain prophetical verſes of one Martius, a noble and famous Prophet in times paſt. Now, by reaſon that in the year before, there was diligent ſerch and inquiſition made, G for ſuch books of Fortune, according to a decree granted out of the Senat, thoſe verſes came to light, and to the hands of M. Æmylius Pretor of the City, who ſat upon that commiſſion. And he immediately gave them to Sulla the new Pretor. Of two Propheſies of Martius, the one, which afterwards caried the greater authority with it, by reaſon of the event that hapned ſo right, and declared it ſo evidently, cauſed the other alſo, whereof the time was not yet come, to be of credit and believed. The former contained a Prediction of the overthrow at Canna, in theſe or ſuch like words:

From Trojane line, O Romane once descended,
Flie Canna River, neer to Cannæ Town:
Lest strangers born, who have thy death intended,
Force thee to fight on Diomede his down.
But warning mine, thou wilt not rest upon,
Until with blood thou first do fill the plain;
And then to Sea from fruitful Land, anon
Thy men shall down the stream by thousands slain.
Thy flesh must bait the fish in Ocean deep,
And lure the foules that flie from high to prey,
And feed wild beasts, on earth below that keep.
Mark well my words. Jove thus me taught to say.

And they who had been souldiers, and served in those wars, knew as perfectly Diomedes his plains, and the River * Canna, as they did the very defeat it self, and losse at Cannæ. Then was the other Propheſy likewise read, which was the darker of the twain: not only because future things are more uncertain, than those which are past already; but also by reason of the kind of writing, which was more obscure and intricate, in these terms:

* The same that Aufidus.

If enemies ye would expel, if botch and plaguie sore
* Sent from a far, ye would drive forth, and vexed be no more;
To Phœbus (Romans) I advise, ye vow, from year to year
To set forth playes in solemn wise, with mirth and merry chear.
From publick stock, the people must, part of the charge disburse:
The rest shall ye, for you and yours, defray with privat purse.
The soveraign Pretor must procure these games to be perform'd,
Who sits in place, mens pleas to hear, and see all wrongs reform'd.
Then shall the ten Decemvirs hight, the Greekish rites observe,
In slaying beasts for sacrifice, and nothing from them swerve.
If all be done accordingly, your joy shall aye increase,
Your State shall daily grow in wealth, and fruits of blessed peace.
For God Apollo will you save, he will your foes destroy,
Who at their pleasure wast your fields, and work you much annoy.

* Apollo is called in Homer Ilia. 9. Ekebolos, i. shooting afar off.

For the explanation and expiation both, of this propheſie, they took one whole day. And the morrow after, there passed a decree from the Senate, That the Decemvirs should peruse and look into the books of Sibylla, about the exhibiting of those said games, in the honour of Apollo, and celebrating likewise of the sacrifices. And when all was perused, and relation made before the Senat: the Lords made an Act, and set down an order; First, to vow and set forth solemn pastimes accordingly, to the honour of Apollo. Item, After the Games were done and finished, to allow the Pretor * twelve thousand Asses, toward the expenses of the divine service, and two greater beasts for sacrifice. There passed also another Act of the Senat, That the Decemvirs should celebrate divine service, and sacrifice after the observance and rites of the Grecians; and offer upon the Altar these beasts, to wit, an Ox with guilded horns, and two white femal Goats, with guilded horns likewise, for Don Apollo: and a Cow with horns, in like manner guilded, for Dame Latona. The Pretor, when he was to represent the Games within the Circus Maximus, gave commandment, and made proclamation, That the people, during the time of those solemnities, should contribute money, for an offering to Apollo, every man according to his ability, and as he might well spare. This is the beginning of the Apollinare Games and Playes exhibited for to obtein victory, and not for to escape some plague or pestilence, as most men suppose. And when they were celebrated, the people stood to behold and look on, adorned with garlands upon their heads, and the dames and matrons of the City went in procession, and made supplications. Every mans doore was set open, and they feasted and made good chear generally through the City in the open street; and a high holyday this was, solemnised with all kind of ceremonies that could be devised.

* 37 lib. 10. sb. sterl.

But to return again to Annibal, who was about Tarentum; and both Consuls remaining in Samnium, but ready, as it seemed, to besiege Capua: it fell out, that the Campans already were distressed with hunger and famine, (a calamity that usually followeth long and continual siege) and the reason was, because the armies of the Romans had impeached and hindred their seedneſſe. Therefore they dispatched Embassadors to Annibal, beseeching him, that he would take order for grain to be brought into Capua, from all parts neer adjoyning, before that the Consuls were come abroad with their legions into their territory, and all the wayes beset, and passages stopped by the guards and companies of the enemies. Whereupon, Annibal gave direction to Hanno, that he should remove out of the country of the Brutii, and passe over with his forces into Campania, and endeavour so, that the Campans might be provided of sufficient store of corn. Then

A Hanno diſlodged anon, and departed with all his power out of the * Brutians countrey, purpoſing to avoid the leaguer of his enemies, and namely the Conſuls, who lay in Samnium: and when he approached neer to * Beneventum, he pitched his Tents three miles from the City it ſelf, upon a high ground. After which, he commanded, that the corn ſhould be brought to him into his camp, out of all the aſſociat and confederat Cities thereabout, into which it had been carried in the ſummer afore; and allowed a good guard for the ſafe convoy thereof. After this, he ſent a meſſenger to Capua, to give them notice, upon what day they ſhould attend, and be in readineſſe to receive their corn; and againſt the time, provide out of the countrey for the carriage, carts, wains, and draught-beaſts, and pack-horſes of all ſorts. But the Campans, like as they carried B themſelves in all things elſe, idly and negligently, ſo in this they were very ſlack and retchleſs: for they ſent little above forty carres, and ſome few beaſts for carriage beſides. For which they had a check given them, and were rebuked by Hanno; becauſe that hunger, which cauſeth the very dumb beaſt to beſtir it ſelf and make hard ſhifts, was not able to prick them forward to be more careful about their own buſineſs. So there was a farther day appointed for to fetch their corn, and to come more furniſhed and better provided for carriage. All this being reported to the men of Beneventum, with the circumſtances and particulars, as it was, they addreſſed with all ſpeed ten Embaſſadors to the Roman Conſuls, encamped then about Bovianum. Upon which intelligence given of the affairs at Capua, they took order, and agreed between themſelves, that one of them ſhould conduct an army into Campania. And Fulvius, who undertook that charge, C marched by night to Beneventum, and put himſelf within the walls of the Town. And there he was advertiſed by them that dwelt neer hand, That Hanno was gone out with part of his forces, for to purvey corn; that there were 2000 carts come, with a rude and diſorderly multitude beſides of people, without armor; that all that they did was in hurry, in haſt, and great fear; and finally, that the camp was out of form and faſhion, and all good military order clean gone, by reaſon of a rabble & multitude of country clowns, come out of thoſe quarters, and entermingled amongſt them. The Conſul, I ſay, being enformed for certain by credible perſons of theſe things, gave his ſouldiers warning to make ready againſt the next night enſuing, nothing but their enſigns and weapons, for that they were to charge upon the camp of the Carthaginians. And ſo they ſet forward at the relief of the fourth watch, leaving their packs and truſſes with all their bag D and baggage behind them at Beneventum: and preſenting themſelves before the camp, ſomewhat before day, they put them into ſuch a bodily fear, and ſo terrified them, that if it had been pitched upon a plain ground, no doubt, it had been won at the firſt aſſault. But the height of the place, and their rampiers and fortifications beſides, which could not poſſibly be entered upon, without climing upon the ſteep hill with much difficulty, were a defence unto it. By day light there was a luſty aſſault given, and a hot skirmiſh begun, but the Carthaginians not only defended and kept their rampier, but alſo (as having the vantage of the ground) they chaſed and thruſt the enemies back, as they mounted up the hill. Howbeit, reſolute hardineſſe overcame all hardneſs and difficulties whatſoever; For in diverſe places at once they advanced as far as the banks and trenches; but it coſt bloudy blows firſt, and the death of many a ſouldier. The Conſul therefore E calling the Coronels and Marſhals together, ſaid, it were not amiſſe to give over that raſh and heady attempt, and, as he thought, it were the ſafer courſe, for that day to retire the army to Beneventum, and on the morrow to encamp themſelves afront the enemy, to the end, that neither the Campans might get forth, nor Hanno return and enter into the Town again. And that this might be the ſooner effected, and with a great deal more eaſe, he would ſend for his Colleague alſo with his army, and both of them jointly bend their forces that way. But theſe devices of the Captain general were ſoon daſht. For as he was about to ſound the retreat, the ſouldiers with a loud voyce cried out, that they could not away with ſuch faint Captains: they ſcorned to be commanded in ſo cold and ſlothful ſervice; they would none of that: and ſo put the Conſul out of his bent. It hapned, that next unto the gate entring into the enemies camp, there ſerved F a cohort or company of the Peligni, led by Captain Vibius, who caught the banner out of the bearer his hand, and flung it over the rampier, and with that, fell to curſing himſelf and his company both, wiſhing a plague light upon him and them to, if the enemies went away with that banner: and therewith led himſelf the way, and brake firſt through the trench, and over the paliſado into their camp. Now by this time the Peligni fought within the rampier: and then Valerius Flaccus a Coronel of the third legion, from another ſide fell to upbraid the Romans, and hit them in the teeth with their beaſtly cowardice, for ſuffering their allies to have the honor of entring and taking the camp. Whereupon T. Pedanius (a centurion of the Regiment called Principes, and ſerving in the firſt place thereof) took likewiſe an enſign from him that carried it, and withal, Now ſhall, quoth he, this enſign, and this Centinere (meaning himſelf) preſently be G within the rampier of the enemies: let me ſee who dare follow, and ſave it from being taken by the enemy. At firſt, his own band and company followed him hard at heels, as he clambred to get over the rampier, and then the whole legion came after likewiſe. By this time, the Conſul alſo ſeeing his ſouldiers climbing over the rampier, changed his purpoſe, and was of a clean other mind: and from calling and reclaming his ſouldiers back, fell to exhort and encourage them, ſhewing in how great hazard and danger a right hardy and valiant cohort of allies were, and the whole Legion of Citizens beſides. They all therefore ſet to, and every man did his beſt: and notwithſtanding there was many a dart driven and javelin lanced, notwithſtanding the enemies oppoſed poſed their armor and bodies full againſt them yet they never ſtinted to aſſay every place, as well H high as low, until they were broken through, and gotten in. Many a man was hurt (ye may be ſure) but yet even they that bled until they fainted, and were not able to fight any longer, carried this mind and ſtrove withal, to die yet within the rampier of their enemies. Thus in the turning of an hand the camp was won, as eaſily as if it had been pitched upon a plain and even ground, and not fortified at all with trench and rampier. From this time now, there was no more fighting, but killing on all hands in that tumult and confuſion of pell mell within the camp. Slain there were of enemies more than ſix thouſand, and above ſeven thouſand taken priſoners, together with the Campan purveiors for corn, and all the proviſion of wains, carts, and labouring beaſts. Beſides, another huge booty was taken, which Hanno when he went a foraging all abroad, I had raiſed out of the country of the aſſociats of the people of Rome. Then the Conſul after he had caſt down all the fortifications of the camp, returned from thence to Beneventum. And there both the Conſuls together (for Ap. Claudius alſo thither came after a few dayes) made ſale of all the prizes and pillage, and divided the ſame. Vibius the Pelignian, and T. Pedanius a principal centurion of the third legion, by whoſe forward and ſingular good ſervice, the camp of the enemies was forced, were rewarded eſpecially above the reſt. Hanno then together with ſome few forragers whom by chance he had with him returned from Cominium Ceritum (whither the news came of the loſſe of the camp) into the Bruttians country, more like one that fled in rout, then marched in warlike order.

The Campans alſo having heard, as well of their own loſſes as of their allies, ſent Embaſſadors K unto Annibal, to certify him; "That both the Conſuls were at Beneventum, that the war was "within a dayes journey of Capua, and but a ſtep from the very gates and walls of the City: and "unleſs he made good haſt to ſuccour and reſcue them, Capua would ſooner come under the "obedience and ſubjection of the enemies, than Arpi did. And he was not to make ſuch a reck-
"ning of all Tarentum (much leſs then of the Caſtle alone) as in regard thereof to leave Capua un-
"defended, and yeeld it to the people of Rome, Capua I ſay, which he was wont to compare and
"make equal with the City of Rome. Annibal promiſed that he would take care for the good eſtate of the Campans: and for the preſent he ſent two thouſand Horſemen with the Embaſſadors, as a guard to keep the country and territory from invaſion and ſpoil.

The Romans in this mean time, among other their affairs, neglected not the ſafety of the L Caſtle of Tarentum, and the garriſon there beneged. For C. Servilius, Lieutenant, by order and authority of the Senat, was ſent by P. Cornelius the Pretor into Hetruria, to purvey for corn, and to buy ſtore: who with certain ſhips laden therewith, arrived in the haven of Tarentum, paſſing even through the guards of the enemies. At whoſe coming, they that before whiles they had but ſmall hope, were oftentimes by way of parly moved by the enemies to go to the contrary ſide, now themſelves began to perſwade and ſollicit the enemy to come unto them. And the garriſon ſurely was ſtrong enough, conſidering that the ſouldiers which lay at Metapontum, were drawn from thence to the defence and keeping of the Caſtle of Tarentum. And therefore the Metapontins, ſo ſoon as they were delivered of the fear whereby they were kept and held in as with a bit, revolted unto Annibal. Semblably did the Thurins alſo, who inhabited the ſame tract by the Sea ſide. M They were moved and perſwaded thereto, not ſo much by the rebellion of the Tarentins and Metapontins, with whom they were linked in kindred, and joyned neer in blond (over and be-ſides that they were deſcended as well as they, out of Achaia) as with anger toward the Romans for the hoſtages lately by them killed. Their friends therefore and kinſfolk diſpatched letters and meſſengers unto Hanno and Mago (who were in the country of the Brutii neer at hand) offering to deliver the City into their hands, if they brought their power and preſented it before their walls. Now was there one M. Atinius, Captain there over a ſmall garriſon, whom they ſuppo-ſed might be eaſily drawn forth of the Town to make ſome raſh and inconſiderat skirmiſh, preſu-ming not ſo much upon his own ſouldiers (who were but an handful) as upon the youth and flour of the Thurians, whom he had of purpoſe enrolled into bands and companies, and furniſhed N with armor againſt the like occaſions of ſervice. The Carthaginian Captains afore named, had divided all their forces between them in two parts, and were entred into the territory of Thurii:
and Hanno with his Regiment of footmen, advanced with banners diſplayed before the City:
Mago with the Horſemen, ſtaid behind cloſe among the Hills, over-againſt the Town, and there lay ſecretly in ambuſh. Atinius then, who by his eſpials was enformed only of the ſquadrons of footmen, came forth with his forces into the field, ignorant (God wot) both of the falſhood and treaſon of the Townſmen, and alſo of the covert trains and ambuſhment of the enemies. The skirmiſh of footmen was exceeding faint and cold, whiles the Romans being but few, fought in the vanguard: and the Thurins looked rather when the skirmiſh ſhould end, than made any haſt to fight themſelves and help: and withal, the ſquadrons of the Carthaginians gave ground for O the nonce, to train the enemy as far as the ſide of the Hill, under which, on the other ſide their Horſemen lay in wait and were ambuſhed. And thither they were not ſo ſoon come, but the Horſemen made haſt to ſhew themſelves, with a great outcry, and preſently put to flight the raw and diſordered company and multitude of the Thurins; who were not very faſt and ſound in heart to them on whoſe ſide they fought. The Romans, albeit they were environed round, whiles the footmen lay ſtill at them on the one ſide, and the Horſemen charged them a-freſh on the other ſide, yet they mainteined fight, and held out a long while: but at laſt, they likewiſe turned their

A back and fled to the City. There the traitors and conſpirators being gathered together on heaps, ſo ſoon as they had let in at the gates ſtanding wide open, the companies of their own citizens: when they ſaw once the Romans running apace in diſaray toward the City, made a falſe alarm, crying aloud that the Carthaginians were at hand, and that both enemies and friends together intermingled, would enter the City, unleſs they made better haſt to ſhut the gates. So they excluded the Romans out, and gave them as a prey to be hewn in peeces by their enemies. Howbeit, Atinius with ſome few, was received within the Town firſt. After this, there was ſome mutiny and diſſention between the citizens themſelves, for a little while. Some were of mind to ſtand upon their guard and defend the Town: others were of opinion, to yeeld unto fortune of B the time, and deliver it up to the victors hands. But in concluſion, fortune and bad counſel together, (as for the moſt part it falleth out) prevailed. And ſo, after they had brought Atinius and his ſouldiers to the haven ſide, unto their ſhips for to be embarked, more upon good will that they bare to him for his mild and juſt government, and therefore were ready to ſave him, than for any regard at all they had of the Romans, they received the Carthaginians into the City.

The Conſuls then led the legions from Beneventum into the territory of Capua, not only to make ſpoil and marre the corn, that was laid up already in ſtrong Towns againſt winter, but alſo to aſſail Capua: ſuppoſing they ſhould make their Conſulſhip renowned unto poſterity, by the deſtruction of ſo rich and wealthy a City: and beſides, do away that great diſhonour and ſhameful C blemiſh of the Empire of Rome, in ſuffering a City ſo neer unto them to continue now three years in rebellion, without revenge and condign puniſhment. But to the end that Beneventum ſhould not be without a guard, and that againſt all ſuddain accidents and occurrences of war, in caſe Annibal ſhould come to Capua, for to reſcue and aid his allies, (which they made no doubt but he would do) there might be Horſemen to withſtand his violence: they commanded T. Gracchus to come out of Lucania, with the cavalry and light armed footmen: and to take order and leave ſome other to govern the legions and the ſtanding camp, for the guard and defence of thoſe parts there.

Gracchus before he diſlodged out of the Lucans country, hapned to have a fearful and prodigiD ous token, as he offred ſacrifice. For after the ſacrifice was performed and accompliſhed, two Snakes came gliding out of a blind hole, no man knew how, to the entrails of the beaſt, and fell to eat the Liver: and ſo ſoon as they were eſpied, ſuddainly glid out of ſight and were no more ſeen. Now, when as the bowel-pryers had given advice to kill a new ſacrifice, and ſo ſoon as the inwards were opened and laid foorth, to tend and look unto them more heedfully; the Snakes came again, as it is reported, the ſecond and third time: and when they had once given as it were an aſſay, and taſted the Liver, they went cleer away without hurt and untouched. And albeit the Soothſayers aforeſaid, had given an Item, and foretold, that this prodigious ſight perteined properly unto the chief Captain and General, and warned him to take heed of ſome cloſe perſons and ſecret practiſes: yet his fatal deſtiny of death that hung over his head, could by no forecaſt and providence be altered and avoided. Now there was one Flavius a Lucane, the principal head of E that bend and ſide of the Lucans, which when the other faction revolted unto Annibal, took the Romans part; and having been by them choſen the Prætor, had continued in that place of Magiſtracy a year already: this man all on a ſuddain chanced his mind and affection, and ſeeking to wind and enter into the favour of Annibal, could not be content to revolt himſelf, and to draw with him the Lucans to rebellion; unleſs he made a league alſo and covenant with the enemies, and ſealed it with the murder and bloud of his General: of him (I ſay) who being enterteined and lodged in his houſe, he purpoſed villanouſly to betray. He entred therefore into ſecret ſpeech and conference with Mago, Governour over the Brutii, and having capitulated with him, under his faithful word and promiſe, That if he delivered the Roman General into his hands, the Lucans might live in freedom under their own Laws, in league and amity with the Carthaginians; he told him of a place into which he would bring Gracchus, with a ſmall company and guard about him: willing Mago to put his foot and horſe in arms, and in ſuch a place aforehand, wherein he might beſtow cloſely and ſecretly a mighty number of men. When the place was well viewed and conſidered all about, they agreed upon a day, for putting this plot in practiſe. This done, Flavius cometh to the Roman General Gracchus, and enformeth him that he had begun an enterpriſe of great conſequence, for the accompliſhment and full perfecting whereof, he needed the helping hand of Gracchus himſelf; "Namely, he had perſwaded with all the Prætors and Go"vernors, who in that univerſal and general trouble of all Italy, had revolted unto Annibal, for "to return again into the league and friendſhip of the Romans: ſeeing that the Roman ſtate and "their Dominion, which by the overthrow at Canna was come in a manner to the loweſt ebb, "and faln into extream deſpair, flowed now again, and grew every day more than other, greater "and mightier; whereas contrary-wiſe, the puiſſance of Annibal decayed much, and was well"neer come to nothing: beſides, the Romans were men that might be appeaſed and reconciled "again, eſpecially the treſpaſs being ſo long ago done and paſt: for never was there nation un"der the ſun, more tractable, more exorable and ready to pardon a fault: and how often have "they (to go no further for examples) forgiven the open Rebellion even of their fore-fathers and "anceſtors? Theſe (quoth he) were my words unto them, and indeed, but my words. Mary "they had rather hear Gracchus himſelf ſpeak, and hear the ſame from out of his own mouth:

"they

"they would more gladly talk with him in perſon, and take hold of his right hand, which as the H
"aſſured pawn of his faithful promiſe, he carieth alwayes with him whereſoever he goeth, and "they deſire no more. I have therefore (ſaith he) appointed a convenient place of enterview and "conference: lying out of the way and forth of ſight, but yet not far from the Romans camp.
"There the matter may be diſpatched in few words, and all the name and nation of the Lucans, "reduced under the obedience and alliance of the people of Rome. Gracchus ſuſpecting no fraud nor harm neither in his words nor deeds, ſounding all to a great likelihood of ſimplicity and truth in his conceit, departed out of the camp attended upon with his Sergeants, and guarded only with a cornet of Horſemen: and ſo by the guidance of his own hoſt, in whoſe houſe he lodged, was plunged headlong within the danger of the ambuſh of his enemies; Who ſuddainly aroſe: I and Flavius becauſe he would put it out of doubt that he was a traitor, went to their ſide and joyned with them. Then they let flie arrows, and ſhot darts againſt Gracchus and his Horſemen on every ſide. "Whereupon Gracchus alight from horſeback, and commanded the reſt to do the "ſame, exhorting them, that the only thing which fortune now had left unto them, they would
"grace and honour with vertue. For what remaineth elſe for us, (a ſmall handful unto them)
"environed as we are with a multitude of them, within a valley compaſſed about with hills and "woods, but preſent death? This only we are to reſolve upon, Whether in this preſent amaze-
"neſs and heartleſs fear, we will as beaſts ſuffer our throats to be cut without revenge again; or "turning wholly our timorous expectation and ſuffering of death, into choler and courage, fight
"adventurouſly and manfully, and bathing our hands in the bloud of our enemies, loſe our lives K
"and fall down dead, upon the weapons and bodies of them, lying gaſping themſelves under us.
"Ah! that Lucan, that fugitive rogue and rebel, that treacherous and falſe traitor, ſee ye all lay at "him. Whoſe hap it will be, ere he die, to be his Prieſt, to ſacrifice and ſend him to the Devil,
"he ſhall win an honourable prize, and find no ſmall ſolace and comfort in his own "death.

With theſe words, he wrapped his rich coat of arms about his left arme (for they had not brought forth with them ſo much as their ſhields) and charged with exceeding force upon the enemies. The fight was far greater on their part than for the proportion and number of the men. The bodies of the Romans lay open moſt unto the ſhot. And thus overcharged on all ſides from the higher places: as being in the valley ſubject to the volley of their darts, they were ſoon pier- L ced through. When Gracchus was left naked alone, and his guard dead at his feet, the Carthaginians did what they could to take him alive: but he having eſpied among the enemies his good hoſt and friend, that Lucan, ran among the thickeſt preſſe: where he was ſo fully bent to mischief him, that they could not will nor chooſe but kill him outright, without they would have loſt the lives of many other. He was not ſo ſoon dead, but Mago ſent him ſtreight wayes unto Annibal, and commanded that his body together with the knitches of rods (belonging to his Magiſtracy) ſhould be preſented and ſhewed before the Tribunal ſeat of the General. And this is the true report of the end of Gracchus: to wit, that he let his life in the Lucan Land, about the plains which are called Veteres Campi. There be ſome that tell it otherwiſe, how he being accompanied with his Serjeants, and three ſerving men his bondſlaves, went out from the camp within the M territory of Beneventum, neer unto the River * Calor, for to waſh himſelf: where there chanced his enemies to lurk, and lye in wait among the willows and ſalows that grew by the bank ſide, and ſo being unarmed and naked too, he was aſſaulted, where he defended himſelf as well as he could with flinging at them pible ſtones ſuch as the River afforded and carried down with the ſtream, and ſo was ſlain. Others write, that by advice of the Bowel-pryers, he went out of the camp half a mile off, for to purge and expiate in ſome pure and clean place, thoſe prodigious tokens above rehearſed: and there was beſet and environed round about with two troops of Numidian Horſemen, who hapned there to lie in ambuſh. See how variable and uncertain the fame goeth, both in what place, and after what manner, this ſo noble and famous perſon came by his death. Nay, the very funeral and ſepulture alſo of Gracchus, is diverſly delivered. Some ſay he was N enterred by his own ſouldiers within the Roman camp. Others give out and ſay (and that is the more common report) that by the appointment of Annibal he was buried in the very entrance of the Carthaginian leaguer; that there was a funeral fire made in ſolemn wiſe to burn his corps; that the whole army juſted and ran at tilt and tornment in their compleat armor; that the Spaniards leaped and danced Morrice; and each nation according to their guiſe and manner performed ſundry motions and exerciſes as well of their weapons, as of their bodies: yea, and that Annibal himſelf in proper perſon, with all honor of funeral pomp that might be deviſed, both in word and deed, ſolemnized the obſequies in the beſt maner. This ſay they that affirm the thing to have hapned in the Lucans country. But if a man ſhould believe them, who record how he was ſlain at the River Calor, then the enemies gat nothing of him but only his head. Which being O preſented unto Annibal, he ſent Carthalo immediatly with it into the Roman camp, unto Cn. Cornelius the Treaſurer or Queſtor: who there within the very camp performed the funerals of the General, and both army and citizens of Beneventum together ſolemnized the ſame right honourably.

Gracchus killed by his hoſt, a Lucan.

The Conſuls being entred into the territory of Campan, as they forraged all abroad, ſtraggling one from another, were by the Townſmen of Capua which ſallied out, and by the Horſemen of Mago, put in fear; whereupon in great fright and haſt, they rallied the ſouldiers to their colours,

that were ranged over the Country: but before they could well embattail them, and set them in array, they were discomfited, and lost above a thousand and five hundred men. Upon which good success, the enemies (as they are a nation by nature proud) began to be very lusty and exceeding audacious, insomuch, as they offered to skirmish sundry times with the Romans, and ever challenged them to fight. But that one battail, so unadvisedly and inconsiderately atchieved, made the Consuls more circumspect and wary afterward. Howbeit, one small occurrence happened, which, as it encouraged and animated them again, so it abated the hearts, and daunted the boldness of the other. For in war there is nothing (be it never so little) but one time or other, it is the occasion of some great consequence and importance. There was in the camp one T. Quintius Crispinus, linked in special friendship and familiarity with Badius, a Citizen of Capua. Their acquaintance grew and encreased upon this occasion: This Badius upon a time, before the revolt of Capua, fell sick at Rome, and lying in Crispinus his house, was liberally and kindly used, yea, and tenderly seen unto by him, during his sickness. This Badius having put himself forward before the standing guards, that warded at the gate of the Roman camp, willed, that Crispinus should be called out unto him. Which being told unto Crispinus, he supposed no otherwise of it, but that he should talk friendly and familiarly with him. For albeit both nations generally were at enmity, in regard of the publick State, yet the private right and band of hospitality, remained still in force, and was not forgotten, and therefore he went out somewhat apart from the rest of his fellows. Now, when they were come in sight and interview one of the other. I challenge thee, O Crispine (quoth Badius) to combat: let us mount on Horseback, and trye it out between us two, without any other companion, whether of us is the better man at arms. To this Crispinus made answer again and said, We want no enemies, neither you nor I, upon whom we may make proof of our manhood: as for me, if I met and encountred you in the very battail, yet I would decline, avoid, and shift from you lest I should defile and stain my hand in the murder and bloudshed of my guest and friend. And with this he turned from him, and went his way. But the Campane contrary-wise, upon these words, was the more eager with him, railing and rating at him for his effeminat cowardise and dastardliness, letting flie at the harmless and innocent man, all spightful terms and reproachful language; which himself I wot (if he had his due) was well worthy of: calling him a friendly foe, and a kind enemy indeed and finally charged him, that he made his excuse of sparing him, for friendship sake, whom he knew he was not able to match in manhood and valour. But if (quoth he) thou thinkest, that by the breach of publick league and covenant, our private bands of amity and hospitality, are not yet enough broken in sunder, then here I pronounce openly, in the hearing of two armies, That I Badius a Campane, renounce all hospitality with thee T. Quintius Crispinus a Roman, and so farewel all friendship for ever: I will, I say, have no more to do by way of acquaintance with thee, no society, no alliance, no hospitality will the guest have with [illegible]at host, who in hostile manner is come to invade his native country, and to make assault upon the publick buildings and private houses thereof. And therefore, if thou be a man, meet me in the field. Crispinus drew back a long time, and was loth to enter into the action, but at last his fellow Horsemen, serving in the same troop and cornet with him, forced and perswaded him, not to suffer that bragging Campane, thus to insult over him without revenge. Whereupon he made no more ado, nor any longer delay, but whiles he went unto the L. Generals, to know their pleasure, whether they would permit and license him, out of his order and rank, to fight with an enemy that challenged him, and gave him defiance. And having obtained leave, he buckled his armor about him took his weapon, mounted on Horseback, and calling upon Badius by name, bad him come forth if he durst to sing'e fight. The Campane made no stay, and so with spear in rest, set spurs to, and they ran their Horses full carier one at the other. Crispinus with his lance pierced Badius above his shield, through the left shoulder, and therewith unhorsed him, and when he was faln to the earth with the push, he alight himself from his horse, minding on foot to fall upon him as he lay along, and so to dispatch him outright. But Badius, before his enemy seised upon him, left his targuet behind and his horse, and by good footmanship recovered his own fellows. Crispinus then, all goodly to be seen with the spoils of his enemy, made shew of the horse and armor that he had won, and bearing up withal the bloudy point of his lance, was with much praise and great gratulation of the souldiers, brought honourably to the Consuls, and presented before them. At whose hands he was both highly commended, and also liberally rewarded.

Annibal having dislodged out of the territory of Beneventum, and removed into Capua, within three dayes after he was come thither, brought forth his forces into the field, making no doubt at all, but that, considering the Campans in his absence, had but few dayes before fought fortunatly, the Romans now would be so much lesse able to abide his royal army so often used to victory. And verily when the conflict was once begun, the Roman battailons of the Infantry were much troubled and distressed, especially with the fierce assault of the Horsemen, who overcharged and pelted them mightily with their darts and Javelins, until the signal was given to their own Cavalry also, to set hard to, and charge the enemies with their horse. Now whiles the men of arms were busy in fight on both sides, it hapned that the Regiment of Sempronius [Gracchus lately slain] were descried marching a far off under the conduct of Cn. Cornelius the Treasurer, which put both parts in like fear, lest they were some new and fresh enemies that advanced against them. So they sounded the retreat on either side, as if they had been agreed so to do, departed out of the field (as a man would say) on even hand, and retired themselves unto H their several holds: howbeit, the greater number was slain of Romans, upon the first violent charge given by the Horsemen. From thence the Consuls intending to draw Annibal away from Capua departed sundry wayes, Fulvius into the territory of Cumes, and Claudius into the Lucans Country. The next day, when Annibal was advertised, that the Romans had abandoned their camp, and that they were gone into divers parts with their several armies, being at first uncertain whom to pursue, resolved at length to make after Appius, and so began to do. But after he had once trained the enemy about to the place that he desired, he returned himself another way to Capua. And Annibal hapned also upon a new occasion presented, to have a good hand of his enemies in those parts. I

There was one M. Centenius, surnamed Penula, one of the chief Centurions of the Pilani, a singular good Captain in that kind, as well in regard of his mighty and goodly body, as also of his brave mind, and valiant courage. This man having served out his ordinary time required by Law, was by the means of P. Cornelius Sulla the Pretor, brought into the Senat-house, and became a Petitioner unto the LL. of the Councel, that he might have the leading of five thousand footmen: promising that within short time, by reason he was so well acquainted with the nature and qualities of the enemy, and withal so much beaten in coasting those quarters, he would do some great deed, and atchieve a piece of notable service: and look, by what cunning devices and stratagems, both our leaders and our armies had been until that day, entrapped and over-raught, the very same would he use and practise against the enemy. He was not so vain and unadvised in K making this offer, but they were as sottish and foolish again in taking him at his word, and trusting him: as who would say, A good Leader and Commander, and a stout and hardy souldier were all one. And so where as he demanded but five thousand, he had the charge given of eight thousand: whereof the one half were citizens, the other allies and confederats: and besides them, he himself also gathered together out of the country as he marched, a good Company of Voluntaries: in so much as his power was doubled, by that time he came into the Lucans Country, where Annibal abode after that he had followed Claudius in vain, and to no effect. But a man that had but half an eye might see what the sequel and event would be of the conflict between General Annib. l. and Centinere Centenius: between both armies also, the one of old beaten souldiers used ever to victories, the other of raw novices and yong beginners, yea, many L of them taken up suddainly in hast, and slenderly armed by the halfs. For so soon as both hosts had confronted one another, and that on neither side they dallied and shifted off, but minded presently to go to it & fight: soon were they on both parts arranged in order of battail. And albeit the Romans had many disadvantages, yet they mainteined skirmish more than two hours: and that so hotly and couragiously, that they shrunk not one jot, so long as their leader stood on foot. But after that he once was strucken down and slain, who not only in regard and remembrance of the former name (that he had won) of valour and prowesse, but also for fear of future shame and dishonor, in case he should remain alive after the defeat of his forces, whereof he was the only cause through his fool-hardy rashness, presented himself desperately upon the pikes of his enemies, where he might be sure of nothing but present death: and incontinently the Roman bat- M tailon was discomfited and put to flight. And so hard bestead they were, in seeking wayes and means to escape (all the avenues were so laid and beset with the Horsemen) that of so a great a multitude, there were hardly one thousand saved, all the rest miscarried here and there, and came by their death one way or other.

In this mean time, Capua was streightly beleaguered by the Consuls, and they began to assault it in most forcible manner: great preparation there was of all things needful unto such an exploit, and with great diligence every thing provided and brought accordingly. Corn was conveighed to Casilinum, and laid up there for store: at the mouth of the River Vulturnus (where now the City standeth) was the sconce and castle fortified (which Fabius before had built) and a strong garrison therein planted, to the end that both the Sea so neer, and the whole River also might be N at their command. Into these two fortresses standing on the Sea side, as well the corn which lately was sent out of Sardinia, as also that which Mutius the Pretor had bought out of Hetruria, was transported from the Port of Ostia, whereby the army might be served plentifully all winter season. Over and besides that losse received in the Lucans country, the army likewise of the Volones, i. Voluntary souldiers (which during the life of Crassus, had served truly and faithfully) now abandoned their colours; as if by the death of their Captain they had taken themselves fully discharged from warfare.

Annibal made no small account of Capua: for willing enough he was, that his allies and friends there should not be forsaken and left in so great peril wherein they stood; and yet upon that fortunat succes which happed unto him through the rashhes of one Roman Captain, his fingers O itched to be doing with another of them, and hoped to find some good opportunity and advantage to surprise and overthrow both Captain and army. Whereas therefore certain Apulian Embassadors advertised him, that Cn. Fulvius the Pretor, (who at the first in assaulting of certain Cities in Apulia, which had revolted unto Annibal, bare himself like a wise and prudent Captain: now afterwards, upon his good fortune and happy speed in those affairs, whereby himself and his souldiers had made up their mouths and filled their hands well with booties and pillage) both himself and his men were grown so idle, and so dissolute, that no good government nor military disci-

A discipline remained among them: hereupon Annibal having good experience, (as often heretofore, so in this late instance but few dayes past) in how small stead an army serveth, when it is directed by an unskilful Leader, removed his forces into Apulia. Now lay the Roman legions and Fulvius the Pretor, encamped about Herdonia. And when the news came thither, that the enemies were on their journey coming toward them, hardly might the souldiers be reclaimed and stayed, but they would in all haste pluck up standards and ensigns, and straightwayes go into the field and bid them battail, without commission and commandement of their Pretour. And no one thing more held them back, than the assured hope they had, to do it at their pleasure whensoever they would. Annibal the night following, having certain intelligence, that there was a tu-B mult in the camp, and that most of the souldiers mightily importuned their General to put forth unto them the signal of battail, and called earnestly unto him for to lead them out into the field, made full account to meet with good opportunity and occasion, to have a fair day of his enemies: and therefore he bestowed three thousand men lightly appointed, in divers villages thereabout, among the thick groves and bushes, and within the woods: who at a sign given them, should all at once upon a suddain, start up and leap forth of their lurking corners: and withal, he gave order to Mago, with two thousand Horsemen or thereabout to keep all the wayes whereas he supposed they were most like to flee and make escape. Having thus ordred all things beforehand in the night time: at the break of day he entred the field with his army, and embattailed himself in warlike manner. Fulvius for his part, was not behind; not induced so much upon any C hope or conceit he had of good speed, as drawn and haled thereto through the rash enforcement and compulsion of his souldiers. And therefore as they came forth to battail upon a head and heat, inconsideratly, so they were set in array as disorderly; even at the pleasure of the souldiers, according as they came forth and took up their ranks and files, as they list themselves: and then again, as the toy took them in the head left the same, either upon wilfulness or fear. The first legion together with the left wing or cornet of Horsemen, were first marshalled: and the squadrons drawn and stretched out in a great length: notwithstanding the Knight-Marshals and Coronels cried out, that within, there was no strength nor power at all; and that the enemies whersoever they should hap to charge, would break in upon them and go through. But no wholesome counsel for their own good might be taken and considered upon: nay they would not so much as D lend their ear, and give them the hearing. And by this time Annibal was in place, with another manner of army (you may be sure) and otherwise ordered and aranged. And therefore the Romans were not able to abide so much as the first shout and shock of the onset. The Captain himself (as foolish and heady as Centenius, but in courage and resolution far short of him) seeing how the world went, the field like to be lost, his souldiers in fear and great perplexity; recovered his horse in great hast, and with some two hundred horsemen fled away and escaped: all the army besides, beaten back affront, beset behind, flanked on the sides, and environed round, were so killed and hewn in pieces, that of eighteen thousand, there were not past two thousand saved. And the enemies besides were masters of the camp.

When these losses one in the neck of another were reported at Rome, the City was set in a great
E fit of sorrow and fear for the while: but so long as the Consuls, in whom rested the main chance, had hitherto prospered and sped well, they were the lesse troubled at these by-blowes and crosse misfortunes. Whereupon they addressed C. Lectorius and M. Mitilius as messengers unto the Consuls, willing them to gather together with good care and diligence, those dispersed reliques and remainders of the two armies; also to have an eye and heedful regard unto them, that upon fear and desperation they yeelded not themselves to the enemy (as it hapned after the Cannian overthrow;) and last of all, to make diligent search and seek out those Volones, or voluntary servitors, that had abandoned their ensigns and cassed themselves. The like charge was laid upon P. Cornelius, who had commission besides to levy more men. And he made proclamation throughout all market Towns, fairs, and places of frequent resort, That those Volones should be found out F and brought again to their own colours, to serve as aforetime. All these directions were executed and accomplished with exceeding great care and diligence.

Appius Claudius the Consul, after he had made D. Junius Captain of the sconce erected upon the mouth of the River Vulturnus, and M. Aurelius Cotta Governour of Puteoli, with commission, That as any ships [with corn] from out of Hetruria or Sardinia arrived there, they should immediatly send the corn to the camp; went back himself to Capua: where he found Q. Fulvius his Colleague, transporting thither all provision from Casilinum, and making preparation for the assault of Capua. Then both Cons. jointly together besieged the City: and sent unto Claudius Nero the Pretor, for to come unto them from Suessula, out of the old camp of Claudius.
G Who likewise leaving a small garrison there to defend the peece, with all his power and forces, descended into the plains before Capua. So there were three royal pavillions pitched for three LL. Generals about Capua: and three full armies in three sundry places began to fortifie, erecting bastions and forts in places not far distant: yea, and to cast a trench and raise a rampier round about the City. And in divers quarters at once, they skirmished with the men of Capua, whensoever they came to hinder their fortifications, with so good success, that the Townsmen were driven at last to keep within their gates and walls. But before that those rampiers and trenches aboveseid were fully finished, and all ends brought together, there were Embassadors dispatched unto Annibal, to complain in the name of the Capuans, as finding themselves grieved, that he had forſaken Capua, and in a manner delivered it into the Romans hands: and withall, to beſeech him earneſtly, that now or never, he would reſcue and ſuccor them, being not only beſieged, but alſo ſhut up and almoſt trenched about, as within a priſon. P. Cornelius likewiſe the Pretor of the City of Rome, ſent his letters unto the Conſuls, adviſing them before they had fully inveſted Capua round about, to make offer unto the Capuans of this liberty, That as many as would, might depart with bag and baggage out of Capua: and whoſoever went forth before the * Ides of March, ſhould enjoy their freedome and all their goods and lands: but as many as after that day, either departed or tarried there ſtill behind, ſhould be reckoned no better than very enemies. Theſe intimations were made known unto the Campans, but ſo light they ſet by them, that they fell a railing, reviling, and menacing the Romans, with moſt reproachful taunts and ſpightful terms. Annibal was departed from Herdonia with his legions unto Tarentum, hoping either by force or fraud to gain the Caſtle. And ſeeing he little prevailed, he turned from thence and took his way to Brunduſium, ſuppoſing that Town would be betrayed into his hands. Whiles he lay there alſo and loſt his time in doing nothing, the Embaſſadors of the Campans arrived and came unto him, with complaints and humble requeſts both at once. Unto whom Annibal made this glorious and lordlike anſwer with a Majeſty: Once already have I raiſed the ſiege, and never will the Conſuls, I trow, abide my ſecond coming. The Embaſſadors having received their diſpatch, departed with this hope: but much ado they had, to put themſelves within Capua, ſo enclоſed round was it (by this time) with a double trench and a rampier.

* 15. of March.

It fortuned at the very ſame inſtant, when Capua was thus ſtreightly beleaguer'd, that the ſiege alſo and aſſault of Syracuſe came to an end: helped forward and haſtned by inteſtine treachery and treaſon withal, as well as by force of army and valour of Captain abroad. For Marcellus in the beginning of the ſpring, doubtful in himſelf and hanging in ſuſpence, whether to bend his whole forces toward Agrigentum againſt Himilco and Hippocrates, or ſtill proceed to beſiege Syracuſe: albeit he ſaw the City might not poſſibly be won, either by forcible aſſault, (conſidering it was by ſituation both by Sea and Land invincible) or piniug famine, by reaſon the paſſage in manner lay open to and fro between it and Carthage, for ſafe tranſporting of all ſort of victuals: yet becauſe he would leave no ſtone unrolled, but try all wayes that could be deviſed; he commanded certain revolts from the Syracuſians (for there ſided with the Romans ſome of the nobleſt perſons of the City, who at the time of the firſt backſliding from the Romans, becauſe they miſliked and abhorted all rebellion and change in the ſtate, were driven out and baniſhed the City) to deal with their bend and faction by way of conference, to ſound the hearts (I ſay) of ſuch as were their followers, and to ſollicit them to their part: and withal to aſſure them (upon their warrant) that if by their means Syracuſe were betrayed, they ſhould live in freedome, and enjoy their own Laws as they would themſelves. But no opportunity could they eſpie for to parly and talk with them. For by reaſon that there were many ſuſpected to encline and draw that way, every man had a careful eye and regard unto them, that there could be no treachery practiſed, but ſoon it would be found out and detected. Yet a bond-ſervant toward one of the baniſhed perſons aboveſaid hapned to be let into the City, pretending that he was run away from the adverſe part unto them: who hapning to meet with ſome few, began to move and broach ſuch a matter. After which, certain others lying cloſe hidden under the nets in a fiſher boat came about by water to the camp of the Romans, and had conference and communication with thoſe former fugitives and exiled men. And thus from time to time, this was practiſed in the ſame manner, by divers and ſundry perſons, until at length they were a crew of fourſcore in all. Now when all things were concluded for the betraying of the City, neer upon the point of execution, it chanced that one Attalus (a falſe brother among them, who took ſnuff that he was not ſpecially truſted in the matter) diſcloſed the conſpiracy unto Epicides, and appeached the parties: whereupon they were all put to extream torture, and ſuffered death every one. When this plot would ſpeed no better, they conceived hope another way, by a new occaſion and occurrence that preſently offred it ſelf. There chanced one Damaſippus a Lacedemonian, ſent from Syracuſa, as a meſſenger to King Philip for to be taken priſoner by the Roman armado. Now both Epicides was very deſirous and exceeding careful how to ranſome him, and alſo Marcellus was not unwilling for his part to grant the ſame. For even then the Romans began to affect the friendſhip of the Ætolians, with which Nation the Lacedemonians were confederat, and in league. So, when there ſhould be commiſſioners and delegates ſent on both ſides, to parle and treat about his redemption the moſt indifferent place for them to meet in, was at the key or wharf of * Trogili, faſt by a turret which they call * Galeagra, as being juſt in the midſt between, and moſt convenient for both parties. It hapned now, that as they had recourſe oftentimes thither about this buſineſs, one of the Romans well viewed the wall neer by, he counted the ſtones that appeared in the forefront of the wal, and made eſtimate to himſelf of their quadrature and proportion; and withal, giving a gueſs as neer as he could of what height (by his reckoning) and meaſure the wall might be: and ſuppoſing it was a good deal lower than either he himſelf or others had alwayes before taken it to be and eaſy to be ſca'ed with ladders, even of a mean ſize and middle ſort, he relateth the matter and his conceit of it to Marcellus. And in his opinion it was a thing not to be neglected, but to be thought upon. But for aſmuch as there was no acceſs unto that place by reaſon that for the lowneſs therof, it was the more carefully guarded and defended, it was thought good to wait for ſome opportunity and advantage to help that difficulty. Which, as good hap was, offered it ſelf preſently unto them by means

A means of a fugitive: who gave them intelligence, that they held a ſolemn feaſt of Diana at that time within the City, and the ſame continued three dayes together: alſo he ſaid, that for want of other things, during this ſiege to make good chear withal, they ſpared for no wine, but made merry therewith in great plenty and abundance. For why? not only Epicides had bountifully beſtowed wine upon the whole Commons, but alſo the great men of the City had in every ward and pariſh where they dwelt, allowed a proportion beſides, of their own charges. When Marcellus heard this, he called unto him ſome few of his Colonels and knight Marſhals, and conferred with them: and when they had ſorted out certain choice and elect Centurions and ſouldiers, fit and ſufficient men to adventure and execute ſo great a peece of ſervice, and withal provided ladders
B ſecretly; to all the reſt he commanded a watchword and warning to be given, That they ſhould betimes take their refection of meat and repoſe of ſleep, for that in the night they were to be employed in an expedition and action of ſervice. After this, when he thought it was about the time, that they (as having feaſted all day long, and well filled their bellies with meat, and their heads with wine) were gone to reſt, and newly fallen ſound aſleep, he commanded one enſign or company of ſouldiers, to cary ladders; and beſides them, there were upon a thouſand well armed and appointed, marching with ſilence and in thin ranks, brought thither to the place. When the formoſt without any ſtir or noiſe at all had ſcaled the top of the wall, others followed in their courſe. For the forward and reſolute boldneſs of the former, was able to animate and encourage the reſt, if they had been fals-hearted. By this time now, the thouſand armed ſoldiers had ſeized
C that part, when the reſt of the ladders were ſet to: and upon more ladders ſtill, they gat up to the wall in diverſe places, upon a ſignal given them from the gate Hexapylos. Unto which places the Romans were now come, and found no ſtirring at all, but exceeding ſilence and deſolation, for aſmuch as a great ſort of them had made good chear within the turrets, and either were faſt aſleep with drinking wine already, or elſe were bibbing ſtill, notwithſtanding their eyes were heavy, and their hearts aſleep. And yet, ſome few of them they took in their beds, and killed. Neer unto Hexapylos there is a little wicket, which with great violence they began withal, to break it open. So as now, both from the wall (as was before appointed) they gave ſignal by ſound of trumpet: and alſo from all parts they went not to work any more by ſtealth, but plainly and openly without diſſimulation. For they were come already as far as Epipolæ, a place full of D watchmen and warders. And the enemies were to be terrified now and ſtrucken into fear, and no longer to be dealt withal by craft and guile. And it fell out ſo indeed, that they were mightily ſcared. For they heard not ſo ſoon the ſounding of the trumpets, and the ſhouting and outcry of them that were poſſeſſed of the walls and one part of the City, but the warders, thinking all was gone, ſome ran along upon the wall, others leapt from the walls, or elſe were born down headlong, with the preſs of others that were affrighted. And yet many there were, who were not ware at all of this miſery and extremity, both becauſe generally they were all dead aſleep, and alſo by reaſon that the City was ſo wide and large, that a thing felt and ſeen in ſome remote parts, reached not ſtreightwayes throughout, to all the reſt. The gate Hexapylos was broken down ſomewhat before day, at which Marcellus with all his power entred the City. He wakened them all, and E ſet them to their buſineſs; he made them take weapon in hand, and to help (what they could) a City in a manner wholly ſurpriſed and taken. Epicides made haſt from the Iſland (which they themſelves call Naſos) with a company of ſouldiers about him, making full account to drive them out again: as ſuppoſing that they were but ſome few, who through the negligence of the watchmen and warders were got over the wall: and ever as he met with any that were ſcared and in fear, he ſaid unto them eftſoons, that they themſelves made more ado, and every thing worſe than there was cauſe, reporting all in greater meaſure and more fearful manner than need was in very truth. But when he ſaw all places about * Epipolæ full of armed men, after ſome ſmall volley of ſhot, and little skirmiſh with the enemy, (whereby he provoked them, rather than did any good elſe) he turned back again with his companies, and retired into Acradina, not fearing ſo much the vio-
F lence and multitude of the enemies, as leſt ſome inteſtine miſchief by this occaſion might ariſe, and that he ſhould find in this tumult and hurliburly the gates of Acradina, and the Iſland ſhut againſt him. Marcellus being entred within the walls, took his proſpect from the higher places, and when he beheld under his eyes the moſt goodly and beautiful City of all others in thoſe dayes, (by report) he wept and ſhed tears abundantly, partly for joy that he had brought his purpoſe to good a paſs, and partly in compaſſion and remembrance of the ancient glory and renown of that City. He called to mind the navies of the Athenians by them ſunk and drowned: he thought upon the utter overthrow of two puiſſant armies, together with the loſs of two moſt noble and famous Captains of theirs: moreover, there came into his memory ſo many wars fought againſt the Carthaginians, with ſo great peril and hazard: ſo many and ſo mighty Tyrants and Kings that G raigned and kept their ſeat and royal court there: and amongſt the reſt, he could not chuſe but think of King Hiero, of freſh and famous memory, a Prince, who above all other gifts which his own vertue and fortune had graced and endued him withal, was recommended eſpecially for his many favours and good turns done unto the people of Rome. When all theſe things preſented themſelves to his remembrance, with this cogitation beſides, how all that beauty and glory within one hours ſpace was ready to burn on a light fire, and to be conſumed into aſhes: before that he advanced his enſigns againſt Acradina, he ſent before, thoſe Syracuſians who had converſed (as is aforeſaid) amongſt the guards and garriſon of the Romans, to perſwade the enemies with mild and gentle ſpeech, yet, to yeeld the City. It ſo fell out, that the moſt part of them that warded the gates H and walls both, of Acradina, were certain fugitive revolts fled from the Romans, who had no hope at all, upon any condition whatſoever to be pardoned. Theſe would ſuffer none, either to approach the walls, or to parle and ſpeak with any. And therefore Marcellus, after he ſaw that enterpriſe fruſtrate and diſappointed, commanded to retire with the enſigns unto Euryalus. This Euryalus is a little mount and fort, ſituate in the utmoſt quarter of the City remote far from Sea, and commanding the high way that leadeth into the fields, and the middle parts and very heart of the whole Iſland; a place very commodious for the taking up and receipt of all victuals. The Captain of this hold was Philodemus an Argive, placed there by Epicides. Unto whom there was ſent from Marcellus, Soſis, one of them that murdred the tyrant: and after long communication, I Soſis with crafty words abuſed by him, and colourably put off until another time, made relation unto Marcellus, that Philodemus had taken a farther day of reſpite and deliberation. But he put off ſtill from day to day, trifling out the time of purpoſe, until Hippocrates and Himilco might come with their forces and legions, making no doubt, but if he might receive them into his fortreis, the whole army of the Romans being now encloſed within the walls, ſhould be overthrown and utterly defeated. Marcellus ſeeing that Euryalus was not delivered up, (and forced poſſibly it could not be) encamped himſelf between Neapolis and Tyche (ſo are two parts of the City named, and may for their bigneſs go well enough for two entire cities of themſelves:) for fear leſt if he were once entred into the populous and moſt inhabited places of the City his ſouldiers greedy of pillage, would not be kept together, but run looſely up and down to rifle. Thither came unto him K from Tyche and Neapolis, Embaſſadors and Orators, with olive branches adorned with ſacred veils and infules, humbly beſeeching him to hold his hand from effuſion of bloud, and firing the City. Marcellus calling his Councel about theſe their petitions, rather than demands, after mature deliberation, by general conſent of all, gave expreſs and ſtreight commandment to the ſouldiers, that no man ſhould offer abuſe or violence to the body of any free-born perſon whattoever: as for all beſides, his will and pleaſure was it ſhould be their booty. Now was the camp of Marcellus defended on both ſides with houſing in ſtead of a wall, and he beſtowed a good corps de guard at the gates thereof, lying open over againſt the ſtreets: leſt when the ſouldiers ran to and fro in the City, the camp in the mean while might be aſſailed. Then upon the ſound of Trumpet the ſouldiers fell to their buſineſs, ran into all parts, brake open dores, ſet all on a fearful hurry, but ſpilled L no bloud: and they never gave over ranſacking and rifling, until they had caſt out and carried away all the riches and goods, that had been a gathering a long time, during their wealthy and proſperous eſtate. Amid theſe ſtirs, Philodemus alſo ſeeing no hope of ſuccours and reſcue, after he had covenanted for his ſecurity, to return ſafe and without harm to Epicides, withdrew his garriſon away with him out of the fort, and rendred it up to the Romans.

Now whiles every man was turned another way, and buſied in that part of the City which was forced, Bomilcar taking the advantage of one night, wherein the Roman fleet by reaſon of a violent tempeſt could not ride at anchor in the main Sea, gat forth of the haven of Syracuſe with 35 ſhips, and having Sea-room, hoiſed up ſails, and away he went with a mery gale of wind, leaving 40 behind for Epicides and the Syracuſians: and after he had informed the Carthaginians in what M danger the ſtate of Syracuſe ſtood, returned within few dayes with a fleet of a hundred ſail, rewarded for his labor (as the report went) by Epicides, with many rich gifts, which the treaſure of King Hiero paid for. Marcellus poſſeſſed now of the fortreſs Euryalus, and having planted there a garriſon, was well rid of one care yet: for he doubted, leſt if a new power of enemies had been received behind his back into that fort, they would greatly have annoyed his men, encloſed now as they were, and encumbred within the walls.

After this he beſieged Acradina, and inveſted it round about, and fortified three ſeveral camps (in meet and convenient places) againſt it, hoping to ſhut them up into ſuch ſtreights, that they ſhould be driven to extream ſcarcity and want of all things. Now when as for certain dayes, the guards of the one ſide and the other had reſted quiet, ſuddainly upon the arival of Hippocrates and N Himilco, they within began from all parts to ſet freſhly upon the Romans. For, firſt Hippocrates (after he had encamped and well fortified himſelf faſt by the great Key, and given a ſignal to them that kept Acradina) aſſaulted the old camp of the Romans, where Criſpinus lay with his guard for the defence thereof: then Epicides alſo ſallied forth, and brake upon the Corps de guard of Marcellus: and withal, the Carthaginian fleet approached cloſe to the ſtrand that lieth between the City and the Roman camp, to hinder that Criſpinus might have no aid ſent unto him from Marcellus. And yet for all this ado, the enemies made a greater ſtir and tumultuous alarm, than any skirmiſh to ſpeak of: for Criſpinus not only gave Hippocrates the repulſe, and drave him from the defences of his own camp, but alſo followed him in chace, as he fled fearfully in haſt away: and Marcellus forced Epicides to take the City again, and get it over his head. So as now they O ſeemed very ſufficiently provided and appointed againſt all dangers from thence forth, of their ſuddain ſallies and irruptions.

Over and beſides all theſe troubles, there hapned a common calamity unto both, the plague and peſtilence: in ſuch manner, as it might ſoon have withdrawn the minds, as well of the one part as of the other, from thinking any more of war. For, beſides that it fell out to be the Autumn or harveſt ſeaſon of the year, the place it ſelf by nature unwholſome, ſtinking and corrupt (but much more without the City than within) the extream and intolerable heat of the weather

A weather mightily diſtempered all their bodies generally, in the camps both the one and the other. At the firſt, by occaſion of the diſtemperature of the ſeaſon, and corruption of the place, they both fell ſick and died: but afterward by viſiting and tending one another that were infected, the diſeaſe grew catching and contagious, and ſo ſpred and increaſed more and more: in ſuch manner, as either they that were faln ſick periſhed for want of looking to and diligent attendance; or if any came about them, to keep them and miniſter unto them, they were infected and endangered alſo as deeply as the other: ſo as every day a man could go no where, but either death, or corſes carried forth to their graves, were preſented to his eyes: night and day in all places there was nothing heard but weeping, wailing, and piteous lamentation. In the end their B hearts were ſo hardned and made ſavage again, by continual uſage to this miſery, that not only they gave over to weep over the dead, and to accompany them unto their ſepulchres with due mourning and doleful plaints but alſo to carry them forth and to inter them: ſo that the breathleſſe bodies lay ſcattred all abroad on the ground in the ſight of them, that looked every hour for the like miſerable death themſelves. The dead killed the ſick: the ſick infected the ſound, partly with fear, and partly with the corruption and peſtiferous ſtench that came from their bodies. And becauſe they would die rather upon the ſwords point, than of this maladie, ſome of them made offer to go alone among the armed guards of their very enemies, to be killed out of hand, and rid out of their miſery. Howbeit, the plague was hotter by far in the Carthaginian camp, than among the Romans, by reaſon of corrupt water, and much ſlaughter committed there, C and ſo long ſiege about Syracuſe. For of the enemies army, the Sicilians at the firſt, ſo ſoon as they ſaw the ſickneſs to ſpread commonly, and increaſe by reaſon of the corruption of the place, got themſelves away, and ſtole every man home to the Cities neer adjoyning. But the Carthaginians were fain to ſtick by it ſtill, as having no place to retire themſelves unto, and ſo, they together with their Generals themſelves Hippocrates and Himilco, died all of them, and not one eſcaped. Marcellus when he ſaw this mortality grow thus hot, brought his people into the City, where the houſes and ſhadowy places yeelded ſome good refreſhing to the ſick and weak bodies: howbeit, many alſo of the Roman army went of it, and turned up their heels. Thus when the Land-ſouldiers of the Carthaginians were all gone and conſumed of the plague, the Sicilians who had ſerved under Hippocrates, withdrew themſelves into certain Towns, which were not D great, yet ſure and ſtrong both by natural ſituation, and alſo by ſtrength of walls and other defences; the one of them three miles from Syracuſe the other fifteen miles diſtant from the haven mouth: and thither they conveighed from out of their own cities adjoyning, all manner of victuals, and ſent abroad for aids of men.

In the mean while Bomilcar ſet ſail once again with his fleet for Carthage, where he made relation of the ſtate of their confederats in ſuch terms, that ſtill he fed them with ſome hope, That not only by their help they might be ſaved, but alſo that the Romans (notwithſtanding they had in ſome ſort forced and taken the City) might be ſurpriſed and taken there themſelves: and in concluſion perſwaded and prevailed ſo with them, that they granted not only to ſend with him a great number of hulks and caricks, laden with ſtore of all things, but alſo to furniſh him with E more ſhips of war, to encreaſe his Armado. Whereupon he departed from Carthage with 130 Gallies, and 70 ſhips of burden, and had forewinds good enough to ſet him over into Sicily. But thoſe winds kept him from doubling the point of the Cape Pachynus.

The fame and rumor firſt of Bomilcar his coming, and then his delay above mens expectation, that checked it again, wrought diverſly in the minds of the Romans and Syracuſians, miniſtring one while fear, another while joy unto them both. Whereupon Epicides fearing leſt if the ſame Eaſterly winds which then held, and were ſettled in that corner, ſhould continue many dayes more, the Carthaginian navy would return again into Affrick, leaving the guard of Acradina to the Captains of the waged and mercenary ſouldiers, ſailed to Bomilcar, riding ſtill with his fleet in the rode that looketh toward Affrick, and fearing a conflict at Sea, not ſo much F becauſe he was inferiour to the enemies either in force or number of ſhips (for he had many more than the Romans) but for that the winds ſtood more favourably to help the Roman Armado than his: howbeit, in the end he perſwaded him to try the fortune of a battail at Sea. And Marcellus for his part, ſeeing both the Sicilian forces gather and aſſemble together from all parts of the Iſland, and underſtanding that the Carthaginian fleet was coming with great ſtore of victuals: for fear leſt at any time whiles he was ſhut up within the enemies City, he ſhould be aſſailed both by Sea and Land: albeit he was ſhort of them in number of ſhips, yet determined to hinder Bomilcar for arriving at Syracuſe. Thus rid two armadaes of enemies affronting one another, about the head of Pachynus, ready to joyn battail, ſo ſoon as the calmneſs of the weather would give them leave to advance into the main and open Sea. Therefore when the Eaſt wind began to lie, G which for certain dayes had bluſtred and raged, firſt Bomilcar weighed anchor: and the vanguard of his Armado ſeemed to gather ſtill into the deep, only becauſe he might more eaſily gain the Cape and promontory aforeſaid. But ſo ſoon as he ſaw the Romans ſhips make way toward him, (I wot not what ſuddain accident it was that affrighted him) he ſet up all his ſails and fell off, into the main Sea: and after he had ſent certain meſſengers to Heraclea, willing them for to fet again their hulks home into Affrick, himſelf coaſted all along Sicily, and ſhaped his courſe for Tarentum. Epicides diſappointed thus on a ſuddain, of ſo great hopes that he had, becauſe he would not return again to the ſiege of a City, whereof a great part was loſt already, ſaileth to trye any more, how to help them with any ſuccour from thence.

Theſe things being reported in the camp of the Sicilians, to wit, that Epicides had quit Syracuſe; that the Carthaginians had abandoned the whole Iland of Sicily, and in manner yeelded it again into the hands of the Romans: after they had ſounded firſt their minds who were beſieged, by talk and conference with them, they ſent Embaſſadors unto Marcellus, to treat about conditions of ſurrendring the City. When they were grown in a manner to this point, without any ſquaring or difference at all, That the Romans ſhould have the ſignory all and wholly which belonged unto the Kings: and that, all the reſt the Sicilians ſhould enjoy, with liberty and their own proper Laws; the Embaſſadors aforeſaid called forth to a parley, thoſe unto whom Epicides at his departure had committed the government of the affairs, and declared unto them, that I as they were addreſſed Orators unto Marcellus, ſo they were from him ſent unto the army of the Sicilians: that generally all, as well the beſieged, as thoſe who were without the danger of the ſiege, ſhould be comprized within the treaty, and abide one and the ſame fortune: and that neither the one ſide nor the other ſhould capitulate or enter into any covenant for themſelves apart, without all the reſt. Who being received and admitted, for to ſalute and ſpeak unto their kinsfolk and friends, made them acquainted with the agreement and compoſition between Marcellus and them: and ſo after they had preſented unto them ſome good hope of their ſafety, they perſwaded with them ſo far forth, as to joyn with them, and all together, for to ſet upon and aſſault the bodies of the Captains deputed by Epicides, namely, Polyclenus, Philiſtio, and one Epicides ſurnamed Sydus. When they were once made away and killed, they called the multitude K together unto a general aſſembly: where they complained greatly of their poverty, and penury of all things (for which they were wont to murmur ſecretly among themſelves:) "And albeit "ye are diſtreſſed (ſay they) with ſo many miſeries and calamities, yet are ye not to blame for- "tune therefore, ſo long as it was in your own power and choice, either to be delivered from "them, or to endure them longer. As for the Romans (ſaid they) it was not hatred, but meer "love and charity, that moved them to come againſt Syracuſe for to aſſault it. For when they "heard that the government of the ſtate was uſurped by Hippocrates and Epicides (the miniſters "firſt belonging to Annibal, and after to Hieronymus) then they began to lay ſiege unto it intending not the overthrow and deſtruction of the City it ſelf, but to put down and depoſe the L
"cruel tyrant that ruled the ſtate. Seeing then, that now Hippocrates is dead, Epicides excluded "from Syracuſe, his Deputies and Captains killed, and the Carthaginians driven out of all their "hold and poſſeſſion of Sicily, both by Land and Sea, what reaſon have the Romans, but to be "willing and well content, that Syracuſe ſhould continue in ſafety now as well as if Hiero him- "ſelf were living, the only mainteiner and obſervant upholder of the Roman amity? And there- "fore, if ought but well ſhould happen, either to the City, or to the Citizens, ye may thank your "ſelves and none elſe, for letting ſlip opportunity now offered, of reconciliation and attone- "ment with the Romans. Never look to have the like occaſion hereafter, to that, which at this "inſtant is preſented: if ye had the grace to ſee what a door is opened for you, to be delivered "from the yoke of moſt inſolent and proud tyrants. This ſpeech they gave ear unto with ex- M ceeding accord and general applauſe. But before that any Embaſſadors were nominated to be ſent unto Marcellus, it was thought good that new Pretors ſhould be created. Out of the number of which Pretors, there were Orators addreſſed unto Marcellus. And the principal man among them, ſpake in this wiſe. "Neither we Syracuſians (quoth he) O Marcellus, at the firſt re- "volted from you Romans, but Hieronymus, impious and wicked Prince as he was; yet nothing "ſo much hurtful to you as to us: nor afterwards, when peace was knit again upon the murder "of the tyrant, was it any citizen of Syracuſe, but Hippocrates and Epicides (the Kings right "hands and miniſters, who oppreſſed and kept us under, with fear of one ſide, and with deceiva- "ble ſleights on another ſide) that made the brack, and were the troublers and diſturbers of this "peace. Nor yet can any man come forth and ſay truly, that ever we were at our own liberty, N
"and entertained not peace and amity with you. And now alſo I aſſure you, ſo ſoon as by the "maſſacre of theſe, that held Syracuſe in ſuch oppreſſion and bondage, we began again to be our "own men and to have the law in our own hands; the firſt thing you ſee that we do, is this, to "come and preſent our ſelves unto you, to deliver up our armor and weapons, to yeeld our bo- "dies, our City, the walls, and all the ſtrength thereof, and to refuſe no condition, that it ſhall "pleaſe you Romans to impoſe upon us. As to your ſelf, O noble Marcellus, the Gods have "given you the honour of conqueſt, over the moſt noble and beautiful city of all other in Greece. "Behold now, what memorable acts ſoever that we have at any time atchieved, either by Land "or Sea, all makes to the advancement of the glorious title and dignity of your triumph. See "you then, that another day it be not known by bare hear-ſay and the trump of fame, how great O
"and mighty a City you have won, but rather that it may ſtand ſtill and remain for all poſterity, "for a mark and worthy ſpectacle to behold: to the end, that whoſoever hereafter, ſhall reſort "thither by Land, whoſoever ſhall arrive there by Sea, it may preſent unto them, both our Tro- "phees and worthy victories over the Athenians and Carthaginians; and alſo this of yours over "us the braveſt conqueſt of all the reſt. See (I ſay) that you leave for your houſe and family, "the City of Syracuſe whole and ſound, to do homage and fealty ever hereafter, to the name and "linage of the Marcelli, and to hold of them as of their ſoveraign LL. in chief and in villenage.

A "That all the World may see, that the late remembrance of Hieronymus, beareth no greater stroke "with the Romans, that the ancient name of King Hiero, a noble Prince of famous memory. "Much longer was he a friend, than the other an enemy. His good deeds and many favours ye "have tasted and felt with great contentment: the folly and madness of Hieronymus, hurt none "of you, but wrought his own confusion and overthrow. There was nothing but they might "have obteined at the Romans hands: all was cleer there, and no danger from thence. But a- "mong their own selves they were at more war: there was the peril, there was all the mischief. "For the Roman rebels, who were run from them, doubting that they should be delivered over "into their hands, and not comprised within the terms of the composition and protection, drave
B "the auxiliaries also that were waged souldiers into the same scruple and fear. They hastily there- "fore took arms, and first killed the Pretors: and afterwards, ran all about to massacre the Syra- "cusians. Look whom they hapned to meet, them they murdred in this furious fit of choler. "Whatsoever came next to their hands, and lay handsome for them, they rifled. And because "forsooth they would not be without their leaders, they created six provosts or Captains, that "three should govern Acradina, and other three Nasos. At the last, after the uprore was "appeased, the mercenary souldiers aforesaid, followed the matter throughly by search and "diligent inquiry, what were the capitulations indeed agreed upon with the Romans; and "then began the very truth to appear, namely, that their condition and the fugitives were far "different.

C These Embassadors in very good time returned from Marcellus, and certified them that they were caried away with a wrong surmise and false suspition, and the Romans had no just cause to punish them. Now there was one of those three Provosts of Acradina, a Spaniard named Mericus. Unto him there was sent for the nonce among those of the retinue and train of the Embassadors aforesaid, one of the Spaniards, who were auxiliary souldiers, serving under the Romans: who finding Mericus alone without other company, gave him to understand especially above all "things, in what terms he had left Spain (and from thence he was newly come) namely, how the "Romans there were grown mighty, and held a great hand over them with their forces. And "that himself, in case he had a mind to do some worthy deed, might soon rise, and be a great man "in his country: chuse whether he list to serve under the Romans, or return again into his own
D "home. Contrary-wise, if he went on still in this course he had begun, and minded still to be "besieged, what long abiding place could he have there, shut up as he was from Sea and Land? Mericus pondered well these reasons: and when it was agreed, that there should be addressed new Embassadors unto Marcellus, sent his own brother with them, who by the self-same Spaniard was brought apart from all the rest unto Marcellus: and after he had a protection granted, he laid the plot, and ordered all the matter how it should be done, and so returned to Acradina. Then Mericus because he would withdraw mens minds from all suspition of treason, and that he intended nothing lesse, than to betray Acradina, gave it out, That he liked not, and would no more of this recourse, ever and anon, of Embassadors between; and therefore as he would admit of none to come from Marcellus, so he would send no more to him. And to the end, that E all the guards should be kept more diligently, he thought it good to divide conveniently among the Provosts, the quarters of the City, and assign to every one his ward by himself, and that each one should be bound to answer for the safe keeping of his own division, and for no more. Then all gave their consent to part accordingly, and to himself befel the charge of that quarter which reacheth from the fountain or well Arethusa, unto the mouth or entry of the great key or haven. And hereof he gave notice and intelligence to the Romans. Whereupon Marcellus caused a great Hulk, laden with armed souldiers, to be fastned by an haling rope unto a Gally of four course of oars, and so in the night by strength of oars to be rowed and drawn up after it into Acradina, and landeth the souldiers over against the gate, that is neer to the fountain Arethusa. This being done about the relief of the fourth watch, Mericus received the souldiers that were set ashore at F the gate, according as before it was agreed. And Marcellus by the dawning of the day, with all his forces gave a Camisado upon the walls of Acradina, in such manner, that not only he turned thither unto his assault all those that kept Acradina, but also from Nasos there came running whole squadrons and companies of armed men (leaving their own wards) for to repel and put back the violence and assault of the Romans. In this turmoil and trouble, certein Barges appointed and furnished thereto aforehand, were brought about to Nasos, & there set other souldiers aland: who coming at unwares upon the corps de guards that were left half naked and very weak, by reason of the departure of their fellows, and finding the gates wide open, at which erewhile the souldiers ran out, with small ado were masters of Nasos, left, as it was, forlorn of warders, who in fear made hast to run away and escape. And none of them all had lesse means to de-G fend themselves, or smaller mind to tarry still, than the fugitive rebels, for they durst not well trust their own fellows, and so in the hottest of the skirmish made an escape. Marcellus so soon as he understood, that Nasos was won, and likewise that one quarter of Acradina was held and kept for him, and that Mericus with his guard had joyned to his souldiers, sounded the retreat: for fear, that the Kings treasure, which was more in name than in deed, should be rifled and spoiled.

Thus by suppressing the violence of the souldiers, both the rebel fugitives that were in Acradina, had good time and place to shift for themselves and get away, and also the Syracusians delivered livered now at last from fear, opened the gates of Acradina, and sent Orators unto Marcellus, craving nothing but life for themselves and their children. Marcellus called his Councel together, and those Syracusians likewise, who in the time of civil dissention, were driven to forsake their houses, and remained among the garrisons of the Romans: and then he made the Embassadors this answer. "There have not been (quoth he) more benefits and good turns for the space of "fifty years received at King Hiero his hands by the people of Rome, than detriments and mis- "chiefs intended against them within these few years, by them that have seized and possessed the "City of Syracusa. But most of those mischiefs in the end, have lighted upon their heads right "justly, who duly deserved the same: and for the breach of league and covenants, they themselves "have suffered at their own hands more grievous punishment by far, than the people of Rome "would willingly ever have required. As for me, this is the third year that I lie in siege before "Syracusa; not, I assure you, with this intent, that the City should not be reserved safe and "sound for the natural people thereof to keep and inhabit, but that the Captains and ring-leaders "of fugitives and rebels might not seize it, and so hold it in captivity and oppression. How "much the Syracusians might have done with me at first, may be easily seen by the example ei- "ther of those Syracusians who conversed among the guards of the Romans, or of the Spanish "Captain Mericus, who yeelded up his garrison. Yea, and the hardy and resolute course in the "end taken (although it were with the latest) by the Syracusians themselves, may sufficiently "testifie the same. Whereby also it may appear, that for all my travel and pain which I have un- "dergone, for all the perils which I have adventured and passed through, about the walls of Sy- "racusa, both by Land and Water, thus long; I have gathered no fruit so sweet and pleasant as "this, that it may be said, how I was able, yet at last, to win and conquer Syracusa.

Syracusa won and ransacked

Then the Questor was sent, attended with a guard, unto Naxos, for to enter upon the Kings treasure there, and to keep the same in safety. The pillage of the City was given to the souldiers: but there were appointed certain warders over every house of theirs, who were among the garrisons of the Romans, for to save the same. Amids many cruel, spightful, and foul examples of anger, malice, and covetousness, which hapned to be committed during the time of this saccage, it is reported That in so great hurliburly as possibly might be, when a City is newly taken, and hungry souldiers run to rifling, Archimedes was busily occupied, and studying upon certain Geometrical figures that he had drawn out in the dust, and hapned to be slain by a souldier, that knew not who he was. Whereat Marcellus was much offended and displeased: and thereupon gave especial order, that he should be honourably enterred: yea, and caused his kinsfolks to be sought out: and all they in remembrance of him, and for his name sake, were not only saved but also well accounted of, and had in good reputation. Thus you see in what sort, and by what means especially, Saracuse was won. A City wherein was found such store of wealth and riches, as hardly would have been gotten in Carthage, if it had been forced then: notwithstanding it was able to hold out with Rome, and maintein war with equal force and power.

Archimedes killed.

Some few dayes before the winning of Syracuse, T. Octacilius with fourscore Gallies, of five ranks of oars, crossed the Seas from Lilybæum to Utica, and being entred the gate before day light, chanced to take by the way certain Caricks charged with corn. After he was disbarked and set a Land, he wasted grievously part of the territory about Utica, and returned to the City with booty and prizes of all sorts. And the third day after he went from Lilybæum he returned thither again with 130 caricks full of corn and other booty: and that corn he sent forthwith to Syracuse: which if it had not come as it did in good time to help the present necessity, the conquerors as well as the conquered had felt the smart of most extream and grievous famine.

In the same summer, the Roman Generals in Spain (who almost for two years had done no memorable act there but warred by policy and stratagems, more than by force of arms) dislodged from their forts and winter harbors, and joyned their armies together. Then they called a Councel, where they jumped with one general accord in this opinion, That considering all this while they had effected this much only, as to empeach and stay Asdrubal from all means of passing over into Italy, it was now high time to make an end at once of the war in Spain. And to effect and bring this to passe, they supposed verily that their strength was well amended and sufficient, by reason that in the winter time they had levied and put in arms thirty thousand Celtiberians. Now the Carthaginians had in Spain then, no fewer than three armies. Asdrubal the son of Gisgo, and Mago, were encamped with all their forces together, distant from the Romans almost five dayes journey: Asdrubal the son of Amilcar, an ancient warrior, and an old Captain in Spain, was somewhat neerer with his whole power, before a City named Anitorgis. Him the Roman Generals were desirous to defeat and vanquish first: and in good hope they were, that they had strength enough and to spare, for to accomplish that: mary, this was their only doubt and fear, lest upon the discomfiture of him, the other Asdrubal and Mago would for fear retire themselves into the unpassable woods, and take the wilds and mountains, and so maintein a long war. They supposed therefore it was the best course to divide their power between them in two parts, and at once to compass the whole war of Spain. And thus they agreed to part their forces; namely, That P. Cornelius should lead two third parts of the army, consisting of Romans and allies, against Mago and Asdrubal: and that Cn. Cornelius with the other third part of that old army should joyn with the Celtiberians, and war against Asdrubal the Barchine [i. son of Amilcar above-said.] Both these Captains with their hosts set out together in their journy, putting the Celtiberians

A berians before in the vanguard, and encamped neer the City Anatorgis in the ſight of their enemies, having but the river running between. And there Cn. Scipio ſtaid behind, and made his abode with the power aforeſaid: but P. Scipio went onward to perform that part of the war which he purpoſed and intended. Aſdrubal after he perceived that there lay in camp but a ſmall power of Romans, and that their whole hope relied upon the aids of the Celtiberians; as one that could well skill of the falſhood and treachery of the barbarous people, but eſpecially of all thoſe nations, among whom he had been ſo long a ſouldier: by reaſon that both camps, as well his own as the other of the Romans, were full of Spaniards, he uſed by the means of reciprocal commerce of their language, for to have ſecret ſpeech and conference with the principal heads of the Celtiberi-
B ans, and ſo treated with them, that in conſideration of a great ſum of money, they were perſwaded and yeelded in the end to withdraw all their forces from thence, and give the Romans the ſlip. And this they ſuppoſed was not ſo heinous and odious a fact. For why? they were not dealt withal to turn their ſwords upon the Romans, and to war againſt them: again, they were to have as good pay and wages to ſit ſtill, and not to ſerve, as was ſufficient to bind them for to bear arms and fight: and laſt of all, reſt it ſelf, and ſleeping in a whole skin, together with their return home to their own, and the joy and pleaſure of viſiting their friends, and ſeeing their goods and lands, were plauſible and pleaſing inducements to every man. And therefore the Captains themſelves were no ſooner drawn thereto, than the very multitude. Over and beſides, to ſtrike it dead ſure, they ſtood in no fear of the Romans (being ſo few as they were) that they could poſſibly keep C them perforce. And ſurely, this might well ſerve, to be a Caveat for Roman Captains ever hereafter, and ſuch precedent examples and inſtances as this, may ſtand in ſtead of good leſſons indeed, to teach them how they truſt again the aids of foreiners; and never to relie themſelves ſo much upon them, but that they alwayes have in their camp the greater part of their own forces, and the more number of their natural ſouldiers. All on a ſuddain therefore the Celtiberians diſlodged, plucked up ſtandards, and departed from them, and never bad them farewel. And when the Romans demanded the cauſe of this change, yea, and beſought and importuned them to tarry, they made them no other anſwer but this, That they were called and ſent for home, by occaſion of wars in their own country. Scipio ſeeing that theſe Allies of his were ſo ſlippery, and could nei-
D ther be intreated nor enforced to ſtay: and that himſelf alone without them was not able to make his part good with the enemy: and to joyn again with his brother, was a thing impoſſible: for want of all other good means, for the preſent, when he ſaw no remedy elſe, determined to retire himſelf as far backward as he could: having this eſpecial care above all things, not to encounter and joyn battail with the enemy in plain field, without ſome advantage, who now was paſſed over the river, and traced him hard at heels in his diſmarch.

About the ſame time P. Scipio ſtood in the like terms of fear, but in more danger by the coming of a new enemy, and that was Maſaniſſa the young Prince, who then was a friend and penſionary ſouldier of the Carthaginians: but afterwards mighty and renowned for his amity with the Romans. He with his Numidian Horſemen firſt encountred P. Scipio, as he marched on his journey, and afterwards both day and night moleſted and troubled him very ſhrewdly: in ſuch ſort, that E not only he would intercept and catch up thoſe that were gone out wandering and ſtragling far from the camp, a fuelling or foraging, and ſend them ſhort of home; but alſo ride braving even before the camp. Many a time would he venture, yea, and enter upon the thickeſt of the ſtanding corps de guard, and make foul work and trouble among them. By night alſo he uſed oft to make many ſtarts upon a ſuddain, and aſſail the gates of the camp and the rampier, and put them in exceeding great frights. So as the Romans at no time, nor in no place could be at reſt and quiet for him, but ever in fear and doubt of ſome ſhrewd turn or other by him: ſo as they were driven to keep within their rampier, cut off from the uſe of all commodities abroad, and in a manner as good as beſieged: and more ſtreightly yet were they like to be beleaguered, in caſe Indibilis, who was
F coming (as the rumor went) with 7500 Sueſſetans, were once joyned with the Carthaginians. Whereupon Scipio a wary warrior and prudent Captain otherwiſe, driven to theſe hard extremities, and forced to make ſhifts, entred into a raſh and inconſiderate deſignment, even to go on and meet (forſooth) Indibilis in the night, and in what place ſoever it ſhould be his hap to encounter him, there to bid him battail, and fight with him. Leaving therefore a mean guard to keep the camp, and T. Fonteius his Lieutenant, as Provoſt and Captain, he ſet out at midnight, and meeting with his enemies, joyned battail with them: but they skirmiſhed rather by looſe companies in their march, than with their united forces in ſet and pight field. Howbeit, the Romans had the better hand ſo much as it was, conſidering what a confuſed and diſorderly conflict there might be. But the Numidian Cavalry, whom Scipio thought he was ſecured of, and that they were not aware of him, all on a ſuddain flanked the ſides of the Romans, and mightily terrified them. Againſt theſe G Numidians, whiles Scipio made head again afreſh, behold a third ſort of enemies alſo charged upon his back, even the Carthaginian Captains, who by this time while the other were in fight, had overtaken their allies and were come thither. So as the Romans were to maintain battail on all hands, and were at a ſtand, and in doubt with themſelves againſt which enemy to turn firſt, or what way with a cloſe couched ſquadron to give the venture for to break through. As the General was thus manfully fighting, and encouraging his ſouldiers, preſenting and oppoſing himſelf forward, where was moſt need and danger, his chance was to be run through the right ſide of his body with a Lance: and that maſſive band of the enemies which had charged upon the thick battailon, battailon, which environed their Captain, seeing Scipio falling from his Horse ready to die, in great joy and mirth set up a cheerful shout, and ran all over the army, and caried glad tidings that the Roman General was slain. This voice being once spread all abroad, caused both the enemies to take themselves undoubtedly for victors, and the Romans to make no other accompt but they were vanquished. Whereupon they having lost their Leader, began forthwith to flie out of the field. But as it was no hard matter for them to make a lane and break through among the Numidians, and other auxiliary souldiers lightly armed; so to escape and go cleer away from so many Horse, and Footmen also, who were as swift on foot as the horsemen, it was almost impossible. Thus they were more in manner slain in their flight now, then in their fight before. And there had not one remained alive, but that the day being far spent already, and toward evening, the night came on apace and overtook them. The Carthaginian Captains, and those also of Affrick, taking the full benefit of this their good fortune, slept not their businesse, nor made delay: but presently after the battail, scarcely allowing their souldiers so much sleep as would content nature, marched in great hast toward Asdrubel the son of Amilcar: making accompt assuredly, that when they had joyned their power with his, they should break the neck of this war, and end it once for all. When they were come to him great joy and gratulation there was between the Captains and the hosts of both sides, for this fresh victory newly atchieved: and seeing they had already defeated so brave a warrior and great commander, together with his whole army, they made no doubt but expected certainly to have another hand as good as this.

The news verily of this so great a foil and overthrow, was not yet come unto the Romans: but yet they were strucken into a sad dump and deep silence, and more than that, into a secret presage and fore-deeming of some unlucky tidings: as commonly mens minds use to fore-give and tell aforehand, when there is some mischief and ill toward them. The General himself besides that he saw he was abandoned and forsaken of his associats, and knew the forces of the enemies so mightily reenforced; by good conjectures and gesses, yea, and by very reason was induced to suspect some loss and calamity received already, rather than enclined to hope after any good success and happy speed. For thus he discoursed with himself: How is it possible that Asdrubal and Mago should bring their armies together without conflict, unless my brother be slain in fight, or have forgotten to be a warrior? how cometh it that he withstood them not? or how hapneth it that my brother followed not hard after them fast upon their backs? At leastwise, if he had not been able to keep them asunder, but that both Captains and armies must needs meet and joyn in one, yet he himself me thinks, at leastwise would have come by this time to his brother, and brought his own power to his. In this perplexity and anguish of spirit, he thought yet, for the present time, that the only good course he could take, was to withdraw himself back from thence as far as he could: and so all that one night unwares to his enemies (who so long only were quiet) he marched a great way, and won much ground of them. The next morning, so soon as the enemies perceived that the Romans were dislodged and gone, they sent out the Numidian light Horsemen, and began to follow after them apace, and pursued them as fast as possibly they could: and before night the Numidian Cavalry had overtaken them, and skirmished one while with the tail of their march, another whiles at their sides and flanks, and gave them no rest: whereat the Romans made as it were a stand, and began to defend and save their army as well as they could: yet with great wariness and regard of security, Scipio encouraged them so to fight, as they might march on still and gain ground, before the Infantry overtook them. But as one while the army was one foot, and another while stood still, in long time they rid but a little ground. And Scipio seeing the night draw on apace, reclaimed his souldiers from farther skirmishes: and after he had rallied them together, he retired with them up to a little mount, no sufficient place (God wot) of safe retreat for an army, especially so troubled and affrighted already, yet higher than any other place all about. There the first thing that he did, was to bestow the baggage and cavalry in the mids within his forces: and at first the infantry ranged round about in a ring, made no difficult matter of it to put by the violent charge of the Numidian Horsemen. But afterwards when the three Generals marching with three full armies approached, their Captain Scipio perceiving that he was never able to keep that place without some fortification, began to cast his eye about, and to bethink with himself, by what means possible he might empale himself round about as it were with a rampier: but the hill was so naked of wood, and the soil of the ground besides so stony and craggy, that he could neither finde any underwood fit to cut out stakes for a pallisado nor earth meet to make turfs for a bank, or minable for a trench: and in one word, all things untoward and unhandsome for a mound, and to fortifie withal. Neither was there any place there, to speak of, so steep and upright, but the enemy might at ease mount up and climb it. All the hill on every side, had a gentle rising and ascent up to the top. Howbeit, to represent some shew and resemblance yet of a rampier, they were forced to take their pack saddles, with their packs tied fast unto them, and so round about to pile them and raise them to the usual height of a mure: And where there wanted pack saddles to make up the work, there they were fain to heap together, all sorts of fardels, trusses, and other carriages, and to put them between the enemies and them. The Carthaginian armies when they were come, matched very easily up against the Hill. But the new fashion and manner of their defences and fortifications, was very strange unto them, so as at the first the souldiers marvelled much

A and were astonied thereat, and stood still. But their Captains on all sides cried out upon them. And why stand ye gaping (say they) so; and do not pull in peeces and pluck away that fooli sh bable there, good to make sport with? A very toy, that women and children would scarce stand about thus long? Why, the enemie is taken already in a pinfold, and lieth lurking and hiding himself behind the trusses and other carriages. After this manner (I say) the leaders rated at the souldiers. But it was not so easy a matter either to get over that Barricado of the packs, or to remove and rid them out of the way, as they lay piled close against them; nor yet to unfold and unwrap the pack-saddles, lying overwhelmed as they did, under the packs, and entangled together with them. Thus they were hindred and staid a long time: and when at length they had put this B bag and baggage aside that was set in their way, and made passage and entrance for the armed men, and that in divers places, the camp and tents were soon taken on all sides, ere a man could turn about: and so being few to many, and frighted men to late conquerors, no marvel if they were killed and hewn in pieces in every place. Howbeit, many of the souldiers having fled for refuge into the forrests neer by, escaped into the camp of P. Scipio, whereof T. Fonteius his Lieutenant had the charge. As for Cn. Scipio some write that he was slain upon that mount at the first onset C and assault made by the enemies: others report that with a few others he fled into a Tower hard by the camp: and that there was a fire made round about it, and so when the gates thereof were burned, which by no violent means otherwise they could break open, the enemies entred and took it, and they within were killed every one. Captain and all.

Thus Cn. Scipio came to his end, in the seventh year after that he went into Spain, and on the nine and twentieth day after that his brother lost his life. Their death was bewailed and lamented no less over all Spain than at Rome. For among the citizens at home one part of their sorrow they took for the loss of the armies, another part went for the distraction and alienation of the Province and a third again was spent in the cogitation of the publick calamity: but Spain from one end to the other, mourned only for their Governors and Captains, and had a great misse of them. And Cneus of the twain, was more bewailed, because he had been longer time their ruler, and had won the favour and affection of men, and possessed their hearts before the other: and was the first that ever gave them in those parts a proof and tast of the Romans just and temperat government.

When the army was thus defeated and brought to nothing, so as Spain seemed utterly lost, D there arose one man yet, that recovered all again, and brought the decaied state to the former perfection. There was in the army one L. Martius, the son of Septimius, a Gentleman and Knight of Rome, a forward young man: for courage and wit, far above the degree and condition wherein he was born. Besides this excellent and most toward disposition of his by nature, he had great helps by the discipline and instruction of Cn. Scipio: under whom, for so many years he was trained and had learned all military knowledge and skill meet for a souldier. This Martius, what by rallying the dispersed souldiers who were fled, and what by drawing others out of sundry garrisons had raised and assembled together a reasonable good power, and joyned with T. Fonteius, the Lieutenant aforesaid of P. Scipio. But the Roman Knight, above all others, grew to so great E credit and reputation among all the souldiers, that when they had fortified their camp within the river Iberus, and were determined among themselves, to chuse one General over the armies, in a solemn assembly of souldiers, even by their own military election: they went one by one in course one after another, unto the main corps de guard that defended the rampier, and to the other wards belonging unto the camp, until they had all given their voyces: and so by general consent created him their General. All the time which they had after, (and that was but small) they employed in fortifying their hold, and conveying thither corn and victuals: and what charge soever was imposed by him upon the souldiers, the same they executed readily and willingly, and without any shew that their hearts were dismayed, and cast down any jot at all. But after that news was brought, that Asdrubal the son of Gisgo, was coming against them, to dispatch clean the reliques
F of the war; that he had passed over Iberus and approached neer: and the souldiers saw once the signal of battel put forth unto them by this new General; calling to mind, what noble warriors they had served under but a while before: what worthy leaders they were wont to have, and with how puissant armies they used heretofore to go to the field; they fell a weeping every one, shaking and beating their heads: some lift up and stretched out their hands to heaven blaming and accusing the Gods: others lay along upon the ground, calling every one upon his own Captain by special name. Neither could their piteous moans and plaints be staid notwithstanding the Centurions encouraged what they could the souldiers of their companies: notwithstanding (I say) that Martius himself sometimes spake them fair, sometimes rebuked them, for giving themselves to such foolish and vain puling, like women: and not rather resolve to raise up their hearts, G and with him to quicken and whet their stomacks in defence of themselves and of the commonweal, and not to suffer their former Captains and Leaders to lie dead and unrevenged. By this time now all on a sudden the shout of the enemies was descried, and the sound of the trumpets were within hearing, being come close under the rampier. Whereupon all at once turning their sorrow and weeping into anger and indignation, they run every man to his armor and weapon: and as if they had been born mad they hastned from all parts to the gates and entries of the camp, and charged upon the enemies as they came carelessly and without order and array. Immediately this unexpected and suddain object, stroke an exceeding fear into the Carthaginians:

as wondring from whence ſo many enemies ſhould ſtart up ſo ſoon, conſidering the armies were H ſo lately clean in a manner deſtroyed; and how it came to paſſe, that being newly vanquiſhed and put to flight, they ſhould be ſo ſtout, ſo bold and confident of their own ſelves; who a Gods name, ſhould be their General, after the two Scipios were ſlain; what Captain and Governor had they over the camp; and who gave out the ſignal of battail: marvelling (I ſay) at theſe premiſſes, and ſo many particulars, that they once imagined not afore, at firſt hand they wiſt not what to do, but as amazed men, began to give ground and retire; but afterwards, being ſtill fiercely followed upon with a violent charge, they were plainly beaten back and put to flight.
And verily, either there had been a foul havock and ſlaughter of them that fled, or a raſh and dangerous enterpriſe for them who would have followed the chace: but that Martius haſtned I to ſound the retreat, and oppoſing himſelf againſt the foremoſt enſigns of the vanguard, yea, and taking hold of ſome of them himſelf, ſtaid the main battail and repreſſed their violence, who were upon the point already to purſue them with heat. And ſo he reduced them back again into the camp, as greedy as they were ſtill of murder, and thirſty of bloudſhed. The Carthaginians, who at the firſt were driven from the rampier, and for fear haſtned away; after that they ſaw none to follow them, ſuppoſed they had been afraid, and therefore ſtaid ſtill: whereupon they departed to their camp again in rechleſs manner, fair and ſoftly. And as careleſs as they were in their retire thither, ſo negligent were they in guarding the ſame: for although their enemies were neer, yet they remembred and thought again, that they were but the tail and reliques of two armies, van-quiſhed and defeated a few dayes before. Upon this reſolute perſwaſion of theirs, and baſe con- K ceit of the enemies, they were very negligent every way within their camp: whereof Martius having by his eſpial, certain intelligence, reſolved upon a deſignment, which at the firſt ſight ſeemed more like a project of hazard, than an enterpriſe of hardineſs; and it was no more, but even upon a bravery to ſet upon the enemy in his own camp, and give him a camiſado. For as he thought it an eaſier empreſe, to force the hold and pavilions of Aſdrubal, being but one, than to defend and keep his own, in caſe three armies and three Captains ſhould joyn together: ſo he conſidered withal, that either if he ſped well in this exploit, he ſhould reſtore and ſet upright again unto the Romans, the decayed and proſtrate State of Spain: or if he were diſcomfited and put back, yet by giving the adventure firſt upon the enemies, he ſhould not be altogether contemned, and of no reputation. But leſt this attempt ſo ſuddain, and the terror and error which may fall out in the L night-time, ſhould happen to trouble this his deſigned plot, and the courſe of his good fortune; he thought it not amiſs, to make a ſpeech unto his ſouldiers, and to exhort and encourage them afore-hand. And therefore calling them together to a general audience, in this manner he diſ-courſed unto them of his intent and purpoſe.

The Oration of Martius to his ſouldiers.

"My valorous and loyal ſouldiers, either the reverence and affectionat love of mine, toward "our chief Captains during their life, and after their death; or the very preſent condition and
"ſtate wherein we all now ſtand; may be a ſufficient teſtimony and proof to any man whoſo-
"ever, that this charge and government of mine, as it is in regard of your judgement of me right "honourable, ſo it is in truth, and in very deed, to me moſt weighty, and full of care and trouble.
"For at what time as (but that fear took away all ſence of ſorrow) I was not ſo much maſter of M
"my ſelf, as to ſeek out and find ſome comfort and ſolace for mine own penſive ſoul and heavy "ſpirit; I was forced being but one, (which is a moſt hard matter for a man to do in time of "grief) to miniſter conſolation unto the common misfortune and calamity of you all. And
"ſurely I have no liſt at all (the harder is my caſe) to avert my mind from continual grief of hear,
"not ſo much as even then, when as I am to ſtudy and deviſe, by what means I may be able to
"preſerve (for the behoof of my country) theſe ſmall remnants of two armies. For why? the gri-
"vous and bitter remembrance of calamities paſt, is ever before me. The two Scipios trouble me "all the day time with careful thoughts, they diſquiet me in the night ſeaſon with fearful dreams,
"they make me oftentimes to ſtart out of my ſleep, willing and charging me, to ſuffer neither
"them nor their ſouldiers (who were your fellows and companions, and for the ſpace of eight N
"years in thoſe parts where they ſerved, never received foil) nor yet the Common-wealth, to "continue unrevenged; warning me withal, to follow their diſcipline, their precepts, rules, & good "inſtructions. And like as, whiles they lived here among us, there was no man more obedient than "my ſelf to their directions and commandments; even ſo after their deceaſe, whatſoever in my "conceit, I judge they would have had eſpecially done in all occurrences, the ſame my deſire is,
"that you alſo (my ſouldiers) would like of and approve for the very beſt. I would not have you
"to weep, wail, and lament ſtill for them, as if they were extinct and gone for ever, (for they live
"ſtill, and ſhall, ſo long as the world endureth, and continue immortal in renown and fame of "their worthy and noble acts) but rather ſo often as you remember and think of them, to go like
"hardy and valiant men to a field, even as if you heard them ſpeaking unto you, or ſaw them gi"ving out the ſignal of battel. Neither was it (I aſſure you) any other object but that, preſented "yeſterday unto your eyes and minds, which effected ſo memorable a piece of ſervice as it was:
"by which ye have made good proof unto your enemies, and given them to underſtand, that the "Roman name died not together with the Scipios; and that the vigour and vertue of that people
"which was not extinct and buried, by the overthrow at Canna, will ever riſe again (ye may be "ſure) out of all adverſities, let cruel fortune ſtorm and rage aſmuch as ever ſhe can. And now,
"ſince ye have ſhewed ſuch valour and hardineſs already of your own accord, I have a mind
"and

A "and would gladly ſee, how bravely ye will bear your ſelves upon the direction and command"ment of your Captain. For yeſterday, when I ſounded the retreat unto you, at what time as "you followed ſo freely upon the enemy, being troubled and diſarraied; my deſire and meaning
"was not to repreſs and abate your bold courage, but to defer and reſerve it againſt ſome greater "opportunity of advantage, and for a more honourable and glorious exploit: that anon upon the "firſt occaſion, you being prepared and provided, might ſurpriſe them at unawares, and not tran-
"ding upon their guard, armed and wel appointed, aſſail them diſarmed & naked. and that which "more is, whiles they are in their beds faſt and ſound aſleep. And the hope that I conceive of this "good opportunity and effect thereof (my ſouldiers) ariſeth not upon ſome fantaſtical imagina-B "tion of mine own brain by hap-hazard, and upon vain preſumption, but grounded upon good
"reaſon and preſent experience. For verily, if a man ſhould demand even of you your own ſelves,
"What the reaſon was, that being but few in number, and lately diſcomfited ye were able to de"fend your camp, againſt many more than your ſelves, and thoſe heartned with freſh victories, ye
"would make no other anſwer but this, That you, fearing that which followed, had both fortifi"ed your camp in every reſpect with ſtrong munitions, and were your ſelves well appointed and "furniſhed, yea, and ready to receive them whenſoever they came. And ſurely, ſo it is, and we find "it true by experience: Men are leaſt ſure and ſecured againſt that which fortune ſaith is fearleſs,
"and need not to be prevented, becauſe that which we neglect is evermore open and expoſed to
"all dangers. Now the enemies doubt nothing leſs at this time, then that we, who were ſo lately C "our ſelves beſieged and aſſailed by them, will now come to give an aſſault upon them in their "hold. Let us adventure to do that which no man would beleeve that ever we durſt enterpriſe,
"and the ſelf-ſame cauſe which ſeemeth to make the thing moſt difficult, ſhall effect it ſooneſt of "all others. At the change of the third watch I will lead you forth without any noiſe at all in "great ſilence. Well enformed and aſſured I am, that in their camp the Sentinels are not relieved "in due courſe and order, neither yet the ordinary corps de guard kept as they ought to be. Your
"ſhout and outcry ſhall not ſo ſoon be heard at the gates, nor your firſt charge and aſſault given,
"but ye ſhall ſurely be maſters of the camp. Then let me ſee you perform that ſlaughter and exe"cution among them heavy and dead aſleep, affrighted with an unexpected alarm, and taken on "a ſudden unarmed, and in their beds; from which yeſterday ye thought much, that ye were cal-D "led away and reclaimed. I wot well, that this ſeemeth unto you an audacious enterpriſe and ful
"of hazard, but when things go croſs and ſtand in doubtfull terms, and when other means fail the "hardieſt attempts, yea, and the moſt venturous and deſperate courſes, are ever ſafeſt and ſpeed "beſt. For if a man ſtay never ſo little at the very inſtant when a thing is to be done (whereof the "opportunity paſſeth and flieth away ere one would think) immediatly when it is once gone, he
"may fling his cap after well enough, and complain thereof and ſay, had I wiſt, but never the "nearer. One Army they have hard at hand, and two more are not far off: now if we venture of "them here, our opportunity and advantage is as good as theirs. And once already ye have "made triall of their forces and your own: put we it off another day, contenting our ſelves with
"the bare name of yeſterdaies ſally, and give over ſo, it will be great doubt and danger, leſt all E "the Generals with all their armies be rallied and re-united. And ſhall we then be able to hold "our own againſt three Generals and three hoſts, whom Cn. Scipio having about him his whole
"puiſſance, freſh and in good plight, could not withſtand nor abide? Our Captains by dividing
"their forces, and diſmembring one compleat army, were defeated and overthrown: ſemblably
"may our enemies, parted while they be, and ſevered aſunder, be diſcomfited and brought to "nought. Lo, this is the only way for us to war and none other. And therefore let us wait no lon"ger than the commodious opportunity of the next night. Go ye then a gods bleſſing make much "of your ſelves, take your repaſt and repoſe, that ye may be freſh and luſty to break into your ene"mies hold with the ſame reſolute courage, wherewith erewhile ye defended your own. The ſouldiers, as they gladly gave ear to this new counſell of their new captain, ſo, the more audaci-F ous and adventurous that it was the better it pleaſed them. The reſt of the day behind they ſpent in furbiſhing and making ready their harneſs and weapons, and in cheriſhing their bodies, yea, and the better part of the night they ſlept quietly. And ſo at the relief of the fourth watch they ſet forward.

Now were there other companies alſo of Carthaginians, beyond this next camp aboveſaid, about ſix miles diſtant from thence. A hollow way and valley there lay between, ſtanding thick of trees. In the midſt of this wood, for a furlong ſpace well near, he beſtowed cloſely a cohort of footmen, yea, and certain horſemen of Romans: but by his leave this was but a craſty and ſlie trick, borrowed of the Carthaginians. Thus the midſt way being intercepted and taken up, the reſt of the forces were conducted in a ſtill march toward the enemies in the next camp. And finding no G guards before the gates, no Sentinels upon the rampier, they entred in as it had been into their own hold, and no man made reſiſtance: then they ſounded trumpets, and gave the alarm. Some fall to killing of the enemies half aſleep; others fling dry litter and ſtraw for to kindle fire upon their huts and pavilions; other ſome again keep the gates, that none ſhould iſſue forth. So the fire, the outcry, and maſſacre all together put them out of their right wits, and made them, as it were, be-ſides themſelves; that neither hear they could, nor yet make any ſhift for themſelves. Unarmed and naked men fell among the bands of armed ſouldiers. Some run in haſte to the gates, others finding the waies and paſſages beſet run up to the rampier: and look as any eſcaped and got away from thence by that means he flieth straight waies directly toward the other camp. Where they were caught up by the cohort of footmen, and the cornet of horsemen, which rose up suddenly out of their Ambuscado: and being enclosed on every side, were killed to the last man. And yet, if it had been any ones good hap to have escaped from thence with life, so swiftly, and with so great expedition, the Romans after they had got the nearer camp, sped themselves to the other, that he could not have recovered it before them, to bring news of the defeat. And even there likewise, the farther they were off from their enemy, the more negligent they were: and because some also a little before day were slipt away a forraging, fuelling, and plundering, the Romans found every thing more loose and out of order, than in the other camp. Their weapons only stood reared up in their corps de guard, the souldiers themselves were unarmed, either sitting and lying all along on the ground, or walking up and down before the gates, and under the rampier. With these souldiers so secure, so retchless, so disarmed and disordered (the Romans being yet in their hot blood, and not cooled upon their fresh massacre, and more than that, lusty and brag for their new victory) began to make a fray, and to skirmish. But the Carthaginians were not able to keep them out of the gates. And so within the Camp there was a hot and cruell fight: for, from all parts thereof, they ran together upon the first alarm that arose in the very beginning of the tumult and scuffling. And long had that skirmish continued, but that the Romans bucklers and targets seen all bloudy were a pattern unto the Carthaginians of a former execution; and thereupon drave them into a mighty fear. This fearfull fight caused them all to turn back and take their heels: and thus as many of them as escaped killing got out by heaps whersoever they could make shift to find way, and were clean turned out of their camp, and all that they had. So in the compass of one day and night, by the conduct and direction of L. Martius, there were two encamped holds forced and won from the enemies: in which there were 37000 of the enemies slain, saith Claudius who translated the Annals of Acilius out of the Greek tongue into the Latine and 830 taken prisoners besides the gain of a mighty rich booty. In which pillage there was found a shield of silver weighing 138 pound, with the image and portraiture of Asdrubal the Barchine. Valerius Antias recordeth, that the camp only of Mago was taken, and seven thousand men slain: and that in another battell with Asdrubal upon a tally forth, there died ten thousand, and 4330 were taken prisoners. Piso writeth, that when Mago followed after our men in an hot and disorderly chace (for they seemed to give back and retreat) there were five thousand men killed by the train of an ambush. But all writers do blaz on the great honour and fame of Duke Martius. And besides the very truth of his glorious name, they make mention also and speak of some miracles: namely that as he made the Oration unto his souldiers, there was seen a flaming fire burning from his head without any sense and feeling of his, to the great wonder and fear of the souldiers that stood about him: and that in the memoriall of his brave victory over the Carthaginians, there remained in the temple of Jup. untill the Capitoll was burned, that foresaid shield, with the Image of Asdrubal, and it was called Martius his shield. After this, Spain was quiet for a long time, whiles both sides after so many overthrows given and taken between them, were loath to hazard the main chance in one battell.

In the time that these affairs passed in Spain, Marcellus upon the winning of Syracuse, having set all other things in order throughout Sicily, with such faithfulness and upright integrity, that not only he greatly augmented his own glory, but also enlarged the majesty of the people of Rome, brought over to Rome all the goodly and beautiful ornaments of that City, their graven and molten images, their pictures and painted tables, whereof there was great store in Syracuse. These braveries (no doubt) at the first were no more but the spoils of enemies, and lawfully acquired in right of war and conquest. But from thence began our great love and liking to the cunning workmanship of Grecian Artisans: and from hence came afterwards our licentiousness and outrage in spoiling and robbing, so commonly & ordinarily, all sacred and profane places, where these things were to be had: which staid not so, but proceeded and turned at length to the spoiling of the Roman gods themselves, and to that very first Temple which by Marcellus was beautified and adorned principally above the rest. For strangers and forrein travellers used in pilgrimage to visit the Temples which were dedicated by Marcellus at the gate Capena, in regard only of the most rare and singular workmanship of the ornaments in that kind, of which at this day there is very little or nothing to be seen.

Now from all City well-nere of Sicily, there resorted Embassies unto him: as their causes were divers and unlike, so their conditions were not all one. As many as before the winning of Syracuse had either not rebelled at all, or became reconciled and in favour again, they were accepted in the quality of faithfull Allies, and made much of: those who for fear after the loss of Syracuse, yielded were reputed as conquered, and received laws and conditions at the will and pleasure of the Conqueror. There remained yet no small reliques of war about Agrigentum for the Romans to dispatch namely, Epicides and Hanno, the Captains of the former war: and a third, sent new from Annibal in the room of Hippocrates, a Citizen of Hippos (his countrimen name him Matines) descended from the Libyphœnices, a man of Action, and one who under Annibal had been brought up, and taught all feats of arms, and skill of warfare. Unto his charge were committed by Epicides and Hanno the Numidian Auxiliaries, with whom he over-ran all the countries belonging to the enemies: he went unto all the Confederats, and so wrought with them to continue fast in their allegiance, and to send aids to every one in due time accordingly: in such sort, that within

A within short time he got himself a great name throughout all Sicily, so as the favorits and faction of the Carthaginians had no greater hope in any than in him. And therefore both Captains, as well Hanno the Carthaginian, as Epicides the Syracusian, who for a time had been pent up within the walls of Agrigentum, bearing themselves as well upon the fidelity as policy of Mutines, boldly adventured to come forth of the walls of Agrigentum, and upon the river Himera encamped themselves. Whereof Marcellus having intelligence, forthwith removed with all his power, and sate him down encamped, almost four miles from the enemy, minding to wait and expect what they did or went about. But Mutines gave him neither opportunity of place to rest him long, nor respite of time to take counsell in, but crossed the river, and with exceeding terrour, and tumultu-
B ous noise assailed the standing guards of his enemies: yea, and the morrow after gave them battell as it were in a pitcht field, and drave them within their holds and fortifications. But being called from thence by occasion of a mutiny of Numidians within the Camp (who to the number almost of three hundred were departed to Heraclea Minoa) he went to appease their moods, and to reclaim them to due obedience: but he gave the rest of the Captains (by report) a great charge and express warning, not to fight with the enemy, howsoever they did in his absence. But both the Captains were greatly offended thereat, and Hanno especially, who was already male-content, and repined at his glory: What? saith he, thinketh Mutines, a base African and not of the right stamp neither, to gage and rule me a Carthaginian Generall, sent with Commission from the Senat and people? He perswaded therefore Epicides effectually to pass over the river, and to strike
C a battell: for, quoth he, if we should stay for him, and then hap to have a fortunate day of it and win the victory, all the honour no doubt shall redound to Mutines.

Be ye sure, Marcellus thought this a great indignity, that he who had repulsed at Nola Annibal, even when he bare himself so bravely upon his fresh victory at Cannæ, should give one foot to these petty enemies, vanquished already by him both by sea and land: whereupon he commanded his souldiers to arm in all haste, and to bring forth the standards and ensigns. But as he was arranging his men in battell array, there came riding unto him all on the spur, with bridle on the horse neck, ten Numidians from out of the army of the enemies, with these tidings and intelligences, assuring them, "That their countrimen, who first were offended and discontented by occasi"on of that mutiny aforesaid, wherein three hundred of their company departed and went away D "to Heraclea: and then afterwards, because they saw their own head and leader, by the practise
"of those other Captain, who maligned and envied his glory, sent far enough out of the way, e"ven against the very day when the battell should be fought; were not disposed at all to fight,
"but would sit still and not stir. A kind of people these were, deceitfull otherwise, and used to break promise; howbeit now, they were just and true of their word. Upon this, as the Romans took better heart unto them, (for there was a speedy pursevant or courrier sent throughout the battaillons from company to company, for to signifie unto them, that the enemy was disappointed and abandoned of his Cavalry, whom they feared most of all other) so the enemies were mightily dismaied and put in fear: for over and besides, that they had no help from them who were the greatest strength of their army, they were in a deep fear lest their own horsemen would E set upon them. By which occasion the conflict was not great, for at the first shout and shock given, well it was seen which way the game would go, and the matter was soon determined. The Numidians, who at the first encounter, and during the conflict, had stood quiet in both points of the battell, seeing their own fellows turn back and flie, bare them only company for a while as they fled: but after that they perceived them all to make haste for fear to Agrigentum: fearing also themselves there to be besieged among them, slipt away every one to their own Cities. Many thousands were there slain and taken prisoners: and eight elephants besides taken alive. This was the last field fought by Marcellus in Sicily: upon this victory he returned to Syracuse. By this time now was the year almost come about and growing to an end. And therefore at Rome the Senate decreed, that P. Cornelius the Prætor should send letters to the Consuls, lying before Capua, pur-
F porting this tenour: That forasmuch as Annibal was far from them, and no great matter of consequence like to be performed the while at Capua; the one of them (if they thought so good) should repair to Rome, for to create new Magistrates in the room of the old. The Consuls having received the letters, agreed between themselves and took order, that Claudius should go to hold and accomplish the solemn election of Magistrates: and Fulvius remain still at Capua. So Claudius created new Coss. Cn. Fulvius Centimalus, and P. Sulpitius Galba the son of Servius: a man that had not born any curule office of state before. After these were Prætors chosen, L. Cornelius Lentulus, M. Cornelius Cethegus, C. Sulpitius, C. Calpurnius Piso. Unto Piso befell the jurisdiction within the City. Sulpitius had the government of the Province Sicily. Cethegus of Apulia: and Lentulus, of Sardinia. The Consuls had the government of their Provinces prorogued for to continue G one year longer.

ANnibal encamped himſelfe at three miles end from Rome, faſt upon the river Anio. Himſelf in perſon, accompanied with two thouſand men of armes, rode to the gate Capena, for to view the ſite of the City. And notwithſtanding that for three daies ſpace the armies of both ſides were come into the field ready embattelled, yet they never joyned in conflict, by reaſon of the tempeſtuous and ſtormy weather: But ever as they were returned again into their Camp, preſently it proved fair. Capua was won by Q. Fulvius, and Appius Claudius the Pro-Conſuls. The Nobles and principall Citizens of Capua poiſoned themſelves. When as their Senators ſtood bound to ſtakes (for to be whipped) and there to loſe their heads, there came letters from the Senate of Rome unto the Pro-Conſul Q. Fulvius, with direction to ſpare their lives: but before that he would read them, he put them up into his boſome, and willed K the miniſters or executioners to let the Law have his courſe, and to do their office, and ſo he went through with the execution. It hapned that in a ſolemn aſſembly of the people there was much debate and queſtion, who ſhould govern as L. Deputy the Province of Spain: and when no man was willing to undertake that charge, P. Scipio, the ſon of that Publius who was ſlain in Spain, *made offer to go that voyage, and by the voyces generally of the people, and with one accord of all he was thither ſent. And there went an opinion of him, that he was deſcended of ſome heavenly race: both for that himſelf, after he was come to ſeventeen years of age, and had put on his mans robe, converſed within the Capitoll, and alſo becauſe there was a ſnake or ſerpent ſeen oftentimes in his mothers bedchamber. ## The ſix and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

CNeus Fulvius Centimalus, and P. Sulpitius Galba the Conſuls, when they had entred into their Magiſtracy upon the Ides of March, aſſembled the Senators into the Capitoll, where they conſulted with the LL. about the ſtate of the Common-weal, concerning the adminiſtration of the wars, and as touching the Provinces and the Armies. Q. Fulvius and Ap. Claudius, the Conſuls of the former year, continued ſtill their rule and full command, with M the charge of the ſame forces which they had before under their hands. And over and beſides, they were expreſly commanded, not to depart from Capua (before which they lay at ſiege) untill they had forced and won the City. For at that time the Romans among all their other affairs were moſt amuſed upon it: not ſo much for anger and malice, (wherof they had never againſt any one City greater and juſter cauſe) as in this regard, that being a ſtate ſo noble and mighty, like as by revolting firſt it had drawn and induced certain other Cities to do the ſame: ſo if it were recovered and regained, like it was to reduce their affections again, to look back and return unto their old allegiance and obedience to their wonted ſigniory of Rome. The Prætors alſo of the former year, M. Junius in Tuſcany, and P. Sempronius in Gaul continued in their places of regiment, with two legions a piece under their conduct the ſame which they had before. And ſo M. Marcellus re- N mained as Pro-Conſul behind in Sicily, for to finiſh and diſpatch the reliques of the war there, with the power of that army which he had already: and had commiſſion (if need were of new ſupply) to make up the number of his companies, out of thoſe legions which were commanded by P. Cornelius the Vice-Prætor in Sicily; provided alwaies, that he choſe no ſouldier out of thoſe bands, unto whom the Senat had flatly denied, either licence to be diſcharged, or paſport to return home into their country, before the war was fully ended. Unto C. Sulpitius, whoſe lot it was to govern the Province of Sicily, were aſſigned thoſe two legions, which P. Cornelius had before: with a freſh ſupply out of the army of Cneus Fulvius, which the laſt year was ſhamefully defeated, beaten and put to flight in Apulia. Theſe ſouldiers, all the ſort of them, had the ſame limitation of ſervice and no other, appointed and ſet down by the Senat, as thoſe former who remained O after the overthrow at Canna. And this diſgrace they had beſides, as well the one company as the other, That they might not winter within any town, nor build them any ſtanding camp for wintring harbours, within ten miles of a City. L. Cornelius the Lord Deputy in Sardinia, was allowed to have the conduct of thoſe two legions which were under the leading of Q. Mutius. And order was given unto the Conſuls, to levy and enroll a new ſupply thereto, if need required. T. Otacilius and M. Valerius were appointed to guard and defend all the ſea-coaſts of Sicily and Greece, with

A the help of those Legions and Armadoes which they had already. The Greeks had fifty sail in their fleet, and were manned with one Legion. The Sicilians had one hundred ships, and two Legions to furnish them. So that in this year the Romans maintained three and twenty Legions, to wage war both by sea and land.

In the beginning of the year, when the letters of L. Martius were read and scanned in the Senat house, the L.L. there assembled, liked well of the contents, and spake highly in the praise of his worthy acts: but many of them were offended at the superscription, because he took upon him the honourable title of a Pro-Prætor in his stile, and wrote thus, [L. Martius the Pro-Prætor to the Senat] considering, that his command was neither granted by the people, nor allowed and B confirmed by the Senat. "An ill precedent (say they) it is, and of bad consequence, that Generals "of the field should be chosen by armies, and that the solemnity of Elections, so devoutly begun "in the name of the gods, and with the religious observation of the Bird-flight, should now be "transferred into the Camps and Provinces far from Laws and Magistrates, and committed to "the inconsiderate wills of rash affectionate souldiers. And when some there in place were of opinion, that the matter should be put in question at the Council Table, it was thought better to defer that consultation, untill those gentlemen of service, that brought the Letters from Martius, were gone and departed. As concerning corn and apparell for the army, they agreed to write back unto him, that the Senat would take order and provide for both: but they would not allow in any cause to give him this addition, and to write [To Martius the Pro-Prætor] lest that they might C seem to approve the very same thing by their prejudice and doom aforehand, which they had left for to be decided and determined afterwards. When the Gentlemen aforesaid had their dispatch, and were dismissed, the first thing that the Consuls propounded was it, and no other: and generally they jumped in this one point, for to deal with the Tribunes of the peoples, that with all speed possible they would move the Commons, and propound unto them, for to know, who their will and pleasure was should be sent L. Deputy into Spain, for to have the government of that army, whereof Cn. Scipio, L. Generall, had the conduct.

This matter, I say, was treated of with the Tribunes, and a bill preferred thereof unto the Commons: but there was another greater contention in terms, that had possessed their minds already. For C. Sempronius Blæsus had commenced a criminall action against Cn. Fulvius, accusing D him for the lois of the Army in Apulia. and ceased not in all the assemblies of the people to make invectives against him, charging him, "That being Captain Generall, through his much folly, ignorance, and rashness, he had brought his army into a place of danger: reproving him more- "over, and saying, That never any Captain but Cn. Fulvius had corrupted, marred, and infected "his legions with all kind of vices before that he betraied them to the enemies: in such wise, that "it might be well and truly said, that they were altogether spoiled and defeated before they had a "sight of their enemies: and were not vanquished by Annibal, but by their own Colonell and "Commander. See (quoth he) the disorder that is in Elections, and how no man, when he is to "give his voice doth well weigh and consider, who it is that he chuseth a General & unto whom "he committeth the charge of an Army. Behold the difference between Cneus Fulvius, and E "T. Sempronius. This man having the leading of an army of bondslaves, by discipline, good or- "der and government, within short time brought his souldiers to that good pass, that there was "not one of them all throughout the army remembred and regarded how basely he was born, "and of what parentage descended, but all in generall bare themselves so, that they were to their "friends assure defence, and to their enemies a fearful terror: and after that he had recovered them "at Beneventum, & other Cities, (as it were, out of the chaws of Annibal) he restored and delive- "red them safe & sound to the people of Rome. Whereas contrariwise Cn. Fulvius having received "an army of Roman Citizens, well and worshipfully born, liberally and honestly brought up, had "taught them servile vices fit for slaves, and so trained them, that with their friends and allies they "were stout, proud, and unruly: and among their enemies were cowards & very dastards: & so far F "short they were to bear off the violence of the Carthaginians that they were not able to abide "so much as their first cry and shout. And no marvel I assure you, that the souldiers could not stick "to it in the battel, and hold out manfully; when the General himself was the first that ran away "beastly. I rather wonder at it that any of them stood to it and died in the field, and were not all "of them as fearful as Cn. Fulvius, and took not heels with him for company. Yet C. Flami- "nius, L. Paulus, L. Posthumius, both Scipios, as well Cn. as Pub. chose rather to lose their lives in "battel, than to forsake their armies when they were environed round with enemies. But Cn. "Fulvius, he was in manner the only man that returned to Rome with news of the army defea- "ted and overthrown. Now verily, a great indignity it is, and a shamefull manner of proceeding, "that the residue of the army, after the overthrow at Cannæ, because they fled out of the field, G "were confined and transported over into Sicily, with expres condition, not to return again from "thence, before that the enemy were clean gone and departed out of Italy: & that the very same "rigorous and heavy decree passed likewise, and was executed against the Legions of Cn. Fulvius; "and Cn. Fulvius himself, who fled out of the battell which was through his own folly and rash- "ness begun should go away clear, and escape without all punishment: that himself I say should "lead his old age in taverns, stews, and brothel-houses, where already he hath spent his youth- "full daies; while his poor souldiers (who had faulted in nothing, but that they were like unto "their Captain) be sent far enough off, and packed away (as it were) into exile, and endure shame-

"full and ignominious ſouldiery. Lo, how unequally at Rome the freedom of the City is parted H "between the rich and the poor; between men of nobility and high calling, and thoſe that are of "mean parentage and low degree.

The anſwer of Cn. Fulvius. Thus much ſpake the plaintiff C. Sempronius Blaſus. The defendant on the other ſide ſhifted all the blame from himſelf, and laid the whole fault upon his ſouldiers, alledging and pleading thus, "That when they called upon him haſtily, and with great wilfulneſs for to give battell, he "brought them forth into the field not on that day which they would themſelves (for it was late "in the evening) but the morrow after, when both time and place were meet and convenient for "the purpoſe: and notwithſtanding they were well appointed and orderly embattelled, yet were "they not able to ſuſtain, either the fame, or the fury of the enemies, I know not whether. And "when they all fled away amain, he alſo was carried away in the throng of the rout: like as Varro I
"the Conſul, at the battell before Canna and as many other Generals elſewhere. And what good "could he have done to the Common-weal, in caſe he had ſtaid behind alone? unleſs perad-
"venture his death might have cured and remedied the publike ſores and maladies, or made "amends for the common loſſes. Neither was it for want of victuals, nor for that he light at un"awares upon places of diſadvantage and danger; nor yet, becauſe he was entrapped within the "trains of an ambuſh, marching on enemies forward, without ſending his eſpials before, that he was "overcome; but even by mere force, by dint of ſword, in open field, and in a pight battel. And it "was not he could do withall if his own men were fearfull and timorous, and the enemies hardy "and venturous, he had not the rule of their hearts. It is long of every one his own nature to be "either bold or heartleſs. K

Two ſeverall daies was he judicially accuſed, and at both times a fine of money only ſet upon his head in caſe the matter ſhould go againſt him. At the third Seſſion the witneſſes were produced forth, to be depoſed and give evidence: and after that he had been ſhamefully reviled, and charged with all manner of reproaches, there were very many upon their oath teſtified, That the firſt beginning of the fright and flight both, was occaſioned by the Prætor himſelf: and that the ſouldiers ſeeing themſelves forſaken by him, and ſuppoſing verily that their Captain and Leader was not affraid of his own ſhadow but had great reaſon to fear, they likewiſe turned their backs and fled. Upon which evidence, the whole Court was ſo incenſed againſt him with anger, that they cried all with one voice, to commence a capitall action, for that he was worthy to die. Whereupon aroſe a new debate and controverſie: for whereas the Tribune had twice before laid L a penall action upon him of money, and now at the third time ſaid that he would have a jury of life and death go upon him: then he called upon the other Tribunes for their helping hand to mitigate this rigour of the Tribune. But when thoſe his Collegues made anſwer again and ſaid, that they would not oppoſe themſelves nor hinder his courſe, but that he might proceed in the ſuit at his own good pleaſure, more majorum, i. e. [according to the ancient manner uſed by their fore-fathers,] either by order of law, or rule of cuſtome, and bring him being but a private perſon to the triall either of a capitall crime, or penall treſpaſs: then Sempronius ſpake and ſaid flatly, that he laid upon him a criminal action of treaſon againſt the State; and requeſted of C. Calphurnius the Lord chief Juſtice of the City, for to have a day of hearing and judiciall triall by the people. Then the defendant caſt about to help himſelf by another remedy, namely, in caſe he could compaſs that M
Q. Fulvius his brother might poſſibly be preſent at the Seſſion when he ſhould be judged: who at that time was a man of great credit and reputation, in regard both of the name that went on him for his noble acts, and of that great hope which men had of him, that he was like preſently to be Maſter of Capua. But when this ſaid Q. Fulvius had requeſted ſo much by letters, endited to that purpoſe as effectually as he could deviſe, and to move commiſeration and pity in behalf of the life of his brother, the LL. of the Senat returned this anſwer unto him again, That it was not for the good of the State that he ſhould depart from Capua: thereupon, before the Seſſions day was come, Cn. Fulvius departed of his own accord into exile to Tarquinii, and the Commons made an act and confirmed that baniſhment of his to be a juſt, due, and ſufficient puniſhment for his offence. N

During theſe buſineſſes at Rome, the whole ſtrength and force of war was bent againſt Capua, and yet the City was rather ſtraightly beleaguered than forcibly aſſaulted; inſomuch as neither the ſervants or bondmen, nor the common people were able to endure the famine any longer: and ſend unto Annibal any meſſengers, they poſſibly could not, by reaſon of the ſtraight watch and ward that the Romans kept, ſo near one unto the other. At length there was a certain Numidian offered to go and to eſcape clear away, who having taken letters unto Annibal to put him in mind to be as good as his promiſe, departed in the night, and paſſed through the midſt of the Roman camp, and put the Campans in very good hope, to iſſue forth at all the gates, and to make a ſally upon the enemy, whiles their power and ſtrength ſerved them. And verily in many ſcuffles and ſkirmiſhes which they made, they got the better for the moſt part in horſe-fight: O but lightly their footmen had ever the worſe. The Romans for their parts were nothing ſo much pleaſed when they had the upperhand at any time, as they were diſcontented and ill apaid, to receive a foil in any kind of ſervice of them, who were not only beſieged, but in manner overcome already and conquered. So they deviſed a means in the end, to make up and ſupply by induſtry and policy the defect they had in ſtrength and force. They choſe out of all the Legions certain luſty young men, ſuch as for clean ſtrength of body, and lightneſs withall, were moſt nimble and ſwift,

A swift. These had every one of them, a light buckler or targer, shorter than commonly horsemen have, and seven javelins or darts apiece, four foot long, with iron heads at one end, like as those Javelins have, which they use to lance that are lightly armed, and begin skirmishes. And every horseman took up one of these behind him on horseback, and used them, both to sit the horse and ride, and also to leap down on foot, with great activity and agility, at the signall and token given them. Now, when as, after daily practice and exercise, they were able to do it nimble enough, and without fear, they advanced forth into the plain, lying between their camp, and the wall of the City, and affronted the horsemen of the Campans as they stood arranged in battell array: and so soon as they were come within a darts cast, the light javelottiers aforesaid, B dismounted from their horses, at a sign given them: and behold, all of a sudden, out of the Cavalry there was a battaillon of footmen arranged, who charged the men of arms of the enemies, and let flie their shot with great force, dart after dart, which they lanced so thick, that they galled many a horse, and wounded also many horsemen. Howbeit, their fear was much greater, by reason of the strange and unexpected manner of fight. The Roman horsemen seeing their enemies thus affrighted set too hard, and charged them upon lustily, chased them and beat them down even to the City gates. After this, the Romans were the better in horse-service also. And hereupon began the manner from henceforth to entertain such light armed javelottiers, called Velites, even among the Legions. The first deviser of this mingling of footmen among the horsemen they say was one Q. Navius a Centurion, and that he was highly honoured by the Generall for C his invention.

Whiles things stood thus at Capua, Annibal was greatly distracted in mind, and possessed with two contrary cogitations, whether he should go to gain the Castle of Tarentum, or to rescue and save the City of Capua. At last the regard of Capua prevailed with him: for he saw that as well friends as enemies depended thereupon, and had their mind and eye wholly bent that way; as being a City like to give the very triall and proof, what would the issue be generally of all the revolt and rebellion from the Romans. Leaving therefore behind him a great part of his carriage in the Brutians country, and all his souldiers heavily armed, he made hatte into Campania, with an elect power of foot and horse, such as he supposed most meet and best appointed for expedition and riddance of way: yet as fast as he marched, there followed after him three and thirty Ele- D phants, and so he sate him down closely in a secret valley behind the mountain Tiffata, which overlooketh the City Capua. At the first coming he forced the fort called Galatia, and compelled the garrison there to quit the place, and then he turned and opposed himself against the enemies who besieged Capua. But he dispatched certain courriers afore unto Capua to signifie unto them at what time he minded to set upon the camp of the Romans: that they also at the very instant might be ready to issue forth at every gate of the City to do the like. The Romans having no fore-knowledge by their espials of this occurrence, were mightily terrified: for Annibal himself assailed them one way, and all the Campans as well foot as horsemen (together with the garrison souldiers of the Carthaginians under the leading of Bostar and Hanno their captains) sallied out another way. The Romans therefore being driven to their shifts, as well as they might in so E sudden and fearfull a case, had an eye to this, not to make head altogether one way, and so to leave the rest quite without defence; therefore they divided their forces in this manner among themselves: Appius Claudius opposed himself against the Campans: and Fulvius against Annibal. Claudius Nero the Vice-Prætor, with the horsemen belonging to the sixth legion, quartered upon the way that leadeth to Suessula: and C. Fulvius Flaccus the Lieutenant with the horsemen of Allies, took up his standing, and planted himself over-against the river Vulturnus. The battell began not after the usuall manner, only with shouts and outcries, but besides all other clamours of men neighing of horses, and rustling of armour, there was a multitude of Campans good for no other service of war, placed upon the wals, who together with ringing and sounding of basons and vessels of brasse (as the manner is in the still dead time of the night, when the moon is in the F eclipse) made such an hideous noise, that it caused even them that were in fight to be amused thereupon, and to listen after it. Appius with small ado repulsed the Campans from the trench and rampier. But Fulvius on the other part had more trouble to deal with Annibal and the Carthaginians, who charged so fiercely upon him, that the sixth legion there gave ground and retreated: which being once beat back, a Squadron of Spaniards and three Elephants passed forwards as far as the rampier, and had already broken through the main battell of the Romans: but they were in suspence between doubtfull hope and present danger, thinking one while to break through and pass into the Camp: and doubtfull another while to be excluded from the rest of their companies. Fulvius seeing this fear of the Legion and perill wherein the Camp stood, encourageth and exhorteth Q. Navius and other principall Centurions, to assail valiantly, to kill and hew in pieces that one company of the enemies which were fighG ting under the counterscarp. "For all now lieth a bleeding, quoth he, and in extream hazard: "for either you must give the enemies way, and then wil they more easily enter into the camp, then "they had already pierced through the thick squadrons of the battell; or else ye must defeat and "slay them in the place even under the trench. And that (quoth he) were no difficult piece of ser- "vice, considering they are but few in number, severed and shut out clean from the succour of "their fellows: and the same Roman battaillon which seemeth now disbanded and open, whiles "it is affrighted, if so be it would make head and turn both sides upon the enemy, were able to

"compass round and environ them, and put them to a doubtful hazard, yea, and cut them in pie- H
"ces within the midst. Navius had no sooner heard the General speak these words, but he caught the ensign of the second band of Hastati from the ensign-bearer, and displaied it in the faces of the enemies, threatning to fling it among the midst of them, unless his souldiers made the better haste to follow him, and settle themselves to fight. He was a goodly tall and personable man of body, his brave armor besides set him out and beautified his person: and withall, the advancing of his ensign on high, drew every mans eye upon him, as well enemies as friends. But when he was approached once to the banners of the Spaniards, then from all hands they spared him not, but lanced at him their barbed javelins, and the whole battell in manner was bent only against him. But neither the multitude of enemies, nor the volley of their shot, was able to repress and rebut the I violence of that one man. Likewise M. Attilius a Lieutenant, caused the ensign-bearer of the first band of the Principes, belonging to the same Legion, to enter with his ensign upon the cohort and troop of the Spaniards. The Lieutenants also L. Porcius Licinius and T. Popilius, who had the guarding of the camp, fought valiantly upon the rampier in defence thereof, and killed the Elephants upon the very counterscarp, as they were passing over and entring the camp. And by occasion that their bodies filled up the ditch, the enemies had a passage made them into the camp, as it were over a causey or bridge raised of purpose to give them way: and there over the very carkases of the Elephants, there was a cruell slaughter committed. But on the other side of the camp, the Campans and the garrison of the Carthaginians had the repulse already: and under the very gate of Capua which openeth upon the river Vulturnus, there was another skirmish, where the X Romans striving to enter the town, were not so much put back and withstood by force of armed men, as by brakes, scorpions, and other engins of ordnance, which being mounted and planted upon the very gate, discharged shot so violently, that they drave the enemies farther off. Over and besides, the forcible and furious assault of the Romans was danted and suppressed, by reason that their General himself, Ap. Claudius, was hurt; who as he was encouraging his men to fight in the very forefront of the vangard, happed to be wounded with a dart above in his brest under the left shoulder: yet there were an exceeding number of enemies there slain before the gate, and the rest were driven for fear to make haste and get the City over their heads. Annibal also perceiving the Cohort of the Spaniards lying along dead, and the camp of the enemies so manfully defended even to the death: gave over farther assault, and began to retire his ensigns, and to turn backward L all his footmen, interposing his horsemen behind them, for fear the enemy should charge them on the tail. The legions were exceeding eager to pursue after the enemies: but Flaccus commanded to sound the retreat, supposing they had done well enough already, and effected two things, to wit, that both the Campans saw in how little stead Annibal served them; and also Annibal himself knew and perceived no less. Some writers that have recorded this battell, set down, that of Annibal his Army there were slain that day eight thousand men, and of Campans three thousand: that the Carthaginians lost fifteen ensigns, and the Campans eighteen. But in others, I find that the conflict was not so great, and that the fright was much more than the skirmish: for when as the Numidians and Spaniards together with the Elephants brake at unawares into the Roman Camp, those Elephants as they passed through the midst thereof, overthrew and M laid along many of the tents and pavilions; and the Sumpter-horses and other beasts there for carriage, with great noise brake their halters, and collars, fled for fear, and bare down all afore them as they went. And that besides this tumultuous fright and confusion, Annibal dealt fraudulently, by sending in among the rest certain that could speak the Latine tongue (for some such he had about him) who in the Consuls name gave commandment (since that the Camp was lost) that every souldier should make shift for himself, and flie to the next mountains. But this deceit was soon espied and prevented with the loss and slaughter of a number of enemies: and the Elephants were coursed out of the Camp with fire. But howsoever this battell was either begun or ended, the last it was fought there, before that Capua was yielded up and surrendred. N

The singular valour of Navius.

The Mediastituticus (for so they call the head Magistrate and Governor of the City of Capua) for that year, was one Seppius Loesius, a man of base parentage and mean calling. The report goeth, that his mother upon a time as she made satisfaction in the name of him (being then fatherless and under age) by a purgatory sacrifice, for a prodigious domestical portent, that happed in her house, was told by the Soothsaier out of his learning, that one day the chief government of Capua should befall to that child: whereat, she seeing no likelihood nor hope at all of any such matter, said thus again, You talk of a poor City of Capua, when that day comes; and God save all, when my son shall be advanced to the highest place and government thereof. But these words spoken at random and in jest, proved afterwards good earnest, and true indeed. For when as the Citizens were driven to great straights, through sword and famine, and were past all hope of recovery: in O such sort, as they that were of quality and born for honour, refused to be in place of authority, this Loesius complaining that Capua was forlorn, betraid, and abandoned by her own nobility took upon him the chief Magistracy, and was the last of all the Campans that bare soveraign rule in that City.

Annibal perceiving that neither his enemies would be drawn forth any more to fight: nor possibly he could break through their camp for to come unto Capua: for fear lest that the new Consuls should stop all the passages, and intercept his purveyance of victuals, determined to dislodge without

A without effecting his purpose, and to remove from Capua. And as he cast and tossed to and fro in his mind what course to take, and whither to go; it came into his head to make no more ado, but to march directly to Rome, the very head and seat-City of the whole war. This was the upshot of all, and the empresse that he most desired. Howbeit as all others much grieved and greatly blamed him, that he had over-slipt the opportunity when it was, even presently upon the battell at Cannæ: so himself acknowledged no less that he was mightily overseen. And yet the thing was not so far past (he thought) that he should despair, but upon some sudden fright and unexpected tumult, he might seize of some quarter of the City or other. And if Rome were once in that hazard, then either both the Roman Generals, or one at the least, would immediatly leave the siege of Capua.
B Who if they had once divided their forces, both of them would be the weaker, and minister either unto him, or to the Campans, some occasion of good fortune. The only thing that troubled his mind was this, for fear lest that as soon as his back were turned, the Campans would yield themselves unto the Romans. He therefore with large and liberall rewards induceth a certain Numidian (an audacious and adventurous fellow, one that cared not what dangers he undertook) to be the carrier of certain letters, and to enter into the camp of the Romans, counterfeiting himself to be a fugitive, from the adverse part unto them: and so when he espied his time, to slip secretly from the other side of the camp to Capua. The letters were very comfortable, importing unto them, "That his remove and departure from thence was for their good and safety, whereby he C "meant to withdraw the Roman Captains and their forces from Capua to the defence of their "own City of Rome: willing them not to let fall their hearts and be discouraged; for by patient "abiding some few daies they should be wholly freed and delivered of the siege. Then he made stay of all the shipping and vessels that he could find upon the river Vulturnus, and commanded them to be brought to Casilinum, which he had fortified aforetime with a pile or Castle to guard and keep the place with a garrison. And having intelligence that there was such store of barges and bottoms upon the river, as would serve to transport in one night his whole army: he made provision of victuals for ten daies, brought down his army by night to the river side, and crossed the water with all his power before the next day-light. But this was not carried so secretly, but before that it was effected, intelligence was given thereof by certain runnegate fugitives: whereupon Fulvius Flaccus addressed his letters unto the Senate of Rome, and gave notice thereof. At D which tidings men according to their sundry fansies and humours were diversly affected: and as so fearfull an occurrence required, incontinently the Senate assembled.

P. Cornelius, surnamed Asina, was of opinion, that all the Captains and Armies whatsoever should be called home out of all parts of Italy, without regard of Capua or any other exploit besides, save only the defence of the City. Fabius Maximus thought it was a dishonest, lewd, and a shamefull part, to depart from the siege of Capua, and to be scared to turn here and there, and to be carried away with every copy of Annibal his countenance, and with his vain threats and menaces. He that won a victory at Canna, and durst not then go forward to the City, hath he conceived any hope now to win Rome, being also lately repulsed from Capua? No, he marcheth toward Rome, not minding to besiege it, but hoping to raise the siege from Capua. And howsoever it E be, I am assured (quoth he) that Jupiter (the witness of covenants broken by Annibal) and other gods besides, will defend us with the help of that army which we shall find at home in the City. Between these two opinions P. Valerius Flaccus held the mean, and prevailed: for he having a regard and due consideration, both of the one and the other; thought good to write unto the Colonels that lay before Capua, and to certifie them what strength they had of able men to defend the City: as for the forces of Annibal, and what power was needfull to maintain the siege at Capua, they themselves knew best. Therefore in case that one of the Pro-Consuls there, and part of the army might be spared from thence and sent to Rome, and nevertheless, the siege continue with the conduct of the other Pro-Consul, and the rest of the army: then Claudius and Fulvius should so order the matter between themselves, that the one of them might remain still be-
F fore Capua at siege, and the other repair to Rome, for to defend and keep their native country from the same danger. Hereupon the Senate agreed, and made an Act: which being brought unto Capua, Q. Fulvius the vice-Consul who was to go to Rome, by reason that his Collegue was sick of his hurt, chose out of the three armies certain companies of souldiers, and so with fifteen thousand footmen, and one thousand horsemen, passed over the river Vulturnus. Then having certain intelligence, that Annibal minded to march along the Latine street way: he took his journey through the towns and burroughs situate upon the way Appia, and sent his courriers before unto Setia, Sora, and Lavinium, which are seated near unto it, not only for to lay provision of victuals ready for G him in their Cities and towns, but also from the country villages farther out of the way, to bring their provision to that port through-fare: and to draw forces into their towns for their own defence, and every one to stand upon their good guard, and to look unto their state, as well publike as private.

Annibal the same day that he had crossed Vulturnus encamped not far from the river. And the morrow after entred into the territory of the Sidicins, and led his host near unto Cales. There, after he had staid one day, forraging and spoiling the country, he marched by Suessula, into the territories of Allifas and Casinum, by the way of the Latine street. Under the town Casinum he abode in camp two daies, and raised booties here and there in every place. From thence leaving Interramna and Aquinum, he came into the country about Fregellæ, as far as to the river Liris,

where he found the bridge cut down by the Fregellans for to impeach and let his journey. *Fulvi-*H us likewise was staid at the river Vulturnus, by reason that the barges and bottoms were burnt by Annibal: and much ado he had, for the great scarcity of timber and wood, to make punts and boats for to set over his army. But Fulvius, after he had once transported his men in such boats and planks as he made shift withall, had afterwards no hindrance in his journey; but found not only store of victuals in the Towns and Cities as he travelled, but also plenty thereof brought ready for him to the waies side right curteously. Then the souldiers as they marched on foot cheered and encouraged one another to mend their pace and make speed, considering they went to the defence of their naturall country. Now there was a post sent from Fregellæ, who rode night and day and never made stay, and he put the City in exceeding fear. The running together I besides of the people, that ceased not to make every thing more than it was, and to invent somewhat of their own fingers ends, and put it to the news that they heard, made a greater hurry than the messenger himself, and set the City in an uprore. And not only the women were heard to weep and wail in their own private houses: but also from all parts the Dames of the City came flocking into the streets, running about to all the Churches and Chappels of their gods and goddesses, sweeping the Altars with the tresses of their hair hanging down, kneeling upon the bare ground and stretching out their hands up toward heaven unto the gods; pouring out their prayers and supplications, That they would vouchsafe to preserve the City of Rome out of the hands of the enemies, and to save the Roman wives and their little children from harm and all abuse. The body of the Senat gave attendance upon the Magistrates in the common place, ready to give K them their advice and counsell. Some receive of them direction, and departed every man to execute his charge: others offer themselves to the Magistrates, to be employed in any service whatsoever. Sundry guards were bestowed in the Castle, in the Capitoll, and upon the walls: all places about the City were well manned. The Alban mountain also and the Castle of Tusculum were furnished with good garrisons. Amidst this alarm tidings came, that Q. Fulvius the Pro-Consul was departed from Capua, and onward on his journey to Rome with an army. And because he should not be abridged of his power and authority, after he was come into the City, there was a decree granted out of the Senat-House, that Q. Fulvius should have as large a commission of rule and command as the Consuls themselves. Annibal, after he had made fouler work and havock in the territory of Fregellæ, than in other places, for anger that they had cut down the bridges a- L gainst his coming, led his army through the Frusinat, Ferentinat, and Anagnine countries, and came forwards into the territory Lavicos: and so by Algidum he marched toward Tusculum. And when he could not be let in there within the walls, he descended beneath Tusculum, on the right hand to Gabii: from whence he conducted his army into Pupinia, and eight miles from Rome encamped. The nearer the enemy approached to the City, the greater slaughter was made of the peasants that fled from him, by his vancurriers, the Numidian light-horsemen whom he sent afore to make riddance. And many there were of all conditions and ages that were taken captive.

In this tumultuous trouble, Fulvius Flaccus with his army entred Rome at the gate Capena: from whence he went through the midst of the City, along the street Carinæ into the Exquilia, M and from thence he went forth, and between the gates Exquilina and Collina pitched his tents. Thither the Ædiles of the Commons brought victuals: the Consul and the Senate resorted to him into the camp, where they sate in Council about the State of the Common-weal. And agreed it was, That the Consuls should lie encamped likewise about the gates Collina and Exquilina: that C. Calpurnius, Prætor of the City, should have the keeping of the Capitoll and the Castle with a guard, and that the Senators keep residence continually in good number within the compass of the Forum, what need soever there should be of their counsell and advice, against all sudden accidents. By this time Annibal was come forward as far as to the river Anio, and within three miles of the City lay encamped where he kept a standing Leaguer. But himself in person with 1000 horsemen advanced forward toward the gate Collina, even as far as to Hercules his N Temple, and rode all about as near as he well could, to view the walls, and the situation of the City. Flaccus took foul disdain thereat, and thought it a shamefull indignity, that he should brave it at his pleasure so scornfully without revenge, whereupon he sent out certain of his own Cavalry, and gave commandment, That they should set the enemies horsemen farther off, and chase them back into their Camp. Whiles they were in skirmish together, the Consuls gave order, that the Numidian horsemen, such as were fled from the enemy, and turned to the Romans (who were at that time to the number of twelve hundred upon the Aventine hill) should pass through the midst of the City to the Exquilia: supposing that there were none more meet than they, for to fight among the valleys, the garden houses, the sepulchres and hollow waies on every side. Whom, when some from the Castle and the Capitoll, espied riding down the O descent of the hill, called Clivus Publius, they ran crying about the City, The Aventine is taken, The Aventine is taken. Which alarm caused a tumult, and gave such an occasion of fear, and running away, that if the Camp of Annibal had not been without the walls, the fearfull multitude doubtless would have abandoned and quit the City. But they took their horses, and got every man up to the terrasses and leads thereof: from whence they pelted with stones and other shot, their own friends instead of enemies, as they rode scattering one from another in the streets. This tumult could not be repressed, nor the error appear, by reason that the waies were so pestered with

A with a number of the country peasants, and of cattell besides, whom sudden fear had driven into the City. Howbeit, the horsemen fought fortunately, and the enemies were removed and set back. And because it was necessary to stay all disorders and uprores that chanced upon small occasions to arise, it was thought good and agreed upon, that all those who had been either Dictators, or born the office of Centors, should have their full power and authority until such time as the enemy was clean departed from about the walls. And that was to good purpose: for all the rest of that day, and the night following, there were divers and sundry garboiles, without any cause or occasion raised, and the same stilled and appeased by that means.

The next day Annibal passed over Anio, and brought forth all his whole power into the field. B Neither were Flaccus and the Consuls behind hand for their parts, but ready for battell. When both armies stood arranged in order on both sides, amused upon the issue and event of that one fight, which was for no less a prize and reward to the victorious part, than the very City of Rome; there fell such a mighty storm of rain and hail together, and so troubled both hosts, that they could scarce hold their weapons in hand, but were driven to retire themselves for safety into their severall Camps, fearing nothing less than their own enemies. The morrow after likewise, when they stood in the same place in battell array, the like tempest parted them asunder. And they were not so soon retired into their Camp, but the day was wonderful fair, and the weather calm again.

The Carthaginians took this for an ominous presage to them of ill luck. And Annibal was C heard (by report) to say, That one while his mind, another while his fortune, would not give him leave to win the City of Rome. There were other occurrences besides, as well small as great, that discouraged him and abated his hope. Of more importance was this, that whiles he lay with his host in arms before the walls of Rome, he understood, there were certain companies with banners displaied sent into Spain for to supply the armies there. Of less reckoning was this, that he was advertised by a certain captive, how the very same plot of ground whereon he was encamped, happened at the same time to be sold: not underfoot, but at the full price, and nothing abated. This he took to be so presumptuous a part, and such a scornfull indignity, namely, that there should be a chapman found at Rome, to make purchase of that piece of land, which he was possessed of and held in right of arms, that presently he called for the publike crier and trumpet, and gave com- D mandment unto him, to proclaim port-sale of all the shops of Bankers and money changers at that time about the Forum in Rome. Nevertheless, hereupon he was moved to dislodge and retired his camp backwards from the City to the river Iuria, six miles from Rome. From whence he took his way to the grove of Feronia, where stood a Temple, in those daies much renowned for wealth and riches. The inhabitants thereabout were certain Capenats, who used to bring thither the first fruits of their corn and revenues yea and many other oblations besides, according to their store: by means whereof they had adorned and garnished it with much gold and silver. Of all those gifts and offerings was this Temple then robbed and spoiled. But after the departure of Annibal from thence there were found great heaps of brass, by reason that the souldiers upon touch and remorse of conscience had cast in many brazen pieces. The sacking and pillage of this Temple, E all writers do agree upon, and make no doubt thereof. Cœlius saith, That Annibal as he went toward Rome from Eretum, turned thither, and he setteth down the beginning of his journey from Reate Cutil æ and from Amiternum. And that out of Campania, he came into Samnium, and from thence into the country of Peligni, and so passed beside the City Sulmo, to the Marucins, and then by the territory of the Albenses into the Marsians land, and from thence he marched to Amiternum, and so forward to the town Foruli. Neither is there any errour or doubt in all this, because the marks and tokens of the voyage of so great an army could not within the memory and compass of so small an age be confounded and worn out. For certain it is, that he passed that way. The only difference lieth herein, whether he came to the City of Rome, or returned from thence into Campania, by that way aforesaid.

F Now was not Annibal to resolute to defend Capua, but the Romans were as fully bent, and more eager to continue the siege and assault thereof. For he sped himself so fast another way in his voyage back, first out of the Lucans country to the Brutians, and so on still to the streight [ of Sicily] and to Rhegium; that with his sudden coming thither, he surprised them at unawares, even before they heard of his arrivall. As for Capua, albeit in the time of Fulvius his absence it was no less straightly beleagured, yet it felt the coming again of Flaccus: and besides, there was much marvell there, why Annibal returned not back as well as he. Afterwards, they understood, by conference with some that were without, how they were forsaken and forlorn of Annibal, and that the Carthaginians were past all hope to keep and hold Capua still to their own use. There was an Edict moreover of the Pro-Consul, passed by order from the Senat, and the same published and divulged among the enemies, That what Citizen soever of Capua would turn to the G Romans before such a certain day he should have a generall pardon. But there was no coming in, nor ranging to the Romans side; for fear of punishment at the Romans hands, more than for any regard of their allegiance to the Carthaginians: because their transgression and trespass in their former revolt was so great, that it might not be abandoned. And as no one man at all privatly on his own head came over to the camp of the Romans, so there was no good order taken by publike councill for the benefit and safety of the whole City. The Noblemen had given over managing of state-matters, and could not be brought by any means to assemble in the Senat.

And

And in chief place of government was he, who had not won to himself any honour thereby, but H his unworthiness was derogatory to the authority and power of that Magistracy which he bare. For now there was not one of the chief Citizens and Noblemen that would be so much as seen in the Market place or Common Hall of assemblies: but shutting themselves within doors in their privat houses, they expected every day for the destruction of their country, together with their own undoing and overthrow. The whole charge and care lay upon Bostar and Hanno Captains of the garrison in the fort there of the Carthaginians, and more carefull were they of their own welfare, than fearfull for the jeopardy of their friends and Allies. These two wrote letters unto Annibal, endited not only in plain terms and frankly, but also sharply and bitterly: wherein they laid unto his charge, "That he had not only betraied Capua into the hands of the enemies, but also I "delivered and exposed them and the garrison to the cruell clutches of the Romans to be massa-"cred and executed. That he was gone his waies, and departed into the country of the Bruttij, as "one that turned away his face of purpose, because he would not see with his own eyes the loss "of Capua. But, I wot the Romans contrariwise could not be withdrawn from the siege of Ca-"pua, no, not by the assaulting of the City of Rome: so much more were the Romans resolute "enemies, than the Carthaginians constant friends. But if he would return again to Capua, and "bend the full force of his war thither, both they and the Citizens also of Capua would be ready "to sally forth and encounter the enemies. For why, they passed not over the Alps with intent to "war with the Rhegins and Tarentins; no, but where the Roman Legions were, there ought the "armies of the Carthaginians to be. Thus at Canna, thus at Thrasymenus were the victories at- I "chieved, by affronting and meeting the enemy, by joyning camp to camp, and by hazarding the "fortune of the battell. To this effect were the letters penned, and given to certain Numidians; who for a good reward had offered their service before, for the safe carriage and delivery of them. These fellows presented themselves before Flaccus in the Camp, in habit and quality of fugitives unto his side: hoping to spy out some convenient time when they might give him the slip and be gone. Now by occasion of the famine which had continued long in Capua, there was none but might pretend a good and reasonable cause to depart from thence to the adverse part. But behold, there hapned a Capuan wench to come into the leaguer (a naughty-pack and an harlot, that one of the supposed counterfeit fugitives aforesaid kept,) she enformed the Generall of the Romans, that those Numidians, fraudulently and by covin pretended to flie unto his part and had L letters about them unto Annibal. This would she stand to, and be ready to aver to the very face of one of them, who bewrayed & disclosed the plot unto her. At first, when he was brought forth before her, he set a jolly countenance of the matter, & made it very strange, & pretending stoutly that he knew not the woman; but by little and little he was convicted by manifest truths, and especially when he saw that they called for the rack, and that he was upon the point to be put to torture: and so in the end confessed that all was true, and therewith brought forth the letters. Over and besides, another thing was now revealed, which before was kept close and secret: to wit, that there were other Numidians besides, who under the colour of fugitives had gone up and down in the Roman camp: of these there were apprehended not so few as threescore and ten, and they together with the new were whipped with rods, had their hands cut off, and sent back again to M Capua. This pitious spectacle and sight of so fearfull execution killed their courage, and brake the very heart of the Campans. Whereupon the people ran together unto the Council-House, and compelled Lesius to assemble a Senat, and openly threatned the Nobles (who a long time had absented themselves from publike consultations) that unless they would now repair into the Senat, they would go home to their very houses, and pluck them out by the ears into the street. For fear hereof the chief Magistrate had a frequent and full assembly of Senators. Whiles all the rest were of opinion to send Embassadors to the Roman Generals, Vibius Virius (who had been the chief cause and principall author of their first revolt from the Romans) being demanded his advice, spake to the point in this manner.

"They that talk of Embassadors of peace, and of yielding, little consider and remember either N "what they would have done, in case the Romans had been at their devotion and mercy, or what "themselves must endure and suffer. For what think ye will become (quoth he) of this present sur-"render of ours, in comparison of that whereby in times past we freely gave unto the Romans "our selves, and all that we had, for to obtain their aid and succour against the Samnits? And "have we so soon forgot, at what time, and in what condition and state we were when we for-"sook and abandoned the people of Rome? Also, after our revolt, how we most cruelly and "shamefully killed their garrison, who we might have dismissed and sent away with their lives? "Moreover, how often we have issued forth against them lying at siege, and how mischievously "minded we were unto them, yea, and how we have sallied upon them in their camp? Over and "besides, call ye not to remembrance, how we called for Annibal to surprise and defeat them? O "and (that which of all other is most fresh in memory) how we sent him from hence to give the "assault to Rome? On the contrary side mark well and call to mind, how maliciously they have "attempted and practised all hostility against us: by which ye may well know what account to "make of them, and what ye are to trust unto. For when they had a stranger and forrain enemy "within Italy, nay, when they had Annibal their enemy: when the wars were so hot, that all "was on a light fire: they passed by all other affairs, yea they let Annibal himself alone, and sent "both their Consuls with two compleat Consular armies to besiege and force Capua. This is the "second

A "second year that they keep us entrenched round about, penning us up, and pining us with ex-
"treame famine and hunger: during which time, they themselves as well as we, have endured the "utmost extremities and dangers that are, and sustained most grievous and infinite travels: of"tentimes being killed and cut in pieces about their rampiers, trenches, and ditches, and finally "driven almost out of their Camp and hold. But to let pass and speak no more of these ordinary "matters, seeing it is an old and usuall case for them to abide painfull toil, and incur many pe"rils, who besiege and assault any Cities or towns of their enemies: See a manifest sign of their "deadly feud, and execrable hatred against us. Annibal with a puissant power of foot and horse"men both, assailed their Camp, yea, and in some part was Master of it. Think ye that in so great "danger of theirs they were one jot withdrawn from the siege? He passed over the river Vul-
B "turnus, and burnt the territory of Cales: yet for all that calamity and loss, which their allies re"ceived, stirred not they one whit, nor gave over their enterprise. He commanded to march for"ward with banner displayed against the very City of Rome: they made as little account of that "dangerous tempest toward, as of all the rest. After he had passed over the river Anio, he pitched "his tents within three miles of the City: nay, he approached at length the walls, and made a bra-
"vado even under the gates: to be short, he presented unto their eye his resolution, and menaced
"to make Rome too hot for them unless they levied the siege before Capua: and yet they gave not "over but beleaguered us still. The very wild and savage beasts be they never so fell, be they mad-
"ded never so much with blind rage and woodness against one, yet if another go to their dens,
"and offer to take away their whelps, they will turn again to succour and help their young ones: C "but the Romans, notwithstanding Rome was besieged, their wives and children in danger; whose
"pitious cries and lamentable plaints were heard almost even hither; notwithstanding their al"tars, their sacred fires, the temples of their gods, the monuments and sepulchers of their Ance"stors, were profaned, abused, and polluted, could not be drawn away from Capua. So eager, so "hungry are they to be revenged of us, so thirsty are they to drink our bloud. And good rea"son, haply, they have so to do. For would not we also have done the semblable, if fortune had "given us the opportunity? But seeing the will of the immortall gods is otherwise: and conside"ring that I owe nature a death; in my power it is (whiles I am at liberty, whiles I am mine own
"man, and master of myself) to avoid torments, to shun shamefull ignominies and reproaches
"(whereof the enemy hopeth I shall feel the smart) and that by one kind of death, which as it is D "honest, so it is also easie and gentle? Never will I endure to see Ap. Claudius and Q. Fulvius
"proudly and insolently bearing themselves upon their conquest over us: never will I be led and "haled bound with chains through the City of Rome, to make a shew, and to serve for a spectacle
"and gazing stock in their Triumph: and afterwards either in dark prison, or tied openly to a "stake, yield my back and side to be rewed, whipped, and mangled: and then lay my neck upon
"the block, to have my head chopt off with the bloudy axe of the Romans. Never wil I behold
"my native country sacked, spoiled, and put to fire and sword, nor the chast married dames of Ca-
"pua to be forcibly ravished, the fair and beautiful maidens shamefully defloured, and the well-fa"voured young boies and freeborn, unnaturally abused. They raised Alba in times past from the "top to the very foundation, and left neither stick nor stone thereof; Alba I say, from whence they E "had their off-spring, and were first descended: to the end that there might remain no memory at "all of their stock and first originall. And shall I ever beleeve they will spare Capua, & receive into "mercy, against which they are more hatefully and mortally bent than against Carthage? There"fore, my masters and friends, as many of you as are minded and resolved to die before ye see
"these so many miseries and wofull calamities, I have at home a supper this night well furnished
"and provided for you all: and when ye have eat meat your fill, and drunk wine to it liberally,
"the same wassell cup that first will be presented unto me, shall go round about to you all: and "that one draught shall deliver your bodies from torments, preserve your spirits from anguish
"and contumelious disgrace; keep your eyes from beholding all cruell acts, your ears from hearing
"all shamefull indignities which follow and attend upon conquered persons. There shall be also F "in readiness certain servitors of purpose to make a mighty great fire within the base court-yard "of mine house, and to cast our dead bodies thereinto. This is the only honest way to death, and "beseeming us who are free born and gentlemen indeed. In which doing, our enemies will won"der at our vertue and valour: yea, and Annibal himself shall well know that he hath forsaken "and betraied his trust and magnanimous allies.

This Oration of Virius, there were more men present that heard with applause and good li-king than could find in their hearts to put that in execution which they so well allowed & appro-ved. The greater part of the Senat, not despairing, but that the clemency of the people of Rome, which had been tried and seen oftentimes in many wars, might be gained and extended also unto them; concluded, to send Embassadors with commission to yield Capua into the Romans
G hands. Some seven and twenty Senators there were that accompanied Vibius Virius home to his house, and supped with him: and after they had done what they could to drink themselves drunk, and to intoxicate their brains with freely taking in their wine, (thereby to withdraw their minds from the sence and apprehension of their imminent harm and misery) drunk all of the poysoned cup abovesaid. This done, and the banquet ended, they rose from the table, took one another by the hand embraced each other, taking their last leave, bidding a finall adieu and fare-well, and bewailing together with plenteous tears their own misfortune, and the miserable state of their country; some staid behind to be burned in one and the same fire for fellowship, others brake company and departed to their own houses. Now, by reason that their veins were filled with full feeding and drinking wine so liberally, the poyson was not so quick of operation, nor so effectuall as to hasten their death. And therefore most of them languished all night long, yea, and continued drawing on a piece of the next day, before they let their last breath: but yet they all had yielded up their ghost before that the gates were set open for the enemies.

Capua delivered to the Romans.

The day following, the gate of Jupiter which stood next over against the Roman Camp, was by the commandment of the Pro-consul opened. Thereat entred one legion and two corners of horsemen, under the leading of C. Fulvius the Lieutenant: who after he had first above all other things given expres order, that all armor of defence, and weapons of offence (which was to be found in Capua) should be brought forth and presented unto him; placed and disposed at all the gates, warders sufficient to see that no person might possibly go forth, or be let out: then he laid hold upon the garrison of the Carthaginians, and commanded the Senators of Capua to repair into the Camp, before the Roman Captain Generals themselves. So soon as they were thither come straightwaies they had irons clapped upon them, and were commanded to make tender unto the treasurers of all the gold and silver they had. The gold amounted to 70 pound weight: the silver rose to the weight of three thousand and two hundred pound. Five and twenty of the Senators were sent to Cales, eight and twenty to Theanum, to be kept safe in ward. Even those who were known for certain to have principally moved and perswaded the revolt from the Romans. Concerning the punishment of the Senators of Capua, Fulvius and Claudius could not agree. Claudius was more tractable and exorable, and might have been soon entreated for a pardon. Fulvius was more rigorous, and proceeded to a harder course. Whereupon Appius put over the whole deciding and determination thereof unto the Senate of Rome. Alledging, that it was meet and requisite, that the LL. of the Councill should have the examination of the cause, and namely, upon these points. Imprimis, whether they had complotted and combined in this action, with any of the free burroughs and Cities belonging to the state of the Latines. Item, whether they had any help and relief from thence in the time of the war, or from any other towns whatsoever? But Fulvius in no case would condescend thereto, nor suffer that the minds of faithfull and loyall allies should be disquieted with doubtfull surmises and suspitions of any crimes; and called in question upon the appeachment and delatory information of those that never yet made reckoning or conscience, either what they did, or what they said. And therefore he protested to suppress that manner of proceeding, and crush that inquisition for ever. After this communication they departed asunder: and Appius made no doubt but that howsoever his Collegue fared and took on, giving out so shrewd and bitter words, he would yet take pause and stay for the letters from Rome, concerning so weighty a business as this was. But Fulvius, because of his designment, brake up his keeping of state in his royall pavilion, and sent his officers and ordinary train out of the way, because he would not be hindred and empeached by them, in the course of his designment: and commanded the Colonels and Captains of the Allies, to give warning unto two thousand chosen men of arms, for to be in readiness and present themselves at a third sound of the trumpet. With this power of horsemen he set forward by night, and marched to Theanum: and by break of day entred the gate and kept his way on into the market-place. At the first entrance of the horsemen, the people ran together from all parts: then he caused the chief Magistrate (a Sidicin) to be called, and charged him to produce his prisoners the Capuans, whom he had in custody. When they were all brought forth, they were first whipped with rods, and then beheaded. From thence he rode upon the spur to Cales: where so soon as he was set on the Tribunall seat, in place of judgement, and the Capuan prisoners likewise presented in place and bound to the stake; there came a horseman in post from Rome, and when he had delivered letters from C. Calphurnius the Consul, and the people of Rome unto Fulvius; there ran a rumour from the Tribunal through all the assembly, that the whole process against the Campans was to be put off and reserved entire to the censure and doom of the Lords of the Senate. And Fulvius supposing it to be no less indeed after he took the letters, never brake them up, but bestowed them in his bosome, and gave commandment to the Crier, to charge the Lictor or executioner to do his office, according to law. Thus they also that were at Cales were executed and suffered death. Then he read the letters, and the order set down by the Senate: but it was too late now, to stay that which was done already and past and which indeed was hastened with all speed that might be, for fear it might have been crossed and prevented.

The Senators of Capua executed.

Now as Fulvius was arising from the bench, Taurea Jubellius, a Campan, passing amidst the throng, called by name aloud upon Fulvius. Whereat Flaccus wondring what the man meant, sat him down again upon his seat, and demanded what he would: Mary (quoth he) command me also to be killed that thou maiest boast and glory another day, that thou hast done to death a better man by far and much more valiant than thy self. Surely (quoth Flaccus) this fellow is lunatick and not well in his wits: and again, were I minded to take his life from him, I am inhibited by vertue of the act of the Senate. "Then (quoth Jubellius) since that my country is forced and lost, "my kinsfolk and friends made away: seeing also that I have with mine own hand murdred my "wife and children, because they should suffer no vilanous indignity; and may not my self so "much as die this death which my countrimen here have suffered before my face, I will seek by "vertue and manhood to ease my self of this life, so tedious, so irksome, and odious unto me: and with

A with that, he drew forth the skein which he had hid under his garment, and ſtabbed himſelf in the breſt quite through his body, and there at the feet of the L. General fell down ready to dye in the place. Foraſmuch as both the execution of the Campans, and alſo the moſt part of other matters were performed according to the will of Flaccus alone: ſome there be that write how Appius Claudius died about the time that Capua was yielded. And that this very ſame Taurea neither came to Cales of his own accord, nor killed himſelf: but that as he was a binding to the ſtake, becauſe the words which he uttered could not be heard for the confuſed noiſe of the people, therefore Flaccus commanded ſilence, and then Taurea ſpake thoſe words before rehearſed, namely, That himſelf a right valiant and hardy man was put to death by a meaner perſon than himſelf, and much inferior to him in valour and vertue. Whereat by the commandment of the Pro-Con- Jubellius killeth himſelf.

B ſul the crier pronounced and ſaid: Go to Serjeant, let this brave and valiant man have the more ſtore of rods beſtowed upon him, let him have good ſcourging, lay on load, and ſet the laſhes ſurely on, and let him be the firſt that you proceed againſt, let him have the law to the full. Some there be that have written, how the act of the Senat was read before he proceeded to the beheading: but becauſe there was this branch or clauſe within the act, That if he thought ſo good, he ſhould reſerve the whole deciding of the matter unto the Senat: he conſtrued it thus, that it was put to his diſcretion for to weigh and conſider what was moreprofitable to the Common-weal. This done, he returned from Cales to Capua. Atella and Calatia were both ſurrendred into his hands; where they alſo who were the chief heads of thoſe ſtates ſuffered the like puniſhment. Thus there were about fourſcore of the Senators put to death: and to the number well-near of three hundred

C Capuans (born of noble blood) committed to priſon. Others of them were beſtowed in ſafe cuſtody within divers Cities of the Latines, and came to ſundry unhappy ends. The multitude beſides of the Campan Citizens were ſold outright.

It remained now to put to queſtion and debate, what was to be done with the City and the Territory thereto belonging. And ſome were of mind, that a City ſo exceeding mighty, ſo near a neighbour, and ſo dangerous to Rome, ſhould be utterly raſed and deſtroyed. But the conſideration of a preſent commodity and gain took place and prevailed. For in regard of the territory and land lying about it (which was well known to be the moſt fertile ſoil in all Italy, and yielded all manner of fruit) the City was ſaved: whereinto thoſe husbandmen that tilled the grounds might retire themſelves and dwell. And for the peopling and inhabiting thereof, there was a multitude

D reſerved of the Inhabitants which were there already, namely of Libertines and enfranchiſed bondſlaves, Merchants factors, retailers, artizans, and craftſmen who kept there ſtill and remained. But the whole territory, and all publike edifices were ſeized to the uſe of the people of Rome. Moreover, order was taken, that Capua ſhould be inhabited only, and repleniſhed with people like a City: but no form of Common-weal, no Corporation, no Senat, no aſſembly of Commons, nor Magiſtrate of their own ſhould be allowed there. For without a common Council of State, without magiſtracy and government, without intelligences and reciprocall commerce, as in the body of a Commonalty, they ſuppoſed, that they would never agree together in any complot, but be far unmeet to contrive a conſpiracy and compaſs alteration. As for a Provoſt or Governor to miniſter law, and execute juſtice among them, they purpoſed to ſend them one yearly from Rome.

E Thus were the affairs ordered and compoſed at Capua, by a good policy and commendable courſe every way. For thoſe that were moſt in fault and guilty were puniſhed with rigour and that ſpeedily. The number of Citizens were ſcattered and diſperſed ſundry waies, without all hope to return again. The bare houſes and walls that had not offended they were ſpared, and neither burned nor pulled down. And beſides, the commodity and gain that accrewed unto the Romans by this manner of proceeding, they won ſome name of clemency and mercy among their Confederates and Allies: in that they ſaved a moſt noble and wealthy City, at the ruins whereof all Campane, and as many States as bordered about Campane, would have grieved much, and groaned again. By this means alſo the enemy was conſtrained now to confeſs, and could not otherwiſe chuſe, how powerful and mighty the Romans were to chaſtiſe and puniſh their faithleſs aſſociats,

F yea, and how feeble Annibal was, and not able to defend and maintain thoſe whom he had received into his protection.

The Roman Pro-Conſuls after they had finiſhed and performed their charge at Capua aſſigned unto Claudius Nero ſix thouſand footmen out of thoſe two Legions which he had before Capua, and three hundred horſemen which he had choſen himſelf: alſo of Latine Allies as many foot in number, and 800 horſe beſides. This army Nero embarked at Puteoli, and tranſported into Spain. When he was arrived at Taracon, after he had there landed his ſouldiers, and laid up his ſhips in dock, and armed with all his mariners (to make the greater number) he marched to the river Iberus, where he received the forces of T. Fonteius, and L. Martius, and from thence advanced toward the enemies.

G Aſdrubal the ſon of Amilcar lay encamped at a place called the Black-ſtones, in the Auſetans country: it lieth between the towns Illiturgis and Mentiſſa. Now Nero kept the narrow ſtreights of the forreſt there. Aſdrubal, becauſe he would not be pent up in ſo ſtreight a room, ſent an herald or meſſenger of peace to him, who ſhould make promiſe in his name, that if Nero would permit him to paſs peaceably from thence, he would withdraw all his forces out of Spain. The Roman Captain took this meſſage joyfully: and Aſdrubal requeſted, That they might emparl the next day, and deviſe together how the Romans would ſet down conditions and articles in writing, ting, as touching the rendry and delivery of the fortresses in every City, and likewise of prefix- H ing some day, by which time the garrisons should be removed and displaced, and the Carthaginians have away all their bag and baggage without fraud and covin. Asdrubal having obtained his request, presently commanded, that in the very evening, and all night long the heaviest and most cumbersome part of his whole army should escape what way soever they could out of the gullet of the forrest. But he gave especiall direction, that they should not over many of them that night go forth, because their small number was not only fitter to deceive the enemy, and not so soon to be discovered, but also might more easily pass through those narrow and difficult passages. So the morrow they came to an enterview and parl: where the time was spent of purpose in much needless talk, and drawing of books, more than cause was: whereupon the day being far gone, the business was put off unto the next day. And the night ensuing between, mi- I nistred Asdrubal more time to send others away. And yet could not they make an end that day neither. Thus there passed certain daies, employed in open shew about dispute and reasoning of the articles and conditions of agreement, and the nights were bestowed in letting out the Carthaginians closely out of their Camp. Now, after that the greater part of his host was gone away clear, then he began to wrangle and jar, yea, and to go from some offers that he had voluntarily made, and ever they were further and further off from agreement. For Asdrubal the less that he feared, the less also was to be trusted. And by this time in manner all his Infantry were got out of the forrest, and the next morning, not only the forrest, but all the plains about were overcast, and covered with a thick and foggy mist. Which Asdrubal perceiving, he sent a messenger to Nero, requesting to defer their farther conference and communication to the K morrow; pretending, that the present day was a festivall holy-day among the Carthaginians, and therefore they made scruple upon it to follow any other business but serve God. All this while there was no fraud so much as once suspected. Asdrubal had no sooner obtained respite for that day, but forthwith he and all his Cavalry, together with his Elephants, dislodged, and without any noise or stir recovered without any harm a place of security. By the fourth hour of the day the sun had dispatched and scattered the mist, and cleared the sky, and then the Romans might discover the Camp of their enemies empty, and no creature left therein. Then at length, Claudius perceiving that Asdrubal had shewed him a Carthaginian trick, and that he was at length thus over-raught by his falshood and cunning practice, began to make out after him, minding to bid him battell. But the enemy would none of that, and fell off. Howbeit there passed some L small skirmishes between the rereward of the Carthaginians, and the forlorn hope and van-courriers of the Romans. Amidst these affairs (the States of Spain) neither they who revolted after the overthrow of the Romans returned again unto them; nor any new fell away, more than before.

At Rome, the Senate and people after the recovery of Capua, took as great care for Spain now, as for Italy it self. And agreed they were in generall, that the army there should be strengthned with new forces and a Generall thither sent: but who should be the man was not yet concluded.
Forasmuch as they were to take some extraordinary care in the chusing of one to be sent thither, where two singular and renowned warriors were slain within the compass of thirty daies, and to succeed in the room of those twain. Whiles some nominated one, and some another, at length M they grew to this point, that the people should hold a solemn assembly (as it were, purchased) for election of a Pro-Consul to go over into Spain. And the Consuls accordingly proclaimed a set day for the said assembly. At first there was great expectation that those persons who took themselves worthy of so great command should put forth themselves, and prefer their own names beforehand. But when this expectation failed and came to nothing, every man began afresh to rerricate and renew the former grief, and mourn again for the losses received, and to find the want and miss of so valorous Captains whom they had lost. Whereupon the whole City being sad and pensive, and in manner destitute of all good counsell, and not resolved what to do in this hard case, came yet down into Mars field upon the day appointed for the election. Every mans eye was upon the Magistrates, and beheld the countenances of their great men and Ru- N lers, how they looked one upon another, grieving and grumbling, that the State was at so low an ebb, and the Common-weal grown to so desperate a case, that no man durst be seen to take upon him the government and Province of Spain. Then all of a sudden, P. Cornelius (his son that was slain in Spain, a young Gentleman, not fully four and twenty years old) shewed himself, and said, That he would undertake that charge upon him: and therewith stepped up into an higher place, from whence he might be seen and there he stood. Upon whom, when all men had cast their eyes, and viewed him well, in a generall accord and favourable affection unto the man, they wished unto him straightwaies a happy and fortunate government. And when the assembly was willed to give their suffrages, and go to a scrutiny, there was not one Century from the first to the last, nor one person from the highest to the lowest, but gave their voice with P. Scipio, for to take a voyage as L. Deputy into Spain. But after the thing was passed, and their passionate heat of affection once allaied, they were on a sudden driven into a still silence and deep dump, to think what a strange and new deed they had done. And that which they bethought themselves most of, was this, that favour had carried them away in this action more than the due consideration and regard of his age. Some there were that had in dread and horror the ominous fortune also of that family; and the name of him that out of two mournfull houses was to

A go into those Provinces where he must fight amongst the Sepulchres both of father and uncle. When Scipio perceived, that presently upon the election passed in so hasty a fit, the people grew to be heavy and pensive; he called them to an open audience, and there before them all discoursed of his young age, of the government committed unto him, and of the future war that he was to manage: and that with so noble courage and hauty spirit, that he renewed afresh and kindled again the former zeal and heat that was so cooled: and possessed mens minds with more assured hope than usually mans faithfull promise, or reason grounded upon the confidence of precedents past, or any earthly thing is wont to afford and warrant. For Scipio was a rare and wonderfull man, not only in regard of those true vertues inherent in him: but also for that he had framed B himself even from his young and tender years, by artificiall means, to the better setting out of those inbred parts and qualities of his own: making shew and semblant before the multitude, that the most things which he did, were either represented unto him by night-visions and apparitions, or else suggested, as it were, by revelation from the gods above; were it that he was superstitiously given, and his mind wholly possessed therewith, or that by his policy he might effect his designments, and have his commandments performed with more expedition, as if they were directions delivered from the Oracles and the very mouth of the gods. Over and besides that, he made this overture to credit and reputation, and prepared mens minds in this sort from his very first beginning. From the very time that he once put on his mans gown, there was no day went over his head, but before he began his own private business, or enterprised any publike affairs, he C would go into the Capitoll: and so soon as he was entred into the Temple, there sit him down, and alone by himself bestow a good time in some secret Ile and corner thereof. This ordinary manner of his, which he continued all his life long, (were it of purpose considerately, or by chance unadvisedly) made divers men beleeve verily, that it was a truth indeed, which was commonly supposed and reported, That the man had a god to his father. Which deep and setled imagination of the people, resembled and renewed again the like fame (in all the world) to that which went before and was bruited abroad of Alexander the great, and for the vanity and fabulous speech of folk, was the very same and all one in every respect: namely, that his mother conceived him by a mighty great serpent: for that very often in her bed-chamber there was seen some such prodigious and wonderfull thing, and ever as any body came in, it would wind away of a sudden, and va- D nish out of sight. These strange and miraculous conceits he would never himself elevate and discredit as toies and vanities, but rather cherish and encrease the opinion thereof, by a certain cunning cast of his own, in that he would neither deny and disavow any such matter, nor yet affirm plainly and verifie the same. Many other devices he had of like sort, partly true indeed, partly feigned and counterfeit, which caused men beyond all measure to have this young man in wonderfull admiration. Upon the strong and grounded presumption whereof, the City at that time conferred upon him (far unmeet, I wot, in regard of his unripe years) so great a government, and a world withall of weighty and important affairs.

Besides, the forces which remained in Spain of the old army, and those which were transported over from Puteoli with Claudius Nero, he had a supplement also of ten thousand foot, and one E thousand horsemen: and to assist in the conduct of his wars, he had as coadjutor appointed unto him M. Junius Syllanus the Pro-Prætor. Thus with a fleet of thirty ships, (and Galleys there were all of five banks of oars) he took the seas, and set sail from the mouth of Tybre, and coasting along the Tuscan seas under the Alps, and through the gulph of Gallia, he doubled at length the point and cape of Pyrene, and disbarked at Emporia a City of Greeks: (for descended they are also from Phocæa) and there he set his people a land. From thence, having taken order that his ships should follow after, he marched by land to Taracon, which he appointed for the Rendezvouz, where all his allies and confederats (for at the wonder and fame of his landing, there flocked Embassadors unto him from all parts of the Province) should meet together at a generall Diet. There he commanded that the ships should be bestowed in their docks, save only three Galleys F (of three ranks) which came from Massiles, and upon curtesie and kindnes accompanied him from home, and those were sent back again. Then he gave audience to the Embassadors, who hung in doubtfull suspence by reason of the variety and of sundry changes and chances that lately had happned, and to them he began to return answer, and give them their severall dispatches: but with such a spirit and boldnes (upon confidence that he had in his own rare vertues) that he let not fall in all his speech one word that might move quarrell, and savoured of rigour, and yet whatsoever he spake, it carried an exceeding majesty with it, and a singular credit. Being departed from Taracon, he visited both the States of the Allies, and also the standing wintring camps of the army: where he highly commended the souldiers, for that notwithstanding they had received two shrewd blows, upon two so great defeats one in the neck of another, yet they held the Province G still, and kept the field; and not suffering the enemies to reap and taste the fruit of their fortunate victories, and kept them out of all the countries lying within Iberus, and defended faithfully all their confederats according to the trust reposed in them. Martius he had in his train alwaies about him; whom he so highly honoured, that it was very well seen, he feared nothing less than that any other man should eclipse or shadow his glory. Then Syllanus succeeded in place of Nero, and the new souldiers were brought into the standing winter leaguers, and Scipio having reviewed all the Cities and the States that he was to survey, and performed all other affairs that were then to be done, retired and withdrew himself to Tarason.

The fame of Scipio was no leſs bruited among the enemies, than it was rife with his own Ci- H tizens and loving allies: and a certain preſage went withall of the future event, which carried (as good hap was) the greater fear and dread with it, as there was leſs reaſon that could be rendred and given thereof. They had betaken themſelves into their wintring harbours far diſtant and remote aſunder. Aſdrubal the ſon of Giſgo even as far as to the Ocean ſea ſide unto Gades: Mago into the midland parts, and eſpecially above the foreſt and chaſe of Caſtulo. And Aſdrubal the ſon of Amilcar wintred neareſt unto Iberus about Saguntum.

In the very end of that ſummer, when Capua was won, and Scipio come into Spain, the Carthaginian Armado which was ſent for out of Sicily to Tarentum, for to intercept the victuals, and empeach the ſame for coming to the Roman garriſon that held the Caſtle of Tarentum, had verily ſtopped all the paſſages from the ſea to the ſaid Caſtle: but by their long abode in thoſe parts, I and keeping the ſeas ſo ſtraightly, they had cauſed a greater dearth and ſcarcity of victuals among their own friends than their enemies: for there could not by the help of thoſe Carthaginian ſhips ſo much corn be along the river that was poſſeſſed by friends, nor from the open ports, for to furniſh the townſmen of Tarentum, as the navy it ſelf conſumed and ſpent in maintenance of that rabble of ſea-men, ſailers, and mariners, mingled of all ſorts of people. So as the garriſon of the Caſtle being but few in number there was able to be ſuſtained by the proviſion they had aforehand, without the help of any new brought in unto them: whereas the Tarentins and the Navy could not have ſufficient conveighed unto them: by reaſon whereof, at length the Armado had leave to depart thence with more thanks of the City, than they had for their firſt bien-venu thither. And yet victuals were not much cheaper, becauſe when the help by ſea was gone, there could K no corn at all be brought from other parts abroad.

At the end of the very ſame ſummer, when M. Marcellus was come to the City out of Sicily, his own Province, C. Calphurnius the Prætor aſſembled the Senat for his ſake in the Temple of Bel-lona. Where, after he had diſcourſed of the acts by him atchieved, and complained after a mild and modeſt ſort, laying open his griefs, not ſo much in the behalf of himſelf, as of his ſouldiers:
in that when he had performed and accompliſhed his charge and commiſſion in his Province, he cou'd not have licence to bring home his army with; he demanded that he might be allowed to ride in triumph into the City: but he could not obtain it. This matter was much canvaſſed and debated, pro & contra, Whether it were leſs meet and convenient, to deny him triumph being now preſent, in whoſe name whiles he was abſent, for the fortunat ſucceſs and good ſpeed of all af- L fairs under his conduct and government, there was a ſolemn proceſſion decreed, and ſacrifices done to the honour of the immortall gods: or to grant him triumph (as if the war were fully finiſhed) whom the Senate had commanded to make over his army to his ſucceſſor; which ſurely they would never have decreed, but that the war remained ſtill within the Province: and eſpecially ſeeing the army it ſelf was away, the beſt witneſs ſimply, whether he had deſerved a triumph or no. At length, a middle and indifferent courſe between both was agreed upon, namely, that he ſhould enter the City ovant in a petty triumph. And the Tribunes of the Commons, by the approbation firſt of the Senate, propoſed unto the people, that M. Marcellus ſhould the ſame day that he came ovant into the City retain ſtill his full authority and government. The day before he entred the City, he rode in triumph upon the mount Albanus, and from thence, in ovant wiſe he M ſent a rich booty before him into the City. There was carried in this pomp the counterfeit of the Marcellus triumpheth. City Syracuſe won, crosbows, brakes, ſtanding ſlings, and all other warlike inſtrument: beſides, the ornaments teſtifying long and continuall peace, and the great wealth and treaſure of the Kings: as divers veſſels of ſilver and braſs curiouſly wrought; other houſhold furniture alſo, rich hangings of tapiſtry, and garments of great price; many goodly images and right noble ſtatues, wherewith Syracuſe was adorned and beautified, even with the beſt and principal Cities of Greece.
In token alſo of a victory over the Carthaginians, there were eight Elephants brought in a ſhew.
And that which was not the leaſt ſight and ſpectacle to behold, Soſis the Syracuſian, and Mericus the Spaniard went afore with crowns of gold upon their heads. The one of them was the guide when Syracuſe was entred in the night ſeaſon: and the other betraied Naſos, and the garriſon there. N Both theſe were enfranchiſed Citizens of Rome, and had fifty acres of land a piece granted unto them for ever. Soſis had his land ſet out in the territory of Syracuſe, which either belonged to the Kings, or to the enemies of the people of Rome, and a dwelling houſe (chuſe where he would in Syracuſe of all thoſe that were ſeized upon by right of conqueſt.) As for Mericus and the Spaniards that with him fled from the enemies, and ſided unto the Romans, they had aſſigned unto them a City to inhabit, and land to occupy in Sicily, which ſometime belonged to them that had revolted from the people of Rome. And order was given to M. Cornelius for to appoint them the ſaid City and land whereſoever he thought good. And in the ſame territory there were allotted and ſet out four hundred acres of land unto Belligenes, by whoſe means Mericus was allured and induced to leave the adverſe part and turn to the Romans. O

After that Marcellus was departed out of Sicily, the Navy of the Carthaginians disbarked eight thouſand footmen and three thouſand Numidian horſemen. Unto them revolted the Murgantine land, and Hybla, together with Magella: and other ſmall piles of baſe account, took example by them and followed after. The Numidians with their Captain Mutines, ranged over all Sicily, and fired the towns and villages belonging to the aſſociats of the people of Rome. Over and beſides all this, the Roman army there, being diſcontented and angry, partly, for that together with their Generall,

A nerall, they were not licenced to go out of the Province: and partly, for that they were forbidden and debarred, for wintring in any good towns; demeaned themselves slackly and lazily in their military service: in such sort, as if there had been a head to lead them, as they had a heart to move them, they would have mutined and rebelled. Among these troubles and difficulties, M. Cornelius the Prætor, both appeased and mittigated the stomacks of the souldiers, as well by comfortable words, as by rebukes and checks: and also brought under his obedience and subjection, all those Cities which had revolted. Of which he according to the former act of the Senate, allotted Murgantia to the Spaniards, unto whom both a City and land to it was by order aforesaid due. Both the Consuls who had the government of the Province Apulia, seeing there was less cause of fear
B and terrour now from the Carthaginians and Annibal, were commanded to cast lots between them for the Provinces of Apulia and Macedonia. So Macedonia befell unto Sulpitius, and he succeeded there instead of Levinus. Fulvius was sent for home to Rome, about the election of the Consuls. And when he held the solemn assembly of the people, for the choice and creation of the Coss. The Century of the younger Citizens, which had the prerogative to give their first voice, declared T. Manlius Torquatus, and T. Otacilius for Consuls. Manlius being there present in place, when the multitude came about him to congratulate with, God give you joy, &c. (for that there was no doubt, but the whole body of the people would approve this choice of the first Century) came with a great company about him to the tribunall seat of estate where the Consul sat: and made request unto him, that he would give him the hearing of some few words, and command C that prerogative century which had given their voices to be called back again to a new scrutiny. And when every wan was attentive, and expected what he should demand, he alledged for his excuse a pair of ill eyes. "For a shameless Pilot of a ship is he, and as impudent a Generall of an ar- "my (quoth he) who having to do all by other mens eyes, would require to have the goods "and lives of other men to be put into their hands. And therefore may it please your honour to "command this Century of the younger sort to give their voices anew, and in creating Consuls, "to remember the war that is in Italy, to consider of the troublesome state of the Common- "weal, and to think of this, That scarcely yet mens ears have had any rest, since they resounded and "rung again with the noises and alarms, that the enemies raised within these few months, when "they lay in siege neer unto the wals of Rome. But after these words, when the said Century cried
D with one accord, that they were of the same mind still, and would nominate the same Consuls again, and none other; then Torquatus, "Neither (quoth he) shall I be able, if I were Consul to "bear with your fashions and conditions, nor you again endure my rule and commandment. To "the scrutiny therefore once again, and think how the Carthaginians war within Italy, and Anni- "bal is the Generall of the enemies. Then the Century moved as well by the authority and reverence of the mans person, as by the applause and admiration of the people, who wondred at his vertue, besought the Consul to call forth and cite a Century of the elder bands: for that they would willingly confer with more ancient men than themselves; and by their sage advice and good direction nominate the Consuls. When those elders were called to this Century, there was some time allowed for to commune apart secretly with them, within the place railed in, called Ovile.
E These ancients said unto them, that they were to consult of three persons, whereof two already were full of honourable dignities, which they had born, to wit Q. Fabius and M. Marcellus. But verily, (say they) in case ye would have some new Cos. to be chosen, for to be opposed against the Carthaginians, ye have M. Valerius Lævinus, a notable man, one who hath performed singular good service and atchieved many noble deeds, both by sea and land against King Philip. So when they had three propounded unto them the elder were dismissed and the younger entred into a second scrutiny; and declared for Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus (glittering then in the prime of his glory, for the late subduing and conquest of Sicily) and M. Valerius, who was absent. This foredom and choice of the prerogative Century, all the rest followed after, and by their suffrages confirmed. "Let them mock on now and scoff hereat all they that have nothing in admiration but F "antiquity and things done in elder time. For mine own part, if there be any such City and Com- "mon-wealth at all, consisting of wise men and Philosophers, as some great Clarks have rather "imagined in their fansies, than found in effect: I dare be bold to think & say, that in it there could "not possibly be either rulers and Magistrates more grave and temperate in their desire of dignity "and government, or a people better mannered, nurtured, and instructed. But that it should be "thought an unlikely matter and scarce credible that a Century of younger persons were willing "to consult with the elder, and be advised by them to whom they should give their voices, for to "be created the chief Magistrates; it is the corruption of this our age that is the cause: wherein "we see how small reverence and authority even parents themselves have, and of how slender "and base account they be amongst their own naturall children.

The Oration of T. Manlius to the Consul.

After this followed the Election of Prætors, wherein were created P. Manlius Volso, and L.
G Manlius Acidinus, C. Lectorius, and L. Cincius Alimentus. When this Election was finished it fortuned that news came, how T. Otacilius (whom the people, as it seemed, would have chosen in his absence to match T. Manlius in the Consulship, but that the ordinary course of the election was disturbed and stopped) departed this life in Sicily. The Apollinare games in the former year had been exhibited: and when Calphurnius the Prætor put up a bill, and moved the Senate, that they might be celebrated again that year also, there passed a decree, That they should be vowed to continue from time to time for ever.

The

The ſame year certain prodigious tokens were ſeen and reported. In the Temple of Concordia the Image of Victory, which ſtood upon the lantern and top thereof was ſmitten with lightning, and being ſhaken and driven from its own place, reſted faſt upon thoſe other Images of Victory that were fixed in the foreſtront of the ſaid Temple, and fell not down from thence. Word alſo was brought, That in Anagnia and Fregellæ the walls and the gates were likewiſe blaſted and ſtricken with fire from heaven: and that in the market place of Sudertum there ran ſtreams of bloud a whole day together: That in Eretum it rained ſtones: and that in Reate a female mule brought forth a ſole. Theſe ſtrange and wonderfull ſigns were purged and expiate with greater ſacrifices: and a ſolemn ſupplication proclaimed; wherein for one day the people ſhould wholly attend their devotions, and pray unto the gods: and likewiſe a Novendiall ſacrifice. In that year died certain publike Prieſts of State, and new were choſen in their ſtead. Caius Livius in the room of M. Pomponius Matho the High Prieſt: and M. Servilius, to ſupply the place of Sp. Carvilius Maximus, the Arch-Augur. And foraſmuch as T. Otacilius Maximus, the Prelate or Biſhop, died when the year was expired, there was none nominated for to ſucceed him. C. Claudius the Arch-flamine of Jupiter loſt his Flaminſhip, and was deprived of that Sacerdotall dignity, becauſe he had committed an errour in ſacrificing, when he ſhould miniſter and diſtribute the inwards of the beaſt.

About the ſame time M. Æmylius Levinus (after he had by ſecret conferences ſounded aforehand and ſollicited the minds of the Ætolian Princes and great LL.) came with a ſmall fleet of ſhips lightly appointed, to their general Diet or Councill, ſummoned before for that purpoſe only. In which ſolemn aſſembly, after he had made declaration, "That Syracuſa and Capua were "won, and under the protection of the people of Rome, and what good ſucceſs they had in the "affairs and wars of Italy: and diſcourſed beſides, That the Romans, according to their ancient "cuſtome, received by tradition from their forefathers, uſed to reſpect and make much of their "Allies: and namely, That either they received them into the City of Rome, and endued them "with the ſame franchiſes that they themſelves enjoyed, or elſe dealt ſo liberally with them o-"therwiſe, that they liked of their condition ſo wel, as they choſe rather to be allies than Citizens: "he proteſted and ſaid, That the Ætolians ſhould be much more honoured amongſt them than "all others, for that they were the firſt that of all forrain nations beyond ſea, entertained league "and amity with them. As for King Philip and the Macedonians, their heavy friends & dangerous "neighbours, he had ſo danted their courages, abated their forces, and driven them to that paſs, "that not only they were forced to abandon thoſe towns, which by violence they had taken "wrongfully from the Ætolians, but alſo had much ado themſelves to keep Macedony it ſelf quiet, and without perill of hoſtility: promiſing withall, That he would bring and reduce the Acarnanians (for whom the Ætolians were ſo diſcontented and grieved, that they were diſmembred "from the body of their State) under their ancient form of juriſdiction and ſeignory again. Theſe relations and promiſes made by the Roman General, were confirmed and aſſured unto them by the authority and countenance of Scopas (who for the time was the Prætor or head Magiſtrate of that State) and of Dorimachus a Prince of the Ætolians, who with leſs modeſty and greater aſſeveration and confidency extolled and magnified the greatneſs, power, and majeſty of the people of Rome. The principall matter that induced and moved them was the hope of recovering and keeping Acarnania. Whereupon, there were conditions drawn & engroſſed, under which they ſhould joyn in league and friendſhip with the people of Rome. And this branch was added to the reſt of the defeazances, That if they were ſo pleaſed, and liked well of it, there ſhould be comprized in the ſame league and privileges, the Eleans and Lacedæmonians, together with Attalus, Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus: of which three, Attalus was King of Aſia the leſs, the other were Princes and Potentates of * Illyricum. The articles ran in this form. Imprimis, That the Ætolians ſhould immediatly make war by land with King Philip. Item, That the Romans at ſea ſhould help with twenty galliaces at the leaſt, bearing five ranks of oars. Item, As touching all the Cities that ſhould be conquered (beginning from Ætolia, ſo far as to * Corcyra) that the ground whereon the Cities were ſeated, the edifices, the walls, and the lands thereto belonging, ſhould be ſeized to the uſe of the Ætolians: all other goods and chattels elſe, ſhould be a prize for the people of Rome. Item, That if the Ætolians hapned to make peace with Philip, it muſt paſs with this clauſe and proviſo, that the peace ſhould ſtand good upon this condition, That Philip abſtain to make war upon the Romans and their Allies, and all thoſe that lived under their dominions. Item, In caſe the people of Rome fortuned to piece again, and be confederate with the King, they ſhould put in a caveat and proviſo, that he might have no liberty to war upon the Ætolians or their aſſociates. Theſe were the covenants agreed upon: and being fair engroſſed two years after into a pair of indentures the one of them remained for the Ætolians in Olympia, the other for the Romans in their Capitoll, among other ſacred records and monuments, for a perpetuall memoriall to all poſterity. The occaſion of ſo great delay was becauſe the Embaſſadors of the Ætolians were ſtaid and kept very long at Rome. But that was no let nor hinderance at all to the proceedings in the wars. For the Ætolians preſently made war upon Philip: and Lævinus conquered * Zacynthus (a little Iſland near to Ætolia, having a City within it of the ſame name, which he forced by aſſault, all ſave the Caſtle) likewiſe * Oeniadæ and * Naxus, which he won from the Acarnanians before: and all theſe he gave to the Ætolians. And ſuppoſing that Philip having his hands full of the war upon his own frontires had no time to think upon Italy, and the Carthaginians, and to mind the

A the covenants that passed between Annibal and him, he retired himself into Corcyra.

Philip lying in winter harbor within Pella, was advertized of the * Ætolians revolt. Therefore because he minded at the prime of the Spring to conduct an army into Greece, to the end that Macedony and the Cities bordering thereupon, should not be molested by the Illyrians, whom he supposed would be at quiet and not stir, if they were once frighted with the harms of others, he made a sudden rode and expedition into the marches of the Oricins and Apolloniats: and when the Appolloniats issued forth against him, he repelled them, and with great fear and terror drave them within their walls. After he had wasted the confines next to the Illyrians, he turned his forces with like celerity and speed into Pelagonia: and then won by assault a City of the B Dardanians, situate in the frontires of Macedonia, through which the Dardanians meant to have their passage. And when he had performed these exploits in great hatte, not forgetting how the Ætolians and Romans both maintained war against him joyntly, he descended through Pelagonia, Nympheum, and Bolea, into Thessaly; supposing verily that the people of those countries might be incited to wage war together with him against the Ætolians. And leaving there behind him (at the streight of Thessaly) Perseus four thousand strong, for to debar the Ætolians entrance that way: himself in person before that he should be occupied in greater affairs, led forth his army into Macedonia, and from thence into Thracia, and so forward against the Medians. That nation was wont to make incursions, and to invade Macedony, whensoever they could perceive that the King was either busied in other wars, or his Realm disfurnished and slenderly provided C of good gard and strong garrisons. He began therefore to forrage and spoil the territories about Phragandæ, and to assault Iamphorina, the principall City and chief strength of that Region Medica.

* Jenizæ Sophiano, aut Zuchia Nigro.

Scopas having intelligence that the King was gone into Thracia, and kept there occupied in the wars, put all the serviceable young men of Æolia in arms, and prepared war against Acarnania. The nation of the Acarnians, albeit they were both in strength unequall, and also saw already, that they had lost the walled City of the Oniades, and Naxus: and knowing well, that the Roman forces would come upon them besides: rather upon anger than any good counsell and advisement, made preparation for war, and resolved to meet them. Their wives and children, and elder persons such as were above forty years of age, they sent away into Epirus, adjoyning near unto them. D Of all that were fifteen years old and upward unto threescore, they took a solemn oath that they would never return back without victory. They laid also a heavy curse and cruell malediction upon all those of their own nation: and framed a most humble requett in as effectuall terms as they could devise, unto all their friends, that none of them should entertain within their Cities, their doors and houses, nor admit to their table, any one of them that were vanquished, and fled out of the field: yea, and besought withall the Epirons to gather together the dead bodies of as many of them as should chance to be slain in battell, and to inter them all in one grave and erect a tomb and monument over them, with an Epitaph and inscription to this effect; Here lie buried and entombed the Acarnanians, who fighting in defence of their country, against the violence and injuries of the Ætolians, lost their lives manfully in the field. By this means, when their courages were enkind- E led and incensed, they encamped themselves in their utmost frontiers, abiding the coming of their enemies. And having dispatched messengers to Philip, to give notice to him in what jeopardy they stood they constrained him to give over that war which he had in hand, considering that Iamphorina was surrendred up into his hands, and that he had sped wel otherwise in the rest of his affairs. The Ætolians, upon the first fame that was blown abroad of that solemn oath taken by the Acarnanians, were wel cooled, and not so hasty to set forward: but hearing once of Philip his coming, they were driven to retire again as far as possibly they could within their own confines. Neither Philip for his part marched on further than to Clime (notwithstanding that he made great speed afore, and took long journies; for fear that the Acarnanians should be surprized, before he could reach unto them) for so soon as he heard that the Ætolians were retired, he himself also returned F unto Pella.

Levinus in the beginning of the spring took the sea, and loosed from Corcyra, and having doubled the point of Leucates, and sailed as far as Naupactum, there he published and gave knowledge, That he would shape his course from thence for Anticyra: and that Scopas and the Ætolians should there meet him, and be in readiness. This Anticyra is situate in Locris, on the left hand, as ye enter into the gulph of Corinth. By land it is a small journey thither from Naupactum, and as short a cut by sea. So within three daies after they began to assail the City on both sides. The fiercer assault was from the sea-side, both because they had in their ships engines of battery, and other ordnance and artillery of all sorts; and also, for that the assailants from that part were Romans. So within few daies the City was yielded up, and delivered again unto the Ætolians, the pillage thereof fell to the Romans share, according to covenant. There Lævinus received letters G from Rome, specifying thus much, That he was declared Consul in his absence, and P. Sulpitius was coming to succeed him in the Province: but by occasion that he lay there sick of a long disease, he came to Rome later than all men expected.

M. Marcellus entring his Consulship upon the Ides of March, assembled the Senat that day, only for form and order sake: "for he made open profession there, that during the absence of his "Collegue, he would treat of no matters, either concerning the state of the City, or the Pro- "vinces. But this protestation he uttered withall, and said; That he knew full well that there were

"many

" many Sicilians in the towns and villages near unto the City, backbiters and slanderers of him, H
" who for his own part he was so far off from hindring, but that they might freely for all him, " divulgate and publish abroad in Rome all those crimes which were devised and spoken against " him by his adversaries, that were it not that they pretended some fear forsooth, to charge the " Consul with any matters, in the absence of his Collegue, he would straightwaies give them au" dience in the Senate: but so soon verily as my brother Consul is come home, I wil not quoth he,
" I assure you, suffer any one matter to be debated here, before that those Sicilians be sent for into
" the Senate house. And I understand that M. Cornelius hath taken generall search like a muster
" over all Sicily, to the end there might come a number to Rome with complaints of me: he also
" with letters full of untruths hath buzzed into all mens ears, and born the whole City in hand, I
" that the war continueth still in Sicily, and all to diminish and abridge my glory. The Consul having that day won the commendation and name of one that knew how to rule and govern his affections, dismissed the Senat: and it seemed that there would be a generall vacation not of law matters only, but of all other things & as it were holyday still, untill the other Consul came unto the City. This rest and idleness (as the wonted manner is) set the Commons having nothing else to do, a talking: and now their tongues walked apace, ceasing not to spread rumours, That by this long and continuall war, not only the lands and territory about the City of Rome (especially where Annibal had marched with his cruell army) were wasted, but also Italy was in a manner dispeopled and laid desolate, by reason of so many musters and levies: complaining, that whole armies were defeated and put to the sword at Cannæ in defence of the Common-wealth: and K that there were two Consuls created, both martiall men, and warriors, over-fierce and eager of fight, such as time of peace and quietness were able to find occasions of war: so little was it to be looked for at their hands, that in time of war they would seek for peace, and suffer the City to have any breathing time and intermission. These speeches rumoured among the common people were interrupted and staid by occasion of a Scare-fire that began in sundry places together about the Forum, in the night of that day, which was immediatly before the festivall daies of Minerva, called Quinquatrus. At one and the self-same time the seven merchants shops and ware-houses, which afterwards were turned into five, and the shops of the Bankers and money changers which now are called Novæ, (or the new-shops) were on fire. Divers private mens houses also the fire caught, for as then there were no stately Halls and Palaces of the City there built. Likewise the L fire took hold of the common prison, called Latumiæ the Fish market hall likewise, and the royall gallery or walking-place. Hardly could the Chappel of Vesta be saved, and that by the good help and pains-taking especially of thirteen bondslaves; whose bondage was bought out at the Cities charges, and they made freemen. The fire continued one night and a day: and no man made doubt, but it came by mans hand, and was the practice of some lewd persons; for that the fires began in many places at once, and those far distant asunder. Whereupon the Consul by the advice and direction of the Senat, made proclamation in a solemn assembly of the people, that whosoever would come forth and give notice by whose means that fire was procured, he should be well rewarded: if he were a free-man, with a piece of money; if bond, with freedome. In hope of which recompence, a certain slave belonging to the Calavii the Campans, (his name was Manius) was induced to bewray the masters whom he served, and five other young Gentlemen of Capua, whose fathers had lost their heads by the commandment of Q. Fulvius. Those he appeached to have made the said fires: and he gave them a warning besides, that they intended to do more mischief about the City, if they were let alone, and not apprehended; so they were attached, and their household-servants. At the first, these persons made light account both of the informer, and the information they made, and elevated the credit that was given thereto: alledging, that the day before the party himself being chastised and scourged by his Masters, ran away, and so upon an anger and giddy fit devised (by occasion of this misfortune which was meer casuall) to frame an accusation against his masters. But when the matter was averred to their teeth in open place, and that they, by whose ministery the feat was done, were in the midst of the Forum put to N the rack for to utter a truth, then they all made confession of the fact. So as well the Masters that were the setters thereof, as the servants that were privy and accessary thereto, had their deserts, and suffered for it. The informer who disclosed the villany, was made free, and had * 20000 asses for his labour.

* 648 l. 13 s. 4 d. Rom.

As the Consul Lævinus passed by Capua in his journey [homeward,] there flocked about him a number of Campans, and besought him with tears, that they might have leave to go to Rome, and present themselves before the Senate, there to make suit (if haply there were any pity and commiseration in them) not to destroy them utterly, nor suffer Q. Flaccus to consume the name and generation of the Campans from off the face of the earth. "Now Flaccus for his part " denied flatly that he bare them any private grudge by malice: but only hated the Campans as O
" the common enemies to the state, and so he would do ever, so long as he knew them so ill affe" cted as they were to the people of Rome: for there was not a nation upon earth, nor a people un" der heaven more spightfully & deadly bent against the Roman name than they were. And that " was the cause (saith he) that he penned them up within their wals. For whosoever of them chan" ced any way to make an escape, they ranged about the country like brute and savage beasts, ren" ting, tearing, and killing whosoever came in their way. Some of them are fled to the adverse side " unto Annibal: others are gone to Rome to set fire on the City, and there (quoth he) shal the Con" sul

A "ſul find the market place half burned, and the very prints and tokens remaining freſh of the "Campans miſchievous practiſes. There ſhould he ſee that they minded to have done violence
"upon the Chappel of Veſta, and to have put out thoſe eternall fires, and utterly defaced the fatal
"pledge of the Roman Empire, beſtowed and laid up ſure in the moſt ſecret place of the Chap"pell. Neither thought he it was ſafe for the City to permit the Campans to come within the "walls thereof. Then Lævinus having cauſed the Capuans to take a corporall oath, and ſwear unto Flaccus, that they would make return to Capua before five daies were expired, after they had their anſwer and diſpatch from the Senate; commanded them to come after him to Rome.
Attended thus as he was with his company, he encountred the Sicilians alſo, who came forth to B meet him: and with this multitude he entred the City, accompanied (I ſay) with the Campans and Sicilians, both vanquiſhed and ſubdued by war, as accuſers of two moſt famous perſons, Marcellus and Fulvius, who had conquered two moſt noble and renowned Cities, Syracuſe, and Capua.

But both the Coſſ. treated and conſulted firſt with the Senate, about the ſtate of the Commonweal, and the government of the Provinces. There Levinus related in what terms ſtood Ma-cedony and Greece: the Ætolians alſo, with the Acarnanians and Locrians: likewiſe what acts he had atchieved in thoſe parts both by ſea and land; and how he had repulſed Philip back into Macedonia, when he began to make war upon the Ætolians, who now was retired and gone into the utmoſt parts of his Kingdom: ſo as the legion might be withdrawn from thence, for C that the Armado was ſufficient to keep the King forth of Italy. Thus much ſpake he of himſelf, and of the Province whereof he had been governour. Then both Conſuls in common, propoſed unto the Senat, concerning the Province. And the LL. decreed that one of the Conſuls ſhould take the charge of Italy, and of the war with Annibal: and the other ſhould have under his hand the Armado, whereof T. Octacilius was the Admiral; and together with L. Cincius the Prætor govern the Province of Sicily. They were allowed the two armies which were in Tuſcany and in France, conſiſting of four legions: whereof two of the former year, that were of Citizens ſhould be ſent into Tuſcany, and thoſe two which the Conſul Sulpitius had conducted, ſhould be led into France. Moreover, that he ſhould have the government of France, and the leading of the Legions there, whom that Coſ. would appoint, whoſe lot it was to have Italy for his Province.
D Into Tuſcany was C. Calphurnius ſent, with Commiſſion after the term of the Prætorſhip expired, to have his full juriſdiction to continue for a year. Likewiſe to Q. Fulvius was aſſigned the keeping of Capua, and his rule prorogued for another year. The armies, as well of Citizens as of Allies, were by commandment of the Senat abridged and made leſs: ſo that for two legions there ſhould be but one, and that conſiſting of five thouſand footmen, and three hundred horſemen:
that they ſhould be diſcharged of ſouldiery who had ſerved longeſt: that of Allies there ſhould be left ſeven thouſand foot, and three hundred horſe: with the ſame reſpect and conſideration of ſervice in diſmiſſing the old ſouldiers. As for Cn. Fulvius the Conſul of the former year, he ruled the ſame Province of Apulia ſtill, without any alteration of his forces: only his government was continued unto him another year. And P. Sulpitius his Colleague, was commanded E to ſend away all his army, only the mariners and ſailers excepted. Likewiſe order was given that ſo ſoon as the new Conſul was arrived and landed in the Province of Sicily, the army there, which was commanded by M. Cornelius, ſhould be ſent out of Sicily. Unto L. Cincius the Prætor were aſſigned the ſouldiers that remained after the defeat at Cannæ, for to keep Sicily in order, and thoſe aroſe to two legions. And as many legions were appointed for P. Manlius Volſo the Prætor, for to go into Sardinia, even thoſe whereof L. Cornelius had the leading in the ſame Province the former year. As for the legions of Citizens, the Conſuls were enjoyned to levy and enroll them ſo, as they entertained no ſouldier of all thoſe who had ſerved in the army, either of M. Claudius, or M. Valerius, or Fulvius: nor exceeded the number that year of one and twenty legions of the Romans. When theſe Acts were paſſed in the Senate-houſe, the Conſuls caſt lots for F their ſeverall Provinces. Sicily and the Armado fell to Marcellus: Italy and the war againſt Anni-bal, to Levinus.

This lot that fell to Marcellus ſo ſtruck the Sicilians dead, (who ſtood in the preſence of the Conſuls, looking for the event of the lottery) as if Syracuſe had been loſt again: in ſuch ſort, as their pitifull lamentations, and their woſull plaints, for the preſent turned all mens eyes upon them, and none after miniſtred cauſe of much ſpeech and talk. For they went about to all the Senators from one to another, in poor and vile array, proteſting, "That if Marcellus came "amongſt them again as L. Deputy, they would not only forſake every man his own country "where he was born, but alſo abandon the whole Iſland of Sicily: complaining that without any
"deſert of their parts, heretofore he had been cruelly bent againſt them, and his hatred was irre-
"concileable: and what would he now do in his choler, and knowing that the Sicilians came to G "Rome of purpoſe to make complaints of him? The Iſland were better (ſay they) to be on a light
"fire to burn with Ætna; or to be all a very ſea, than thus to be expoſed as a prey unto a mor"tall enemy, for to be devoured. Theſe grievous moans and pitious complaints of the Sicilians firſt carried to the houſes of the Nobles and great men of the City, and there taken up and much talked of by many, whiles ſome pitied the Sicilians, others envied Marcellus, ſpread abroad at length ſo far, untill they came to the Council-Table. And the Conſuls were dealt withall, to propoſe unto the Senate, that they might exchange their Provinces one for another. Then Mar- cellus ſtood up and ſaid, "That in caſe audience had been given to the Sicilians already in the Se- H

"nat-houſe, peradventure he would deliver his opinion to another purpoſe: but now left any "man might ſay, that they were bridled for fear, and durſt not ſpeak their minds freely, nor com"plain as they would of him, at whoſe command, and under whoſe obedience, they were to be "within a while: he was for his part ready to make change of his Province, if his Collegue were
"as well content, and made no greater ſcruple of the matter. Only he requeſted that the Senate
"would not prejudice his cauſe. For if at the firſt (quoth he) it had been hard and unjuſt, extraor"dinarily and without caſting lots, to give my Collegue the free choice of his own Province, how "much greater wrong then ſhould I have, nay, what diſgrace were offered unto me, if my lot "ſhould be taken from me and transferred upon him. So for that time, the Senat having made an I overture unto Marcellus, what they would have done, rather than by any decree prejudiced the matter, brake up. And the Conſuls between themſelves privatly made exchange one with the o-ther. See the fortune and fatall deſtiny of Marcellus, that haled him, as it were, to be matched with Annibal, and to fall into his hands: to the end that the ſame man, who of all the Romans, was the firſt that vanquiſhed Annibal in fight, and won the honour from him: ſhould now in the midſt of proſperity and happy ſucceſs of war, be the laſt Roman General that was ſlain by Annibal, and yielded the glory of giving him the overthrow. After the Provinces were thus interchangeably ſhifted, the Sicilians were brought into the Senat. Where they made a long ſpeech as touching the perpetuall and conſtant faithfulneſs unto the end of K. Hiero, towards the people of Rome; and all to curry favour and gain thanks unto the whole nation of Sicily. Recounting, "that Hieronymus K
"firſt, and after him Hippocrates and Epicides, as for other things, ſo eſpecially for their revolting "from the Romans, and turning to Annibal, were odious and hateful unto them. For which cauſe
"and nothing elſe Hieronymus was by the hands of the chieftains of their young gallants, as it "were by a publike decree of the ſtate made away and killed, and the nobleſt of their young gen"tlemen, to the number of ſeventy, conſpired to murder Hippocrates and Epicides: who being diſ-
"appointed and put by the effecting of their deſignment, through the delay of Marcellus, (who at "the time before appointed, came not with his power to Syracuſe) were appeached, their inten"ded plot revealed, and they all by thoſe tyrants put to death. And yet, to ſpeak a truth, Marcel-
"lus himſelf was he that gave the firſt occaſion of the tyrannizing of Hippocrates and Epicides, in "that moſt cruelly he ſacked and rifled the Leontins. But from that time forward, the Nobles of L
"Syracuſe never ceaſed to come in unto Marcellus, & promiſed to deliver the City into his hands, "whenſoever he pleaſed. But he, forſooth, at firſt, ſtood upon theſe terms, that he would rather "force it by aſſault: but afterwards, ſeeing he could not effect that his purpoſe, notwithſtanding he "had wrought all the devices he could, both by ſea & land, he made choice of one Soſis a copper-
"ſmith & Mericus a Spaniard, to have them to work and contrive the betraying of the City, rather "than of the principal of the Syracuſian Nobility, who had ſo often offred that ſervice, and never "yet would it be accepted: & all, I wot, becauſe he might pretend ſome colourable cauſe of juſtice,
"to proceed in all rigor againſt the moſt ancient allies of the people of Rome, for to maſſacre them,
"and make ſpoil of all that they had. Set caſe that Hieronymus had not revolted and gone to An-
"nibal, but the whole people and Senat of Syracuſa: Suppoſe, that the Syracuſians in generall, by M "publike conſent had ſhut the gates againſt Marcellus, & not their Tyrants Hippocrates and Epi-
"cides, when they had the Syracuſians ſure enough under their own hands: Say they had warred
"againſt the people Rome with as ſpightfull and cankred malice as the Carthaginians do, and ever "did: what greater hoſtility could Marcellus poſſibly have exerciſed againſt them more than he "hath, unleſs he would deſtroy and raſe the City to the very ground? Surely he hath left nothing
"in Syracuſa but the bare walls, the naked and empty houſes of the City, the temples and chappels
"of the gods defaced & broke open; for the gods themſelves, with all the rich & gorgeous orna"ments are carried away. Many a man is ſpoiled and robbed of his goods, in ſuch ſort, as having "nothing left him but the bare ſoil, they are not able when all is gone, with his leavings to main"tain themſelves, and ſuſtain their wives and children. They were humble petitioners therefore, N
"and ſuppliant ſuiters unto the LL. of the Senate, to take order, that reſtitution might be made "unto the rightful owners, if not of all (for that is unpoſſible) yet of ſo much at leaſt, as was to be "found, and might be truly owned again.

The complaints of the Sicilians againſt Marcellus.

After theſe and ſuch like complaints, Levinus the Conſul commanded them to go forth of the Councill-Houſe to the end that the LL. might be conſulted with, and deliver their opinions concerning their demands. "Nay mary (quoth Marcellus) let them ſtay ſtill rather, that I may anſwer
"to their very faces: ſeeing my LL. our caſe and condition is ſo hard, who war and fight for you,
"that we muſt have thoſe to enform againſt us, and be our accuſers, whom we have conquered
"and ſubdued by martiall arms; Let it even be ſo that two Cities, to wit, Capua and Syracuſa,
"won this year, may convent judicially both their conquerors, the one Fulvius, the other Mar- O
"cellus. When the Embaſſadors were brought back again into the Senat-houſe, then began Mar- "cellus the Conſul, and ſpake in this wiſe.

Marcellus his defence againſt the Syracuſians.

"I am not ſo far overſeen, and forgetfull, my Lords, either of the majeſty of the people of "Rome, or of this place of command which I now hold, that I would plead mine own cauſe, "Conſul as I am, againſt theſe Grecians, my accuſers, in caſe the queſtion were of any crime or "fault of mine own. But all the controverſie to be diſcuſſed, ſtandeth not upon theſe terms, to "examine what I have done, whom the right of war will juſtifie and bear out, howſoever I have "proceeded

A "proceeded against enemies: but what these men have deserved to suffer. If they were not ene"mies, nor so to be reputed, then it mattered not, and it had been all one, either now or in the "life time of King Hiero, to have forced Syracusa. But if it appear, that they have revolted, that "they have evil intreated our Embassadors, threatned to lay violent hands, and to run upon them "with sword and force of arms; that they have manned their walls, and shut their gates upon us;
"that they have maintained the army of the Carthaginians against us: who can be grieved and
"offended, if they have suffered as enemies, who stuck not first to offer all hostility whatsoever?
"Rejected I the Nobles of Syracusa when they would have delivered the City into my hands?
"And made I more account of Sosis, and Mericus the Spaniard, and thought them worthy to be "trusted in so important a matter? Ye are not, I am sure, the meanest of the Syracusians, that thus B "reproach others with baseness of estate. Who was it of all you here, that promised to open me
"the gates? that undertook to receive my armed souldiers into the City? Nay, nay, ye hate and "curse them in your heart, who have so done; and even in this place cannot forbear to give them
"hard terms, and revile them: so unlike it is, that you your selves ever meant to have done any "such thing. Even this abject condition and base calling of theirs, my LL. which these men twit
"them with, is a manifest token, and a most evident argument, that I refused none, that was wil"ling to do good service unto our state and Common-weal. At the very first, before I laid siege "unto Syracusa, I assaied by all means to have peace; one while sending Embassadors unto them, "otherwhiles going in person to parle with them. Afterwards, seeing that without all reverence
"of Embassadors, they shamed not to offer them abuse; without regard of my self, they deigned C "me no answer when I came to the gates, and conferred with their chief Nobility: after much "travel, toil, and infinite pains, sustained both by Land and Sea, at length by mere force and hot "assault, I became Master and Lord of Syracusa. Now as touching that which hath befain unto "them, since they were overcome, and lost their City, I would suppose they had more reason, and "juster cause to make their moan, and complain unto Annibal and the Carthaginians, those that "are likewise conquered, than before the Senat of the people of Rome their Conqueror. For mine "own part, my LL. if I had ever meant to deny and disavow the spoiling and sacking of Syracusa,
"and not to stand to it when I had done, I would never have been so ill advised, as to beautify and "adorn the City of Rome with the spoils thereof. And what I have given or forgiven unto any "particular person, I am assured that I may well justify and avow the same, both by the law of D "war, and also by the desert of every one. Now, my LL. whether ye will approve and ratify my "doings or no, it concerneth and toucheth the Common-weal rather than my self. My part I have "done, and discharged my duty faithfully. It much importeth now the State, that by reversing (as "it were) and disanulling mine actions, ye make not your other Generals from henceforth, to be "more slack and backward in the like employment. To conclude my LL. since that ye have heard
"both my self and the Sicilians speak our minds face to face, we will all together go out of this "Temple, that in my absence the Senate may more frankly speak to the point, and deliver their "opinions. Thus the Sicilians were dismissed, and he himself went forth also to the Capitol, for to take a levy of souldiers.

E The other Consul in the mean time, put to question the demands of the Sicilians before the LL. Much canvassing a long while, and discussing there was of the matter, and divers opinions passed. Many of the Senators following T. Manlius Torquatus the head and principal man, that maintained a side, were of this mind, "That they should have made war against the tyrants, the com"mon enemies as well to the Syracusians, as to the State of Rome. And as for the City, it was
"(say they) rather recovered and received, than won by force: and being so received, it was to "be re-established in her own ancient laws and freedom, and not after it was so wearied with "miserable servitude, to be scourged and afflicted with war upon it. But between the warring of "the tyrants of the one side, and the Roman General of the other, a most beautiful and noble City,
"standing in the midst (as a prize and reward for the winner) is undone by the means; even that F "City which sometime had been the garner (as it were) and the Treasure-house of the people of "Rome: by the munificent liberality and bounty whereof, by whose rich presents and goodly gifts
"our City many a time and oft, yea, and but of late dayes in this Punick war, hath been relieved and "adorned. If King Hiero should arise again from the dead and come among us, Hiero (I say) the "most faithful maintainer of the Roman state, with what face could we shew unto him, either Sy- "racuse or Rome? When he should see of one side, his own native country, half raised and wholly "spoiled: and on the other side, coming to Rome, in the very entring of the City, and hard at the "gate, should behold the spoils of his own City? Notwithstanding these and such like speeches cast out among them, to procure ill will and hatred to the Consul, and to move pity and compassion to the Sicilians, yet the LL. of the Senat in favour of Marcellus, agreed upon a milder decree, G and enacted, That whatsoever he had done, either during the war, or after conquest, should be ratified and allowed for good: Item, for the time to come, the Senat would take order and provide for the good of the Syracusians, and give the Consul Levinus a special charge, to have regard of the welfare of that City, so far forth, as might not be prejudicial to the state of Rome.
Then were two Senators sent into the Capitol to the Consul, to request him to repair again unto the assembly of the Senate: and after the Sicilians also were admitted into the place, their act and decree aforesaid was openly read. The Embassadors had good words given them, and were dismissed: whereupon they fell down prostrate at the feet of Marcellus the Consul, beseeching him to pardon that which they had ſpoken, either to bewail, or to eaſe their calamity; and to re- H ceive both them in particular, and the City of Syracuſe in general, unto his merciful protection. After this, the Conſul with gracious words licenſed them to depart.

When the Sicilians had their diſpatch, the Campans had audience given them in the Senate: and as their ſpeech was more lamentable, ſo the cauſe was heavier, and harder to be digeſted: for nei- "ther could they themſelves deny, but that they deſerved condign puniſhment: nor Tyrants had "they any, upon whom they might lay the blame. But they thought they had ſuffred enough for "their ſins already, in that ſo many of their Senators died by poiſon, and ſo many loſt their heads. "Some few of their nobility and but a few remained yet alive, who as they were not touched in "conſcience, nor ſo faulty, as to lay violent hands upon themſelves, ſo the Conqueror in his furious I "wrath, adjudged them not worthy of death: they therefore made humble ſuit for themſelves, "their wives and children, to obtain freedom, and to enjoy ſome part of their own goods, being, "as they were, meer citizens of Rome, and moſt of them by affinity and neer kinred, upon mutual "and croſs mariages, linked in alliance and bloud to the Romans. After that they alſo were willed to void out of the Senat houſe: for a while, there grew ſome queſtion and doubt, whether Q. Fulvius ſhould be ſent for from Capua (for preſently upon the taking of the City, Claudius the Conſul died) that this matter might be argued and diſcuſſed in preſence of the General himſelf, like as the other had been reaſoned of and debated between Marcellus and the Sicilians. But afterwards when they ſaw in the Senat-houſe M. Attilius, and C. Fulvius, the brother of Flaccus, both his Lieutenants: likewiſe Q. Minutius, and L. Veturius Philo, Lieutenants unto Claudius, who had K been preſent in all actions, and were eye-witneſſes of every thing; and beſides, were unwilling that either Fulvius ſhould be called away from Capua, or the Campans longer delayed: M. Attilius Regulus, who of all them that had been at the ſervice of Capua, was of greateſt authority and reputation, being demanded his opinion, ſpake in this wiſe.

"I take it (quoth he) when Capua was newly won, I was one of Councel with the Conſuls "there, when queſtion was asked, and enquiry made, Whether any one Campane had deſerved "well of us and our Common-weal. And found it was, that two women only, to wit, Veſia Oppia, "born in Atella, but dwelling then at Capua, and Faucula Cluvia, ſometime a common ſtrumpet "and curtizan, were well willers unto us. The former of theſe twain daily ſacrificed for the wel- "fare, life, and victory of the Romans; the other, ſecretly ſuſtained the poor and needy Roman L "captives with food and victuals. As for all other Campans, from the higheſt to the loweſt, they "were no better affected unto us, than the Carthaginians. And even thoſe, who were beheaded "by Quintus Fulvius, ſuffered death, not becauſe they were more faulty than others, but for that "they were of greater mark and calling than the reſt. Now, that the Senate ſhould decide the "cauſe of any Campans, who are enfranchiſed denizons of Rome, without a grant from the peo- "ple, I ſee not how it can be. For in our fore-fathers time the like caſe was of the Satricans that "rebelled: and then M. Antiſtius, a Tribun of the Commons, firſt put up a bill, and the Commons "afterwards paſſed it, namely, That the Senat might have power and authority, to give their opini- "on, and determine of the Satricans. Therefore I am of mind, that we deal with the Tribuns of "the Commons, that one or more of them, prefer a bill unto the Commons, by vertue whereof we M "may be authoriſed to ſet down ſome order for the Campans. Then L. Attilius, a Tribun of the Commons, by leave and advice of the Senate, propoſed unto the Commons a bill in this form and manner. Whereas the Campans, Atellans, Calatins, and Sabatins, who have yeelded themſelves unto Fulvius the Pro-conſul, to be at the pleaſure and devotion of the people of Rome: all that alſo which they have ſurrendred together with themſelves, as well their territory as their City, as all utenſils both ſacred and prophane, their neceſſary implements, and all other things whatſoever, I demand your will and pleaſure, O Quirits, what ſhall be done with the premiſſes? The Commons after deliberation, gave their voyces to the ſaid bill in this form. Our will and pleaſure is, that whatſoever ye the Senators, who now are ſet in Councel, or the moſt part of you think good and determine, ſhall ſtand for juſt and lawful. Upon this grant or Act of the Commons, the Senat by a decree awarded unto Oppia N and Cluvia, firſt their own goods and liberty: and moreover if they were deſirous to crave far- ther reward at the Senates hand, they were beſt to repair unto Rome. For every family and ſeveral houſe of the Campans, there were ſpecial acts and decrees made, all which to repeat and rehearſe, would not quit the labour. Some had their goods confiſcate: themſelves, their Children and Wives were to be ſold, excepting thoſe their Daughters which were wed- ded, before that they came under the ſubjection of the people of Rome. Others were to be clapt up in Priſon, until farther order were taken for them hereafter. Moreover, of ſome Campans they made diſtinction by valuation of their wealth, whether their goods were to be confiſca e or no. All their beaſts and cattail which were taken, ſave Horſes; all their bond-ſlaves, but males fourteen years of age and upward, all moveable goods alſo which were not annexed O and faſtned to the ſoil, they awarded for to be reſtored to the true owners. All Campans, Atellans, Calatins, Sabellans, excepting thoſe, who either themſelves, or whoſe parents took part and ſided with the enemies, they judged to be free: provided alwayes, that none of them were either Free-denizens of Rome, or of Latium. Item, it was enacted, that none of all them who had been at Capua whiles the gates were ſhut, ſhould remain either in the City or territory of Capua, within a certain day prefixed: but ſhould have a place ſet out unto them for to dwell in, on the farther ſide of Tyberis, ſo it were not upon the very bank cloſe unto

A Tyber. As for those that during the time of war had been neither at Capua nor in any other City of Campan, which revolted from the people of Rome, they should be removed to inhabit on this side the River Lyris between it and Rome: but such as were turned and passed to the Romans side, before that Annibal came unto Capua, they should be transplanted on the hither side of Vulturnus the River: provided, that none of them should possess either house or Land within fifteen miles of the Sea. As concerning them who were displaced and confined to inhabit beyond the Tyber, neither they nor their heirs and successors for ever, should purchase and hold house or Land in any place, but in the territory either of Veii, Sutrium, or Nepesium: but so, as they exceeded not the stint of five hundred Acres of ground. As touching the goods and chattels of all the Senators, of such as had born Magistracy in Capua, Atella, or Calatia, they awarded that sale should be B made thereof in Capua. As for those that were free born, and whose bodies were to be sold, they should be sent to Rome, and there set a-sale. Finally, the Images and Statues of brass, which were said to have been won and taken from the enemies, whether they were sacred or profane, they referred to the Colledge of the Priests and Prelates, to determine thereof at their discretion. Thus they gave the Campanes their dispatch, and sent them away much worse apaid for these decrees, than they were when they came first to Rome. And now they complained no more of the cruel proceedings of Q. Fulvius against them, but blamed the iniquity and unjust dealing of the very Gods, and their own cursed fortune together.

After the Sicilians and Campanes were dismissed, there was a muster taken: and when an army was levied and enrolled, there began some question and reasoning about the mariners and C Rowers to furnish the Gallies. For the accomplishment whereof, when the Consuls could neither raise men enow, nor yet find mony at that time in the Chamber of the City, for to prese and hire them, and pay their wages withal: they published an edict, that private men according to the rate and proportion in the Subsidy book, out of all orders, degrees, and companies, should as aforetime find Rowers at their own charges, and maintain them with meat and money for thirty dayes. Upon which Edict and Proclamation, all men so grumbled and muttered, and were so highly discontented and angred, that they wanted an head and Captain, rather then matter and occasion of a mutiny and insurrection: giving out, "That the Consuls had taken a course,
"and were in the very train to plague, undo, and destroy the Commons of Rome, like as they "had already the Sicilians and the Campans. For thus many years they have been pilled, polled, D "clean spent and consumed with exaction of tributes, and had nothing left them but the bare "ground, and the same lying wast and untilled. As for their Houses upon their Lands, the ene"mies had burned: their servants and hinds, such as should husband and till their grounds, the "Common-wealth had bereaved them of: one whiles buying them up to the war, for some small "piece of mony: otherwhiles levying and pressing them to the Seas to be Gally-slaves, for a thing "of nothing. A man could not so soon get one brass farthing, or single silver denair before-hand, "but it went by and by either for Gally-pay, or for yearly Tribute. And to give that now which "they had not, they might never be brought by any force or for any mans commandment what"soever. Let them sell and make an hand of their goods, imprison and punish their bodies too,
"when all is gone besides; seeing there is nothing left them to ransome and redeem the same
E "again. These and such like words were not only muttred in huggermugger, but uttered also and given out in broad terms even in the market-place and before the Consuls, by the multitude that flocked and gathered together in exceeding great numbers: in such sort, as the Consuls were not able with all that ever they could do, to appease the mutiny, neither by sharp rebukes, nor fair words and comfortable speeches. Then they said, that they would give and allow them three dayes respit for to think and consider of these matters: which they themselves bestowed wholly and employed in taking a view and survey of their goods, and making dispatch and riddance thereof out of the way. The next day the Consuls called the Senate together to consult about the supply of Rowers and Gally-slaves: where, after much debating and arguing, that the Commons had good reason to make denial; at length the drift of all their speech was this, "That F "whether it were right or wrong, the burden must lye on privat mens shoulders, there was no re"medy: for seeing there was no mony in the common chest, how should Mariners and Rowers "else be gotten and levied? And without Armadoes, how possibly should either Sicily be held
"still in possession, or Philip be kept out of Italy? or the Sea coasts of Italy remain in safety and "security? In these distresses and difficulties the Councel being perplexed, and to seek for reme"dy; and whiles every mans wits were in the wan and so confused, as if they were benummed
"and stone cold: Then Lævinus the Consul, As the Magistrate (qd. he) goeth before the Senate in "place of honor, and the Senat likewise before the common people in worth and dignity: so they "ought in all difficulties and hard occurrences to undergo the weightiest burdens first, and be the "Foremen and Leaders in all dangerous adventures whatsoever. For if a man would enjoyn his G "inferiors to bear some grievous and heavy load, let him first take it up himself, yea and impose the "same upon his own train and company: all the rest then, will be more willing and obedient to "follow after, and do the semblable. And never will they grutch at any cost or charges, when "they see their Leaders and Rulers take more upon themselves, than they are well able to wield
"and sustain. To the end therefore that the people of Rome may be provided and furnished of a "fleet rigged and trimmed, as our desire is, and that private persons may not think much, nor "refuse to find Rowers thereunto; let us first that are here command our own selves: let us,

The speech of Lævinus the Consul.

"I say, that be Senators, bring abroad in common all the gold, all the silver, all the brasen coin H
"that we have, so as every man reserve rings only for himself, his wife and children: and a little
"tablet or Jewel for his son, as a pendant to hang about his neck. Also let all them that have wives
* 3 pound ste, or daughters, retain still one ounce weight of * gold, and * one pound of silver: And as many as
* 3 pound ster. and two shil. over, if libra be centenaria, have born office of State, and sitten in the Ivory Chair, keep still the trappings and caparison of their Horses, and two pound weight a piece, the one of gold, the other of silver; for to have a Salt-sellar, and a little boll or cup, to sacrifice and offer unto the Gods withal. As for the rest of the Senators, let us leave them but one pound weight of silver, and no gold at all, and five thou-
* 15 pound 12 shil. 6 pence st. sand * Asses in coin, to every housholder a piece. "All other gold, silver, and brasen money be"sides, let us forthwith bring abroad and present unto the Triumvirs or publick bankers, before
"that we make or enact any decree of Senat: to the end, that our good example in this volun- I
"tary benevolence and contribution, and our earnest endeavour to help the Common-weal, may "stir up and provoke the hearts and affections, first of those that are by calling Gentlemen and "Knights of Rome, and then forward the rest of the commons, to imitate and follow us with "some emulation. This is the only means which we that are Consuls have thought upon and de"vised, after much talk and conference together. Set to therefore, my masters, in the name of "God, and lead the way: God will bless your good beginnings. So long as the City standeth
"on foot, and holdeth up the head, no man need to fear his private state; but it shall do well "enough. Go the weal-publick to wreck once, and decay, let no man ever think to save his "own. All the whole house liked so well of these motions, that not only they gave their accord and consent thereto, but over and besides, yeelded hearty thanks unto the Consuls for their good K advice and counsel. When the Senat was dismissed, every man for himself brought forth his gold, his silver, and brasse money, and laid all together in common; and that with such speed, striving a vie who could go before another, and have his name entred first in the publick Rolles and Registers: as neither the foresaid Triumvirs were able to receive it fast enough, as it was tendred unto them; nor the ordinary Clerks and Notaries to set it down in writing, and take note thereof accordingly. This consent and agreement of the Senators, the Knights and Gentlemen of Rome in their place and calling seconded; and the commons for their parts were not behind. So without any constraint of law, without edict, without any exhortation made by the Magistrate, the common-weal wanted neither Rowers for to furnish the armadoes, nor mony to pay the Rowers. And thus when all things were provided necessary for the wars, the Consuls went forth to their L several Provinces.

Never was there any time of this war, wherein Carthaginians and Romans together, had more tryal of the alternative and variable change of fortune: never hung they more in equal ballance, between fair hope and fearful danger. The Romans, in their Provinces tasted both of sweet and sour. In Spain on the one side, they sped ill and lost: in Sicily on the other side, they sped well and won: so as their sorrow was interlaced still and mingled with joy. Also in Italy, the losse of Tarentum turned to their woe and damage: but the keeping of the Castle there with the garrison, beyond all their hope and expectation, brought them joy and comfort for their sorrow. Also, their suddain fright and fear, for the siege and assault of the City of Rome, was saived and cured again within a few dayes after, by the forcing and winning of Capua: and all that heavinesse and mourning turned into mirth and gladnesse. The affairs also beyond Sea, were checked M with interchangeable turns and courses. Philip became their enemy in an ill time, and when they had little need thereof. Contrary-wise, the Ætolians and Attalus the King of Asia the lesse, proved to be their new friends and loving allies: whereby even then fortune, seemed to smile on the Romans, and by that overture, promised as it were, unto them the Empire of the East. Semblably the Carthaginians, as they lost Capua, so they won Tarentum, and made a saving game of it. In like manner, as they took no small pride and glory, in coming to the walls of Rome without resistance; so they were danted and dismaid again, that this their enterprise took no better effect in the end: and held themselves much disgraced and dishonoured, that whiles they sat themselves before one gate of Rome, there was an army of Romans led forth at another, and N sent into Spain. And even in Spain also, the greater hope men had there, that upon the death of two so noble and valiant Generals, and the defeat of two as puissant armies, the war was come to a final end, and the Romans driven from thence for ever: the more spight it was, and the greater grief and vexation they conceived again, when by the valour of L. Martius a tumultuary Captain, chosen in hast they knew not how, those former victories turned to vanities, and came to just nothing. Thus fortune was indifferent, and all things doubtful and wavering in suspence, both on the one side and the other. Their hope all one as it was at first: their fear, the same still, neither more nor lesse: So as between hope and fear, they fared, as if the war at this time were new to begin.

Annibal above all other things, was vexed to the heart, that Capua being more hotly and O eagerly assaulted by the Romans, than manfully and faithfully defended by him, had diverted and turned away the hearts of many States of Italy from him. For neither was he able to hold them all with sufficient garrisons, unless he would dismember into many small portions, and mangle by piece-meal his army; which to do then, was no good policy: nor he thought it safe and good, to withdraw his garrisons from thence, & leave the fidelity of his allies at liberty, either to depend upon fickle hope, or to sway with suddain fear. And (as he was by nature covetous and cruel-

A ly minded) he resolved at length upon this course, to make spoil of those Cities which he was not able to keep, and so to leave them wast and empty for the enemy. This designment was not so dishoneſt and shameful in the first enterprise, but it proved as bad and hurtful to himself in the effect and conclusion. For he lost the hearts clean, not only of those that were the parties grieved, and suffered these indignities, but also of all others besides. The present calamity and loss touched but some few: but the precedent and example reached to many more. Neither was the Roman Consul behind hand for his part, to sollicite and sound those Cities, from whence he saw some light appear, and any hope to gain them unto him.

There were in Salapia two noble men above the rest, Dasius and Blasius. Dasius was friend to Annibal, Blasius (to far as he might with safety) affected and favoured the Romans. And by enter-
B course of secret messengers, had put Marcellus in some good hope of betraying the City; but without the help of Dasius the plot could not be compassed and effected. Wherefore, after much musing and long deliberation, after many stayes and delayes, at length he resolved (for want rather of better counsel, than upon any hope to speed) to address himself to Dasius, and acquaint him with the matter. But Dasius not only misliking utterly and abhorring the thing, but also carrying a secret enmity to the party himself, the only eye-sore and concurrent that he had, striving to be greater than he, disclosed all to Annibal. Whereupon, both were sent for, and convented peremptorily before him. As Annibal was sitting upon the Tribunal seat, giving audience and dis-C patch to certain other matters; and that he might anon the better attend unto Blasius and the action intended against him: whiles the plaintife and defendant stood apart by themselves from the rest of the people a good way, Blasius went in hand again with Dasius, and sollicited him for to deliver the City to the Romans. With that, Dasius (as if the matter had been too too apparant) cried out and said, That he bashed not to break unto him and move him, even in the presence and sight of Annibal, for to practise treason and betray the City. Annibal and all they that were there present, gave little credit unto Dasius: and the more audacious the thing it self was, the lesse likely-D hood it carried with it of a truth. Every man supposed verily, it was nothing but emulation, envy, and cankred malice, that caused Dasius to charge upon him that crime, which because there was no witness to the contrary, he might untruly devise and more freely enforce against him. And so for that time, they were both discharged the court. But Blasius never gave over to follow still this bold enterprise, but beat still upon this one point, shewing how good and commodious the thing would be, both to themselves in private, and to their country in common, until he had wrought him so, and won him to grant, that the Carthaginian garrison, (and those were Numidians) toge-E ther with the City Salapia, should be rendred unto Marcellus. But without much bloudshed they could not possibly be thus betrayed and delivered: for they were the most hardy and valiant horsemen by far, of all the Carthaginian army. Wherefore, albeit they were taken on a suddain unprovided, and had no use of Horses within the City, yet with such weapons, as in such a suddain tumult and uprore they could catch and come by, first they assayed and gave the venture to break through and escape away: and when they saw that they could by no means save themselves and get forth, they fought it out to the last manfully, even unto death: so as there were not of them above fifty left alive, and came into the hands of the enemies. And surely, the loss of this cornet of F Horsemen, was a greater dammage unto Annibal, than the forgeing of Salapia: for never from that day forward, had Annibal the upper hand in cavalry, which was the only service whereby ever before he most prevailed.

Much about the same time the Castle of Tarentum was streightly distressed for want of victuals, and hardly could endure and hold out any longer. The only hope that the Roman garrison had, which lay there, and the Captain thereof M. Livius the Constable of the Castle, was in the provision sent out of Sicily. For the safe convoy whereof, along the coast of Italy, there rid at anchor a fleet welneer of twenty sail before Rhegium. The Admiral of this fleet appointed to wast these victuals from time to time, was one Decius Quintius, a man of obscure birth and base parentage, howbeit, for many worthy acts and feats of arms, much renowned in martial G glory.

At the first he had the charge but of five ships, whereof two of the greatest, which were three banked Gallies, were allowed him by Marcellus: afterwards, upon his good service, when he had born himself bravely in many conflicts, he had three more committed unto him, and those were of five banks of oars, until at last himself, by calling upon the confederat Cities, as Rhegium, Velia, and Paestum, for the ships due by covenant unto the people of Rome, he had made a prety Armado, as is above said, of twenty sail. As this fleet had disanchored and was gone from Rhegium, Democrates with the like Armado for number of Tarentin ships, encountred almost five leagues from the City of Tarentum, at a port called Sacriportus. It fortuned at that time, that the Roman Admiral, little looking for any battel, came forth under sail only, but about Crotone and Sibaris, he had furnished his ships with Rowers also, and so his fleet for the bigness and taines of the Vessels, was well appointed, and sufficiently armed and manned. And even then it hapned at one time, that both the boisterous wind lay, and the enemies also were within kenning, so as they had scarce time enough to fit their tackling, to make ready their Rowers, and to set in order their fighting men, against a skirmish that was so neer toward. There was not lightly seen a greater conflict, fought more hotly and fiercely between two royal Armadoes that affronted one another, than between these small fleets. For why, the battel was for a greater matter, than all their ships came to. The Tarentins mainteined the fight more eagerly, because they were desirous H to recover their Castle out of the Romans hands, as they had done their City, after one 100 years almost, during which time, they had been out of the possession thereof: hoping thereby, if they could be masters of the Sea once by some fortunat and victorious battel, to cut off and intercept all hope of victuals from the enemies. The Romans on the other side bestirred themselves as lustily that by keeping the possession of the Castle, all the world might see, that Tarentum was not lost by force, clean strength and valour, but betrayed by stealth and treachery. So they sounded the battel from both parts, and ran affront one at another, with the beaks and stems of their prows, and neither staid rowing amain forward, nor suffered their enemy to part or go aside from them, until they closed and grapl'd their ships together, by the means of iron hooks like hands. And so neer I they buckled, in hot and furious fight, that not only they discharged shot aloof one against another, but also they coped together (as it were) foot to foot, at hand strokes with sword fight. Their prows and for-ships stuck grapled together, while the poops and hin-decks were driven about with contrary oars of the adverse part. So neer and so thick withal stood the ships, and within so narrow a room, that scarce one dart light into the water in vain, and did no harm. With their beak-heads they assailed one another, as it had been on land fight, and so close they were, that the souldiers might passe out of one ship into another, as they fought. Howbeit, two ships there were above all the rest, that maintained a notable fight, and in the vanguard and forefront of the battel, invested one another most furiously. In that of the Romans was Quintius himself in person, and in the other of the Tarentins, was one Nico, surnamed Perco, a man not only odious unto the Romans, for the publick quarrel between both states, but also maliciously bent, upon a private spight K and rancour, as banding with that faction, which had betrayed Tarentum to Annibal. This Nico espying Quintius both fighting and also encouraging his men withal, charged him at unawares, and ran him quite through with a partisan: who was not so soon faln forward headlong upon the fore-deck, armour and all, but the Tarentin following the train of his victory, and seeing the ship disordered and troubled for the losse of their leader, lustily came forward, and boorded her; laid about him manfully, and put by the enemies out of his way, until the Tarentins were masters of the prow and fore-castle. Whiles the Romans had much ado (so thrumbled they were and thrust together disorderly) to defend and keep the poop and hind-deck; with that, another gally of the enemies appeared on a suddain, and charged the hind-part. So the Roman ship in the midst between both, was boorded on every side, and taken. Whereupon all the rest were greatly terrified, seeing the L Admiral-ship was won by the enemy: and they fled on all hands. Some were sunk in the deep Sea, some made hast with their oars, and scudded to the land, but anon were a prize and prey to the Thurins and Metapontins. But of the Hulks and Caricks, which were fraught with victual, and followed after, very few there were that fell into the hands of the enemies: the rest shifting and turning their sails crosse, this wayes and that wayes, according to the inconstancy of the wind, recovered the main Sea.

But about Tarentum at the same time, their fortune was nothing so good. For whereas there went out of the Town upon a foure thousand men a foraging, for to purvey corn, Livius, Constable of the Castle and Captain of the garrison, spying his time (as he waited ever for all opportunities) made out of the said Castle 2000 armed souldiers, under the leading of C. Persius a valorous and M industrious man: who set upon the Tarentins straggling out of order, and dispersed in wandering wise over the fields; and after he had followed a long time the execution, killing them here and there as he encountred them; the rest, which were but few left of so many, he chaled to the Town: for they made hast in great fear thither, and were let in at the gates standing half shut, for fear lest at the same randon the Town should have been lost. So the Tarentins and Romans, when they had made the reckoning, put up all on even hand. For the Romans were winners by land, the Tarentins at Sea: and both of them disappointed alike of their hope of corn, which was presented to their eyes, but they never tasted thereof.

At the same time Lavinus the Consul, after a good part of the year was gone about, arrived in Sicily, greatly expected and looked for, as well by the old allies as the new: and the first thing of N all other and most important, he supposed, was together with this new peace, to settle and compose the State of Syracusa, so much disordered and out of frame. After that, he led his legions to Agrigentum, where only there remained the reliques of war; which City was kept by a strong garrison of Carthaginians. There fortune favoured his first designs. Hanno chanced to be the General over the Carthaginians, but he wholly relied and reposed all his hope in Mutines and the Numidians. This Mutines had ranged all over Sicily at his pleasure, and raised booties out of the territories and Lands of the Roman associats, and by no force or policy could he be intercepted of his passage back to Agrigentum, nor yet be pinned within the City, but that he would issue forth whensoever he listed. This glory of his, because now it checked (as it were) the fame and honour of the General, turned the man at length to displeasure and danger: so as, what good O service soever was atchieved, it was never well taken by Hanno, nor joyously accepted, in regard of the person, who was a prick alwayes in his eye. Whereupon in the end he gave away the Captainship of Mutines from himself, and bestowed it upon his own Son: thinking, that together with his government and command, he should lose all his authority and reputation also among the Numidians. But it fell out far otherwise. For the more that he was in disgrace and disfavour with Hanno, the greater grew the old favour and love of the Numidians toward him.

Neither

A Neither could he himself endure any longer the unworthy wrong and indignity offered unto him: and therefore in revenge he presently dispatched certain secret messengers unto Lævinus, with credence, that he would betray and deliver Agrigentum into his hands. By the mediation of these intercourriers, there passed sufficient security and assurance between them: and the matter being concluded, the manner also of contriving the plot, was agreed upon. Whereas therefore the Numidians were possessed, and had the guard of that gate that openeth toward the Sea: after they had either driven out the old warders from thence, or killed them, they let in the Romans at the same gate into the City, who were sent of purpose, according to the former agreement. And when they marched up into the midst of the City, even to the market place, with banner displaied, and with great tumult and noise; Hanno supposing it was nothing else, but a seditious uprising of B the Numidians (like as they had done sometimes before) came forth as to appease and stay a mutiny and commotion. But discovering a greater multitude afar off, than the Numidians were: and hearing withal the Romans to shout, with the manner whereof his ears had been well acquainted before time, he took him to his heels ere he came within the dart-shot. And being let out at a back postern gate, taking with him Epicides, he recovered with some few other the Sea side, where, a good hap was, they light upon a small bark or pinnace: and so leaving Sicily to the enemies, for which there had been much strife so many years together, they passed over into Affrick. The multitude besides both of Carthaginians and Sicilians, without any skirmish either begun or intended, fled like blind men they wist not whither: and finding all wayes made up, and no passage forth, they were miserably slain and hewn apieces about the gates. Lævinus being possessed of the C Town, caused all the chief men and rulers of the City, to be beaten with rods, and to lose their heads: all the rest together with the pillage he sold in port-sale, and the money that was raised thereof, he sent to Rome.

When the news of this misfortune of the Agrigentins was blown over Sicily all at once turned Roman, and Annibal lost all. For in short space there were 20 Towns betrayed and yeelded, six forced by assault, and to the number of 40 voluntarily surrendred to the devotion and protection of the Romans. The principal noble men of which States, after that the Consuls had either rewarded or punished according to their several demerits, and compelled the Sicilians generally to lay by arms and weapons, and to take themselves to the plough, for to ear, till, and sow their grounds; to the end that the Iland might bring forth fruit, not only to sustain and maintain the natural inhaD bitants thereof, but also to ease the price of corn and victuals in the City of Rome, and throughout all Italy, like as it had done many times before: he transported over with him into Italy a rabble and damned crew of unruly people from Agatirna. Some four thousand there were of them, a confuted multitude of all sorts, a very mish mash and sink, dunghil of vile and wretched persons, most of them Outlaws, Bankrupts, and notorious malefactors, in danger of death by the laws of their Cities where they lived. And being fled their countries, some for one fact, some for another, they chanced all upon like fortune to sort themselves (as commonly birds of a feather will flie together,) and at Agatirna, they made choise like outlaws, to live by robbing and spoiling: and this was their only profession and trade. Lævinus thought it no good policy to leave behind him these good fellows in an Iland, which began out now upon new peace to knit and unite again; for fear E lest they would minister matter of innovation and change; and besides, there was some good use of them among the Rhegins, for to forage and rove about the Brutians country: for such they stood in need of, and had laid for a company which were acquainted with theeving and stealing. And so this year made an end of the war in Sicily.

P. Scipio L. Deputy and General in Spain, having in the prime and beginning of Spring put his ships to Sea and set them aflote, and by an edict summoned all the aids of the allies to repair to the Rendezvous at Taracon; gave order and commandment, that ss well the ships of war as of charge and burden, should from thence set forward, and shew themselves at the mouth of the River Iberus. And after he had given direction and charge, that the legions from out of their winter harbors, should there meet together, himself accompanied with five thousand of his allies put himself on his journey to his main army. Being thither come, he thought it good to make some speech to the old souldiers especially, as many as remained alive after so great defeats and overthrows, and when he had assembled them all together to an audience, in this wise he spake unto them. "Never was there new General before my self, that could by good right, and in "regard of desert, render thanks unto his souldiers before he had employed them, and made "tryal of their good service. But as for me, before I ever came within sight of this Province, "before I entred my government and saw the camp, fortune hath obliged me, and made me be- "holden unto you. First, for your kindness and zealous affection to my father and to mine un- "cle, both while they lived, and when they were dead. Secondly, in that when the possession "of this Province was lost; after so great foils and overthrows, ye have by your vertue and va- "lour recovered the same again, and kept it entire to the behoof of the people of Rome, and my "self, the next successor in place of soverain rule and command. But forasmuch as our full "purpose and present resolution is, by the leave, favour, and power of the Gods, not so much "to hold the possession our selves and abide in Spain, but to dispossesse the Carthaginians that "they may have no footing nor abode at all there: and since the thing that we go about, is not "to stand keeping the bank of Iberus, for to stop the passage of the enemy: but to give the at- "tempt o passe over our selves by force: yea, and therewithal to transport the war over with us

"us into his own country, and to come home unto him. I fear me greatly, lest this will seem H "unto some of you a greater designment, and more audacious enterprise of mine, than may ei"ther suit and sort with the fresh remembrance of those late defeats, or stand well with my young "and unripe age. The foils and unfortunat foughten fields in Spain, can be of no man in the "World forgotten later than of my self, whose father, whose Uncle, were within the space of "30 dayes there slain, to the end that sorrow upon sorrow, funeral upon funeral, one mournful "death after another, should infortunatly be heaped upon our house and family. But as this de"solate estate and defect almost of all my house and name (wherein I only, in manner, am left alive
"of my race) woundeth my heart and makes it bleed, as often as I think of it: to the publick for"tune and vertue of the Common-weal, reviveth my spirit again, and will not suffer me to de"spair totally of the state of this Empire: considering the destiny and Providence of the Gods, I "whereby it is a thing given unto us, and our luck hath ever been, that howsoever we have recei"ved overthrows in all great wars and dangerous battails, yet in the end, we have gone away "with the victory. I omit to speak of old examples, of Porsena, of the Gauls, and Samnits: and "I will begin at the Punick wars. How many armadoes and fleets, how many brave Captains, "how many valiant and puissant armies were there lost and miscarried, during the former? And "what should I say of this in our dayes? In all the defeats and overthrows, I was either presen
"my self in person; or if I were not in any of them, yet I am sure, I was he that felt the smart of "them, more than any man else whatsoever. The River Trebia, the mere Thrasymenus, the Town
"Cannæ, what are they else, but the very sepulchres and tombs of the Roman armies there hewn "in pieces, and of their Consuls slain. And thereto, the general revolt of Italy, the rebellion of "Sicily, the falling away of the greater part of Sardinia. Moreover and besides, this late affright
"and terror; namely, the Carthaginians camp pitched between Anio and the walls of Rome, and "Annibal seen well neer, as conqueror at the very gates of our City. In these so great ruins and "adverse distresses of our state, yet the vertue alone and valour of the people of Rome hath stood
"upright, sound, and immutable: yea, and hath raised up again and set on foot, all that which lay
"along on the ground. You only, my valorous souldiers, were the first, that after the discomfiture
"of Cannæ, under the leading and good fortune of my father, withstood Asdrubal in his journey and "expedition toward the Alps, purposing to go down into Italy; who if he had joyned with his "brother Annibal, certainly by this day, there had remained no memory of the Roman name.
"And in very truth, these affairs falling out so prosperously, made amends and recompence for all "the former losses. But now through the goodness of the Gods, all things prosper and go well
"forward: and the affairs of Italy and Sicily both, mend daily, and are every day better than "other. In Sicily, Syracuse and Agrigentum are won and wholly ours: the enemies be driven "out of all the Iland, and the state is reduced into the form of a Province, subject to the people of "Rome, and under their obeisance. In Italy, the Town of Arpi is recovered by surrender, the "City of Capua is forced by assault. Annibal himself, having measured all the way, (but in fear-
"full hast and in manner of a flight) as long as it is from Rome to the Brutians country (in high
"Calabria,) is there driven up into the furthest angle and corner thereof, nothing more wishing
"and praying for at Gods hands now, than to be able to retire and get away safe out of his ene"mies Land. What thing then were lesse befeeming, my hardy souldiers, than this, If you who "have sustained and upheld the decaying and down-falling estate of the Roman Empire in this "Province you (I say) together with my two parents (whom for the reverence that I owe to "them, give me leave to make equal, and to honour with that name) at what time as calamities
"and losses, hapned suddenly one in the neck of another, and the Gods themselves seemed to ne
"part and stand with Annibal; should now let fall your courages and be faint-hearted, because in "those Provinces aforesaid, all things go well to our hearts desire and great contentment. As for "the late misfortunes and adversities which have hapned here, would to God they had passed over "without sorrow, as well of my part, as of yours. But for the present, the immortal Gods, Prote"ctors and Governors of the Roman Empire, who inspired into the minds and hearts of all the "Centuries, to wish and chuse me to this place of soveraign honor, even the same Gods by augu-
"ries and auspices, by all tokens of the birds either by flight or sight, yea, and by visions also in the "night season, do portend, signifie and promise unto me, all good speed and happy successe: yea
"and mine own mind giveth me, (which ever hitherto, hath been to me the truest prophe, and "never deceived me) that all Spain is ours: and that within short time the whole Punick nam and
"nation, being expelled and driven out from hence, shall fill all Seas and Lands with their shame-
"full and dishonorable flight. That which my spirit and soul of it self presageth, the same doth rea"son also conclude by most certain and infallible demonstration. The allies and subjects here of "the Carthaginians, oppressed and wronged by them, have humbly by their Embassadors craved
"our aid and succour. The Captains General of their forces, being at difference and odds all three "among themselves, insomuch as they had like to have departed and revolted one from the other, O "have distracted and dismembred their forces into three parts, and bestowed them in three sever-
"all countries, most removed and distant asunder. And no doubt, the like fortune is ready to fall "upon their heads, which lately was our undoing and overthrow, upon the same occasion. For "even as we before were forsaken of the Celtiberians, so are they now abandoned of their allies.
"Besides, they parted and divided their armies asunder: which was the only cause, that brought "the utter ruin and destruction upon my father and uncle. And be ye sure, that their intestine
"discord

A "discord and dissention, will never suffer them to joyn friendly and unite again in one. And thus "singled as they are, they cannot possibly withstand our puissance. Now my souldiers, for your "part, do but favour the name of the Scipios: do but affect and love me, the issue and off-spring of "your noble Generals, budding forth again (as it were) out of the old stock, cut down to the roote. "Go to, old souldiers, and redoubted servitors, with bon-courage set over the River Iberus a new "army and a new Captain: pass over with them into those Lands, which ye have often conquered, "and wherein ye have atchieved many valiant and memorable acts. And for my self, I will so "endeavour and effect, that as ye now agnize in me, the resemblance of my fathers and uncles vi-"sage and countenance, the same feature, proportion, and lineaments of the body: so I will shew "and represent unto you, the true pattern and portraicture of their spirit, wit, faithfulness, and ver-B "tue, even as the express and lively image taken and drawn from their own selves: in such sort, as "every man may say, That Captain Scipio is either risen from the dead, or new born again. Ha-ving by this Oration, incensed and inflamed the courages of his souldiers, and left Syllanus with a guard of three thousand foot, and three hundred Horse, for the defence of that coast; he trans-ported over the River Iberus, all the rest of his forces, amounting to the number of five and twenty thousand foot, and 25 hundred Horsemen. There he was advised by some about him, seeing the Punick armies were departed into three countries so far remote and dissite asunder, to set upon and assail that which was next: but he doubting and fearing lest by that means he should draw them altogether, and knowing that he was not able alone, to match and make his part good with so many hosts at once, determined in the mean while, to be doing with new Carthage, and to besiege C and assault it. This City, as it was rich and wealthy in it self, so it was full of all the enemies furni-ture and provision for war. There was their armour kept, there was their money laid up, there re-mained the hostages of all Spain. Besides, as it was seated commodiously to cross over from thence into Affrick: so it stood upon a convenient and large haven, able to receive and harbour the greatest navy at Sea, and the only haven (if I be not deceived) of all that coast and tract of Spain, which boundeth next upon our Sea. But no man was made privy to his determination, or knew whither they should take their journey, save only Lælius. He being sent about with the armado, had di-rection so to temporise and guide his course by sail and oar, that at one and the self same instant, both Scipio might present his Land forces in the view of Carthage, and the fleet enter the haven. So they depated from Iberus, and within seven dayes came before the City of Carthage, both by Sea D and Land. His camp he pitched on the north-side of the City: which he entrenched and fortified on that outward back-part, that stood farthest from the City: as for the forefront, it was by natural situation of the ground, defended surely enough. For the site of Carthage is in this sort. There is a gulf or creek of the Sea, in the middle coast and river well neer of Spain, opposite most to the South-west wind, running & retiring in length within the Land half a mile, but lying out in breadth somewhat more. In the very mouth of this creek, there is a little Iland from the open Sea; which saveth, sheltereth, and defendeth the haven from all other winds, but only the Southwest. From the inmost nook of this bay, there beareth out a promontory like a demy Iland, which is the very Hill or Cape whereupon the City is built. The same on the East side and the South is compassed with the Sea: from the West, it is enclosed with a lake or standing mear, which also spreadeth somewhat E toward the North, of an uncertain depth; which altereth according to the tide, and as the Sea ei-ther ebbeth or floweth. Now, there is an elbo or bank of firm ground, somewhat lesse than a quar-ter of a mile over, that joyneth the City with the main or continent. To that side (notwithstan-ding it had been no great piece of work there to fortifie) the Roman General cast no trench, nor raised any rampier: either upon a brave and hauty mind, to shew the enemy how confidently he trusted in his own strength; or because, whensoever he advanced to the walls of the City (as oftentimes he took occasion so to do) he might have open recourse and regress again into the camp. But when the utter side, which required fortifications, was finished, he set the ships in order with-in the haven, making a shew, as if he would besiege them also on the water side. And when he had gone through all his armado, and given the Captains of the ships in charge, to look well to their F centinels and watches in the night (for that commonly enemies at their first besieging, make what attempts and adventures they can in every place) he returned into his camp. And because he would not only yeeld his souldiers good reason of this his designment, in that he began war first and principally with the besieging of that City; but also encourage them, and put them in good hope of the winning and conquest thereof, he assembled them together, and discoursed before them in this manner,

The situation of New Car-thage.

"My valiant souldiers and trusty friends, If any man here thinketh, that ye are brought hither The Oration "to assail a City only, and there an end: he rather maketh reckoning of your present pain and of Scipio to his "travel, than casteth the profit and commodity thereof ensuing. For ye shall in very truth give souldiers. "the assault to the walls but of one City: but in that one City ye shall be masters and conque-G "rors of all Spain. Here lie the hostages of all their Nobles, their Princes, and States. And no "sooner shall ye be Lords of them, and have them in your rule and custody, but presently, all that "now is under the hands of the Carthaginians in Spain, will be surrendered unto you, and at "your devotion. Here is all the money that the enemies have: without which, like as they are not "able to maintain war, (as who wage and entertain all their armies for pay) so it will mightily "stead us (if we light upon it) in gaining the hearts of the barbarous people. Here are their engines "and artillery, here is their armour, here is their tackling and provision for their navy, and all

"other

"other munition and furniture for war: wherewith we shall both furnish our selves, and disfurnish H
"the enemy. Gain we shall over and besides, not only right fair and beautiful, but also a most rich "and wealthy City: yea, and more than that, of right great importance and consequence, in re"gard of a goodly and surpassing commodious haven: by means whereof, we may be provided "both from Sea and Land, of all things needful and requisite for the wars. Which, as they will be "of great moment to us that shall have them, so they will be the greater loss to the enemy that "shall forgo them. This is their Castle for strength, their garner for corn, their treasury for mony,
"their armory, their arsenal: and in one word, their very store-house of all things whatsoever.
"Hither is the direct passage and streight cut out of Affrick, here is the only port and harbor for "shipping, between the Islands of Gades, or Gebraltar, and the mountains Pyrenæi: from whence "all Spain overlooketh (as it were) and commandeth Affrick. But knowing that you are well I
"appointed already, and prepared to the service, I will say no more but this: Now for the honour
"of the Romans, let us go courageously to it, and with all our might and main assault new Car"thage. And when they all with one accord cried unto him, so to do indeed, and that no other thing was first to be done; then he advanced before Carthage, then he gave commandment to assail it at once, by Land and Sea. Mago the Captain of the Carthaginians on the other side, when he saw preparation made by Water and Land to give the assault; for his part ordered his forces and disposed them in this manner. To make head against the Romans on that side where they lay encamped, he opposed two thousand Townsmen: with a guard of five hundred souldiers he kept the citadel: other five hundred he placed upon a little hill belonging to the City which looketh to the East: all the other multitude whatsoever, he appointed to make resistance in other places, K where any outcries, shouts, or suddain alarms should be given. Then having set open a gate, he sendeth those forth, whom he had arranged in that street which leadeth directly to the camp of the enemies. The Romans (according as they were commanded by their Leader himself) in the beginning gave ground a little and retired, to the end, that during the time of skirmish and conflict, they might be neerer to the supply of succours, which were to be sent to second them from behind. And verily at the first they stood to it stoutly on both parts, and there was no ods perceiv-ved. But afterwards, the Romans being still freshly reenforced from out of the camp, not only discomfited the enemies, and put them to flight, but pressed on them so hard, as they fled disordered and out of aray, that if Scipio had not sounded the retreat, it seemed, that they would have intermingled themselves pelmel with those that ran away, and rushed into the City with them. With- L in the City throughout there was no less fear than in the battel. Many courts of guard and other places were abandoned, the curtein of the walls was left naked, and every man made what shift he could to leap down and escape. Which when Scipio perceived (who now was turned to a mount which they call Mercurius Tentates) and namely, that the walls were void of all the defendants, he commanded all his souldiers to issue forth of the camp, to set forward to the assault, and to bring ladders to scale. Himself in person, defended with the shields of 3 tall lusty young men going before him (for by this time they let flie afresh from the walls a mighty volley of shot of all sorts) approached the City. There he exhorted, encouraged, and commanded them to do what was requisite in this service. And that which made most to enkindle the courages of the souldiers, he was there personally as an eye-witness and beholder of each mans valour or cowardise. Whereupon M they stuck not to run upon the very shot, and to receive many a wound: and now nothing could keep them back; neither the strength of the walls, nor the armed men that stood thereupon, but they scaled striving who could mount upon the walls first. At the same time, that part of the City also which the Sea beat upon, began to be assailed by the ships. But from thence, it should seem, they made more ado with houting and hurrying, than effected ought by any forcible assault. For whiles they came close to the walls with their ships; whiles they put forth their ladders and their souldiers; whiles every man laboured to gain the Land, the neerest way he could: what with their striving and hast-making, they hindred one another. And by that time Mago had filled the walls full of armed men, who let flie arrows, Javelins, darts, and all kind of shot, whereof they had gathered together exceeding great store. But neither men, nor arrows and darts, nor any things else N defended the wall so much as the very wall it self. For few ladders they had that could reach up to the top: and the longer any of them were, the more weak also they were. Whereupon, by reason that they who were climed up to the highest rounds, could not gain the parapet and discharge the ladder, and yet some or other still clambred up after, the ladders being overcharged with the weight, brake in pieces. Some again there were, that notwithstanding the ladders under them held still and stood unbroken, yet when they looked down from on high, their eyes so dazled, and were overcast with a mist, that they lost their sight, and fell from the top to the ground. Thus when ladders here, and men there, came tumbling down, and the enemies upon their good speed grew to be more harty and hardy, the retreat was sounded: which gave to the besieged within the Town not hope only of present rest and intermission of so great labour and toil, but also assured them in O manner, for the time to come, that the City was tenable against all scalades, although it were invested therewith round about. And as for fabricks and mounts to be raised and planted against it, they were not only difficult and hard to be performed, but also would ask some long time: and Minister in the mean while, space sufficient for the other Generals of their own to come to the rescue. But scarce was the first assault fully ceased, when Scipio commanded other fresh and unfoiled souldiers, to take the ladders of them that were wearied already and wounded, and

A with greater violence to give a new Camisado. Himself, so soon as he understood that it was ebb and low water, having been advertised by certain fishermen of Taracon (who sometimes with light boats used to row, and other whiles when their vessels touched the ground, to wade all over the lake upon firm ground) that men might easily passe to the walls on foot: thither to that place he brought all his souldiers to the assault. It was now almost noon-tide of the day; and besides that the water of it self naturally fell with the ebb into the Sea, there was a good sound northern wind arose, which drave the water out of the lake (which now was well fain) after the tide, and discovered such shallows, that whereas in some places thereof they went up to the navel, in some again they waded scarce knee deep. Which albeit Scipio knew well to be an ordinary thing in B natural reason, and therefore with good forecast had made provision accordingly to take that advantage, yet he turned it to a miraculous and prodigious accident, attributing all to the immediate handy-work of the Gods: as who to give passage and footing to the Romans, had turned back the course and current of the Sea, discharged lakes of their water, and opened wayes unto them, that never before were troden with the sole of mans foot: and therewith he willed his souldiers to follow Neptune, the guide and Leader of the way, and to passe boldly through the mids of the lake close to the very walls. On the Land side the assailants had exceeding trouble in standing under the walls: for not only they were hindred by reason that the curtein was so high; but also as they went, they lay open and under their shot, and were wounded both wayes, so as their flanks and sides were more annoyed as they approached under, than their faces and forefront of their bodies. But on the other part, as they went quietly and easily through the mear to the wall, so they
C climed forward as securely to the very top thereof. For neither was it strongly fortified with bulwarks, nor raised to any height by industry and art of man, as being supposed by natural situation of the place, and the standing lake besides, strong enough and sufficiently defended: nor any guard of armed men were there in watch and ward, opposed against the assailants: whiles every man was busy, and wholly intended to help there, from whence some danger was seen. The Romans being thus entred the City over the walls without any skirmish, marched from thence with what speed they could, unto that gate, about which all the fight and hot skirmish was already begun: for there not only all their minds were bent and attired, but also their eyes and ears were occupied and possessed; whiles some fought, others looked on and encouraged the fighters: in such sort, D that there was none of them all once perceived or knew, that the City was taken and surprised behind them, before the darts flew about their ears and light upon their back parts, and until they had the enemies both before and behind. Then not only the walls were taken (when the defendants upon a twofold fear, were driven to abandon them) but also the gate from withinforth and without, began to be broken down: and anon, after continual running and beating against it, the leaves thereof perforce flew apeeces, because there might be nothing to impeach or let them in their entrance: then the armed souldiers brake in most furiously. Many already had scaled the walls, and got over, but they turned and betook themselves every where to massacre and make havock of the Townsmen. But the main battel, which entred in at the gate with their Captains, orderly by companies and ranks in their array, marched forward through the midst of the City to E the market place. From whence Scipio might see the enemies flie two wayes, some to the fortress upon the hill aforesaid, which standeth to the East, and was kept with a guard of five hundred souldiers: others into the citadel, into which Mago himself, with all the armed men in a manner, who were driven from the walls, had retired and fled for to save himself. Whereupon he sent a part of his forces to win the said Hill, and himself in person led the rest to the Castle. And as the fort upon the Hill was taken at the first assault and onset given, so Mago, after he had a while made some means to defend the Castle, seeing all places full of enemies, swarming every where, and no other hope, yeelded himself, the citadel, and the garrison. Until the Castle was surrendred and given up, there was nothing but murdering and killing all over the City, and not F one spared that seemed to be fourteen years old and upward, if they came in their way. But then, upon the sound of Trumpet the execution ceased, and the Conquerors fell to sacage and pillage, which of all sorts rose to a mighty thing. Of free born, such as were of male sex, there were taken prisoners 10000. Then, so many of them as he found to be natural citizens of Carthage, he dismissed and let go free, and restored unto them not only the City, but also their own goods, which the first fury and rage of warriors had left untouched. There were of Artisans and handicrafts-men, some two thousand: those by an edict he pronounced to be bond, and adjudged them as confiscate, to serve the Common-weal of the people of Rome: yet with some hope, that shortly they might obtain their freedom again, in case they performed good service, and shewed themselves diligent in all ministeries and offices of war. The rest of the multitude of inhabitants, such G as were able and young lusty men, as also the stout and sturdy bondmen, he awarded them to the ships, for to furnish up the number of Gally-slaves and Rowers, and with the eight ships of war, which he took captive in the haven, he encreased his own Armado. Besides all this multitude, there were also the hostages of the Spaniards above written, of whom he took as great care, and as good regard, as if they had been the children of Allies and associats. A mighty deal of warlike artillery and ordinance was there found and seized on. Of Catapults of the greatest size 120, of a lesser sort 281. Balists some greater, some small; of them 33, of these 52. Of Scorpions and Crosbows to shoot quarrels as well great as small, and likewise of defensive armour, and offensive weapons, a huge deal, and a marvellous quantity. Military ensigns 74. Of gold and silver there was

was a mighty mass brought unto the General. Golden cups or bolls there were 276, every one H weighing almost one pound. Of silver tryed, wrought, and coyned, 18300 pound weight: and much plate and vessels of silver. All this C. Flaminius the Treasurer, received either by weight or tale. Of wheat there was 40000 Modii, of barly 270000. Of barks and ships of burden, there were in the haven won by force, and taken, 113. Some were fraught with corn, armour, brass besides, and iron, sail-cloth, and hemp, or spart for cables and ropes, also with timber for ship-wrights.
Carthage the Town it self, in so great store of wealth and warlike provision, was the least of all other.

That day Scipio, having committed the charge of guarding and keeping the City unto Lelius and the mariners, brought back the legions into the camp, and commanded the souldiers to refresh their bodies with food and rest, wearied as they were, and over-laboured in one day with all man- I ner of toil and work that belongeth to war-service: as who, had both fought a battel in the field, and also taken so great pains, and undergone so much hazard and danger, in assaulting and forcing the City, yea, and after it was won, had fought with disadvantage of ground, with those that were fled into the Castle.

"The next day, after he had called both souldiers and mariners together, first he rendred laud and "praise, yea, and thanks unto the immortal Gods, who in one day had not only made him Lord of "the most mighty and wealthy City in all Spain, but also had laid up for him there against his co"ming, all the riches well-neer of Affrick and Spain: whereby as the enemies now had nothing "left them, so he and his had all things plentiful. Then he commended the vertue and valour of K
"his souldiers, whom neither the sallying out of the enemies could fright, nor the mighty height "of the walls scare, nor the blind and untried foords of the lake could once dismay, nor the situa"tion of the Castle seated upon an high cliff terrifie, nor yet the Castle it self most strongly built
"and fortified, was able to daunt and make afraid, but that they would pass over all and break "through all. And therefore albeit every one of them deserved at his hands all rewards, yet the "principal honour of a mural crown and garland, belonged properly unto him that first scaled and "mounted over the wall. Come be forth therefore (quoth he) and shew himself, who taketh him"self worthy of that gift, and let him claim his due. Whereupon there were two that put in for it, and demanded the same, Q. Trebellius, a Centurion of the fourth Legion, and Sext. Digitus, a Servitor at the Sea. Neither strived these parties themselves so hotly about the matter, as the love and favour of them set all the whole army divided into legionary souldiers, and servitours at Sea, in a L heat of contention, to labour for him that belonged to their side, and was a member as it were of their body. C. Lelius Admiral of the fleet, went with the Sailers and Seamen. M. Sempronius Tuditanus was altogether for the legionary Land-souldiers. This debate was like to breed a scab, and to raise a very mutiny in the holt. Whereupon Scipio pronounced that he would appoint as Delegates three Commissioners, to sit upon the cause who should take the deposition of witnesses, and give their verdict accordingly, whether of these two persons entred over the wall first into the Town. Now because C. Lelius and M. Sempronius were Advocats to the one party and the other, he therefore adjoyned unto them a third person, one P. Cornelius Candinus, to go as an indifferent Mediator between them two: and gave order and commandment, that those other three commissioners aboveseid should sit together, and hear and determine the controversie. When as M the matter grew to a greater heat of contention, by reason that men of such mark and worth, were acquainted with the action, and had their hand in it, who were not so much Advocats to plead, but moderators and judges to bear down a side; C. Lelius, rising out from the court, came to the "Tribunal seat unto Scipio: and informed him that the manner of proceeding in this matter in "question, was without all good order, modesty and reverence; and so handled, that they were "like to go together by the ears, and try it out by knocks. But, be it, quoth he, that no blows be "dealt, yet it is a most shameful example and detestable precedent, that the honor and guerdon
"due to vertue, should be carried by fraudulent coven and ungodly perjury. For, quoth he, the le-
"gionary souldiers stand of the one hand, the Sea servitors on the other, and ready they be to swear
"on both sides all the oaths of God, and to that rather which their will and affection carrieth them N
"to, than which in their conscience they know to be true. By which guilt of forswearing and per"jury, they will not only bring a curse and vengeance upon themselves and their own lives, but "also upon the ensigns, standards, and very Eagles, yea, and their religious military Oath and Sa"crament. Thus much I thought good to give you advertisement of afore-hand, and that by the ad"vise of P. Cornelius, and M. Sempronius. Scipio after he had highly praised Lelius, called the soul-diers to an assembly, and there with a loud voice pronounced, and said thus: I am sufficiently informed upon certain relation, that Q. Trebellius, and Sex. Digitus scaled the wall both together, and therefore I award as well to the one as to the other a mural garland, in token and testimony of their singular vertue. Then he rewarded the rest also, according to every mans desert and valorous service. But above all other, he honoured C. Lelius Admiral of the fleet, not only in O matching him equally with himself in all commendable parts and qualities, but also in presenting him with a coronet of beaten gold, and thirty Oxen. Then he gave commandment that the hostages of the Cities and States of Spain should be called forth. What a number were of them, I am abashed and loth to set down in writing: for almuch as I find in some Chronicles, that they were upon some three hundred, in others 725. The like variety there is of other matters, amongst sundry writers; One writeth that the Punick garrison were ten thousand: another 7000.

A and a third comes with his two thousand, and no more. I meet with one record which reporteth, that there were 10000 taken prisoners: and another, that there were above 25000. Of Scorpions or Crosbows, great and small, I should say there were gained some 60, if I would take for mine author Silenus, a greek writer: but if I follow Valerius Antias and go by him I should tell you a tale of six thousand of the greater sort, and thirteen thousand of the smaller. See how little rule they had of their tongues to over-reach, or stay of their pens to set down so loud lies upon record. Nay, they are not well agreed so much as upon this point, who were the great Captains and Commanders. Most of them say, that Lælius was L. Admirall: there be again that would have M. Junius Syllanus to be the man. And Armes was Captain of the Punick garrison, and yielded to the Romans, if ye list to beleeve Valerius Antias: but by the testimony and credit of others, it was B Mago. Moreover, the records accord not about the number of ships that were taken, nor of the weight of gold and silver, nor yet of the sum of money that was raised of the pillage. To conclude, if we must needs beleeve some one or other, the mean between is the best, and carrieth most likelihood of the truth.

But to return again to Scipio: "When he had called forth the hostages into his presence, first he "bad them all in generall to be of good cheer: for why? they were now in the hands of the peo- "ple of Rome, who ever desired to bind men unto them by favours and good turns more than to "awe them with fear and dread; and to have forrain nations knit and joyned in faithful amity, "rather than held in subjection by heavy servitude. Then after he had taken the names in writ-
C ing of their severall Cities, he also reviewed the number of the prisoners, and counted just how many belonged to every State. Which done, he dispatched messengers home into their countries, willing their parents and friends to come and receive every man their own. If haply any Embassadors of their Cities were present, he restored unto them their own hostages without delay: for all the rest, he gave expres charge to C. Flaminius the Treasurer to see unto them in all kind, courteous, and liberall usage. Whiles he was busie in taking this order, there hapned to come from among the hostages, even out of the midst of the company, an aged gentlewoman, the wife of Mandonius, brother to Indibilis, a Prince and great Lord of the Ilergetes. "She shed tears, and "fell down prostrate at the feet of the L. General: and withall began to beseech him most instant-"ly, to give a more special charge, concerning the custody of the women-sex: and to recommend "them to their keepers, for to be guarded with a careful eye, and to be kept and attended on D "more tenderly. Why? quoth Scipio, I warrant thee good woman, they shall want for nothing "that is meet for them. Then replied this Dame again, We stand not so much (quoth she) upon "these terms; for a little thing, God wot, may serve and content them in this poor estate and low "condition: my care is for another matter, when I consider and behold the young and tender "age of these maidens here. As for my self, I am now past date, and without danger of that injury, "which our sex is subject and exposed unto. Now there stood about her the daughters of Indibilis, virgins in the fresh prime and flower of their age, and passing fair and beautiful withall; besides some other Ladies as nobly born as they: who all honoured her as their natural mother that bare them. Then Scipio, "I would (quoth he) in the ordinary course as well of mine own discipline "as of that which is established by the people of Rome, have a respective consideration, that no E "one thing among us should suffer abuse, which elsewhere in any place of the world is held invi- "olable: this would I do, I say, for mine own credit, and for the honour of Rome: but to have a "more special eye that way, your own vertue also and worthiness bindeth me: who in the midst "of these your calamities and miseries have not forgot your womanly carriage and the honour of "your sex. And thereupon he delivered them over to the custody of a man of approved honesty and integrity, commanding him to guard them with no less reverence, modesty, and continency, than if they were the wives or mothers of their neerest friends that gave them entertainment. After this, there was presented unto him by his souldiers a damosel and virgin of ripe years, taken also prisoner: but so well favoured and surpassing in beauty, that whersoever she went every mans eye was upon her, in admiration of so rare and perfect a creature. Scipio having enquired of F her country where she was born, and likewise of what parents she was descended; among other things learned, that she was espoused and affianced to a young Prince of the Celtiberians, whose name was Allucius. Forthwith he sent home to her parents and foresaid spouse, for to repair unto him: and in the mean time he understood that her husband that should be was wonderfully enamoured of her, and ready to die for her love. So soon as the young Gentleman was come, Scipio entred into a more familiar speech with him, than he did either with the father or mother of the maiden, and in these terms he entertained him: "I am a young man (quoth he) as well as your "self. Come on therefore, let us young men both devise and commune together more freely, and "not be too nice, coy, and bashfull one to the other. After that your espoused wife, taken captive "by my souldiers, was brought unto me, and that I heard of the exceeding fame and affection G "that you cast upon her, I beleeved it full well: for her singular beauty deserveth no less. Now for- "asmuch as my self, if I might be allowed to use the pastimes of youth, (I mean no otherwise than "in honest and lawful love) and were not called away by the Common-weal, & employed wholly "in other affairs of state, I would think to be pardoned and held excused, if I had an extraordina- "ry liking to a spouse of mine own, and loved her extreamly. I must therefore needs favour and "tender your love, which is the thing I can, considering that I may not the other in any wise. Your "sweet-heart and best beloved I have entertained as well, and as respectively, as she should have " been with your father and mother in law, who are her own kind and natural parents. Reserved H

" she hath been, and kept for you alone, that you might receive her at my hands, unspotted and un" touched, and a present beseeming me and you both. In lieu and recompence therefore of this
" boon and gift which I now bestow upon you, I require at your hands again this only pro" mise and faithful covenant, that you will be a friend and well-willer to the State of Rome. And if " you take me indeed to be a good and honest man, such as these nations and people here have " known my father and uncle to have been before me: know you thus much, that in the City of " Rome there are many more like unto us: and that there cannot at this day a nation in the world
" be named, which you would wish less to be an enemy to you and yours, or desire more to en" tertain as your friend. The young Gentleman being abashed for very modesty, and yet right glad and joyfull withall, held Scipio by the hand, called upon all the gods, and besought them in his I behalf to thank and recompence him therefore, since it lay not in his own proper power, in any proportion or measure to be thankful and make requitall, either as himself could wish, or as Sci- pio had deserved. Then were the parents and kinsfolk of the maid called for: who seeing the dam-sell freely rendred and given them again, for whose ransome and redemption they had brought with them a sufficient sum of gold; fell to intreating and requesting Scipio to vouchsafe for to accept the same at their hands, as a gift and token of their good will: assuring him, that in so doing, they should take themselves no less bound and beholden unto him, than for the restoring and delivering of the virgin untouched and undefiled; Scipio seeing them so earnest and importunate, promised for to receive it, and withall, commanded that it should be laid down at his feet: and calling Allucius unto him, " Here (quoth he) over and besides all your other dowry which your K " father in law must pay you, have from me thus much more money to mend your marriage with,
" take this gold therefore to your self, and keep it for your own use. And so after this rich reward given, and great honour done unto him, he was dismissed, and departed home with much joy and hearts content: where he made report unto his countrymen and people of the praise-worthy vertues of Scipio, and the favours from him received; saying moreover, there was come into Spain a young man resembling the immortall gods in all respects; who as well by bounty, liberality, and bestowing benefits, as by martiall prowess and force of arms, is in the very way to win and conquer all. So when he had assembled and mustred all his vassals and tenants, he returned within few daies accompanied with a train of fourteen hundred of the best and most choice horsemen of his country. L

Scipio keeping Lælius still with him, untill by his advice and counsel he had disposed of the captives, hostages, and other prizes and pillage: after he had setled all in good order, appointed a Galiace of five banks of oars, wherein he embarked the prisoners, with Mago and some fifteen Senators besides, who together with him were taken, and sent them to Rome with a messenger, to carry tidings of this victory. Himself determined to sojourn a few daies in Carthage, which time he spent in training and exercising his souldiers, as well of land service as at sea. The first day he caused the Legions to run to and fro in their armour four miles out in length. The second day he commanded them to scour and furbish their harness and weapons before their tents. Upon the third day they joyned and encountred in battel-wise, and practised to fight with blunt wasters and bastons; yea, and lanced one at another darts and javelins, rounded at the point end with M bals in manner of foils. The fourth day they rested and reposed themselves. On the fifth day again they ran at turnament as before, armed. This order they kept, exercising, labouring, and resting by turns, so long as they abode at Carthage. And thus much for the Legionary souldiers. The sea-servitors and mariners used in calm water and still weather to row up into the sea, and there to make triall of the nimbleness and agility of their ships, representing shews of sea-fight and skirmish. Thus without the City, they enured their bodies, and quickned their spirits and courages both on land and water. Within the town there was nothing heard but preparation of war-furniture. All the publike shops and work-houses full of smiths, engineers, and all other artificers for the purpose, plying their work, and never going from it. The Generall himself, as supervisor, with equall and indifferent care oversaw all, One while he would be with the Armado in the har- N bour: another while, he conversed among the Legions, and turneyed with them. A time he would set by for to visit the works about the walls, and see how they went forward. Otherwhiles he would be in the shops aforesaid, among the multitude of the Carpenters, and Smiths, and other Artisans, viewing what they did there; and in the arsenall and ship-docks, observing and marking how much they went forward day by day, striving by way of emulation, as they did, who could do most and quit himself best. Having thus set them a work, repaired the walls which he had battered and shaken, and placed certain guards there, for the defence of the City; he took his journey to Taracon: and all the way he was visited and plied with sundry embassages. Some of them he answered and dispatched as he was in his journey: others he put off, to give their attendance at Ta- racon: for thither he had summoned all the allies and confederates, both new and old, to meet O him. And in manner, all the Cities and States on this side Iberus, and many also of the farther Province of Spain there assembled.

The Carthaginian Captains and Commanders at the first of set purpose, suppressed and stopped the rumour of the winning of Carthage. But when the thing was too too apparent, & could not be hidden and smothered, they used all the words they could to elevate it, and make the matter less than it was. To wit, " That by a sudden invasion and expedition of the Romans in one day
" [illegible]

A "(as it were) by ſtealth, it chanced that one of the Cities of Spain was ſurprized: that the inſolent
"and fooliſh young man bearing himſelf prodigally proud, and jocund beyond all meaſure, would
"ſeem to make up the meaſure of ſo ſmall a catch that he had got, with a great ſhew of a brave vi"ctory: but when he ſhall hear once that there are three Generals coming toward him, and three "victorious armies of enemies, he will ſoon pull in his horns: he will then tell us another tale,
"when preſently he ſhall call to remembrance with grief of every vain in his heart, the death of "father, of uncle, and other progenitors. Theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches they gave out among the people and common ſort, knowing in their own conſcience what a blow they had caught, and how much their ſtrength was decayed by the loſs of new Carthage.

The ſeven and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

THus ſtood the affairs in Spain. In Italy the Conſul Marcellus having recovered Salapia by compoſition, won by force two towns from the Samnits, Maronea and Meles. Where there were ſlain three thouſand of Annibal his ſouldiers, who had been left there in garriſon. Some good portion of the pillage was ſhared among the ſouldiers. Of wheat beſides, there was found there 24000 meaſures called Modii, and of barley 110000. But the joy from hence was not ſo great as the loſs and damage received within few daies after, not far F from the City Herdonea. Cn. Fulvius the Pro-Conſul lay there encamped upon hope to regain that City, which after the defeat at Canna, had revolted from the Romans: a town neither ſeated in a place of ſurety, nor yet well furniſhed and manned for defence. The Captain thereof (Cn. Fulvius aforeſaid) was by nature ever negligent, but grown much more rechleſs now, preſuming upon a vain hope that he had of them within, in that he perceived how the townſmen already began to fail in their devotion and faithfull allegeance to the Carthaginians, eſpecially, after they heard, that upon the loſs of Salapia, Annibal was departed out of thoſe parts into the Brutians country. Annibal had intelligence of all this brought unto him from Herdonea by G ſecret meſſengers, which, as it cauſed him to have a carefull eye to the ſaving and keeping of a friend City, ſo it miniſted good hope unto him for to ſurpriſe his enemie at unawares and unprovided. Whereupon with his army lightly appointed, he took long journies and made haſte to Herdonea, ſo as he prevented almoſt the fame and bruit of his coming. And to ſtrike the more terrour into his enemie, he thither marched in battell array. The Roman Generall, as adventurous and bold as he every way, but nothing at all ſo politick, nor ſo ſtrong, brought his forces forth in more haſte than good ſpeed, and gave him battell. His fifth legion, and the left wing or cornet of Cavalry began the skirmiſh, and charged hotly. But Annibal had given his horſemen direction, that when the Infantry was in the midſt of skirmiſh, with mind & eye wholly occupied that way, they ſhould wheel about and fetch a compaſs, and whiles ſome of them aſſailed the Camp, the reſt ſhould play upon the back of their enemies: himſelf iterating eftſoons unto H his men the name of Cn. Fulvius, for likeneſs ſake, becauſe two years before in the very ſame quarters, he had vanquiſhed another Cn. Fulvius who was Prætor alſo, aſſured them of the like ſucceſs now in this conflict. And verily this conceit and hope of his proved not vain and fruſtrate. For when as in cloſe fight and skirmiſh of the footmen many of the Romans were falo down and ſlain, but ſo, as yet the ranks ſtood unbroken, and the enſigns upright, behold a ſudden freſh charge of the horſemen on their back, and a great ſhout of the enemies withall deſcried and heard from the camp, firſt diſcomfited the ſixt legion, which being marſhalled in the ſecond battaillon, had been put in diſarray before by the Numidians, & then the fift, & ſo conſequently even thoſe that fought in the forefront of the vanguard before the enſigns. Some fled amain, others were killed in the midſt between, where Cn. Fulvius himſelf with twelve Tribunes of Knight marſhals were left dead I in the place. Of Romans and Allies how many died in that conflict, who is able to ſet down for certain; ſeeing in ſome records I find the number fifteen thouſand, and in others not above ſeven thouſand?

The conqueror Annibal was Maſter likewiſe of the Camp and all the pillage there. As for the town Herdonea, becauſe he underſtood for truth, that it minded to have revolted unto the Romans, and would not continue faſt in their fidelity, if his back were once turned: after he had conveyed away the multitude of the inhabitants to Metapontum and the Thurians, he ſet it on fire and burnt it quite. The Nobles and principall Citizens, who were known to have had ſecret talk and conference with Fulvius he put to death. The Romans, who out of ſo great an overthrow eſcaped, made ſhift by divers and ſundry waies to flie, half naked as they were, to Marcellus the K
Coſ. into Samnium. But Marcellus nothing diſmaied and affrighted at this ſo great deſeat, addreſſeth his letters to the Senat at Rome, with advertiſement of the loſs of the Captain Generall, and the army at Herdonea: giving them yet to underſtand how himſelf, even he who after the Cannian field had tamed and danted Annibal, as luſty and proud as he was upon that victory, was minded preſently to encounter him, and make him take no long joy and pleaſure, wherein he now ſo vanted and exalted himſelf.

And at Rome verily, as they mourned much for the loſs paſt, ſo they feared as greatly the future dangers. The Conſul having paſſed out of Samnium into the Lucans country, late down before Numiſtro, in the very ſight of Annibal, and there in a plain encamped himſelf, notwithſtanding the enemy was poſſeſſed before of the hill, and had the vantage of the ground. And for to make L more ſhew of his own confidence, and how little he feared, he firſt brought forth his men, and marſhalled them in order ready to bid battell. Annibal ſo ſoon as he ſaw the enſigns advanced forth of the gates, ſtaid not behind. And they arranged their battels in ſuch manner, as that the Carthaginians with the right wing took up part of the hill, and the Romans diſplaied their left wing in length, to the very walls of the town. After they had continued fight from the third hour of the day unto night, and that the vanguards on both ſides were weary with maintaining of skirmiſh ſo long: then the firſt legion of the Romans, with the right wing of their horſemen; the Spaniſh ſouldiers alſo of Annibal his part, the Balearian ſlingers likewiſe, together with the Elephants, began the fight, whiles the reſt were already in hot conflict, and cloſe together. For a long time the fight ſhrunk not of any hand. The firſt legion of the Romans was ſeconded with M the coming in of the third: and among the enemies likewiſe there came in new ſouldiers that were luſty in place of the ſoiled and wearied. Whereby, of a lingring and long skirmiſh there began all on a ſudden a new, hot, and cruell battell, by reaſon that their courages were freſh, and their bodies in heart. But the night parted the fray, and left the victory doubtfull in the midſt. The morrow after, the Romans from ſun-riſing ſtood arranged in the field untill it was far day: and ſeeing none of the enemies appear and ſhew themſelves, they fell to gather up the ſpoils by leiſure, and heaped up in one place all the bodies of their own men that were ſlain, and made one great fire, and burnt them to aſhes. The night enſuing Annibal diſlodged ſecretly without any noiſe, and departed into Apulia. And Marcellus, ſo ſoon as day-light diſcovered the flight of his enemy (leaving his hurt and wounded people at Numiſtro with a ſmall guard, and L. Furius Purpurio a Co- N lonell to be their Captain) followed him by his ſteps, and at Venuſia overtook him. There for certain daies paſſed ſome ſallies from the guards of both armies, whiles both horſe and foot one with another rather made ſlight skirmiſhes, than any ſet battels; and lightly the Romans had alwaies the better hand. From thence the armies were conducted through Apulia, without any memorable fight at all, by reaſon that Annibal in the night ſeaſon ever ſet forward, ſeeking ſome opportunity of forelaying and entrapping his enemy; and Marcellus never followed but in broad day light, and ſent out his eſpials before to clear the coaſts.

In this mean while Flaccus ſpending the time at Capua, in making port-ſale of the noblemens goods, and in ſetting and letting out to farm the land which was confiſcate and forfeit to the common-wealth of Rome (and all for a rent of corn) there hapned a new complot and practice O which lay hidden for the time, to be detected and come to light, to the end that he might never want one matter or other to take occaſion for to plague and torment the Campans. He had taken order that his ſouldiers ſhould remove out of the houſes within the town, partly for that as well the tenements of the ſaid town within as the lands without ſhould be rented forth: and partly for fear leſt the exceeding pleaſantneſs and delectable ſeat of that City ſhould effeminate his army, as it had done the hoſt of Annibal before time: and commanded them to build themſelves

about the gates and along the walls, cottages and sheds in warlike fashion, and only to serve for souldiers. These were most of them made of hurdles and boords, some warled and wound with reeds, and all of them thatched with straw and stubble, as it were of purpose to minister fuell for fire. Now there were some hundred and seventy Campans had conspired at one certain hour of the night to set all a fire: and the principall heads and Captains were certain brethren of the Blosii: and it fortuned that by some of the same house and family the conspiracy was disclosed. Whereupon at once the gates were made fast by the commandment of the Pro-Consul: and the alarm being stricken up and sounded all the souldiers ran together. All those that were party or privy to the intended treason were apprehended, and after rigorous examination had by torture, they were condemned and executed: the informers were made free, and had each one a reward of * 10000 peeces of brass called Asses.

* 31 lib. 5 sterl.

When the Nucerines and Acerrans made moan that they wanted place of habitation, forasmuch as Acerra was in part burnt, and Nuceria utterly razed and destroyed: Marcellus referred them over to the Senat of Rome, and sent them thither. The men of Acerra had leave granted to re-edifie again their own edifices which were burned: But they of Nuceria, according to their own desire, were translated to Atella, and the Atellans commanded to remove unto Calatia, there to dwell.

Amidst the managing of many and weighty affairs, which falling out variably, one while well, another while ill, buzzed and amused the minds of men; yet the Romans forgot not the Castle of Tarentum: for M. Ogulnius and P. Aquilius, went as Embassadors into * Ætolia, for to buy up corn, to be conveighed and brought to Tarentum: and a thousand souldiers out of the City army, whereof the number of Romans and Allies was all one, were sent with the said corn thither to lie in garrison.

* Or Hetruria.

Now was the summer at an end, and the time drew neat of the Consuls election. But the letters of Marcellus unto the Senat (wherein he signified that it was not for the good of the Commonwealth to depart one foot from Annibal, whom he himself pursued still at heels, and so much the more hotly because he fell off and forbare to fight:) set the LL. of the Senat into a great perplexity, for fear either to call away the Consul from the wars, especially now in the midst of his best service, or to be without Consuls the next year. But it was thought in the end the best course, that Valerius the Consul, although he were not in Italy, but beyond sea, should rather be sent for, and called forth of Sicily. So by order from the Senat, there were letters dispatched unto him, from L. Manlius the Prætor of the City, together with those other letters of M. Marcellus the Consul: to give him to understand what the reason was, why the LL. called him rather out of his Province than his Collegue and companion in government.

At the same time there fortuned Embassadors to come unto Rome from King Syphax, "Recounting what prosperous wars their King had fought with the Carthaginians, assuring the Senat, that their Lord and Master, as he was not a greater enemy to any nation than to the Carthaginians, so he was not more ready to friend any State than the Romans: saying moreover, "that he had sent aforetime his Embassadors into Spain unto the Roman Generals Cn. and P. Scipios, and now was most willing to seek for the amity and friendship of the Romans even at the "very fountain and well head. The Senat not only returned answer to those Embassadors in most gracious and courteous terms, but also addressed Embassadors of their own with rich gifts unto the King, and by name, L. Genutius, P. Petellius, and P. Popilius. The presents which they carried were a side robe, and a kirtle of purple, an Ivory chair, a boll or cup of beaten gold, weighing five pound. These Embassadors had in commission and charge, presently after they had dispatched with the King, to visit other Princes and great Lords of Affrick: and for to bestow on them also, they carried robes pursled and embroidered with purple, and golden bowls of three pound weight. Likewise there were sent as far as Alexandria (in Ægypt) unto King Ptolomeus and Cleopatra the Queen, M. Attilius and M. Acilius as Embassadors, for to call to remembrance, and renew the old friendship: and to them also they presented gifts, namely unto the King a long robe and a kirtle of purple, with an ivory chair: unto the Queen a rich mantle of Baudkin, wrought with sundry colours, with a vail of purple.

In this summer time, whiles these foresaid matters passed, there were from out of the Cities and country towns adjoyning many prodigious sights, and fearfull tokens reported. At Tusculum, there fell a Lamb having an udder yielding milk: the louver and lantern of the Temple of Jupiter was strucken with lightning, and in manner all the roof uncovered. And much about those daies at Anagnia, the very soil and ground before the gate thereof caught fire with lightning, and for one day and night burned so, without any matter of fuell: and the fouls and birds of the air forsook their nests which they had built in the trees of the grove consecrated to Diana, near unto the carrefour or cross way of Anagnia. Near unto Tarracina there were seen in the sea, not far from the haven, serpents of an huge and wonderfull bigness to leap up above the water, and to disport and play like fishes. At Tarquinii a swine farrowed a pig with a mans face. Also in the territory of Capena, about the grove and temple of Feronia there were four Statues sweat much blond a day and a night. These fearfull tokens were by a decree of the Prelats purged and expiate by greater sacrifices. And a solemn Supplication proclaimed one day at Rome in every Church and Chappell before all the shrines of the gods: and another day in the territory of Capena, at the said grove and chappell of Feronia.

M. Valerius the Conſul, called by the foreſaid letters of the Senate, after he had recommended H the charge of the Province and the Army, unto Cincius the Prætor; and ſent M. Valerius Meſſala the Admiral of the Navy, with a certain number of ſhips into Affrick, as well to fetch in prizes, as to eſpy and learn what the people of Carthage did and went about: himſelf with ten ſail took the ſeas, and having a proſperous fore-wind arrived at Rome. And being come, preſently he aſſem-bled the Senat, where he declared what acts and deeds he had performed in his Province, namely, "Whereas for the ſpace almoſt of threeſcore years there had been war in Sicily both by land
"and ſea, and the ſame oftentimes fought with great loſs and many defeats; that he now had "brought thoſe troubles to an happy end, and ſet the Province in quiet. That there was not in all "Sicily one Carthaginian left; nor one Sicilian, of all them that for fear had been chaſed and dri"ven out from thence, but was returned and there replanted; that they were all brought home I
"again to their own Cities to inhabit, to their own lands, to plough and ſow; that now at laſt
"the fore-let and waſte ground was husbanded again, and made fruitfull, not only for the profit "and commodity of the occupiers and tenants thereof, but alſo for the moſt aſſured relief and u"ſtentation of the people of Rome, both in war and peace. After this, Mutines, and the reſt who had deſerved any thing well of the City of Rome, were brought into the Senat: unto whom, both all and ſome (for the credit of the Conſul, and to diſgrace him of his promiſe unto them) there were rendred all ſorts of honourable recompence. Mutines alſo was enfranchiſed Citizen of Rome, and a Bill was preferred in that behalf to the people, by the Tribune of the Commons, and with the grant and authority of the Senate.

During theſe affairs at Rome, M. Valerius Meſſala arrived in Affrick with a fleet of 50 ſail, and K being landed one morning before day, ſuddenly and unawares to the people of the country, made a rode into the territory about Utica: and having forraged it far and near, taken many men and women priſoners, and raiſed a great booty of all ſorts of things beſides, returned to the Armado, and croſſed the ſeas back for Sicily, and arrived again at Lilybæum upon the thirteenth day after he looſed from thence, and took the ſeas firſt. Of the Captives (after ſtraight examination) he learned thus much (which alſo he ſet down orderly in writing, and ſent unto the Conſul Lævinus, that he might be acquainted likewiſe with the ſtate of the affairs in Affrick) namely, "that there
"were in Carthage five thouſand Numidians, under the conduct of Maſaniſſa the ſon of Gala, a
"moſt forward young man, and a right valiant warrior; that there were other ſouldiers alſo
"throughout all Affrick waged and levied for money, ready to be tranſported and ſent over into L
"Spain unto Aſdrubal, to the end that he with a moſt puiſſant power might with all ſpeed paſs
"over into Italy, and joyn his forces with Annibal: that in the effecting of this deſignment, the "Carthaginians were aſſuredly perſwaded of the victory. Moreover, that there was a mighty na"vy a rigging and decking for to recover Sicily again, and as they verily thought, it ſhould paſs
"the ſeas very ſhortly.

Theſe news being read by the Conſul, ſo troubled and diſquieted the Senat, that they thought there was no tarrying for the ordinary election of Magiſtrates, ſummoned and called by the Con-ſul, but that they ſhould nominate a Dictator of purpoſe to aſſemble that ſolemn Seſſion, and the Conſul immediatly to return again into his Province. But hereupon grew ſome debate and queſtion for a time, while the Conſul ſaid, that he would nominate and create Dictator M. Vale- rius Meſſala, who was then in Sicily, and Admiral of the fleet: but the LL. replied again and ſaid, that M a Dictator might not be elected or declared without the Territories of Rome, and thoſe were all within the limits and marches of Italy. But after that M. Lucretius (a Tribune of the Commons) had put this controverſie to queſtion before the Senat for to be caſt and decided by their opinions; then the Senate granted out a decree, That the Conſul before he departed from the City, ſhould put up a bill or ſupplication unto the body of the people, that it would pleaſe them to elect a Dictator: and whomſoever they by their ſuffrages choſe, him ſhould he pronounce and declare for the Dictator: and in caſe the Conſul refuſed ſo to do, then the Prætor of the City ſhould propoſe the ſame unto the people: and if not he neither, then the Tribunes ſhould propound it unto the Commons. But when the Conſul denied flatly to put it unto the people, being a thing meerly belonging to his authority and place, and likewiſe expreſſely forbad the Prætor to do it: N then the Tribunes of the Commons took the matter upon them, whereupon the Commons granted, that Q. Fulvius, who then was in Capua, ſhould be nominated Dictator. But the night before that very day that this aſſembly of the Commons was to be holden, the Conſul departed priſily, and took his journey toward Sicily. The Nobles thus being diſappointed and deſtitute, thought good to ſend letters unto Marcellus, for to lend his helping hand now unto the Common-weal, thus forſaken and abandoned by his Collegue, and to declare him for Dictator, whom the people had by their voices elected. So Q. Fulvius was pronounced Dictator by Marcellus the Conſul: and by vertue of the ſaid act of the Commons, P. Licinius Craſſus the Arch-Prelate, was by Q. Fulvi- us nominated Generall of the Cavalry.

The Dictator after he was come to Rome, ſent Cn. Sempronius Bleſus his Lieutenant, whom he O had at Capua, to the Army into the Province of Hetruria, in ſtead of C. Calphurnius the Prætor: whom by his letters he moved to take the government of Capua, and his army there. And himſelf ſent out precepts for the ſolemn elections of Conſuls, againſt the firſt Comitial day that he might by Law. But by reaſon of a contention that grew between the Tribunes of the Commons and the Dictator, it could not paſs and be performed. For the Century Galeria of the younger ſort,

A ſort, which by lot had the prerogative of giving their firſt voices, elected for Conſuls Q. Fulvius, and Q. Fabius: unto whoſe election no doubt, the reſt of the Tribes called forth in right courſe and lawfull order would have enclined, but that C. and L. Ariani, the Tribunes of the Commons came between with their negative voice: who ſaid, it ſtood not well with civility, that one man ſhould continue ever ſtill in Magiſtracy, and beſides, that it was a more ſhamefull example and foul precedent, that himſelf ſhould be created Conſul, who aſſembled the election: and therefore, if the Dictator would admit of his own name, and allow himſelf eligible, they would not ſuffer the aſſembly to continue any longer: but if there might be ſome other propounded beſides him, they would not hinder the proceedings thereof untill all was finiſhed. "The Dictator alledged
B "in the behalf of the election, and maintained the cauſe by the authority of the Senat, by the "grant and act of the Commons, and by ſundry examples of former times. For when Cn. Servili- "us was Conſul, at what time as Flaminius the other Conſul was ſlain at Thraſymenus: by order "granted out of the Senat, there was a bill preferred to the Commons, and the ſame paſſed by "their voices, That ſo long as the war continued in Italy, it might be lawfull for the people to "chuſe and create Conſuls again, as often as they pleaſed, whoſoever they would, out of the "number of them that had been Conſuls. And as for examples (quoth he) in this caſe, I can al-"ledge both old and new: to wit, long ago L. Poſthumius Megillus being Interrex, was even in "that very election which he called and held, created Conſul himſelf, with Cn. Jun. Bubulcus: and "of latter daies Q. Fabius likewiſe, who verily would never have accepted of the Conſulſhip, and C "ſuffered it to be hung upon him ſo continually, if he had deemed it to be againſt the good of "the common-weal. After much debate and long alteration, entertained with ſundry like ſpee-ches, at length the Dictator and the Tribunes agreed to this point, and agreed of this iſſue, That they would ſtand to the award and judgment of the Senat. The LL. of the Senat were all of this mind, that the preſent condition of the common-weal required no leſs, but that the ſtate and the affairs thereof ſhould be managed by old and experienced Captains and Generals, and ſuch as were skilfull in feats of arms. And therefore they utterly miſliked that the election ſhould be hin-dred and diſturbed. Thus the Tribunes relented, and the election went forward and was finiſhed. So there were declared Conſuls, Q. Fabius Max. the fifth time, Q. Fulvius Flaccus the third time. Then were created Prætors, L. Veturius Philo, T. Quintius Criſpinus, C. Hoſtilius Tubulus, and C. Au- D runculeius. When the Magiſtrates were once elected for the year, Q. Fulvius reſigned up his Di-ctators room.

In the very end of this ſummer, a Carthaginian fleet of forty ſail, under the conduct of Amil-car the Admiral, paſſed over into Sardinia, and at firſt invaded and waſted the territory of Olbia: then, after that P. Manlius Volſo the Prætor there, ſhewed himſelf with an army, they ſet a com-paſs about, and ſailed to the other ſide of the Iſland, and forraged the lands about Caralita: and ſo returned again into Affrick, enriched with prizes and booties of all ſorts.

In that year divers Prieſts died at Rome, and new ſubſtituted in their rooms. C. Servilius the Prelat or Pontifex was inveſted and inſtalled inſtead of T. Octacilius Craſſus. In like manner T. Sempronius Longus, the ſon of Caius, was choſen Decemvir, deputed for holy ceremonies, in place
E of T. Sempronius Longus, the ſon of Titus. M. Martius the King of Sacrificers departed this life: and M. Æmylius Pappus likewiſe the grand-Curio or Prieſt of the Curiæ: but to ſucceed them, were no Prieſts deputed that year. In this year alſo were Cenſors created, to wit, L. Veturius Philo, and P. Licinius Craſſus the High-Prieſt. As for Craſſus Licinius, had neither been Conſul nor Prætor, before he was made Cenſor, but ſtepped ſtreight from his Ædiles room into the place of Cenſor. But theſe Cenſors neither made choice of new Senators, nor yet did any publike act: the reaſon was, becauſe L. Veturius died, whereupon Licinius alſo gave over the Cenſorſhip. The Æ-diles of the Chair L. Veturius, and P. Licinius Varus, exhibited the Roman games, and renewed them again one day more than ordinary. The Ædiles of the Commons, Q. Catius, and L. Portius Licinius, ſet up in the Temple of Ceres, the molten images of braſs, which were made of the mo-
F ney taken for fines and amercements: and repreſented the plaies and paſtimes to their office be-longing, right ſtately and with great furniture and preparation, as the wealth and plenty of thoſe times would afford.

In the end of this year C. Lelius the Lieutenant of Scipio arrived at Rome, the four and thirtieth day after that he looſed and took ſea at Taracon: And as he entred the City with a mighty train of Captives, he ſet the people on running out of all parts to ſee that ſight. The morrow after he was admitted into the Senat-houſe: where he related, that new Carthage, the head City of Spain, was forced and won in one day; that divers Cities which had revolted were received upon ſurren-der; and other new entred into ſociety and friendſhip with the people of Rome. And by enquiry of the Captives they found their intelligences to agree in manner with the advertiſements and tidings contained in the letters of M. Valerius Maſſala. But the thing that troubled the Lords G moſt, was the voyage of Aſdrubal into Italy, which hardly was able to withſtand the forces of him and Annibal together. Lelius being brought into the generall aſſembly of the people, diſcour-ſed of the ſame points which he had related in the Senat-Houſe. And the Senat, in regard of the happy ſucceſs of P. Scipio, granted by a decree, a ſolemn proceſſion for one day; and gave order that C. Lelius with all convenient ſpeed ſhould make haſte again, and repair into Spain with the very ſame ſhips that he brought from thence.

The winning of Carthage I have ſet down in this year, having the warrant of many writers: and yet I am not ignorant, that some there be, who have affirmed that it hapned the next year following. But me seems, it was an unlikely matter, that Scipio should spend one whole year in Spain, in doing just nothing. H

Now when Q. Fabius Max. was Consul the fifth time, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus the third time, on that very day upon which they entred their office (which was in the Ides of March) both of them by decree of the Senat, had the government of the Province Italy: but so, as their jurisdiction was set out by the countries: so as Fabius should war about Tarentum, and Fulvius in the Lucans and Brutians countries. M. Claudius continued still in government one year longer. The Prætors had their Provinces parted between them by lot: unto Caius Hostilius Tubulus fell the jurisdiction over the Citizens, but to L. Veturius Philo, over forreiners, together with Gallia. Titus Quintius Crispinus ruled Capua, and C. Aurunculeius governed Sardinia. The armies were divided among the I Provinces in this wise: Unto Fulvius were assigned the two legions which M. Valerius Levinus had in Sicily: Unto Q. Fabius, those in Hetruria, which were commanded by C. Calphurnius. The City army was appointed to succeed those Legions in Hetruria: and C. Calphurnius was ordained to sit in the government of that Province, and to have the leading of that army which Q. Fulvius had. It was agreed moreover, that T. Quintius should be Lord President of Capua, and have the charge of the army there. And that C. Hostilius should receive the jurisdiction of C. Lectorius the Pro-Prætor, over the province at Ariminum, and likwise his army. Unto M. Marcellus the same legions were allowed, wherewith he had warred so fortunatly when he was Consul. Unto M. Valerius and L. Cincius (for they also continued one year more governours in Sicily) was the army remaining after the battell at Cannæ granted: and they were commanded to supply and make up K all the companies thereof, out of those souldiers that were left of the legions of Cn. Fulvius. For the Consuls caused them to be sought out and gathered together, and sent them into Sicily: and disgraced them with the very same kind of ignominious souldiery, in which the Cannians served: as also those who remaining of the army of Cn. Fulvius the Prætor, had been thither sent by order from the Senat, for anger and despite that they fled like as the other. Unto C. Aurunculeius, the same legions were given by decree in Sardinia, wherewith P. Manlius Volso had ruled and governed that Province. And P. Sulpitius having his government prorogued for one year longer, was commanded to rule Macedonia with the same legion and Armado still. Thirty Galleaces of five banks of oars were appointed to be sent out of Sicily unto Tarentum, to Q. Fabius the Consul. With the rest of the navy, it was agreed and order set down, that M. Valerius Levinus should either himL self pass over into Affrick, for to forrage and spoil the country, or send L. Cincius or M. Valerius Messala, whether of them he would. For the government of Spain there was no alteration, save only this, that Scipio and Syllanus had their commission continued, not for a year as the rest, but untill such time as they should be called from thence by order from the Senat. Thus were the Provinces divided, and thus were the forces bestowed for this year.

Among other affairs of greater importance, the Election of the high Curio, or chief parish-Priest, who was to be elected in the room of M. Æmylius late deceased, renewed and set on foot again an old contention [between Commons and Nobles.] For the Patritis denied, That C. Manilius Attilius (who was the only man of the Commons that stood for it) was eligible, and therefore not to be pricked; forasmuch as never any before him obtained that sacerdotall dignity, but M one of Senators calling. The Tribunes being called unto for their assistance referred the matter to the Senat. And the Senat put it unto the people, for to be decided by them. So C. Manilius Attilius was the first Commonner that ever was created Maximus Curio, [i. e. the grand-superintendent over all the Curiæ in matters of Religion.] And P. Licinius the Arch-bishop constrained C. Valerius Flaccus to be installed and inaugurate the Flamine of Jupiter against his will. And C. Lectorius was created Decemvir for holy rites and ceremonies, and for sacrifices, instead of Q. Mutius Scævola late deceased. The cause and occasion of inaugurating that Flamine by constraint and compulsion, I would willingly have concealed and smothered in silence, but that the ill name, wherein he was, turned afterwards to good fame and reputation. This Flaccus for his careless, loose and riotous demeanor in his youth, in regard of which vicious course of life he was odious to his own N naturall brother L. Flaccus, and other his kinsfolk, was for the same cause chosen Flamin by P. Licinius the said Arch-bishop. This man, so soon as his mind was employed about Church-matters and religious ceremonies, so suddenly all at once altered his life, and cast off his old behaviour, that there was not one of all the young men in Rome in more account and credit, nor better liked of the chief of the Nobility and LL. of the Senat, as well those of his own house and linage, as others that were strangers unto him. And when he saw himself grown generally into this good opinion and reputation among men, he began to have a very good conceit of his own parts and worthiness, insomuch, as he brought up an old custome again, and was so bold as to take his place in the Senat-House (a thing, that for many years space had been intermitted and discontinued in regard of the base unworthiness and insufficiency of the former Flamins.) When he was O entred into the Senat-chamber, C. Licinius the Prætor willed him to go forth, as being no place for him, and therewith drew him out: whenpon the Flamine called for help of the Tribunes of the Commons, pleading the ancient right and preheminence of that Priestly dignity, and alledging, that C. Flaminius in times past enjoyed that place, together with the pall or embroidered rich robe, and the Ivory chair. The Prætor on the other side cam upon him again, and said That right was not grounded upon old examples past all date, fetcht out of Chronicles time out of mind:

A but he would needs have it to be carried by the moſt freſh practice of the neweſt and lateſt cuſtome, affirming, That by preſcription of the time, either of our fathers or grandfathers daies, there was no Flamine of Jupiter uſurped that priviledge. The Tribunes, who were to moderate this queſtion, gave their judgment thus, That if a thing were forelet, and diſcontinued through the ſupine negligence of ſome Flamins, it was worſt for themſelves: and they deemed it no reaſon, that it ſhould hurt or prejudice the whole prieſthood. Whereupon, the Prætor himſelf forced not greatly upon the point: nor ſtood much with him, and ſo they admitted the Flamin into the houſe with great conſent of the Nobles, as well as of the Commons. And all men thus conceived of it, That the Flamin had obtained the thing, rather in regard of his ſanctimony and holineſs of life B than in the right of his ſacerdotall dignity.

The Conſuls before that they went into their Provinces, enrolled two legions of Citizens: for to ſupply and make up ſufficiently the defect of all the other forces. The old City army Fulvius the Conſul committed unto C. Fulvius Flaccus his Lieutenant, (and brother he was beſides to the Conſul) for to be led into Hetruria; with direction, that the Legions already in Hetruria ſhould be brought to Rome. And Fabius the Conſul cauſed the reſidue of the army of Fulvius to be ſought up and rallied, which aroſe to the number of 3336: and commanded his ſon Q. Maximus to lead them into Sicily, unto M. Valerius the Pro-Conſul, and of him to receive the charge of two Legions, and the thirty galliaces aforeſaid, bearing five ranks of oars. The withdrawing of theſe Legions out of the Iſland, nothing diminiſhed nor abridged the garriſons of that C Province, either in ſtrength or ſhew. For beſides the two old legions, well and ſufficiently filled and furniſhed, he had a great power, as well horſe as foot, of Numidians, ſuch as were fled from the adverſe part unto the Romans: and took up and levied beſides for new ſouldiers, even thoſe Siciſians alſo, who had been of the army of Epicides and the Carthaginians, men of approved valour, and skilfull warriors. Theſe forrain aids, when he had put to each of the Roman legions, he kept ſtill the form of two compleat armies. With the one he gave order to L. Cincius to defend that part of the Iſland which had been the Realm of King Hiero; with the other he maintained the reſt of the Iſland, divided ſometimes by the confines of the Roman and Punick dominions. There was a fleet alſo rigged and trimmed, conſiſting of ſeventy ſhips, for to guard and defend all the maritime coaſts, along the tract of the ſea ſide. Himſelf in perſon, with the horſeD men of Mutines, rode about all the Province, for to viſit the lands and grounds, and to take note which were tilled and well husbanded, which lay forelet and untilled, and to commend or chaſtiſe and rebuke the landlords and owners thereof accordingly. The care and regard of corn, thus far forth did good, that the Province was able both to ſend good ſtore to Rome, and alſo to convey unto Catana ſufficient to maintain the army that was to lie in ſtanding Camp that ſummer about Tarentum.

But the ſouldiers who were tranſported over into Sicily (and for the better part they were Latines and other Aſſociats) were like to cauſe a great riſing and commotion: whereby we may ſee, that of ſmall occaſions and beginnings oftentimes ariſe great matters of important conſequence. For the Latines and Allies in all their Diets and Councils at home, began to mutter and E grumble, "That now for ten years ſpace they were with continuall muſterings and paiments of "ſouldiers wages conſumed and ſpent, that there was not a year in manner went over their heads "but it coſt them ſome great loſs and overthrow in battell. Many were ſlain in the wars, other "died of diſeaſes. So that a Citizen of theirs, if he were taken and preſt once by the Romans, for "to be a ſouldier was more ſure to periſh, than if he were taken priſoner by the Carthaginians: "for the enemy ſent their captives back again gratis, and without ranſome, home into their coun"try: the Romans poſted and packed them away out of Italy, as confined to a place of ba"niſhment (to ſpeak truly) rather than appointed to ſerve in warfare. For, ſee how the ſouldiers, "remaining after the field of Canna, have continund there, and waxen old theſe eight years al"ready, and no doubt there were they like to lay their bones before that the enemy (who never ſo F "flouriſhed, nor was ſo ſtrong as now) would depart from thence. In caſe then that old ſouldiers "return not into their country, and new ſtill be choſen, within a while there would be none left "behind. And therefore beſt it were for them, before they were come to extream poverty and de"ſolation preſently to deny the people of Rome that, whiles ſomewhat is left, which ſhortly they "muſt be driven to do of very neceſſity when all is gone. And if the Romans ſee their Allies "once agree together, and take this courſe, they will then verily bethink themſelves, and grow to "ſome terms of making peace with the Carthaginians. For otherwiſe be ſure as long as Anni"bal hath a day to live Italy will never be clear of wars. Theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches paſſed in "their Diets aboveſaid. There were at that time thirty Colonies of the people of Rome: and whiles the Embaſſages from them all were at Rome, twelve of them denied the Conſuls flatly, and ſaid they were not able any longer to find either men or money. And thoſe were theſe, *Ar*G dea, Nepet, Sutrium, Circeii, Alba, Carſeoli, Sueſſa, Sora, Setia, Cales, Narnia, Interamna. The Conſuls amazed at this ſtrange and unexpected accident, being deſirous to drive them out of that mind, and to ſcare them from ſo deteſtable a reſolution, ſuppoſed they ſhould prevail more by chaſtiſing and rebuking, than by fair and gentle dealing: and therefore told them again, "That they had preſumed to ſpeak that unto the Conſuls, which they again were abaſhed "and could not find in their hearts to deliver and relate in the Senat-houſe. For ſurely (ſay they) "this is not a refuſall of ſouldiery and war ſervice, but a very meer revolting from the people

" of Rome, and no better than an open rebellion. Therefore they were best to return again speedily H
" into their several Colonies, and to consult with their neighbors & countrimen, whiles the mat" ter remained yet all whole, as men who had rather let fall some words rashly at adventure, than " resolved indeed to attempt and commit so hainous an act: yea and to tell them, and put them in " mind, that they themselves were neither Campans nor Tarentins, but meer Romans, from them
" descended, and of their race; from thence sent as Colonies into the lands that were won by " conquest, for to breed, increase, and multiply; and to admonish them, That whatsoever duties
" children owe to their parents, the same they owed unto the Romans, if there remained in them " any kind and naturall affection, any remembrance of their ancient native country: and to ex" hort them to consider better of the matter, and to lay their heads together anew. Forasmuch as " those designments of theirs tended to betray the State and Empire of Rome, and to deliver the I " victory of all unto Annibal. When the Consuls one after another had dealt and been in hand with them a long time in this manner: and the Embassadors nothing moved with their words, made answer again, That neither they knew what other message to bring home; nor their Senat what new counsell to take; since that they had not any more men to be mustred for souldiers, nor money to be paid for wages: the Consuls seeing them so stiffly and obstinatly bent, made relation thereof before the Senat, whereupon every man was stricken into so great fear and trouble of mind, that many of them gave out, that the Empire of Rome was come to an end. The like, say they, will the rest of the Colonies do, and surely all our confederates and allies are combined and agreed to betray the City of Rome unto Annibal. But the Consuls comforted the Senat, and bad them be of good chear, saying, That all the other Colonies besides would continue loyall and fast K in their duty and alleageance: and even those also which had failed in their obedience, if there might be Embassadors sent amongst them, to rebuke and chastise them, and not to speak them fair and entreat them by way of prayer, would no doubt have a respective reverence of the majesty of the Roman Empire. Now when the LL. of the Senat had committed the ordering of this matter wholly unto them for to manage and handle, according as they should think good for the weal-publike: after they had throughly sounded the hearts and minds of all the rest of the Colonies, they called and cited all the Embassadors, and demanded of them whether their souldiers were in readiness, according to the capitulations of the covenant. Then M. Sextilius of Fregelæ made answer in the behalf of eighteen of them, " That not only their souldiers were ready ac" cording to the form of the covenant, but also if more were needful more they would allow, and L
" whatsoever else the people of Rome imposed upon them, and wished them to perform the same
" would they strain themselves to do to the utmost: for, as yet they had people store, and a purse " good enough: and as for their heart, it was much better than their ability. The Consuls after they had made a short speech unto them by way of a preamble, saying, that they thought it not sufficient for their desert to be commended from their mouth only, unless all the LL. generally in the Senat-house gave them condign thanks with one voice and common accord, willed them to follow after them thither. The Senat having thanked them in as honourable terms as they could possibly devise, and entertained them with most gracious words, gave order to the Consuls, to bring them forth also in the face of the whole people of the City: and before them, among other singular favors and kindnesses which they had shewed both unto them and also un- M to their ancestors, to make rehearsall of this late good desert of others, which they afforded unto the Common-wealth: to the end that now also, after so many ages and lives of men past they should not be forgotten and buried in silence, nor defrauded of their just praise and due commendation. And these were they that remained true hearted and fast unto the City of Rome:
The Signins, Nolans, and Norbans; the Sarticulans, Brundusins, and Fregellans; the Lucerins, Venusins, and Adrians; the Firmans and inhabitants of Ariminum. And from the other sea side the Pontians, Pestans, and Costans: and of mid-landers, the Beneventins, Esternins, Spoletins, Placentins, and the Inhabitants of Cremona. Upon the aid and succour of these Colonies, the Roman state at this time rested and stood maintained: and these all were highly thanked both in the Senat and in the assembly of the people. As for the other twelve Colonies, which N had refused to do their obedience, the LL. of the Senat gave express commandment that they should not be so much as once minded or named: and that the Consuls should neither give them their dispatch, nor retain them still, nor so much as speak unto them. This silent kind of rebuke without word giving, seemed to stand most with the majesty and grandeure of the people of Rome.

Whiles the Consuls were diligent in providing and making ready all other things requisite and meet for the wars, it was thought good to bring abroad the vicesimary gold [ to wit, the twentieth part of all their tributes and revenues ] which had been laid up and reserved apart in a more secret closet of the City-chamber, against an hard winter (as they say) to serve for what need soever the Common-wealth should stand in. So there was taken forth four thousand pound weight of O gold, whereof three hundred pound was given to the two Consuls apiece, and so likewise to M.
Marcellus, and P. Sulpitius the Pro-Consuls: and to L. Veturnus the Prætor, unto whose lot the Province of France befell. And Fabius the Consul had an addition besides himself above the rest of one hundred pound weight of gold for to be carried into the Castle of Tarentum. The rest of the gold they disbursed for to make ready paiment down upon the nail unto them that undertook to provide apparrel for the army in Spain, which to their own fame, and the honour of their General, served there in the wars.

A Moreover, it was thought good, that before the Consuls departed into their Provinces the prodigious tokens should be purged and expiate. On the Alban mount there were smitten with fire from heaven the Image of Jupiter, and a tree standing near unto the Temple: likewise the lake at Hostia, the wall at Capua, and the Church of Fortune: and at Sinuessa the wall and gate of the town. These, I say were, blasted with lightning, and smitten with thunderbolts. There were some also brought word, that the water at Alba ran bloud. And at Rome within the sanctuary of the chappel of Fors Fortuna, a little image that stood upon her coronet, fell of its own accord from the head of the goddess into her hands. And at Privernum it was for certain reported and known of a truth, that an Oxe spake, and that a Vulture or Gripe flew into a shop in the market place, B when it was full of people. And at Sinuessa there was an Infant born of doubtfull sex, between male and female, (which the common sort call Androgynos, as for the most part greek names, admit more easie composition of two words than the Latine) and there it rained milk, and a man-child was born with an Elephants head. These strange and fearfull signs were expiate, and satisfaction made for them with greater sacrifices: and a solemn procession in all the Churches and Chappels, with prayers and supplications was proclaimed for one day. Besides, a decree was granted, that C. Hostilius the Prætor should vow and set out the games and plaies of Apollo, in such manner as of late years they had been vowed and set forth.

About the same time Q. Fulvius the Consul held an assembly for the creation of Censors, and elected Censors were M. Cornel. Cethegus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, who neither of them had C ever had been Coss. And by a grant or commission from the Senat, there was a bill preferred unto the Commons, and the same passed, that these Censors should set, and to farm let the territory of Capua. The review of the Senat and choice of new Senators was hindred and staid, by reason of a contention between the two Censors, who should be the president of the Senat. Now the choosing of him lay in Sempronius his hand. Howbeit Cornelius alledged, that the custome and tradition of fore-fathers should be followed, namely, to elect him for President, who of all them that were now living had born first the office of Censor. And that was T. Manlius Torquatus. Sempronius replied again, and said, that as the gods had given him by lot the first place, so they had granted him free liberty to choose whom he would. And therefore he would elect Q. Fabius Max. whom at that time he was able to prove to be the principall man of all the City, without excep-D tion, and take Annibal himself for the Judge. After much variance and contesting of words, at length Sempronius by relenting and permission of his Collegue elected Q. Fabius Max. the chief Senator. Then the Senat was changed, and new Senators chosen, and eight were overpassed and left out, among whom was L. Cæcilius Metellus, he that gave the infamous and shamefull counsell, to abandon Italy after the defeat at Cannæ. In noting likewise and disgracing the Knights and Gentlemen, the same cause was considered of, and took effect, but very few there were of them that were touched with that infamy: but all those horsemen belonged to the Cannian legions who were in Sicily (and no small number there was of them) had their horses taken from them: And to agravate this sharp punishment and note of disgrace, they were plagued also with time of long warfare: for so many of them as had served with horse allowed by the City, should E not reckon upon the years passed already, but were to follow warfare ten years forward, and find themselves horses. Moreover, these Censors after diligent search and survey found out and met with a great number of those that ought to have served on horseback: and look how many of them were sixteen years old and upward at the beginning of the war, and had not been employed in the wars those all they disfranchised, and made Ærarii, or contributaries. After this, they bargained by the great for the repairing and re-edifying again of those edifices which had been consumed by fire about the Forum, [or market place] namely, the seven shops, the [fish] shambles, and the Kings Hall, or royall gallery.

Thus when all things were finished which were to be done at Rome, the Consuls set forward to the wars. And first Fulvius went before to Capua: and some few daies after Fabius followed: who F besought both his own Collegue by word of mouth most earnestly, and also Marcellus by effectuall letters, to make sharp war upon Annibal, and to keep him occupied, while he assailed Tarentum: which City, if it were once taken from the enemy, he were then driven out of all, & having no place to put his head in, nor which he might make account to stand fast and trusty unto him, he should have no reason at all once to stay in Italy. He dispatched also a messenger to Rhegium unto the Captain of the fort and garrison, which by Lævinus the Consul was there placed against the Brutii: and those were eight thousand men. The greatest part of them were of these good fellows, and that damned crew, wherof we spake before, who used to live by robbing and stealing, and were brought thither from Agatirna out of Sicily. Unto whom there were adjoyned many of the Brutii also fugitives from thence, and as good as themselves every way, both for audaciousness, and also for neediness to set upon any bold adventure whatsoever. This power of men he G commanded should be lead to waste and spoil the Brutians country first, and then to lie against the City Caulonia, and to assault it. They having performed this service, not only willingly & chearfully, but also with greediness: having also chased away and rifled the husbandmen and peasants of the country, assailed the City with all forcible means. Marcellus stirred up and provoked by those letters of the Consul: and having a good opinion of his own, that of all the Roman Captains there was not one so able to match Annibal as himself, left his wintering standing Camp, so soon as ever there was forrage and grass in the country, took the field, and encountred Annibal

at Canuſium. Now was Annibal in hand with the Canuſins, and ſollicited them to revolt. But H hearing once that Marcellus approached, he diſlodged from thence. The country thereabout was plain and open, without any covert places to beſtow an ambuſh, and to lay trains in therefore he began to retire himſelf from thence into the woodland parts. Marcellus tracked him ſtill, and followed him hard at heels, and encamped cloſe unto him: and ever as he had fortified and entrenched himſelf, he brought forth his men into the field, ready for battel. Annibal entertaining ſmall skirmiſhes with certain Cornets and troops of horſemen, and with light appointed footmen, that lanced darts and javelins, thought it not neceſſary yet to come unto a pight ſet battel, and venture all upon one throw. Howbeit he was drawn to a fight, maugre his head, howſoever he laboured to avoid it. For being gone afore one night, Marcellus overtook him upon a plain and open ground: and as he was pitching his tents he kept him from fortifying, by charging his pio- I neers and labourers on every ſide. Whereupon they came to a very battell, and fought with all the forces they had on both ſides: and when it grew toward night, they departed aſunder on even hand: but before it was dark they had encamped not far one from another, and in great haſte made ſhift to fortifie themſelves. The next morning by day light Marcellus came forth into the field with all his power: neither refuſed Annibal the challenge, "having with many words comforted "and encouraged his ſouldiers to remember Thraſymennus and Canna, to cut the comb and beat "down and tame this fell ſtomack and luſty courage of the enemy: who preſſeth ſtill (quoth he) "and ſeeketh upon us, not ſuffering us to march on quietly in our journey, nor to pitch our tents: "giving us no leave to breath our ſelves, nor time to look about us. There is not a morning, but "ſo ſoon as the ſun is up in the horizon to give light to the world, the Roman army is out in the K "field to give us battel. If we could draw bloud of him once, and ſet him out of the field with "bloud about his ears, he would for ever after fight more quietly, and take better leiſure with him. With theſe and ſuch like comfortable words and effectuall remonſtrances they were well animated; as alſo provoked ſeeing themſelves thus moleſted by the enemy, who day by day never ceaſed to challenge and brave them ſtill: whereupon they began a fierce and cruell battell. They had now continued fight above two hours, and then began the Roman Cavalry from the right wing, and the extraordinary ſouldiers that flanked the main battell, to give ground and diſmarch. Which Marcel. perceiving, he brought forward the eighteenth legion in the vanguard. And whiles ſome retreated back fearfully, others come forward but ſlowly, the whole battell was put out of order, and diſarrayed; and ſo at length it was diſcomfited: and for that fear ſurmounted ſhame, L they turned their backs and fled away amain. Slain there were in the conflict and in the rout together ſome 2700 Citizens and Allies one with another: among whom, there were four Roman Centurions, and two Colonels, Marcus Licinius, and Marcus Fulvius. Of military enſigns, there were four loſt of that right wing which firſt ſhrunk and loſt ground: and two others of that legion which came to ſuccour their fellows that gave back and retreated. Marcellus after that he was returned into the Camp, welcomed his ſouldiers with ſuch a bitter and ſharp Oration, that the very words of the Generall in his anger and wrath were more heavy and grievous unto them, than the conflict it ſelf, which they had unfortunately endured all the day long before. "I yield

"praiſe yet, and render thanks to the immortall gods, (quoth he) as I may in ſuch a caſe, that our "enemies having vanquiſhed & conquered you in the field, and driven you in ſo great fear to run M "headlong within your trenches & gates, came not with all at once to aſſail the camp. For ſurely in "the ſame fearful fright that you forſook battel, you would likewiſe have abandoned your tents & "pavilions. What fearfulneſs is this? Whence cometh this terrour? What means this oblivion of "yours? How cometh it to paſs, that ye ſhould ſo forget all on a ſudden, both your own ſelves and "them with whom ye have to fight? Why ſurely, they are the ſame enemies & no other, whom the "ſummer paſt, you did nothing but either vanquiſh & overcome, or elſe purſue & follow in chace: "whom for theſe certain daies paſt, ye have been ready to tread on their heels as they fled and ran "away before you both by day & night; whom in light skirmiſhes ye have diſcomfited; whom no "longer ago than yeſterday, you ſuffered neither to march forward, nor to pitch their camp. I for- "bear to ſpeak, and I paſs in ſilence thoſe things which in good right ye may ſtand upon & make N "your boaſt. I ſay nothing of that whereof ye ought to be aſhamed & diſpleaſed with your ſelves, "namely, how but even yeſterday ye brake off the fight on even hand, and retired out of the field, "when the enemy had got no advantage? What hath this one night, or what hath one day cut "you off? Are either your forces in this meantime abridged & diminiſhed, or your enemies aug- "mented & encreaſed? Now ſurely, me thinks, I ſpeak not to mine own army, nor to Roman ſoul- "diers. Only ye carry about you the ſame bodies & armour that ye were wont. For if ye had born "the ſame minds and hearts with you, ſhould the enemies ever have ſeen your backs? Should "they have taken either banner from any company, or enſign from cohort and ſquadron? As "yet the enemy never vanted and made boaſt of the defeat of our Roman legions. You are "the very firſt that this day have given him the honour of diſcomfiting and putting to flight our O "army. Then they all cried out, and beſought him to pardon that daies default, and to make trial "once again of his ſouldiers courages when and whereſoever he would. Mary, and that I will "(quoth he) my ſouldiers: I will put you to it: even to morrow I will bring you abroad into the "field, and after ye have got the victory ye ſhall obtain that pardon which ye now crave. So he gave order, that thoſe cohorts which had loſt their enſigns ſhould have the allowance of barly inſtead of wheat: and as for thoſe Centurions of the bands or companies, whoſe banners were

A were loſt, them he degraded in this manner: He cauſed them to be diſarmed, and their skeins to be drawn naked and taken from them, and ſo let them go and ſhake their ears. And withal, he made proclamation, that the next day they ſhould all preſent themſelves in readines, as well footmen as horſemen. Which done, he diſmiſſed the audience, and they all confeſſed and acknowledged, that they were juſtly and worthily thus checked and rebuked: and that there was not that day one man in the Roman army, ſetting aſide the General himſelf only, but he was bound to make amends and ſatisfaction, either with ſpending heart-bloud, or atchieving a noble victory. The morrow after, they all ſhewed themſelves unto him in their armor, and wel appointed, according to his commandment. The General commended them for their forwardnes: and gave them to underſtand, that he would ſet thoſe in the forefront of the vanguard, which the day before be-
B gan to run away, as alſo thoſe cohort likewiſe that loſt their enſigns. And now he gave them warning, and charged them all to fight it out luſtily, to win the field: and to endeavour and ſtrain themſelves, both all and ſome, that the news of yeſterdayes flight came not to Rome before, and prevented the fame of this dayes victory. Then he willed them to go to their meat, and to ſtrengthen their bodies: that in caſe the fight ſhould hold long, they might be able to endure to the end. Now when all was ſaid and done, that might encourage and ſtir up the hearts of ſouldiers, they went out & advanced their enſigns into the field. Annibal being advertiſed hereof, "Now believe "me (qd. he) we have to deal with an enemy indeed, who is of that nature, that he can neither "brook his good fortune, nor away with bad. If he hath won at any time, he purſueth thoſe whom "he hath vanquiſhed, cruelly. Contrary-wiſe if he have loſt, he beginneth to fight with the con-C "querors again right freſhly. Then he commanded the trumpets to ſound, and brought forth his power in battel array. A field was fought there on both hands more ſharply a good deal, than the day before. The Carthaginians ſtrived to keep the honor and reputation of yeſterdayes ſervice: the Romans ſtrained to wipe away the ignominy and ſhame of that dayes foil. On the Romans ſide, the Cavalry of the left wing, and thoſe cohorts which had loſt their enſigns, fought in the vanguard, and the twentieth legion was marſhalled and ranged in the right point of the battel. L. Cornelius Lentulus, and C. Claudius Nero had the leading of both theſe wings, M. Marcellus himſelf commanded the main battel, and withal his perſonal preſence encouraged them, as a witneſs of their valour and courage. Now, when as the fight had continued long, and the victory enclined no way, Annibal commanded the Elephants to be put forth upon the very forefront of the bat-
D tel, to ſee if that object might poſſibly work ſome terror and confuſion among the Romans. And at the firſt they diſordered the enſigns, and troubled the ranks: ſo as partly by treading under foot, and partly by ſcattering them for fear, that were all about, they had laid naked and open the battel in one part; and in more places than ſo had the Romans fled, but that C. Decinius Flavus, a Colonel, having from the firſt band of the Haſtati, caught up the banner in his hand, commanded the company thereto belonging to follow him; and thither he led them where the foreſaid Elephants were gathered round, and made fouleſt work, and charged them to fling their darts and javelins at them. All this ſhot light ſure, and miſſed them not, yea, and ſome ſtuck in them: and no marvel, for the beaſts were neer at hand, the bodies great and ſtanding thick in a plump together. But as they were not all wounded, ſo they that had the darts ſet faſt in their backs and ſides, were as ready (ſuch is their nature, dangerous to meddle withal) for to hurt their own maſters, as the enemies: and all turned upon their fellows that were unhurt, and drave them back. So as now, not that entire band only, but every ſouldier elſe for his own part, who was able to reach the herd (as it were) of the Elephants as they fled, did his beſt to lance javelins and ſhort darts at them. And ſo much the more furiouſly ran the beaſts upon their own, and made a far greater havock there, than they had done among the enemies; by how much more fiercely fear and fright ſet them agate, and ſent them forward, than the will of their maſters that ſate upon them, was able to rule and reſtrain them. The Roman footmen eſpying this advantage, came forward with their enſigns and banners upon that battaillon, which was put in diſarray by the running to and fro of theſe unruly dumb creatures, and without much ado and farther skirmiſh put them to flight, after E they were once broken out of their ranks, and ſet in a fright. Then Marcellus ſent his Cavalry after them, to purſue them as they fled, and to follow the chaſe, and never gave they over hunting and courſing them, until they had lodged them in great fear within their camp. For beſides all other things, which made them thus ſcared and affrighted, there chanced two Elephants to fall down in the very gate & entrance thereof, ſo that the ſouldiers were forced to ruſh into it over the trench and rampier. In that place was the greateſt ſlaughter made of the enemies. For there were ſlain eight thouſand men, and five Elephants. Neither had the Romans a bloudleſs victory of it: for of the two legions, there died faſt upon 1700, and of the Allies more than 1400. Beſides, many a citizen and confederat ſore wounded. And Annibal the next night diſlodged and departed. Marcellus although he was deſirous to follow upon him, yet he could not for the multitude of his hurt
F men. The eſpials that were ſent out to purſue him in his march, brought word back the next day, that Annibal took his way into the Brutians country.

Neer about the ſame time, the Hirpins, Lucans, and Volſcents, after they had delivered up the garriſons of Annibal, which they had in their Cities, yeelded themſelves alſo to Q. Pulvius the Conſul, and were received to mercy with great clemency by the ſaid Conſul, after ſome rebuke given them in words only for their treſpaſs and errour paſt. The Brutians alſo had the like hope of pardon, when as Vibius & Pactius, two brethren, of the nobleſt houſe of that nation, came from them to ſue for the ſame condition of yeelding and ſurrendring themſelves, which was granted H unto the Lucans.

Q. Fabius the Conſul, won by aſſault a Town in the Salentins countrey called Manduria. Priſoners were taken there 4000, and ſome good ſtore of other pillage. From thence he went to Tarentum, and in the very mouth of the haven, lay againſt the City. Thoſe ſhips which Livius had for to waſt the convoy of victuals, he partly charged with engins, and other ordnance to aſſault Towns withal, and partly furniſhed with artillery, with ſtones, and ſhot of all ſorts: the ſhips of burden likewiſe, and not the Gallies only which were guided by oars; to the end, that ſome might bring Engins and Ladders unto the walls, and others aloof from out of the ſhips, wound and hurt thoſe that defended the City. Theſe ſhips were ordained and appointed from the open Sea to aſſault the City. And clear was the Sea of all danger from the Punick navy, which I was ſent unto Corcyra, at what time as Philip minded to aſſail the Ætolians. In this mean while, the aſſailants of Caulonia, a little before the coming of Annibal, for fear leſt they ſhould be ſurpriſed, betook themſelves to a little hill: which as it was (for the preſent danger) a place of ſafety, ſo it wanted all things elſe. Fabius, as he lay at ſiege about Tarentum, was much helped to the atchieving of a matter of great importance, by a trifling thing to ſpeak of, and of ſmall moment in it ſelf. The Tarentins had a garriſon of the Brutians, ſent from Annibal to defend the City. The Captain of this garriſon was greatly enamoured and ready to die for the love of a woman, who had a brother that ſerved in the army of Fabius the Conſul. He being certified by letters from his ſiſter, of this new acquaintance that ſhe had with that forrainer and ſtranger, ſo wealthy and ſo honorable a perſon among his country-men; conceived ſome hope by means of his ſiſter, that K her lover might be brought to any thing, and wrought as they would: and ſo acquainted the Conſul with his conceited hope. And this ſeemed no vain imagination. Whereupon the young man was ſent to Tarentum in habit and quality of a fugitive, and by the mediation of his ſiſter, grew into ſome favour with the Captain aforeſaid: and at firſt practiſed ſecretly to underfeel and found his mind; and afterwards ſeeing the weakneſs and inconſtancy of the man, he prevailed with him ſo much, through the flattering ſpeeches and allurements of the woman, as to betray the keeping and guard of that place whereof he had the charge. After that the manner how, and the time when this plot ſhould be put in execution, was agreed upon, the ſaid ſouldier was let out of the City cloſely by night in a place between the corps de guard, and informed the Conſul what was done already, and in what ſort every thing was to be done. Fabius at the firſt watch, after he had L given a token and watchword to them in the Caſtle, and to thoſe likewiſe that had the keeping of the haven, himſelf fet a compaſs about the ſaid haven, and lay as cloſely as he could to that part of the City which lieth to the Eaſt. Then all at once the trumpets ſounded from the Caſtle, from the haven and ſhips, which in the open Sea rid neer at hand. Great houting there was, and much ado on ſet purpoſe from all theſe quarters, whereas indeed there was leaſt danger or none at all there. In the mean ſeaſon the Conſul kept his men in. Whereupon Democrates, who had before-time been Admiral of the Armado, and whoſe chance it was to have the guarding of that place, againſt which the Conſul lay cloſe, ſeeing all thereabout quiet enough, and no ſtirring at all, and hearing all other parts to ring again and reſound with ſuch alarms as otherwhiles it ſeemed the City was taken and won, and fearing leſt if he ſat ſtill and beſtirred not himſelf, the Conſul would M make ſome Camiſado, and give the aſſay to enter the City with banner diſplaied; withdrew his guard toward the Caſtle, from whence was heard the greateſt and moſt terrible noiſe. Fabius, when he perceived once by gueſſing at the time, as alſo by the ſilence it ſelf in that place (for where but a while before they kept much ado, raiſing up one another, and calling to arm, there now all was huſht and not a word) that the guards were had away from thence, he commanded that the ladders ſhould be brought to that ſide of the wall, where the brocher & broker both of the treaſon, had brought word that the cohorts of the Brutians were quartered and kept their guard. Thus on that part was the wall won by the means of the Brutii, who were ready to help and take them up, and ſo they got over into the City. Then was the next gate broken open, that the army might come by companies under their ſeveral colours. Whereupon they ſet up a ſhout, and a little N before break of day, they marched as far as into the market ſtead, and met with none to make head againſt them, and cauſed all them that fought at the Caſtle and the haven, to turn upon them. There, in the very entrance of the market place, began a great skirmiſh, rather fought hotly than maintained thorowly. For the Tarentin ſouldiers were nothing comparable to the Romans, either in courage of heart, or goodneſs of armour; in skill and knowledge of war, or in luſtineſs and ſtrength of body. And therefore when they had only ſhot their darts, even before they came to handſtrokes, they turned back and ſlunk away through the lanes of the City, where with they were well acquainted, ſome to their own home, and ſome to their friends houſes. Two of their Captains, Nico and Democrates, fought manfully, and were ſlain. Philomenes, who was the principal head that wrought the revolt unto Annibal, fled out of the skirmiſh as faſt as ever his horſe would O carry him: but a while after his empty horſe was ſeen & known wandering aſtray in the City, but his body could never be found. It was commonly believed, that he flung himſelf headlong from his horſeback, into a certain open pit. As for Carthalo, Captain of the Punick garriſon, he caſt away his armour and weapon, and as he was coming to the Conſul with a goodly tale, recounting and remembring his fathers friendſhip and intertainment to the Romans, there hapned a ſouldier to meet him and ſtrike off his head. Then by ſome or other in every place, the Carthaginians and

A Tarentins both went to wrack, and were killed without mercy and regard, as well unarmed as armed. Yea, there were many of the Brutians alſo fell upon the edge of the ſword, were it that they were miſtaken, or for an old grudge and in-bred hatred; or to ſuppreſſe and extinguiſh the bruit and rumor that went of betraying the Town: to the end that Tarentum might ſeem the rather won by aſſault and force of arms. Then from murder and ſlaughter, they fell to ſack and ſpoil the City. There were taken priſoners by report thirty thouſand head of ſlaves: a mighty maſs of ſilver tried and coined: of gold 87000 pound weight. Images and painted tables or pictures, ſo many, as very neer amounted to the number of the ornaments of Syracuſa. But Fabius of a braver mind, abſtained from that kind of prize and pillage, which Marcellus forbare not. For when his Scribe or Secretary asked him, what his pleaſure was, ſhould be done with the images (and the B Statues they were of the Gods, of a mighty bigneſs and proportion, portraied every one in their own habit like warriors:) Mary (qd. he) let the Tarentins have their angry Gods ſtill among them, for me. After this, the wall which divided the City from the Caſtle, was diſmantled, raſed down, and laid even with the ground.

Whiles theſe things hapned at Tarentum, Annibal (after they had yeelded themſelves unto him that beſieged Caulonia) hearing of the ſiege and aſſault of Tarentum, went night and day and made all the haſt he could, with a running march, to reſcue & ſuccour the City: but hearing by the way that it was forced and gone, "Ah, I ſee well, qd. he, the Romans alſo are not without their Anni-
"bal. In good faith, ſo was Tarentum won, and ſo loſt again, by treachery and treaſon. But be"cauſe he would not be thought to turn back & flie, in the very ſame place where he made ſtay, he C ſat down, and encamped almoſt five miles from the City: and after he had abode there ſome few daies, he retired himſelf to Metapontum. From thence he ſuborned two Metapontins, and ſent them to Fabius at Tarentum, with letters deviſed from certain principal men of that City, wherein they promiſed to betray Metapontum and the Punick garriſon into the Conſul his hands, upon aſſurance made unto them, that all former treſpaſſes & offences ſhould be forgiven and forgotten. Fabius ſuppoſing all was truth and plain-dealing, appointed a certain day when he would come to Metapontum, and ſent his letters alſo to thoſe principal citizens, which letters were brought unto Annibal: whereat he was right glad and took great contentment that his fraud ſped ſo well, and that Fabius alſo might be entrapped, caught, and overtaken by his wily fetches as well as others: and thereupon laid an ambuſh for him in the way not far from Metapontum. As Fabius (before he D ſhould go out of Tarentum) attended to know what the birds ſignified, he obſerved once or twice that they approved not his journey. And when he killed a ſacrifice, thereby to know the will of the Gods, the Soothſayer, or bowel-prier gave him warning, to take heed of the deceit of his enemies, and beware of wait-laying. The Metapontins, ſeeing that he came not at the day appointed, were ſent again to haſten him forward, and to encourage him to come: who were all ſuddainly at once apprehended, and for fear of farther torture, diſcloſed the practiſe of the ambuſh.

In the beginning of that ſummer wherein theſe occurrents hapned, after that Scipio had beſtowed the whole winter, in winning and reconciling the hearts of the barbarous people, partly, with gifts and rewards, and partly with enlarging and ſending back their hoſtages, and the priſoners: there came unto him one Edeſco, a noble and famous Captain of the Spaniards. His wife and
E children were in cuſtody with the Romans: but beſides that occaſion which brought him to Scipio, there was another cauſe, even a general inclination of all their minds, that chanced I wot not how, which withdrew and eſtranged whole Spain from the Carthaginian Empire, unto the Roman. The ſame reaſon moved Indibilis alſo and Mandonius, the greateſt LL. and Princes no doubt of all Spain, to leave Aſdrubal, and with all the power they could make of their followers and vaſſals, to depart into the mountains ſtanding juſt over his camp, from whence they might from hill to hill continually retire themſelves in ſafety to the Romans. Aſdrubal perceiving the puiſſance of his enemies to grow and increaſe ſtill more and more by little and little, and his own to diminiſh; and fore-ſeeing, that unleſs he made ſome hardy adventure and prevailed that way, all would be naught, and fall to the ground, as it was beginning already to reel, determined to put it to a battail with all ſpeed poſſible. Scipio alſo was ſharp ſet, and the more deſirous of fight, as well for the good hope, which the ſucceſs of his former affairs confirmed and encreaſed; as alſo becauſe, before the armies of his enemies ſhould joyn together, he was more willing to fight with one General and one army, than with all them joyntly at once: and yet he had well amended and encreaſed his forces politickly of purpoſe, againſt the worſt, in caſe he ſhould be driven to fight with many of them together. For, ſeeing there was no uſe of ſhips, becauſe all the Rivers and Seas along Spain, were cleered of the Carthaginian navy, he withdrew his fleet up into the harbor at Taracon, and joyned his Sea-ſervitors to his Land-ſouldiers. For armour he had ſtore enough, which was either taken in the pillage of Carthage, or newly made after the winning of the Town, by ſo many Artificers and Craftſmen that he kept there hard and cloſe at work. With this pow-G er, Scipio in the beginning of ſpring departed from Taracon (for now by this time was Lelius returned from Rome, without whoſe company he was not willing to enterpriſe any ſervice of great moment and importance) and led forward againſt the enemies. As he journeyed peaceably all over the country, and paſſed through the territories and confines of every City and State, his Allies were ready to entertain and accompany him. Indibilis alſo and Mandonius among the reſt, with all their power met him. Then Indibilis in the name of them both, ſpake, not like a ſottiſh barbarian fooliſhly & inconſiderately, but rather with a modeſt kind of gravity: more like one that excuſed his revolt and running from the adverſe part upon conſtreint and neceſſity, than made H boaſt of catching and embracing the vantage thereof upon the firſt opportunity preſented. "I

"knowful well (quoth he) that the very name of a fugitive revolt, as it is odious and deteſtable
"to old Allies, ſo it is ſuſpicious to new. And I cannot greatly blame the manner of men in ſo "doing, in caſe it be not the bare name, but the double dealing that cauſeth the hatred. Then he "reckned up his own good turns and deſerts done unto the Carthaginians on the one ſide: and
"recounted their covetouſneſs and pride on the other ſide, together with their injurious dealings "with himſelf and his people. And therefore, quoth he, this body of mine only hath converſed
"among them until this day, but my heart and affection hath long ſince been with them, where
"I believe verily, that right, juſtice and religion is regarded and maintained: for even ſo do we I
"flie as ſuppliants in humble manner to the Gods alſo, when we can no longer endure the vio"lence and wrongful outrages of men; Beſeeching Scipio this one thing withal, that this his ſtar-
"ting from the enemy, and ranging with him, he would neither blame and condemn preſently as "a tranſgreſſion, nor honor and commend as a good deſert of his: but as he ſhould find both him "and the reſt, by good poof from that day forward, even ſo to make reckoning of them accor"dingly, and not otherwiſe. Scipio made anſwer again, That in truth he would ſo do: neither would he take them for fugitives and runawayes, who judged that they were not bound in con-ſcience to maintain the ſociety and alliance with them as good and lawful, who made no count at all to obſerve inviolable, any promiſe or duty to God or man. Then were their two wives and children brought forth into their ſight, and delivered unto them, whom they received, and ſhed tears abundantly for joy, and ſo for that day they were had to their lodgings. The morrow after K faith was plight and contracted between them, and the ſame confirmed by covenant; and they were diſmiſſed to bring their forces, and to ſhew them before him: and ſo they quartered and lodged in the ſame camp with the Romans, until by their guidance and direction they came unto the enemy. The army of the Carthaginians next unto them was under the conduct of Aſdrubal, neer unto the City Batula. Before his camp, he kept certain ſtanding guards of horſemen. Upon them the light armed forlorn hope of archers and darters of the Roman hoſt which went before the battail to skirmiſh, likewiſe they of the forefront and vanguard, charged forcibly with their ſhot; yet ſo contemptuouſly, and in ſcornful wiſe, even preſently upon their travail in journey, and before they had choſen a peece of ground to encamp in, that it was ſoon ſeen what heart there was in both parts. For, the Cavalry of the enemies fearfully fled, and were driven into the camp: L but the Romans advanced with banners diſplaied, hard to the very gates: and ſo for that day their ſtomacks were only up and provoked to a fight, and then the Romans pitched their tents. Aſdrubal in the night retired his army to a mount, which in the top had a broad plain. Behind this hill there ran a river, the fore-front thereof, and the ſides all about the skirts were compaſſed as it were with a ſteep bank ſtanding plumb upright. There lay under this hill top another plain lower than the other, which alſo was encloſed round about with the like bank, as difficult for aſcent as the former. The next day Aſdrubal, after he ſaw the enemies ſtanding arranged before their camp, ſent down his Numidian-horſemen, the light armed Ilanders alſo of the Balears, and like-wiſe the Africans. "Then Scipio rode about all the regiments, enſigns, and ranks of his army, M "marſhalled as they ſtood in battail wiſe, and ſhewed unto them their enemies, how they de-"ſpaired afore-hand to fight on equal and even ground, how they taking the vantage of the hills, "braved and ſhewed themſelves, preſuming and truſting upon the place, and not upon their own
"valour and ſtrength of arms. Howbeit (quoth he) Carthage had higher walls, and yet the Ro"man ſouldiers were able to ſcale and get over: neither Hills nor Caſtle, no, nor the very Sea, "ſtood in their way then, nor ſtopped them of their entry. And as for theſe high places which "the enemies are poſſeſſed of, they haply may ſerve their turns well, when they ſhall take their "flight, and leap from off the ſteep banks, and run down-hill apace, and ſo get away. But I trow,
"I ſhall debar them there, and lay a block in their way on every ſide. Whereupon he commanded two ſquadrons, the one to keep the ſtreights of the valley, through which the river runneth:
the other to beſet the paſſage that leadeth from the City into the fields, and croſſeth overthwart N the hill ſide aboveſaid. Himſelf led the light appointed vantcurriers, who the day before had diſ-comfited the guards and wards of the enemies, to affront the light armed ſouldiers, that were quartered in the nether brow of the hill. And firſt they paſſed through the roughs, and were not impeached nor hindred otherwiſe than by the difficult paſſages. But afterward, when they were come within ſhot, at the very firſt, they were welcomed with a mighty volley of all ſorts, pouring (as it were) like hail upon them. Himſelf anſwered them again, and recharged upon them, letting drive and diſcharging the ſtones which lay ſtrewed all over the ground, and were ſuch in manner all, as might be welded and flung from them with eaſe. And not only the ſouldiers, but lackies and horſe-boyes, & ſuch as followed the camp, were intermingled amongſt the armed companies.
And albeit the aſcent up the hill was hard, and they were pelted and almoſt overwhelmed with O darts and ſtones, yet being ſo inured as they were to clime wals; and reſolute withal, they mounted up firſt to the top: and ſo ſoon as they had got ſome even ground, where they might have ſure footing, they found the enemy, (who was light and nimble, and able to run to and fro, and to ſave himſelf, and ſhift well when he was far off, all the time that they skirmiſhed aloof, and plaid upon one another with light ſhot) now that they came to cloſe fight, and to hand-ſtrokes, not able to ſtand his ground: and ſo they drave him from his place, and with great ſlaughter chaſed him and

A set him back to the very battel, that stood upon the higher hill. Then Scipio having given commandment to these, for to follow on the train of their victory, and to enter up still upon the main battel of the enemies, parted the rest of his forces, together with Lelius, willing him to coast along and wheel about on the right hand of the mount, until he found some way of easier ascent himself on the left hand, fetched no long circuit and compass, until he came cross overthwart the flank of the enemies. Hereupon first began their battel to be disordered, whiles they were desirous to turn their wings, and to oppose their ranks and squadrons against the noises and shouts which rang every where about them. In this tumultuous trouble, Lelius also was got up; and while the enemies drew backward and gave ground, because they would not be charged behind on their back, the vanguard of their part was displayed and lay open: and so the Romans even of the mid-
B dle battel also, had a lane and spacious room to get up and enter upon them: who never had been able to have gained the ground, and won the plain above, (considering the disadvantage of the steep bank) so long as the ranks had stood unbroken, and the Elephants were opposed against them before the Ensigns, in the forefront. Down went the enemies now on every side, and were piteously killed: and Scipio, who with his left wing encountred the right, charged and plaid especially upon the naked sides of the enemies. And so by this means they had no way left them to flie and escape clear. For the Roman guards on both hands, as well on the left as the right, had beset all the passages. And as for the gate of the camp, the General himself, and the other Captains and officers of the Camp, had taken it up as they fled that way: besides the combersome trouble of the Elephants, whom being now affrighted, they feared no less then their ene-
C mies. So there died of them 8000. Asdrubal, who before the conflict had made sure work with all the money, and taken it with him, sent the Elephants before, and having rallied as many as he could, of them that fled and escaped out of the camp, he made haste along the river Tagus, toward the mountain Pyrenæus. Scipio being now master of the enemies camp, after he had given to the souldiers all the pillage and spoil, but only the prisoners, such as were freemen: when he came to take the number of the captives, found they were ten thousand footmen, and two thousand horse. Of which number, as many as were Spaniards he set at liberty and sent them home without ransom. But as for all the Africans, he commanded the Treasurer to make money of them. Then the whole multitude of the Spaniards, as well those that before had yeelded themselves, as they that were taken prisoners the day before, saluted him with great consent and general voice, D by the name and title of King. Whereupon Scipio, after silence made by the crier, said, "That he "took the name of *L. General or Commander, to be the greatest of all other names, by which Imperator.
"his own souldiers used to call him. As for the title of King, howsoever in other places it was "great and honorable, at Rome surely, it was odious and intollerable. For his own part, the mind "indeed he caried of a King, and if they deemed it to be the highest honour that can fall to the "nature of man, let them judge so in their own hearts secretly, and please themselves with that "stile: only he wished them to forbear the word and term thereof. These very Spaniards, as barbarous as they were, perceived by this speech how haughty and magnanimous he was, who in the height of spirit contemned that as a base thing, whereat in admiration only of the very title, all E mortal men besides are amazed and astonied. After all this, he bestowed upon the Princes and great Potentats of the Spaniards, sundry gifts. And of the horses, whereof he had taken in the field and camp great store, he gave Indibilis the choise of three hundred where he would. When the treasurer was selling the Affricans, according to the General his commandment, he hapned upon a young springal and stripling, of rare and singular beauty: and hearing that he was of royal bloud, he sent him to Scipio. And when Scipio demanded of him who he was, and what country-man, and wherefore at those years he was in camp among rude souldiers; "I am (saith he) a Numidian
"born, (and with that his eyes stood full of water) and in my country they call me Massiva. Being "left and orphan and fatherless, I was brought up with my grand-father by the mother side, Gala
"the King of the Numidians. And with my uncle by the mother, Masanissa, who was lately come "with a power of horsemen to aid the Carthaginians, it was my hap to sail over into Spain. And "never to this day, have I been in any battel, by reason that Masanissa would not in regard of my "tender age, suffer me in any hand to go to the wars. Howbeit that very day when the battail
"was fought with the Romans, unwares to my said uncle, I secretly got an horse under me, and
"armour upon my back, and went forth into the field; where my horse chanced to fall, and cast
"me down headlong on the ground: and so it was my fortune to be taken by the Romans. Scipio gave order that this Numidian youth should be kept safe, and so proceeded to finish matters that were brought before him, as he sat upon the Tribunal in marshal court. And after he was come back from thence into his royal pavilion, he called the party again before him, and asked him, whether he were willing to return again to Masanissa. Whereat the tears gushing out of his eyes for joy, yea, full fain (qd. he) and with all my heart. Then after he had given the young gentleman a ring
G of gold, a coat embroidered with purple stud-wise, with a Spanish souldiers cape, a golden clasp or button, & a brave courser, with all the furniture & caparison thereto belonging he sent him away, and commanded certain horsmen to safe-conduct and accompany him, so far as he would himself.

Then Scipio fell to consult about the war. Some there were that advised him, presently to pursue Asdrubal: but he supposing that to be a dangerous course, for fear lest Mago and the other Asdrubal should joyn their forces to his, he sent only a good guard to keep the passage of the hill Pyrenæus, and imploied the rest of the summer, in receiving homage and fealty of other States of Spain.

Within few dayes after the battel at Bœtula, when as Scipio in his return to Taracon, was gone H past the chase or forrest of Castulo: Asdrubal the son of Gisgo and Mago, the two Generals, arrived out of the farther province of Spain unto Asdrubal the son of Amilcar. But they came a day after the fair, and too late to help an overthrow past already: yet in very good time, to give counsel for the managing and executing of the war behind. There, as they conferred together, concerning the disposition of the Spaniard, and how they stood affected in the countries of each province, only Asdrubal the son of Gisgo was of opinion, and perswaded, That the utmost tract and coast of Spain, which lieth upon the Ocean and Gades, was hitherto unacquainted with the Romans, and therefore fast enough and sure to the Carthaginians. But the other Asdrubal and Mago, were of another mind, and agreed in this, That Scipio with his favours and benefits had possessed the affections and hearts of all men already, both in general, and also in particular, and that I there would never be an end of sliding from them, and siding to the Romans, before that all the Spanish souldiers were either removed into the fartheſt parts of Spain, or conveighed over into France. And therefore albeit the Senat of the Carthaginians had not granted out any such act and commission, yet there was no remedy, but that Asdrubal must go over into Italy, where Annibal was the head of the war, and in whom lay the main chance of all: by which means also he might withdraw out of Spain all the Spaniards, far enough from the naming and hearing of Scipio. For Asdrubal his army, as well by daily falling away and revolting to Scipio, as also by the late defeat much empaired, was to be replenished again with new souldiers. Moreover, that Mago should deliver his army to Asdrubal the son of Gisgo, and himself in person cross over into the Balear K Islands, with a great sum of money, to wage new aids and succours from thence. And that Asdrubal the son of Gisgo, with his army should retire farther up into Portugal, and not encounter the Romans at all in any hand. And that out of all the Cavalry there should be chosen out the very flower and strength, to the full number of 3000. for Masanissa, and that he should range and overrun all the hither Province of Spain, partly to help the distressed Allies, and partly to spoil the enemies towns, and forrage their lands. After these orders and directions set down, the Generals departed asunder to the execution of these determined designments. Thus ye see what were the affairs and occurrences of Spain for that year.

At Rome the fame of Scipio grew greater every day then other. Fabius for the winning of Tarentum, albeit he gat it rather by craft and policy, then by force and vertue, was glorious therefore. L
The name of Fulvius began to age and decay. Marcellus grew also into an ill name and some obloquy, both for that at first he had a foil, and also because he suffered Annibal to range over Italy at his pleasure, and himself at mid-summer had retired his souldiers to Venusia to take up there (as it were) their winter quarters. He had a sore adversary in the City, one C. Publius Bibulus, a Tribun of the Commons: who from the very first time of that discomfiture, with continual speeches and Orations brought Claudius into hatred and infamy with the common people, and now was in hand with them to deprive him of his government. Howbeit, the friends and kinsfolk of Claudius obtained thus much, That Marcellus leaving his Lieutenant at Venusia, should repair to Rome for to make his purgation, and acquit himself of such crimes as his adversaries objected and laid against him: and that during his absence, they should not treat nor debate about his deprivation. M

It hapned much about one time, that both Marcellus came to Rome (to meet with the shamefull slander that ran on him, and to save his honour) and also Q. Fulvius the Consul, about the new election for the year following. The question touching the government of Marcellus, was debated and handled in the lists or Circus, called Flaminius: and a great assembly there was, and much concourse of the Commons and of people of all degrees and calling. The Tribun accused not Marcellus only, but all the nobility: by whose fraudulent practise, and by whose cold and delayful proceedings, it was come to pass, that Annibal now these ten years had remained in Italy (as it were) in his province continually, where he had had led a greater part of his life, then at Carthage in his native country. And now (quoth he) the people of Rome taste the fruit, proceeding of proroguing and continuing of government still in one person. For see what is come of it; Marcellus his army hath been twice defeated and fallen upon the enemies sword, and now, forsooth, is housed in Venusia for sun burning. But Marcellus so confuted this accusatory speech of the Tribun, by recounting his own worthy noble acts; that not only the Bill preferred for the deposing him out of his room, was disannulled, and the neck of it broken, but also the next day after, all the Centuries with one general voice created him Consul. There was joined with him companion in government T. Quintius Crispinus, who then was Pretor. The morrow after were the Pretors chosen, to wit, P. Licinius Crassus Dives, who was at that time the Arch-bishop, P. Licinius Varus, Sex. Iulius Cæsar, and Q. Claudius Flamen. N

During the time of this solemn Parliament or Session for the election of Magistrates, the City was much disquieted for the revolt of Hetruria: C. Calpurnius who ruled that province as Propretor, had by his letters given notice, that the beginning therof arose from the Aretins: and therfore immediatly M. Marcellus the Consul elect, was thither sent with commission to look into the matter, and (if he thought it requisite) to send for his forces, and to translate the war out of Apulia into Tuscany. For fear whereof, the Tuscans pild in their heads, and were quiet. O

The Tarentine Embassadors made suit for peace, and that together with their freedom they might enjoy their own laws. And this answer was returned by the Senat, That they should come again when Fabius the Consul was returned to Rome. The Roman Games, and also the playes called

A called Plebeii, were exhibited that year, and renued one day apeece more then ordinary. The Ædiles of the chair were L. Cornelius Caudinus, and Servilius Sulpitius Galba: but those of the Commons were C. Servilius, and Q. Cecilius Metellus. As for Servilius, it was denied, that he had been Tribun of the Commons before, or now Ædile by right and order of law, because it was now for certain known, that his father (of whom the opinion went currant for ten years that he was slain by the Boians about Mutina, at what time as he was Triumvir for the division of lands) was now living, and in the hands of the enemies in slavery and bondage.

For none might be Tribun or Ædile, whose Father was living.

In the eleventh year of the Punick war, M. Marcellus entred his consulship the fifth time (so you reckon upon that Consulship which he never bare through, because there was an error com-B mitted in his creation) and with him T. Quintius Crispinus. To both Consuls the Province of Italy was assigned, and both armies of the Consuls the former year. There was a third army then at Venusia, whereof M. Marcellus had the conduct. Of these three, they were to chuse two, which they would; and the third remaining, was to be committed unto him, who was by lot to have the government of Tarentum, and the Salentins. The rest of the Provinces were thus divided amongst the Pretors. P. Licinius Varus had the jurisdiction civil, and P. Licinius Crassus (then Pontifex Max.) that of the forraigners, and to go whither soever the Senat should think good to send him. Unto Sex. Julius Cæsar befell Sicily, and to Q. Claudius Flamen the City of Tarentum. Q. Fulvius Flaccus had his commission renewed, to continue in government for one year longer: and he was appointed to govern Capua, which had been the charge of T. Quintius the Pretor, and to have C under his hand the command of one legion. Likewise C. Hostilius Tubulus remained still in office, and that as Pro-pretor he should succeed C. Calpurnius, and have the conduct of two legions. Moreover, L. Veturius Philo had his authority & government confirmed to him anew, that as Propretor he should sit Lord Deputy in the same province of France, and have the same two legions as before, when he was Pretor there. The like decree that was granted for L. Veturius, passed also in the Senat for C. Aurunculeius, and a bill was propounded unto the people for the proroguing and continuance of his office, who as Pretor ruled the Province of Sardinia with the strength of two Legions. And for the defence and guard of the said Province he had an addition of fifty ships of war, which P. Scipio had sent out of Spain. P. Scipio likewise and M. Syllanus, held still, by vertue of a decree, their provinces of Spain, and commanded the same armies for one year lon-D ger. As for Scipio, he had direction to send over into Sardinia fifty ships, out of those eighty which he had under his hand, either taken with him out of Italy or won from the enemy at Carthage, because there ran a rumor, that there was great preparation at Carthage for a navy that year, and that the Carthaginians would take up, and fill all the sea coast of Italy, Sicily and Sardinia, with an Armado of two hundred sail. In Sicily the government was divided in this manner, Sextus Cæsar had the leading of the Cannian army: M. Valerius Levinus (for his government also was confirmed for a year longer) the charge of that fleet of seventy ships, which rid about Sicily: with commission to add thereto, those thirty ships which the former year lay before Tarentum: and with this Armado consisting of one hundred sail, to put over into Africk, if he thought so good, and there to forrage and fetch booties. Over and besides, P. Sulpitius was for one year longer to E continue in office, and to govern the provinces of Macedony and Greece, with the force of the said Navy which he had before. As touching the two legions which remained about the City of Rome, there was no alteration. Only the Consuls were permitted to levy and enrol a new supply, as need should require. Thus the Empire and State of Rome for that year was maintained with the power of 21. legions. P. Licinius Varus the Pretor of the City, was charged to repair those thirty old ships, which lay at Hostia, and to furnish twenty new built, with sailers and marriners, that with this Armado of fifty sail he might be able to defend all the sea coast neer unto the City of Rome. C. Calpurnius was forbidden to remove his forces from Arretium, before a successor came in his place. The same order was given to Tubulus, and to have especially a vigilant eye, that no commotion arose from thence. And then the Pretors went into their provinces.

F As for the Consuls they were troubled in mind and made some scruple of conscience to go to their provinces, upon the report of some prodigious and ominous signs, and because also in their sacrifices they found not the gods so propitious and favourable unto them. For out of Campania news came, that in Capua two Temples, to wit, of Fortune and Mars, and also some Tombs and Sepulchers, were smitten with lightning: and besides (see how vain and preposterous superstition imputeth even the least triffling things to the hand of God) that certain Mice, forsooth, in a Chappel of Jupiter gnawed the gold. Also that in Casinum, a great swarm of Bees settled in the very market place. Moreover, that the Wall and one of the Gates at Hostia was blasted and stricken with lightning. That in Cære, a Gripe fled into the Church of Jupiter. That at Volsinii, there was a Pool flowed with blood. In regard of these strange and wondrous tokens, there was a devout G supplication for one day. And for certain days together, greater beasts were killed for sacrifices, without any good token: and for a long time the grace and favour of the gods could not be obtained. But yet the fortune of the Common-weal stood still upright, and all this anger and mischief portended by those wonders light upon the head of the Consuls alone, and their death excused all the rest. The Playes called Apollinares, in the year of Q. Fulvius and Ap. Claud. Consuls, had been by P. Cornel. Sulla Pretor of the City, first exhibited: after whom all the Pretors ever after did the like. But they vowed them a year before, and performed them on a day uncertain. The same year hapned a grievous plague both in the City and in the Countries about, which

yet in the end turned rather to long and chronick diſeaſes, then to ſharp and deadly maladies. For H this peſtilence there was not only ſolemn going in proceſſion, in all the high ſtreets, carreſours, and croſs ways throughout the City: but alſo P. Licinius Varus Pretor of the City, was commanded to propound unto the people, that the Playes above ſaid ſhould be vowed for ever againſt a ſet and determinat day. Himſelf therefore was the firſt that vowed them, and exhibited them upon the * third day before the Nones of July, and the ſame day ever after was obſerved and kept holiday for that purpoſe.

* 5 day of July.

As the rumor of the Aretins revolt encreaſed dayly greater, ſo the LL. of the Senat were careful about it every day more then other. Letters therefore were ſent unto C. Hoſtilius, that he ſhould without delay take pledges of the Arentines: and C. Terentius Varro was ſent with commiſſion, to receive the ſaid hoſtages at his hands, and to bring them to Rome. He was no ſooner come, I bot Hoſtilius preſently commanded that one legion, which lay in camp before the town, ſhould enter the City with banner diſplayed, and there he put ſufficient guards in places convenient.
Then having called and ſummoned the Senators to appear in the market place, he demanded of them hoſtages. And when the Senat requeſted but two days reſpit to conſider of the matter, he made proclamation, that either they ſhould deliver them preſently, or elſe the next day he would ſeize upon all the Senators children every one. Then he commanded the Colonels, the Captains of the Allies, and the Centurions, to ward the Gates, that none might go forth of the City by night. But this was ſlackly and negligently executed, for ſeven principal Senators, before the warders were ſet at the gates, eſcaped forth with their children before night. The morrow morning by break of day, when the Senat began to be cited into the Common Hall, theſe parties were K miſſed, and their goods confiſcat, and ſold in port-ſale. Of the reſt of the Senators, their children were taken hoſtages to the number of 120. and were delivered to C. Terentius, for to be conveigh-ed to Rome: who when he was come into the Senat, made ſuch relation of the matter, that the ſuſpition of their revolt was much more pregnant then before. And therefore, as if ſome inſurre-ction had like preſently to grow from Tuſcany, C. Terentius himſelf was commanded to conduct one of the two legions about the City of Rome, unto Aretium, and there to lie in garriſon with it for to keep the town in order. And it was thought meet that C. Hoſtilius with the army beſides, ſhould ſurvey and viſit the whole Province, and to be careful and circumſpect, that no occaſion nor opportunity might be given unto them, that were minded to ſeek alteration and to rebel. C.
Terentius ſo ſoon as he was come to Aretium with the legion, when he called unto the Magi- L ſtrates for the keys of the gates, and they made anſwer that they were but miſcaſt aſide and could not be found; ſuppoſing that they were rather cautelouſly laid out of the way for the nonce, than loſt by negligence, cauſed other keyes and locks to be made, and ſet upon every gate: and took as great heed and care as he could, to have all under his own hand. He gave eſpecial warning alſo to Hoſtilius as touching the Tuſcans, and told him, that he ſhould never hope to reſt in ſecurity, that they would not rebel, unleſs he took order with them aforehand, that they poſſibly could not rebel.

After this, there was much debate and contention in the Senat about the Tarentins, even before
Fabius, whiles himſelf excuſed and defended them whom he had conquered and ſubdued by force and arms: but others were mightily offended with them, yea, and moſt of them gave out plainly M that they were full as faulty as the Campans, and deſerved no leſs puniſhment. And ſo there was an act of the Senat granted according to the opinion and advice of M. Acinius, that the town ſhould be held with a garriſon, and all the Tarentins kept from ſtirring out of the City: and that the matter ſhould further be debated and decided afreſh another time, when the ſtate of Italy ſtood in better tearms of peace and quietneſs. And the like contention and variance was among the LL. of the Senat touching M. Livius Conſtable and Captain of the Caſtle of Tarentum, whiles ſome were of mind to condemn him as in great fault, becauſe through his careleſneſs and ſloth, Tarentum the City was betrayed to the enemy: others again awarded him good conſideration and reward, for that he kept the fort ſo well by the ſpace of five years, and by his meanes eſpecily and by none elſe Tarentum was recovered. But ſome were of opinion between theſe and ſaid, N that the diſcuſſing and determination of that matter pertained properly to the Cenſors and not to the Senat: of which judgement Fabius alſo himſelf was. And this moreover he ſaid withal, that he muſt needs confeſs, that true it was, which Livius his friends in the Senat ſtood ſo much upon, and iterated ſo often, namely, that he was the only means that Tarentum was recovered: for in good faith, quoth he, it never could have been regained if it had not once been loſt before.

T. Quintius Criſpinus one of the Conſuls, went to the army which Q. Fulvius Flaccus had, with a new ſupply into the Lucans country. But Marcellus ſtill was ſtaid behind, upon occaſion of new ſcruples of conſcience, and ſundry objects that troubled his mind, and kept a hammering in his head one after another. Amongſt which, this was one, that having vowed in the Gauls war at Claſtidium, a Temple to Honor and Vertue: the dedication of the ſaid Church was hindred by the O Biſhops, who ſaid, that one Chappel, by right and according to their ceremonies, ſerved but for one Saint, and could not be conſecrated unto more. For in caſe it ſhould be blaſted and ſmitten by fire from heaven, or otherwiſe ſome prodigious token hap therein, hardly could the right expiation and purging thereof be performed, becauſe it might not be known, to which of the ſaints or gods the ſacrifice ſhould be done; for by order one ſacrifice could not ſerve twain, unleſs there were ſome particular and eſpecial gods named. So there was fain to be another Chappel built

built for Vertue: and great haſt there was made for the rearing thereof, and yet it was not his fortune ever to dedicate thoſe chappels. So at length he ſet forward and put himſelf on his journey with a ſupply, unto the army which he had left the year before at Venuſia.

When Criſpinus minded to aſſault Locri in the country of the Brutians, becauſe there went a great name of Fabius for the aſſailing and winning of Tarentum, he ſent for all kind of artillery and engins out of Sicily, and ſhips alſo were brought from thence, for to batter that part of the City that lieth to the Sea ſide. But the enterpriſe went not forward, becauſe Annibal had removed, with all his forces to Lacinium. And beſides, the news went that his colleague had already brought out his forces from Venuſia, with whom he was deſirous to joyn. And therefore he returned out of the Brutians country into Apulia: and ſo between Venuſia and Brutia, the Conſuls encamped ſeverally, within three miles one from the other. Annibal likewiſe was retired into B the ſame country, conſidering that the war was turned from Locri. There the Conſuls (hot men of nature both) almoſt every day led forth their men into the field, not doubting but if Annibal once met them (having two Conſular armies joyned together) to make a diſpatch of the war once for all. Annibal becauſe the year before, he had twice affronted Marcellus, and both given and taken the foil: like as he had great reaſon, as well to fear as to hope, if he were to encounter and fight with him alone: ſo he thought verily, that he was never able to make his part good with both the Conſuls together. And therefore laying off his Lyons skin, he took himſelf wholly to his old Foxes coat, and ſought all means and opportunities to lay a train for to entrap them. Howbeit there paſſed ſome light skirmiſhes between both their camps, with variety of fortune and C interchangeable ſucceſs. By which, the Conſuls thinking that they ſhould hold out and keep the enemies play, during the ſummer ſeaſon, and yet nevertheleſs be able to aſſault Locri, wrote unto L. Cincius, that he ſhould take the Seas, and croſs over with his fleet out of Sicily to the City of Locri. And to the end that the Town might be likewiſe aſſailed from the Land ſide, they commanded part of the army which lay in garriſon at Tarentum, to be conducted thither. Annibal having intelligence afore-hand of theſe things, by certain Thurins, ſent forth certain of his forces to beſet the wayes from Tarentum. And there under the ſide of the Petellian mount, he beſtowed ſecretly in ambuſh two thouſand horſe, and three thouſand foot. Upon whom the Romans (marching without their eſpials ſent afore them) chanced to light, and were ſlain to the number of two thouſand, and upon twelve hundred taken alive: the reſt were ſcattered and fled over D the fields and forreſts back to Tarentum. Now there was a little hill between both the camps of the Carthaginians and Romans, and the ſame all overgrown with wood, which at firſt was poſſeſſed and kept, neither by one nor other: becauſe the Romans knew not the ſituation of that ſide which lay toward the enemies camp: and Annibal ſuppoſed verily that it was a place fitter for to lay an ambuſh than to encamp in: and therefore he ſent by night for that purpoſe, certain troops of Numidians, and beſtowed them cloſely in the mids of the wood, and not one of them ſtirred all the day long out of their ſtandings, for fear leſt either their armour or themſelves might be eſpied a far off. In the Roman camp, every man generally was of mind, and let not to ſay, that the ſaid hill was to be ſeized and fortified for their uſe, with a good fortreſs built upon it, for fear leſt if it were firſt gained by Annibal, they ſhould have the enemy as it were over their heads ready to annoy them. And Marcellus himſelf was of the ſame opinion: whereupon, Why go not E we our ſelves in perſon (quoth he, to his colleague) with ſome few horſemen, to view and conſider the place, where our eyes ſhall be our judges; and ſeeing the ground once, we ſhall reſolve more certainly what courſe to take? Criſpinus liked well of the motion: and ſo they went forward accompanied with two hundred and twenty horſemen: of which forty were Fregellans, the reſt all Tuſcans. There followed after them, M. Marcellus, the Conſul his ſon, and Aulus Manlius, two Colonels: alſo L. Arennius and M. Aulius, two Captains of the allies. Some Authors have ſet down in writing, that Marcellus the Coſ. ſacrificed that day; and when the firſt beaſt was killed, the liver was found without an head: howbeit in the ſecond, all things appeared that were wont to be ſeen. But in the head of that liver there ſhewed I wot not how, a kind of extraordinary F creſcence: which the Sooth ſayer had no liking to, becauſe after thoſe inwards which ſeemed before ſhort, unperfect, and miſliking; now thoſe again were ſeen too well fed and overgrown. But the Conſul Marcellus was ſo hot and deſirous to fight with Annibal, that he thought himſelf never encamped neer enough unto him. And even then alſo as he went forth out of the camp, he gave order to his ſouldiers to be ready at a ſhort warning, and have their eye upon the place: that preſently, if he liked the hill, for which they went to view, they ſhould diſlodge, truſs up bag and baggage and follow preſently. Now there was a little flat and plain ground before the camp, from whence the way that led unto the ſaid hill, was on every ſide very open and evident to the eye: where there lay a ſcout or ſpie, ſet of purpoſe to diſcover any of the enemies gone far from the G camp ſtragling and ranging abroad either for fewel or forage, that they might be intercepted: and not for any hope of ſo great effect as fell out. This fellow gave a ſign unto the Numidians, that all at once they ſhould ariſe out of their lurking & ſtarting holes. And they that from the top & ridge of the hill, were to riſe & ſhew themſelves affront, never appeared & made head, before that they had fet a compaſs about, for to ſhut up the paſſage at the back of the Romans. And then from all parts they began to ſtart up & with a main ſhout charged & ran upon them. The Con. now were in that valley, from whence they neither could poſſibly get up to the pitch of the hill, poſſeſſed aforehand by the enemy: nor had any place of ſafe retreat behind, for that they were invironed & hemmed in on on every ſide. Howbeit they might have maintained skirmiſh and held out a good while, but that H the Tuſcans began to run away, and put all the reſt in a bodily fright. Yet the Fregellans, forſaken as they were of the Tuſcans, gave not over, but fought manfully, (ſo long as the Conſuls ſtood on foot unhurt) & received the charge of the enemies, encouraging their people, and fighting themſelves right valiantly. But when they ſaw once both their Conſuls wounded, and Marcellus alſo run through with the puſh of a lance, and falling from his horſe ready to die: then they alſo (and few of them God wot remained alive) together with the Conſul Criſpinus (who was wounded with two javelins) and young Marcellus, who was himſelf alſo ſore hurt, fled away and eſcaped.

There were ſlain in this skirmiſh, A. Manlius a Colonel, of the two Captains of allies, M. Aulus was killed out-right, and L. Arenius taken priſoner. As for the Lictors belonging the Conſuls, five of them then fell alive into the hands of the enemies: the reſt were put to the ſword, or eſcaped I with the Conſul. So there were three and forty horſemen died either in the conflict, or in the flight, and eighteen taken priſoners. In the camp there was much ado, and crying out for to go and ſuccour the Conſuls, when they ſaw one of them, and the other his ſon grievouſly hurt, and the poor remnant of that unfortunat expedition, coming toward the camp. The death of Marcel- lus was much pitied and lamented in many other reſpects, but for this eſpecially: that he, a man of that age (for he was now above threeſcore years old) and who ſhould have had more wit: an old Captain and Leader (I ſay) that ſhould have had more wiſedom and forecaſt, ſo unadviſedly had brought both his colleague together with himſelf, and alſo in manner the whole commonwealth into ſo deſperate a danger. I ſhould make much circumſtance, and fetch many turns and compaſſes about one point, if I would rehearſe all that writers have diverſly ſet down, as touching K the death of Marcellus. But to let all others go, L. Calius delivereth the thing three manner of waies: the one by hearſay only, and a general report: the other, extant in an Oration of the praiſe of Marcellus, penned by his own ſon that was himſelf preſent at the action: the third, which Ca- lius himſelf alledgeth upon his own knowledge, and after diligent enquiry into the matter. But howſoever the voice and fame varieth in ſome circumſtances, moſt of them jump in the occaſion, That he went forth of the camp to view the place: and all agree of the event, That he was entrapped and ſo ſlain. Annibal ſuppoſing that the enemies were mightily terrified, as well by the death of the one Conſul, as the hurt of the other: becauſe he would take all advantage, and omit no good opportunity offered, forthwith removeth his camp, and pitcheth upon the very hill where he had fought. There he found the corps of Marcellus, and cauſed it to be enterred. L

Criſpinus affrighted both at the death of his companion in government, and alſo at his own hurt received, diſlodged in the dead time of the night following, and in the very next mountains that he could come unto, encamped and fortified himſelf upon an high ground, and ſurely fenced on every ſide. There the two Generals of both parts, beat their brains, and occupied all their wits contriving the one to lay trains, and the other to avoid them. Annibal together with the body of Marcellus, had gotten his ring or ſign manual. Criſpinus fearing that Annibal might practiſe ſome craſty fetch, and beguile ſome body by the means of that ſignet, ſent meſſengers to all the Cities next adjoyning, giving them notice, that his brother Conſul was ſlain, and that the enemy had gotten his ſeal ring, and warning them, that they ſhould give no credit to any letters written in his name, or ſigned with his ſeal. This meſſage was not ſo ſoon brought to Salapia, but ſtreight M after there came letters thither from Annibal, framed and indited in the name of Marcellus to this effect, That he would the next night that immediately followed that preſent day, be in perſon at Salapia; willing the garriſon ſouldiers to be in readineſs, for to be emploied in ſome ſervice that ſhould be thought needful. The Salapians perceived whereabout he went, and ſuppoſing that it was a perillous plot, whereby Annibal ſought ſome opportunity to be revenged of them and to puniſh them, for anger, not only that they were revolted from him, but becauſe they had killed his horſemen: they therefore ſending the meſſenger back again, (who was a Roman fugitive and renegate, and had fled from them to Annibal) to the end, that their ſouldiers might effect that which they were minded to do, without the knowledge of the meſſenger, and not be eſpied by him; beſtowed all the Townſmen along the walls and in ſundry convenient places of the Town, N to keep a ſtanding corps de guard. The watch and ward they tended the next night very carefully, and about that gate where they ſuppoſed the enemy would come, they oppoſed the ſtrength and moſt able men of all the garriſon. Annibal neer about the time of the relief of the fourth watch came to the City. In the vanguard marched certain Roman Rebels and Renegates, with Roman armor upon them: who when they were come to the gate, called up the watch, and ſpake all in Latin unto them, willing them to ſet the gates open, for that the Coſ. was come. The watchmen making ſemblance as if they were rouſed and awaked at their call began to beſtir themſelves, to make haſt with much ado, as buſy as ever they might be. The Port-cullis which had been let down, ſtood yet ſhut. Then they began, ſome to heave and to weigh it from the ground with leavers & coleweighs, others to draw it up with ropes unto that height, that men might go upright O under it. The paſſage was ſcarcely made open & ſet wide enough, when the fugitive traitors came ruſhing in at the gate apace, ſtriving who might enter firſt. And when there were almoſt 600 of them got in, the rope was let go, at which the port-cullis hung, & it fel down with a mighty noiſe.
The Salapians then, ſome ran upon the fugitive Romans aboveſaid, carying their armor looſely and retchleſly hanging upon their ſhoulders, as travellers & wayfaring ſouldiers in a peaceable country of their friends: others frō the turrets of the gate pelted the enemies with ſtones, & puſhed at them with

A with punchion poles, or with darts and javelins ſlew them. So Annibal caught in his own ſnares, was fain to depart.

He went from thence to levy and raiſe the ſiege before Locri, which Town Cincius beleaguered ſtreightly, and aſſaulted moſt forcibly, having raiſed fabricks about it, and planted all kind of engines, artillery, and ordnance againſt it, which were brought thither out of Sicily. Mago who began already to diſtruſt that he ſhould not be able to defend and keep the City, conceived now the firſt hope of better, when he heard once of the death of Marcellus. And then there came alſo a meſſenger with news, That Annibal having ſent afore him the horſemen of the Numidians, followed after himſelf in perſon, as faſt as he could, with the power of the footmen. And therefore ſoſoon as he perceived, by a ſign given from the hill tops, that the Numidians approached, himB ſelf at once ſet the gate open, and ſuddainly ſallied forth upon the enemy with great violence. At the firſt the skirmiſh was doubtful, more becauſe he came upon them at unawares, than for that he was equal to match them in ſtrength: but afterwards, when the Numidians charged them beſides, the Romans were ſo terrified, that they fled here and there in every place to the ſea and their ſhips, leaving their fabricks and engins wherewith they had ſhaken and battered the walls. So by the coming of Annibal the ſiege brake up before Locri.

Criſpinus, after he was adv rtiſed that Annibal was gone into the Brutians countrey, commanded Marcus Marcellus a Colonel or knight Marſhal, to lead away unto Venuſia, the army which had been commanded by his Colleague new deceaſed. Himſelf went to Capua with the legions, ſcarce able to endure the ſhogging and ſhaking of the horſelitter, for pain and grief of his wounds. C From whence he wrote letters to Rome, giving notice, That his brother Conſul was dead, and in what danger himſelf was. Signifying alſo, that he could not himſelf come unto Rome againſt the election, becauſe he thought he ſhould not be able to endure the travel of the journey: and beſides, he was in great care for Tarentum, leſt Annibal from out of the Brutians countrey would turn thither with all his power. Moreover, he gave the Senat to underſtand that it was requiſite there ſhould be ſent as Embaſſadors or Agents unto him, men of wiſdom and diſcretion, whom he might confer with, and acquaint with his will and mind, as touching State-matters. The reading of theſe letters, cauſed them much to lament and mourn for the death of the one Conſul, and greatly to fear what would become of the other. Therefore they not only diſpatched Q. Fabius the ſon, unto the army in Venuſia, but alſo ſent unto the Conſul three commiſſioners, Sex. Julius D Caſar, L. Licinius Pollio, and L. Cincius Alimentus, who but a few dayes before was returned out of Sicily. Theſe had in commiſſion to ſignify unto the Conſul from the Senat, that in caſe he were not able himſelf to come to Rome againſt the Election, he ſhould nominat within the Roman territory a Dictator for to aſſemble the people for the ſaid Election: alſo that their pleaſure was, in caſe the Conſul went to Tarentum, that Q. Claudius the Pretor ſhould withdraw his legions from thence into thoſe parts, whereas he might defend moſt Cities of the Allies.

In the ſame ſummer M. Valerius took the Seas, with a fleet of a hundred ſail, and from Sicily paſſed over into Africk: and having diſbarked and landed his men neer the City Clupea, waſted the countrey all about, and met no armed men, to ſpeak of, to make head and withſtand his inva- ſion. Then theſe rovers and forragers retired in haſt unto their ſhips, becauſe on a ſuddain there E was a rumour blown abroad, That the punick Armado was coming, conſiſting of 83 ſail. The Roman Admiral fought fortunatly with them not far from Clupea. And after he had boorded and taken eighteen of their ſhips and put the reſt to flight, he returned to Lilybæum, with a rich Land-booty, and much pillage found in the ſhips.

The ſame ſummer Philip alſo ſent aid to the Achæi, that earneſtly beſought his help: whom not only Machanidas the Tyrant of the Lacedemonians, grievouſly afflicted with warring upon their confines, but alſo the Ætolians, who having croſſed the ſtreights or narrow Sea, between Naupactum and Patræ (which the inhabitants there call Rhios) and ſet over a power of armed men, had ſpoiled their territory. Moreover, there went a great rumour and ſpeech that Attalus King of F Aſia the leſs, would ſail over into Europe, becauſe the Ætolians in their laſt Parliament or general Diet had conferred upon him the ſoveraign magiſtracy and rule of their nation. For theſe cauſes Philip came down with a power into Greece, and at the City Lamia, the Ætolians encountred him with their Captain Phyſias, who for that year was created Pretor together with King Attalus in his abſence. They had in their army certain aids from Attalus, and almoſt a thouſand Romans out of the Roman Armado, ſent from P. Sulpitius. Againſt this Captain and theſe forces Philip fought two battails with proſperous ſucceſs, and in both ſlew very many of his enemies: and when the Ætolians were driven for fear from thence, into the City of Lamia, and within the walls thereof ſaved themſelves, Philip retired his army into Phalera. This is a place ſituate in the gulf of Ma- lea, ſometimes much peopled and frequented for the paſſing fair haven, and many good harG bors and ſafe rodes for ſhips, beſides other ſpecial commodities as well of Sea as Land. Thither repaired ſundry Embaſſadors from divers parts, to wit, from Ptolomæus King of Ægypt, from the Rhodians, the Athenians, and inhabitants of Chios, and all to treat about a pacification, to take up the war between Philip and the Ætolians. And of neighbour-borderers there was in the behalf of the Ætolians as peace-maker, Aminander King of the Athamans. All of them were not ſo careful and earneſt for the Ætolians, who were more fierce, ſtout and imperious than the Nation of Grecians naturally is: as they laboured this point, that Philip with his Kingly ſoverangnty, to the prejudice of their liberty hereafter, ſhould not be intereſſed, nor meddle

in

in the affairs and ſtate of Greece. As concerning a peace, the conſultation was put off and refer- H red to the general Councel of the Achæi: and for the ſaid Diet or Councel, was a place appointed, and a certain day ſet down and publiſhed. And in the mean ſpace, a truce obtained for thirty dayes.

Then the King departed from thence, and through Theſſaly and Fœotia, came to Chalcis in Eubœa, for to put by Attalus (whom he heard ſay to be coming with a navy for Eubœa) from arriving in any havens, or landing in any place on the ſea coaſt. Then leaving a guard behind for to withſtand Attalus, (if haply in the mean ſeaſon he ſhould chance to paſs over) he marched himſelf forward with ſome few horſemen and light armed footmen, and came to Argos. There by the ſuffrages and voices of the people, the honour of exhibiting and celebrating the ſolemn games, I called Heræi and Nemei, was recommended unto him, becauſe the Macedonian Kings give out & ſay that they are deſcended from that City. After he had performed the ſolemnity of the Heræi, preſently he went from the very games and paſtimes to the Councel of his allies long before proclaimed, as is aboveſaid. Much debate there was for a finall end of the Ætolians war, that neither the Romans nor Attalus might have any occaſion to come into Greece. But the Ætolians marred all this before the time of the truce was well expired: by occaſion that they heard, that Attalus both was come to Ægina, and the Roman navy anchored at Naupactum. For being called into the Councel of the Achæi, in which the ſame Embaſſies were, who before at Phalera had treated for peace, firſt they complained, that ſome things had been done, during the time of the truce, againſt the faith of the covenant and accord. But at laſt they flatly denied and ſaid, That there could not poſſibly be an end of wars, unleſs the Achæi rendred Pylos unto the Meſſenians; and peace K were granted and reſtored to the Romans, and likewiſe to the Athamans, to Scerdiletus, Pleuratus, and Archides. Whereat Philip was very wroth, and thought it a foul indignity, that conquered perſons ſhould take upon them to article and capitulat with him their conqueror. "But neither "heretofore (quoth he) gave I audience to the treaty of peace, nor yeelded conſent to truce up- "on any hope I had that the Ætolians would ever be quiet: but to this end, that all confederate "friends might bear witneſs that I ſought means of peace, and they ſought occaſions and pickt "quarrels for war. So without concluſion of any peace, he diſſolved the Diet; leaving four thouſand ſouldiers for the defence and guard of the Achæans, and receiving of them five ſhips of war, (which if he had joyned to the armado of the Carthaginians, lately ſent unto him, and alſo to thoſe ſhips which were coming out of Bithynia from King Pruſias, he determined to aſſail the L Romans with ſhip-fight, who had a long time been mighty maſters of the Seas) himſelf preſently from that Councel departed back to Argos: for now the time drew neer of the games Nemei, which he was deſirous to celebrate and honor with his preſence. Whiles the King was occupied in the preparation of theſe games and paſtimes, and ſolaced himſelf during theſe feaſtival holydayes, with more liberty of mind and repoſe, than he ſhould in time of war; P. Sulpitius having looſed from Naupactum, arrived with his fleet between Sicyone and Corinth, and waſted that goodly territory, moſt renowned of all other for fruitfulneſs of all things. The noiſe and rumor of this occurrence awakened Philip, and cauſed him to leave his diſports: and ſo he took his Cavalry with him in haſt, and ſet forward, having given order that the Infantry ſhould follow ſtreight after: where he found the Romans ſtragling here and there all over the countrey, loden with booty and prizes, (as who feared nothing in the World leſs) ſet upon them, and drave them to their M ſhips. Thus the Roman fleet nothing well appaid for the booty they had gotten, returned to Naupactum. And Philip greatly augmented the ſolemnity and magnificence of the games that were behind, by the fame of a victory over the Romans at that time, how much or little ſoever it was. And with great joy and mirth were thoſe holy-dayes kept: and ſo much the more, becauſe the King for to pleaſe the people withal, laid aſide the diadem of his head, put off his purple robes and other princely and royal habit, and in outward port bare himſelf equal to others, and no better: a thing right acceptable and pleaſing to free States, as nothing can be more. By which deed of his, he had given great and undoubted hope unto all men, of liberty and freedom; but that he ſtained and marred all again with his intolerable luſt and looſeneſs of life. For he uſed to go ram- N ging up and down with one or two of his favourits in company, and did nothing elſe but haunt ſuſpected houſes by the Sea ſide day and night in diſguiſed manner: and thus by debaſing himſelf to the meaneſt ate of a private perſon, the leſs he was ſuſpected and known, the more diſſolute he was: and whiles he pretended unto others a vain ſhew of freedom, he abuſed all to his own licentiouſneſs. Neither paid his purſe for all his pleaſures, nor with flattring perſwaſions and fair ſpeeches obtained he his deſires: but to accompliſh his wickedneſs, he uſed oftentimes forcible violence: and dangerous it was both to husbands and parents, to be any thing ſtreight-laced, and make it goodly by tedious delay and unſeaſonable ſeverity, to ſeem but to ſtay the unbridled luſt and appetite of the King. From one of the Princes alſo of the Achæi named Aratus, he took his wife away called Polycratia, and upon hope and colour of mariage with the King, drew her away O with him into Macedony. Having thus with theſe lewd and wicked pranks paſſed the time of the ſolemnity of the Nemean games, and ſome few dayes over and above; he went to Dyma for to diſſeiſin the garriſon of the Ætolians, which they had ſent for and received into the City [of Dymæ] from the Eleans. Cycliades (who was the ſoveraign or chief magiſtrat of that ſtate) and the Achæi met the King at Dymæ: who as they hated the Eleans, becauſe they diſſented from the reſt of the Achæans, ſo they were maliciouſly bent againſt the Ætolians, whom they were perſwaded to

A to have stirred the Romans to levy war upon them. So from Dyma they departed, and with joint armies passed over the river Larissus, which divideth the country of the Eleans from the territory of Dyma. The first day after they were entred the confins of their enemies, they spent in foraging. The morrow after, in battail array, they presented themselves before the City, having sent out their Horsemen before them to make bravado's before their gates, and all to provoke the Ætolians; a kind of people full of stomack, and ready enough to sally forth and make excursions. Now were they not ware all this while, that Sulpitius with fifteen ships had crossed over from Naupactum to Cyllene: nor that he had landed four thousand souldiers in the still time of the night (because they might not be seen to march) and entred Elis. And therefore, this suddain and unexpected object put them in a terrible fear, when they saw and knew once among the Ætolians and B the Eleans, the Roman ensigns and their armor. At the first, the King would have had his men to retire: but afterwards seeing the skirmish was begun already between the Ætolians and Triballi, (a kind of Illyrians) and perceiving that his souldiers also were put to it and charged, then the King also himself with his Horsemen assailed the Cohort or Squadron of the Romans. There his Horse was with a dart shot through: and when he had once flung and cast the King forward over his head, there was a cruel and deadly fight on both sides, whiles the Romans laid hard at the King, and the Kings men protected and guarded his person. Himself fought right manfully above the rest, considering he was forced on foot, to maintain skirmish among the Horsemen. But afterwards, by reason of the great disadvantage, and seeing many about him striken down and wounded, he was caught away by his gard, mounted upon another Horse, and so he fled and escaped.
C And the same day he encamped 5 miles from the City of the Eleans. The next morrow he led all his whole power to a Castle of the Eleans situate neer at hand, called Pyrgos: into which he had intelligence that a multitude of the country peasants for fear of being spoiled, were with their cattail driven and retired. This confused, disordred, and naked company he took captive at his coming, presently upon the first charge and onset that he gave: and with that booty he licked himself whole again, and salved the shameful defeat that he had received at Elis. As he was busy in sharing the prizes, and dealing abroad the prisoners (and there were of men some four thousand, and of cattail of all kinds one with another twenty thousand head) there came a post out of Macedony with news, that one Eropus had surprised Lychnidum, by corrupting for a piece of money the Constable of the Castle, and Captain of the garrison there: and that he held in possession
D certain borrough Towns of the Dassaretians, and still raised the Dardanians to Rebellion. The King therefore gave over the Achæan and the Ætolian wars: yet leaving two thousand five hundred armed souldiers of all sorts, under the leading of Menippus and Polyphantes for to defend his Allies, he went from Dyma through Achaia, Bœotia, and Bevœus; and upon the tenth day came to Demetrias in Thessalia. Where other messengers also encountred him, bringing tidings of a greater insurrection: namely, that the Dardanians had invaded Macedony, and were masters of Orestis, and came down into the plains of Æstræum: and that the rumor was rife and went currant among the barbarous people that Philip was slain. The truth is, in that expedition wherein he fought at Sicyon with those that preyed and made spoil in the country, he was carried by his hot and stomack-full Horse under a Tree, and there against a bough or arm thereof that stood
E out, he chanced to break a corner of the crest of his helmet at one end. That piece chanced to be found by a certain Ætolian, and was brought into Ætolia unto Scerdiletus, who knew by the mark that it was the Kings helmet: whereupon the fame of the Kings death was divulged commonly abroad. After the departure of Philip out of Achaa, Sulpitius who was arrived with his navy at Ægina, went forward, and joyned with Attalus. The Achæi, not far from Messena struck a fortunat battail with the Ætolians and the Eleans. Attalus the King, and P. Sulpitius wintred in Ægina.

In the end of this year, T. Quintius Crispinus the Consul, when he had nominated for Dictator, L. Marcellus Torquatus, for to hold the solemn election of Magistrats, and to set out the games, died of his hurt aforesaid. Some say he left his life at Tarentum: others in Campane. Thus both F Coss. being slain without any memorable battail, (a thing never seen afore in any other war) left the Common-wealth desolate, and as it were clean fatherless. Manlius the Dictator chose for his General of the Horse, C. Servilius, at that time Ædile curule. The Senate upon the very first day that the L L. were assembled, gave order to the Dictator, to exhibit the great Roman games, which M. Æmilius the Pretor of the City, whiles C. Flaminius and Cn. Servilius were Coss. had represented and vowed for 5. years. Then the Dictator, both set them forth and also vowed them for the next five years. But considering there were two Consular armies without their Generals, so neer unto the enemies: the LL. of the Senate and the people set all other matters G aside, and had a principal care above all things, to creat Consuls as soon as possibly they could: and " such especially, whose vertue and valour should be thought secured and safe enough, from Punick craftiness and deceitful trains. For whereas during the time of all these wars, the over-
" hasty heads and hot spirits of the Leaders, had been ever dangerous and hurtful to the state: so
" in this very year, the Consuls upon immoderate desire to fight with the enemy, was fallen
" and plunged into a jeopardy and mischief ere they were aware. Howbeit the immortal Gods
" had mercy and pity upon the Roman name, in sparing the guiltless armies, and punishing the " inconsiderate rashness of the Consuls, with the losse only of their own lives. And when the LL. of the Senate looked about every way, to see if they could spie out any to make Consuls of:

above all others by many degrees, C. Claudius Nero excelled and was the onely Paragon. But a companion with him in the government they were likewise to seek for. As for him, to do it, they deemed him a singular man and a brave Captain: but yet more forward and eager, than the quality and occasions of this war required, or to be matched with such an enemy as Annibal was. And therefore they thought good to joyn with him for his colleague, a sober, wise, and prudent man, who might temper and qualifie that fierce nature and disposition of his. Now M. Livius, many years ago had been upon his Consulship condemned by the judgement of the people. Which ignominy and reproach he took so grievously to the heart, that he departed into the country, and for many years together, forbare not only the City, but to converse and keep company with men. And almost eight years after his condemnation aforesaid, M. Claudius Marcellus and M. Valerius Lævinus the Consuls, reduced him again into the City. But he used to go in old and worn apparel, letting the hair of his head and beard grow long, carrying in his very countenance and array, the fresh and notable remembrance of the disgrace before received. But L. Veturius and P. Licinius the Censors, compelled him to cut his hair, and lay away his vile and unseemly weed, to come into the Senat, and to meddle again in civil matters and affairs of State. And yet in so doing, he would never proceed farther, than to say Amen to other mens opinions, and speak but one word, yea and nay: or else nothing at all, but shew his mind by passing on his feet to one side or other. Until such time as a kinsman of his own, M. Livius Macatus, being in trouble, and his name and honour called in question, caused him to stand up in the Counsel-house and deliver his opinion. And when after so long discontinuance, he was seen and heard once to speak, he turned every man his eye upon him, and ministred occasion also of speech in these terms, namely, "That the people had done the man exceeding great wrong, yea, and hurt the common-weal "much, in that during the time of so dangerous a war, there had been no imployment of so worthy a person, either for his travail and pains, or his advice and counsel. But to return again to the Lords of the Senate: they knew well, that neither Q. Fabius, nor M. Valerius Lævinus, could possibly be joyned as companion in government to C. Nero: forasmuch as it was not lawfull that both should be chosen out of the Nobles or Patritii. And the same was T. Manlius his case also. Besides that, as he once refused the Consuls room, when it was offered unto him, so no doubt he would not accept thereof the second time if it were tendred unto him. But if they should sort Marcus Livius and C. Claudius together, there would be an excellent couple of Consuls in deed. Neither stood the people against this overture, thus moved first by the Lords of the Senat. The only man in the whole City, that denied it, was the very party himself, unto whom this dignity and honourable place was presented. Who much blamed the levity and inconstancy of the City: saying, "That they had no pity of him, when it was: namely, whiles he was in que- "stion and accused, and during the time of his trouble wate poor and simple garments: but now "against his will, they offred him a glittering white robe to stand for a Consulship. Thus (quoth "he) they punish and depress, thus they honour and advance the same persons. If they took me "for a good and honest man, why condemned they me as they did, for a wicked one and a guilty? "If they found me naught and faulty, what cause have they to trust me with a second Consulship, "who used the former so badly, which was committed unto me? As he argued and made com- "plaints in this wise, the Lords of the Senat reproved him, and replied again: setting before his "eyes the example of M. Furius, who in times past was called home out of exile: and when the "state was decayed and lying along, set it upright again in her former place and pristine glory. "And like as the curstness and rigor of parents, is to be mollified by patience, even so the hard "and shrewd dealings of a mans country, is to be dulced and mitigated by bearing and sufferance. So they all stuck close together, and chose M. Livius Consul, with C. Claudius. Three dayes after, they went to the election of the Pretors. And there were created Pretors, L. Porcius Licinus, Caius Manlius, A. Hostilius, and C. Hostilius, both Catos. When the election was finished, and the games celebrated, the Dictator and General of the Cavalry surrendred their places, C. Terentius Varro was sent into Hetruria as Pro-pretor, to the end that out of that province, C. Hostilius should go to Tarentum, unto that army which T. Quintius the Coss. had. That L. Manlius should go beyond Sea as Embassador, to see how the world went there: And withal, considering that in summer, there were to be solemnized the famous games at Olympia, which were celebrated with a most frequent resort and meeting of all Greece, in case he might safely and without impeachment of the enemy, he should visit that great assembly: to the end that if he could light upon any Sicilians, who were fled and banished their country, or any citizens of Tarentum, confined thither and sent away by Annibal, they should repair home again into their own countries, and know, that whatsoever they were possessed of, before the wars began, the people of Rome would restore the same, and make good again unto them.

Because it was like to be a right dangerous year, and no Consuls were invested fully in the Common-weal, all men depended upon the Consuls elect, and were desirous that they should with all speed, cast lots for their Provinces: and every man was willing to know aforehand, what Province each one should rule, and what enemy he was to deal withal. Moreover, a motion and speech there was in the Senat-house, that the Consuls should be reconciled and made friends, and Q. Fabius Max. propounded that first. For there had been notorious enmity and variance between them aforetime: and the calamity of Livius made the same more grievous and unsupportable unto himself; in regard that he was perswaded, how in that misery of his, he was despised of his adversary. Whereupon he grew to be more implacable of the twain, and worse to be intreated. "There needs (quoth he) no reconciliation, neither is it material and to any pur-"pose. For they will do all with more diligence and better spirit, who ever stand in fear that their "adversary and concurrent shall grow great and be advanced by their default. Yet the authority of the Senat bare such a stroke with them, that they laid aside all malice and old grudge, and with one mind consent and counsel, administred the affairs of the common-weal. Their Provinces were not intermingled, nor their government extended into one anothers country, as in former years, but distant asunder and divided by the remote frontiers and fartheſt marches of Italy. For unto one of them were assigned the Brutians and Lucans country against Annibal: unto the other, Gallia against Asdrubal; who as the rumour and bruit went, was come forward neer unto the Alpes.

Of those two armies which were in Gallia and in Hetruria, he whose fortune was to go into Gallia, was to chuse which army he would, and have besides, that other of the City. And he whose lot should be to go into the Brutians country, besides the new legions enrolled of citizens, was to take unto him, the army of whether Consul he list, of the former year. Also Quintius Fabius the Pro-consul, had the charge of that army which the Consul refused: and his authority was renued for one year longer. As for C. Hostilius, whose Province Tarentum they exchanged for Hetruria, they altered his Province again, to wit, Capua instead of Tarentum. Unto him was allowed that one legion which Fulvius the last year commanded.

Now encreased their care every day more than other concerning the coming of Asdrubal into Italy. And the Embassadors of the Massilians had brought news first, that he was passed over into Gallia: and that the minds of the Gauls were mightily cheered up by his coming, because the speech went, that he had brought a huge deal of gold with him, for to hire and wage souldiers for aid in the wars. Then afterwards, Sex. Antistius, and M. Retius, who were sent Embassadors back with them from Rome, for to see whether it were so indeed, had made relation unto the Senate, that they had sent certain of purpose guided by the Massilians, who by means of their especiall friends the Princes and Lords of the Gauls, might learn the truth, and bring word back accordingly. By whose report it was for certain known, that Asdrubal having levied already a puissant army, was minded the next spring to passe over the Alps: and that there was nothing else staid him, but that it had been done already, saving only the passages of the Alps which were closed up with the winter snow.

In the room of M. Marcellus, L. Aquilius Patus was created Augur, and so consecrated. And likewise Cn. Cornelius Dolabella was inaugurat or installed King of the sacrifices, instead of Marcus Martius, who died two years before. In this very same year the City was purged, and there was a general survey and numbring of the people, by the Censors taken, P. Sempronius Tuditanus, and M. Cornelius Cethegus. There were reckoned and entred into the Censors books of Citizens, 137108. A smaller number by much ods, than before the war. It is recorded in the Annals, that this year first after that Annibal came into Italy, the Comitium was built over head and covered. And that the Roman Games were once renued by the Ædiles of the chair, Q. Metellus, and C. Servilius: and that the other Games called Plebeii, were renued two dayes by Q. Mavlius and M. Cæcilius Metellus, Ædiles of the Commons: who also offered three images and set them up in the Chappel of Ceres. And the solemn feastival dinner of Jupiter was celebrated by occasion of those Games.

Then C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius the second time, entred their Consulship: who (because whiles they were but Coss. elect, they had cast lots for their Provinces) commanded the Pretors to do the like. And to C. Hostilius fell the jurisdiction over the citizens, who had that likewise over strangers and forrainers; to the end, that the other three might go forth into their Provinces. To A. Hostilius, was allotted Sardinia: to C. Manlius, Sicilia; and to L. Porcius France. In sum, the legions were in number three and twenty, divided into the Provinces in this sort: to wit, the Consuls had two apeece, Spain four. The three Pretors for Sicily, Sardinia, and France each of them twain. C. Terentius in Hetruria commanded two. Q. Fulvius in the Brutians country, other two. Q. Claudius about Tarentum, and the Salentins conducted twain: and Caius Hostilius Tubulus at Capua, one. Last of all, two were enrolled for the City. In the four first legions, the people chose all the Colonels or Marshals, but to all the rest the Consuls sent new to make up the defect.

Before the Consuls went forth, there was a Novendial sacrifice celebrated because at Veii it had rained stones from heaven. And after one prodigious sight was once minded and spoken of, there were (as it is commonly seen) others also reported: namely, that in Minturnæ the temple of Jupiter, and the sacred grove of * Marica was smitten with lightning: and at Atella the wall and gate likewise, was blasted with fire from Heaven. The men of Minturnæ spake also of a more fearful and terrible thing than that, to wit, that there ran a river of bloud in their very gate. Last of all, at Capua a Wolf entred the gate at night, and worried and dismembred one of the watchmen.

* The same that Circe.

These wonderful signs were expiate with sacrificing of greater beasts, and a supplication was holden for one day, by vertue of a decree from the Prelats. Then was the Novendial sacrifice once again renued, because it was seen, that in Armilustrum it rained stones. And mens minds were no sooner freed of one religious scruple, but they were troubled again with another. For word was brought, that at Frusino there was an infant born as big as ordinary a child is at four years of age. And the thing was not so strange for the bigness of the body, as for that it was born doubtful, whether it were male or female, like as two years before, at Sinneſſa. H The wiſards that were ſent for out of Hetruria, ſaid, that this of all other was a foul and filthy monſter, and that it ſhould be had forth of the Dominion of Rome, and drowned in the deep, ſo as it might touch no ground. Whereupon they put it alive into a coffer, and when they had carried it a good way into the Sea, they flung it in. Moreover the Prelats made a decree, that certain Virgins in three companies, having nine apiece, ſhould go through the City, and ſing certain Canticles. And whiles in the Temple of Jupiter Stator, the Maidens were a learning their ſong by heart, deviſed and framed in verſe by Livius the Poet, the Temple of Queen Juno in the Aventine hill, was ſtriken with lightning from Heaven. And when the Aruſpices had declared that this prodigious token touched the matrons and dames of the City, and that the goddeſs was to be pacified with an oblation; they were (by vertue of an edict granted out by the Ædiles of I the chair) called all into the Capitol, as many as had any houſe, either in the City of Rome, or within ten miles every way. And they among themſelves choſe five and twenty, into whoſe hands all the reſt ſhould put ſome ſmall portion of their dowry. Of which there was made a fair and large golden baſon, for to be preſented unto Juno: and it was brought into the Aventine; and withal, the dames offered unto her purely and chaſtly their ſacrifices. And ſtreight after the Decemvirs proclaimed a day for another ſacrifice of the ſame goddeſs, the manner and order whereof was this: There were two white heifers led from the Temple of Apollo into the City through the gate Carmentalis: after them were carried two Images, repreſenting Juno, made of Cypreſs wood: then went there ſeven and twenty Virgins in long ſide garments, chanting hymns and ſongs to the honour of Juno. Theſe ſongs in verſe were peradventure commendable, and paſſed K for good with thoſe rude and groſs wits then living: but if they ſhould be rehearſed now adayes to our fine heads, they would ſeem but ſimple ſtuff, and compoſed without rime or reaſon. After this row of Maidens, followed the Decemvirs deputed for ſacred Ceremonies, with chaplets and garlands of Baies, clothed in veſture and robes embrodered with purple. From the gate above named, they paſſed by the ſtreet Jugarius into the Grand-place, and there reſted this ſolemn pomp and train. Then theſe Virgins taking hold of a cord, which went through all their hands, ſung a ſong, and danced the meaſures, footing it artificially according to the note. From thence they went by the Tuſcan-ſtreet and Velabrum through the beaſts market, and ſo forward into the Clivus Publicus, until they came to the Temple of Juno. There the Decemvirs ſacrificed two beaſts, and the Images of Cypreſs wood were offered and ſet up in the Temple. When the Gods and L Goddeſſes were duly pacified, the Conſuls took muſters more ſtreightly and with greater preciſeneſs, than any man could remember in former years. For both the fear of the war was two-fold, by reaſon of a new-come enemy into Italy, and alſo there was leſs ſtore of youth, out of which the ſouldiers ſhould be enrolled. Whereupon they compelled the inhabitants of the Colonies by the Sea ſide, who were ſaid to have an eſpecial immunity of warfare (by a ſacred law) for to find ſouldiers: and when they denied, and ſtood upon their priviledge of exemption, they ſet them down a certain day upon which every man ſhould repair into the Senate, and ſhew what cards they had for their immunity and vacation. Upon the day appointed there preſented themſelves before the Senat theſe Commonalties following, to wit, of Hoſtia, Alſia, Antium, Auxur, Minturnæ Sinueſſa and Sena from the upper Sea. When every one of theſe States exhibited and M read their charter of immunity, there was none of all them diſpenſed with, but they of Antium and Hoſtia, in regard the enemy abode in Italy: and ſo the young and ſerviceable men of thoſe Colonies, were put to their oath and ſware, that not above forty of them ſhould lie one night forth of the walls of their Colony, ſo long as the enemy continued in Italy.

When all the LL. of the Senat were of opinion, that the Conſuls were to go forth to the wars with all ſpeed poſſible (for that both Aſdrubal was to be encountred coming down the Alps, for fear he ſhould ſollicit the Gauls on this ſide the Alps; and the Tuſcans likewiſe who hoped and looked every day for a change and alteration; and alſo Annibal was to be kept occupied in his own war, that he might not go forth of the Brutians country, and meet with his brother) only Livius made ſome ſtay and drew back, as repoſing but ſmall truſt in the armies belonging to his N own Provinces. And as for his Colleague, well he wiſt, that he had the choiſe of two notable Conſular armies, and of a third, whereof Q. Claudius had the charge at Tarentum. Whereupon he had made ſome motion of calling the Volones [or voluntaries] again to their colours, and to ſerve in the wars. The Senat granted the Conſuls a large and free commiſſion, both to make ſupply from whence ſoever they would, by chuſing out of all the armies whom they pleaſed, and to make exchange with whom they would, yea, and to draw out of the Provinces whomſoever, according as they ſhould think it good for the Common-weal. And all this was executed with the exceeding concord and unity of the Conſuls. The Volones were enrolled into the nintereenth and twentieth legions. Some Authors have written, that Scipio ſent unto Livius from out of Spain, a ſtrong power of auxiliaries for that war, to wit, eight thouſand of Spaniards and Frenchmen, two O thouſand legionary footmen, and eighteen hundred men of arms, partly Numidians, and partly Spaniards: and that Marcus Lucretius brought theſe forces by Sea: alſo that C. Manlius ſent out of Sicily four thouſand archers and ſlingers.

The fear and troubles in Rome were much increaſed, by occaſion of letters ſent out of Gallia from L. Porcius the Pretor: purporting thus much, That Aſdrubal was removed out of his wintring harbours, and was paſſing over the Alps: that there were eight thouſand Ligurians levied

A levied and ready in arms, to joyn with him so soon as ever he was come into Italy, unless some one were sent against the Ligurians, to prevent and keep them otherwise busied with war. As for himself, he would with that weak army that he had, go forward, as far as he thought he might with safety. These letters caused the Consuls to dispatch the musters in great hast, and to go forth into their Provinces, sooner than they had purposed: with this intent, that both of them as well the one as the other, might in his several province keep the enemies occupied, and suffer them not to joyn, and lay their forces together. And verily the thing that helped them most in this their designment, was an opinion and perswasion that Annibal had: For albeit he was assured that his brother would that summer pass over into Italy, yet when he called to remembrance what a toil he had himself, and how much trouble and travail he endured in the passage, one while of the river Rhodanus, ano-
B ther while of the mountains of the Alps, and how for the space of five moneths together, he was forced not only to fight with the people, but struggle also with the difficulties of the places; he never looked that Asdrubal could so easily and so speedily pass over as he did: which was the cause that he dislodged out of his wintring places so much the later. But Asdrubal found better expedition, and all things more easy and speedy than either himself hoped for, or others expected. For the Arverni, and other nations (by their example) both of France and also about the Alps, not only received and entertained him, but also accompanied him to the war. Over and besides, as he conducted his army by those passages which were prepared and made open by his brothers journey, and had been afortime unpassable wilds and craggy rags: so against his coming, the Alps were much more easy, by reason of twelve years continual passage to and fro those wayes: and the na-C ture of the peasants more civil and tractable. For the people before, being not used to any strangers and aliens, nor accustomed to see passengers or travailers coming into those parts, were in manner unsociable, savage and wild, and could not away with the society of men. And at the first not knowing whither Annibal intended to go, they supposed that he came for to surprise their holds in caves and rocks, to take their fortresses, and to drive away their people and cattail as booties. But afterwards, the fame that went of the Punick war (wherewith now twelve years Italy was plagued and vexed) had taught them sufficiently, that the Alps were nothing but the way for the Carthaginians to travail through. And by this time well they knew, that two most puissant Cities and States, divided and removed one from another by a great space of Land and Sea between, strived together and warred for their greatness and Soveraignty. Upon these occasions, I say, the Alps
D were open and passable to Asdrubal with ease. But look what time he gained by speedy journies, the same he lost again by stay about Placentia, whiles he lay there in vain, rather besieging than assailing it. He was carried away with a perswasion, that the Town seated upon a plain and champain country, might soon be forced and won: and the great name that went of that noble Colony, induced him to believe, that by the overthrow and razing of that City, he should strike a terror to all the rest. But in lying against that Town, he not only hindred himself much, but also staid Annibal: who having heard that he was passed over the Alps, and come down into Italy, so much sooner than he looked for, was upon the point to dislodge out of his standing wintring camp. For he considered and cast in his mind, not only what a long and tedious piece of work it is to besiege and assault Cities, but also well remembred how himself after his victory at Trebia, assaied to force E that colony in his return from thence, but might not prevail.

"The Consuls being departed from the City, and gone divers wayes as it were for two sundry "wars at once, distracted mens minds with many cares and troublous imaginations, as well in "remembrance of those losses and overthrows, which they had received at Annibal his first co-"ming: as also in thinking, what gods should be so propitious and favourable to the City and "empire of Rome, as to prosper the affairs of the State and Common-weal, at one time in both "places. For until then, their success had been variable and alternative; and their prosperity al-"wayes delayed with lemblable adversity: and again, their losses were recompensed with equal "gains. For when in Italy the Common-wealth of Rome went one way downward headlong to F "the ground at Thrasymenus and Canna: the fortune at wars another way in Spain, set it upright a-"gain. Afterwards, when in Spain one overthrow and defeat hapned in the neck of another, "at what time as two noble Captains were slain, and two valiant armies in part destroyed; the "happy and lucky hand in Sicily and Italy, made up those breaches, and set the reeling state on "foot again. For why? the very distance of the place so far remote (because one of the wars "was maintained in the farthest part of the World) yeelded time and respite to breath themselves "and gather new strength. But now, two wars at once are entertained within Italy, two most "brave warriors and renowned Captains enclose between them the City of Rome: all dangers "come huddle together: all the heavy load and whole burden beareth upon one and the self-"same place: and no doubt, but whether of those two Captains first shall get a victory, he G "will within few dayes after joyn his forces to the other. The fresh and lamentable remem-"brance also of the very last year, wherein two Consuls lost their lives, mightily affrighted the "hearts of the people. So as, in these perplexities and troubles of minde, they accompanied the Consels as they departed and went into their several Provinces. It is more over in some records found, that when Q. Fabius advised and warned M. Livius, being upon his journey toward the wars, not rashly and hand over head to give battail to the enemy, before he knew his nature and qualities, he full of anger still and discontentments with his fellow citizens, made this answer, That so soon as ever he could have a sight of his enemies army, he would fight: and being asked asked again, why he would make such hast? Mary (quoth he) either shall I by victory of mine H enemies win singular honor and renown: or by the overthrow of my fellow Citizens gain some hearts-ease and contentment, if not honest in all respects, yet at least-wise such as they have deserved.

Before that Claudius the Consul was come into his Province, C. Hostilius Tubulus accompanied with certain cohorts lightly appointed, encountred Annibal as he led his army and marched by the utter confines and marches of the territory of Larinum, which leadeth to the Salentins: and charging upon his disordred army, put them to great trouble, slew four thousand of his men, and carried away nine Ensigns. Q. Claudius who had certain garrisons planted in all the Cities of the Salentins country, hearing of the enemies coming, had removed out of his wintring camp: and therefore Annibal, because he would not fight with two armies at once, by night dislodged I out of the territory of Tarentum, and withdrew himself into the Brutians country: and Claudius turned with his army to the Salentins again. Hostilius in the way to Capua, met with the Consul Claudius at Venusia. There, out of both armies, the Consul picked forth forty thousand choise Footmen, and 2500 Horsemen, for to war with Annibal. The rest of the forces Hostilius was commanded to lead unto Capua, and to deliver them to Q. Fabius the Pro-consul.

Annibal having assembled his forces from all parts, as well those which he had in camp during winter time, as those that lay in garrison in the Brutians country, came as far as Grumentum in the territory of the Lucans, upon hope to recover the Towns, which for fear, had revolted to the Romans. Unto the same place the Roman Coss. making out his espials before to discover and cleer the wayes, marched from Venusia, and about a mile and half from the enemy, K encamped himself. The Carthaginians had fortified themselves, and cast a trench close in a manner to the walls of Grumentum: and between the camp and the Romans was some half mile. A plain lay in the midst: and on the left hand of the Carthaginians, and the right hand of the Romans all along between, the hills overlooked them, bare and naked, and of neither part suspected, by reason that they had no wood growing upon them, nor any lurking places to hide an ambush in. Into the plain between they used to put out certain bands and companies from the Corps de guard of both sides, and made light skirmishes not worth the talking of. And it seemed that the drift of the Roman Consul was to keep the enemy in, and not to suffer him to go his wayes. But Annibal desirous to be gone, entred the field with all his power in order of battail. Then the Consul borrowing a little of his enemies cunning, for that in so open hills there L was less fear and suspicion of ambush, gave order that five Cohorts and Horsemen, reenforced with as many bands of footmen, should by night get over those hills, and in the Vallies behind, sit down closely: with direction to T. Claudius Asellus a Colonel of footmen, and P. Claudius a Captain of allies whom he sent to conduct them, at a certain time to arise out of ambush, and to charge the enemy: himself by day light led forth all his whole power as well foot as Horse into the field. Within a while after, Annibal likewise put forth the signal of battail: and all the camp over they set up a cry, running all about to their armour and weapons. Then Footmen and Horsemen both rushed apace out of the gates who could be soonest forth; and scattered as they were all over the plain, made hast to the enemies. Whom when the Consul saw thus disordered, he commanded C. Aurunculeius a Tribun or Colonel of the third legion, to put out the Ca- M valry belonging to that legion, for to charge the enemy with all the violence he could: for that like sheep they were so spred over the plain without all form and fashion, and might be surprised, discomfited, and beaten down, before they could be brought into array and set in order of battail. Annibal himself was not come forth of the camp, when he might hear the noise of them fighting together and hard at it: and excited with this tumult, he led in great hast all the rest of his forces against the enemy. By this, the vanguard and forefront of his battail was frighted with the Horsemen of the enemies: yea, and the first legion of the Infantry and the Cavalry of the right wing began to charge. The Carthaginians disordered as they were, fought at a venture, as they chanced to meet either with Footmen or Horsemen. The conflict grew hotter, by reason of new supplies and fresh succours, and encreased still by the number of them that N continually ran out to the fight. And surely Annibal, notwithstanding this tumult and troublesome fear, had set and marshalled his men in good order as they were fighting (which had been no easy thing to do, but that the army was of old souldiers, and their Captain well experienced and beaten to it) if it had not been for the shout of the cohorts and bands above-said, which they heard at their backs, as they from the hills behind ran down upon them; and set them in great fear, lest that they would thrust in between them and home, and so shut them out of their camp. Hereupon I say they were affrighted, and began to flie here and there. But the slaughter was the less, because the camp was neer, and far they had not to run thither and save themselves in this their fearful fright. For the Horsemen plaid upon their backs still, and gave not over: the cohorts from the open Mountains ran easily down the hill, and charged cross O upon their sides and flanks. Howbeit, there were slain more than eight thousand men, and above 200 taken Prisoners: nine Ensigns won and carried away: of Elephants also (whereof there was little or no use) in a suddain and tumultuary skirmish four were killed, and two gotten alive. Of Romans and Allies, there died two hundred. The next day after, Annibal stirred not. The Roman Consul having brought his army forth into the field, and seeing none to come abroad and make head against him, commanded the slain enemies to be disarmed and despoiled,

A the spoils to be gathered up, and the bodies of his own men to be brought together into a place and buried. For certain dayes after continually, he presſed ſo hard at the camp gates, that he wanted but little of entring thither with banner diſplayed. In ſo much as Annibal at the third watch of the night, leaving behind him many fires burning, and divers tents ſtanding, on that ſide eſpecially which looked toward the enemies, and ſome few Numidians, to make a ſhew upon the Rampier and at the gates; diſlodged, and purpoſed to go into Apulia. The next morning by day light, the Roman army embattailed, approached the trench and rampier. The Numidians of ſet purpoſe ſhewed themſelves in the gates and upon the rampier: and when they had a good while dallied thus and played with the enemy, they mounted on Horſeback, and ſpared no Horſe-fleſh until they had overtook their fellows. The Conſul perceiving that B all was quiet within the camp, and ſeeing not ſo much as thoſe few appear any where, who in the morning betimes had walked their ſtations, ſent forth two Horſemen into the camp as eſpials. After he underſtood for certain that all was ſafe, and the coaſts clear, he commanded his enſigns to make an entry. And ſtaying no longer there, than whiles his ſouldiers ran up and down to pill and ſpoil, he ſounded the retreat: and long before night, brought his army back again. The next morrow after, he ſet forward by the dawning of the day, and with long journeis, following his enemies by the voyce of the country, and tracing them by their foottſteps, he overtook them not far from Venuſia. There alſo was a ſcufling skirmiſh between them, and not ſo few as two thouſand Carthaginians ſlain. From thence Annibal ever marched by night, and journied through the mountains, becauſe he would give his enemy no vantage of fight, un-C till he came to Metapontum. From whence Hanno (for he was Captain of the garriſon there) was ſent with ſome few in his train into the Brutians country, to levy a new army. And Annibal after he had joyned thoſe forces to his own, returned again to Venuſia, by the ſame way that he came from thence; and ſo forward he marched to Canuſium. Nero never left the enemy, but was ready to tread on his heels, and as he marched himſelf toward Metapontum, he had ſent for Q. Fulvius to repair into the Lucans country, becauſe thoſe parts ſhould not be diſfurniſhed of defence.

In this mean ſpace, there were four French Horſemen, and two Numidians, ſent to Annibal with letters from Aſdrubal, after he was removed from the ſiege of Placentia: who having travailed in manner all the length of Italy, through the mids of the enemies, whiles they follow af-D ter Annibal in his retire unto Metapontum, miſſed of their way, and light upon Tarentum: where they were encountred by the forragers of the Romans that ranged about the fields, and by them were brought before Q. Claudius the Propretor. At the firſt they entertained him with ſlim ſlams, with doubtful and intricate anſwers: but when the fear of the rack and other tortures, had forced them to tell a truth, they confeſſed, that they had letters about them to deliver from Aſdrubal to Annibal. With thoſe letters ſealed as they were, they were committed unto L. Virginius a Colonel, for to be conveied unto Claudius the Conſul. And two troops or Cornets beſides of Samnit Horſemen were ſent to guard them. So ſoon as they were come unto the Conſul, and the letters read by an interpreter, and ſome examination taken of theſe captives: then Claudius conſidering that the common-weal was not now in that good caſe, nor the occaſion ſuch, E that each Governor needed no more, but to make war by the ordinary courſe of commiſſion, within the compaſs and limits of his own Province, with the help of his own army alone, and againſt an enemy aſſigned unto him by the Senate: but that ſome unlooked for adventures muſt be enterpriſed, ſome new deſignments and unexpected put in execution, which when they are begun and attempted, might make no leſs wonder and fear among their own friends, that terror among the enemies: and being once performed and done, might turn the former fear into as great joy and gladnes; ſent the letters of Aſdrubal to the Senat at Rome: and withal, himſelf acquainted the Lords of the Senate what he intended to do. And for aſmuch as Aſdrubal wrote unto his brother to meet him in Umbria, he adviſed them to ſend for the legion at Capua to Rome, to take muſters alſo at Rome, and to oppoſe that army of the City, againſt the enemy at Narnia.
F Thoſe were the contents of his letters to the Senate. He diſpatched likewiſe meſſengers before, through the territories of the Larinats, Marucins, Ferentins, and Pretutians (by whom he meant to lead his army) for to give notice, that all the inhabitants of thoſe parts, ſhould out of their Villages and good Towns, provide and bring forth victuals into the high wayes, for to refreſh his ſouldiers; alſo to come with their Cart-horſes, draught-oxen, and other beaſts for carriage, together with wains and carts, that the wearied ſouldiers might eaſe themſelves thereby. Himſelf out of his whole army, as well of citizens as allies, choſe forth the flour and moſt picked men of all, to the number of ſix thouſand foot, and one thouſand horſe, and gave it out openly, that he minded to ſurpriſe the firſt City that he came next unto in the Lucans country, and withal, the G garriſon of Carthaginians that lay there: and therefore commanded them to be ready for the journey and expedition. Thus when he had ſet forward in the night, he turned his way into Picenum. And the Conſul made no more ado, but with long journies highed him as faſt as he could, and led his army directly to his colleague, leaving Q. Catius his Lieutenant, to guard and command the camp.

At Rome, they were no leſſe terrified and troubled, than they were two years before, at what time as the Carthaginians were encamped before the walls and gates of the City. And men wiſt not well, what to make of this adventurous and audacious journey of the Conſul, whether they

ſhould ſhould praiſe or diſpraiſe it. And it ſeemed that they would meaſure it and report thereof accor- H ding to the event, than which ſurely, there is nothing more unjuſt and unequal. But thus they whiſpered, "That the camp was left with an army, and without their General, neer unto the "enemy Annibal, yea, and the ſame guelded of all the ſtrength and fleur thereof: that the Conſul

"pretended an expedition into the Lucans country, when indeed he went toward Picenum and
"Gallia; leaving the camp by no one thing more ſafe and ſecure, than by the errour and miſtaking
"of the enemy, who is altogether ignorant, that the General is gone from thence, and part of the "forces with him. But where would they be then, and in what taking ſhould the camp be, in caſe
"that were known abroad; or if Annibal would either with his whole army follow after Nero,
"being gone with no more than ſix thouſand? or aſſault the camp, left as it were for a prey unto "him, without forces, without conduct, and without the fortune and good luck of the General to I
"protect it? The old defeats received in this war, the freſh remembrance of two Conſuls ſlain
"but the laſt year, encreaſed mens fear. All which misfortunes hapned, when there was in Italy
"but one Captain General, and one ſingle army of the enemies. Now, of one war of the Car"thaginians there are made twain: and two Annibals (as a man would ſay) be both at once in "Italy, right valorous and renowned warriors. For even Aſdrubal alſo, was Amilcar his ſon as "well as Annibal, as valiant and redoubted a Captain every way: as who for ſo many years to"gether in Spain, hath been exerciſed in the Roman wars, and born the name of atchieving a "twofold victory, and defeating two armies, with two moſt noble and famous commanders: and
"as for expedition and ſpeed in his voyage out of Spain, and for raiſing the Nations of France up "in arms, he may make his boaſt much more truly than Annibal himſelf. For even in thoſe very K "places, where Annibal had loſt the greater part of his ſouldiers, with hunger and cold, (which
"kind of death of all others is moſt miſerable) this Aſdrubal hath levied a power of armed men.
"Moreover, they that knew Spain well, and the affairs which had paſſed there, ſaid beſides, That "he had not to deal with Nero, as with a warrior whom he knew not already; for why? he had
"when it was, made a Child of Nero, by a good token, That when Aſdrubal was by chance in a
"wood, and could not get out, was put to his ſhifts; but whiles he trifled out the time with Nero
"in booking deceitful conditions and capitulations of peace, he ſhewed him a couſening Carth"ginian caſt, gave him the fair ſlip, and eſcaped out of his hands. And to conclude, in all their "diſcourſes at Rome, they magnified every thing on the enemies part above all truth, and debaſed
"all their own means of help beneath all reaſon: ſuch was their fear, which interpreteth and con- L
"ſtrueth all to the worſt.

The ſpeech of Nero to his ſouldiers.

Nero, when he had now gained ſo much ground, and was gone ſo far from the enemy, as it had not mattered much if his deſigns had been revealed and made known unto him, for any danger that might enſue thereof; called his ſouldiers before him, and ſpake ſome few words to this or the like effect. "Never was there deſignment (qd. he) of any General in the field, in outward ſhew more "dangerous, in deed and truth more ſafe and ſecure, than this of mine. I lead you to a certain and
"aſſured victory, even to that war, unto which my colleague would not go before the Senate had "allowed him to his full contentment, a greater power both of foot and Horſe, and the ſame better
"ſet out and more furniſhed, than if he ſhould have gone againſt Annibal himſelf: and therefore "whatſoever ſmall poiſe and addition of forces you bring thereto, you ſhall ſway thereby the M "whole, and as it were weigh down the ballance. For when the enemies ready embattailed to "fight, ſhall hear (and before that time, I will take order I trow, that they ſhall not hear) that ano"ther Conſul and another army is come, no doubt the day will be ours, and they ſhall yeeld us the "victory. For it is a fame & name only, that fighteth the field & determineth battails. And ſmall "matters many times carry away the game, and cauſe mens minds both to ſtoop for fear, and to "riſe with hope. And verily, of a well fought field you are they that ſhall reap the fruit & gain the "glory. For alwayes it is ſeen, that a little help that cometh laſt, is more than all beſides, & ſeemeth
"to effect the whole. And you ſee your ſelves, with what concourſe, with what admiration, with "what affectionat favour all men do entertain & regard you by the way. And in very truth, as they marched along in their journey, it was a world to ſee, how both men & women flocked out of all N the villages of the countrey to ſee them, how they ſorted themſelves into companies & degrees to welcome them, and how as they paſſed as it were in a lane through them, they made vows in their name, they poured out their prayers in their behalf, & dealt praiſes among them: calling them the very guard & defence of the Common-weal, the ſaviours & redeemers of Rome & the Roman Empire: acknowledging that the lives and liberties of themſelves and their children, lay in their right hands, and depended upon the force of their arms: praying to all the gods and goddeſſes, and to all the holy halows of heaven, to vouchſafe them a lucky journey, a fortunat fight, and a ſpeedy victory over their enemies: wiſhing heartily, that they might be bound and condemned (as it were) to pay and perform their vows, which in their name they had undertaken & promiſed: deſiring earneſtly, that as now they went along, & accompanied them with careful minds for fear of the peril which M they went unto, ſo after few dayes they might meet with them upon the way with joyful hearts, as they return with Triumph for their victory. Every man for himſelf in particular invited them friendly, offered them frankly, entreated and beſought them importunatly, that all things whatſo-ever they ſtood in need of, either for themſelves or their beaſts, they would receive at his hands eſpecially, as being ready to afford them all moſt liberally, heapful, and with the better. The no

A no stay they would make with any, nor one jot depart from their colours. Their meat they took by the way as they went, journeying night and day, and scarce allowing their bodies rest and sleep to content their weak nature that looked for it. Now had Nero sent afore-hand to his brother Consul certain Courriers, to give him advertisement of his coming, and to know again from him his mind, whether he should come openly or secretly, by day time or by night, and lodge in one camp with him, or in another apart by himself. Livius his advice was, and he thought it the better of the twain, to enter into his camp, closely in the night season, and had given a watch-word, and made it known throughout all the camp, that every Marshal and Colonel should lodge a Marshal or Colonel, every Centurion entertain a Centurion, every knight or man of arms receive a knight or horseman, and every footman take unto him a footman into his pavilion and cabbin.
B For it was not expedient that the camp should be enlarged and set out wider, for fear that the enemy might take knowledge of another Consuls coming: and so much the more easily might many of them be bestowed in the streight room of their pavilions, because the army of Claudius had brought in manner nothing with them in this expedition, save their armour only. Moreover, in the very way as they came, the company was well mended and much encreased by many voluntaries that offered themselves willingly of their own accord, as well old souldiers, such as had served out their years, as young and lusty men: whom Claudius perceiving so to strive for to have their names entred if he saw them personable and strong of body and like to do good service, had enrolled into the muster book. The other Consul lay encamped before * Sena, and * Senagaglia.
Asdrubal some half mile from him. And therefore Nero, being now approched and come neer, C sat him down close among the mountains, because he would not put himself within camp before night. And when they were come thither, they were welcomed every man according to his degree, by them of their own place and calling, and brought into their tents and pavilions, and with a general joy of all, friendly entertained as their loving guests. The next day following they assembled together to counsel: at which meeting, L. Porcius Licinius the Pretor was present: who was himself encamped close unto the Consuls leaguer. He before their coming, by leading his army over the high places, and one while keeping the narrow streights of the forrest to impeach and stop the passages, another while charging upon the flanks and sides, or else upon the back and tail of the enemy, had by all the devices and policies of war, mocked him and kept him play. This man, I say, was at the foresaid counsel. Many men there were of opinion, that the day of D battel should be deferred for a time, whiles Nero might have some few dayes respite, both to refresh his souldiers, wearied with long travail and much watching, and also to know the quality somewhat better of his enemy. Nero not only persisted still to perswade, but also began most earnestly to intreat, "That they would not by long delay make that design of his to seem rash "and dangerous, which speediness in execution had made safe and secure. Considering, that "whiles Annibal upon ignorance and error (which is not like to continue long with him) "lay still asleep and benummed, neither once thought upon it, to assail the camp left without a "General, nor put himself upon the way, to make pursuite after me; now before he once stir, "I may (quoth he) defeat the army of Asdrubal, and return again into Apulia. But he that E "by deferring still, giveth the enemy time and respite, betraieth as much as lieth in him, the "camp unto Annibal, and laieth the way open for him into Gallia, to joyn with Asdrubal at his "good leasure and pleasure. Nay (quoth he) the signal of battel must be given forthwith, and "we must into the field. We must, I say, take the vantage and make the best of the error and ig-"norance of our enemies, both absent there, and present here: that neither they with Annibal "may know that they are to deal with fewer; nor these again beware, that they are to fight with "more in number, and stronger in power. Thus the counsel brake up, and the signal of battel was put forth, and presently they went into the field. The enemies were already advanced in battel array, and stood with displayed ensigns. The only stay of joyning in fight was this, That Asdrubal riding out with some few Horsemen before the ensigns, chanced to mark some old targets
F of his enemies which he had not as yet seen, and their Horses more lank and lean, than earst before. And (as he guessed) the number also was greater than ordinary and usual. Suspecting therefore, that which was indeed, he sounded the retreat in all hast; and sent out presently to the river where they used to water, to see if they might either light upon some & catch them prisoners, or at least-wise take good marks by their eye, whether any of them haply were higher coloured, or looked sunburnt, presently upon their late travel. Also he gave them commandment to ride aloof about their camp, and to spie whether the rampier were enlarged or set out farther in any place, and to listen attentively whether the trumpet sounded single or double within the camp. When all other circumstances besides were related in order affirmatively, only the not enlarging of the camp, put them by their hint, and gave the occasion that they were beguiled. Two several camps they were, like as before the coming of the Consul: the one belonging to M. Livius, G the other to L. Porcius. And in neither of them were the rampiers and trenches set out any jot, whereby they might put up more tents, and quarter themselves in larger room. But this one thing troubled this old experienced Captain, and acquainted so well as he was with the Roman enemies that his espials brought word, how in the Pretors camp they sounded the trumpet once, and in the Consuls twice. For surely that was an evident argument that two Consuls were there. And in thinking how the other Consul had departed from Annibal & given him the slip, he mightily tormented himself. And he could not suspect & imagine that, which was indeed the truth, namely, that Annib. I was deluded and mocked in a matter of ſo great moment, as to be ignorant what H was become of the General, or of the army, to which he lay ſo cloſe and neer encamped. Surely (thought he) and without all queſtion, he hath received no ſmall foil and overthrow, and in this fright dareth not make after and follow the enemy. Nay, he feared much, leſt all were loſt and gone, and that he ſhould not come time enough to help and ſuccour him: and that the Romans had gotten already the ſame good hand in Italy, which they had before in Spain. Otherwhiles he was perſwaded, that his letters never came to Annibal his hands, that they were intercepted, and ſo the Conſul made haſt to prevent him, and give him the foil by the way. Being perplexed with theſe careful cogitations, he cauſed the fires to be put out, and at the ſignal given at the firſt watch, to truſs up bag and baggage, and to diſlodge, and be gone. In this fearful haſt, and nightly tumult, the guides whiles they were ſlenderly looked unto, and ſmall heed was taken of them, I one of them ſat down and reſted cloſe in a ſecret lurking hole which he had before deſtined in his mind; the other waded over the river Metaurus, through the foords that he was well acquainted with, and ſo got away and made an eſcape. So the army left at random without their guides, firſt wandred over the fields, and then diverſe of them being weary and ſleepy with overwatching, laid them down along here and there, and left their colours with few about them. Aſdrubal commanded them to march along the bank of the River, and to follow it, until the day-light might direct them the right way: and ſo going a compaſs in and out according to the winding reaches and cranks of the River, wandred a great while, and gained but a ſmall ground forward.

that

Now when day light once appeared, he purpoſed to ſpie out the firſt place for convenient paſſage and there to get over. But finding no foords, by reaſon that the farther it was from the Sea, the K higher were the banks from the water that kept in the River, he ſpent all the live-long day, and gave the enemy time to follow after him. And firſt Claudius Nero came with all the Horſemen, then Porcius followed hard after with the van courriers, and light armed footmen. Whiles they made offer to charge their enemies in their march, every way, and plaid ſtill upon them, inſo much as now Aſdrubal leaving to journey forward (wherein he ſeemed rather to flee than march) was deſirous to take a little hill along the river ſide, and there to encamp and fortifie: Livius was come alſo with all the main power of footmen, ſo armed and ſo orderly appointed and marſhalled, as they were not only provided to march in journey, but ready alſo preſently to give battail. But when they were all joyned together, and aranged in battail array, Claudius had the leading of the right wing, Livius commanded the left, and the Pretor took the charge and L conduct of the main battail. Aſdrubal ſeeing no other remedy but to fight, never fortified his camp; but in the fore-front before the vanguard, and in the very mids, placed his Elephants: about them in the left wing he oppoſeth the French againſt Claudius; not ſo much truſting upon them, as ſuppoſing verily that the enemy was afraid of them: and in proper perſon he took up the right wing againſt Livius for himſelf and the Spaniards, in whom (being old beaten ſouldiers) he repoſed his moſt hope. The Ligurians in the mids were beſtowed behind the Elephants.
But the battail was rather drawn out in length than ſtretched forth in breadth. The Frenchmen were defended with the hill that bare out over them. That front which the Spaniards kept, encountred with the left wing of the Romans. And all the battail of the right ſide, which bare out from the conflict, ſtood ſtill and fought not. The hill that was oppoſite againſt them, was the M cauſe that neither afront, nor aflank they could charge upon the enemy. But between Livius and Aſdrubal there was an hot fight begun already, and cruel bloudſhed on both ſides. There were both the General Captains: there was the greater part of the Romans, as well foot as Horſe:
there were the Spaniards, old and experienced ſouldiers, skilfull alſo in the Roman manner of fight: there were the Ligurians, a rough nation, and hardy in fight. Againſt this battailon were the Elephants turned, who at the firſt ſhock and onſet troubled and diſordered the vanguard, yea, and began to force the enſigns to give ground. But after upon the noiſe that grew greater, and the battail that waxed hotter, they began to be unruly, and travers between both battails, as it were doubtful to whether ſide they belonged, much like to ſhips left hulling and floting without their pilots and ſteers men. Then Claudius cried out eftſoons to his ſouldiers: To what N end, quoth he, made we ſuch poſt haſt, and took ſo long a journey? But ſeeing that he laboured in vain to advance his banners and mount up againſt the hill oppoſite unto him, and perceiving that way how it was impoſſible to come unto the enemy and to enter upon him, he drew forth certain cohorts out of the right wing where he ſaw they were liker to ſtand ſtill than to fight, and wheeled about behind the enemies battail, and ſo unwares not only to the enemies, but alſo to his own men, he charged upon the left flank of the enemies: and he beſtirred himſelf ſo nimbly, that when he had ſhewed himſelf on the ſides, preſently he plaid upon their backs; in ſuch ſort, that now on all hands, affront, behind, and on their flanks, down went the Spaniards and Ligurians, and were hewn in pieces, yea, and the execution reached to the very French. There, with them was leaſt ado, and ſmalleſt fight of all: for a great many of their fellows had abandoned their co- O lours and being ſlipt away in the night, lay aſleep all over the fields: and ſuch as were there, weary with travail and watching (as having bodies that of all things cannot away with labour and pains taking) were ſcarce able to bear their corſelets on their backs. Beſides, now it was high noon: and what with drought & heat together, they ſtood gaping for air & yeelded their bodies either to be maſſacred, or taken captive. As for the Elephants, there were more of them killed by the hands of the governors and guiders that ſate upon them, than by the enemy that fought againſt them. For their

A their manner was to have about them a Carpenters chissel and a mallet, and when the beasts began once to rage and to run upon their own fellows, their masters would set the said chissel between their ears, even in the very joynt where the nape of the neck and the head meet together, and with his mallet to drive it as hard as he could: this was found to be the readiest and most speedy way to kill so mighty and huge a beast, when they were past all hope to rule them and keep them in order. And the first inventor and practiser of this feat was Asdrubal, a famous and memorable Captain, as in many other respects, so especially for this battail. He it was that held out to the end, exhorting his souldiers to fight, fighting also himself, and adventuring all dangers: he it was, that when his men were weary and drew back (by reason of long toil and labour) incensed them again, one while by fair words and intreaty, another while by sharp checks and re-
B bukes: he reclaimed them again when they were running away; he renewed the fight in divers places when it slaked and gave over. And at the very last, when he saw evidently that the enemy had the honor of the day, because he would not remain alive after so great an army defeated that followed his standard, and were induced by the reputation and name that went of him, he set spurs to his Horse, and rode among the Squadrons of the Roman Horsemen; and there, as beseemed Amilcars son, and Annibals brother, fighting right manfully, was slain. Never during the time of this war in one field were there so many enemies killed: and it seemed now that for losse of Captain and overthrow of army, they might well cry quittance with them for the defeat at Canne. Slain there were 56000 enemies, 6400 taken prisoners: and a rich booty and pil-
C lage gained of all sorts, besides gold and silver. Moreover, there were recovered of Roman citizens above four thousand, who had been taken prisoners, and were among the enemies. That comfort they had to make amends for the souldiers that died in this battail: for they won not the victory without bloudshed in this field, wherein to the number almost of eight thousand Romans and allies together, lost their lives. And the Conquerors themselves had so much their fill of bloud and slaughter, that the next morrow, when word was brought unto Livius the Consul, that divers Cisalpine Gauls, and Ligurians, which either were not at the battail, or escaped out of the execution, and were going away in one company all together, without a certain Leader, without Ensigns, without any order or command, and might all be put to the sword and utterly destroyed, if there were but one cornet of Horsemen sent out after them, D "Nay, quoth he, let some remain alive to tell the news both of our enemies losse and ruin, and of "our own vertue and valour. And Nero the very next night after the battail, marched with more speed backward, than he came thither, and within six dayes returned again so far as to his standing leaguer, and the enemies. All the way as he marched, he was not indeed so resorted unto and frequented by so many men, by reason that there went no harbingers or messengers before: but his coming was welcomed, with so great gladness and mirth, that for very joy, the people were welneer besides themselves. As for Rome, it cannot be uttered and expressed in words sufficiently, how men were affected the one way or the other: neither how pensive the City was in doubtful expectation of the event, nor how joyous and jocund again, upon the news and tidings of the victory. For never one day (after the rumour once was blown thither, that Claudius the Consul was gone forth in his expedition) from the sun-rising unto the setting, de-E parted either Senators out of the Councel-chamber, from attendance upon the Magistrats, or the people out of the Common-hall. The dames of the City, because other help they could yeeld none, betook themselves to their beads and devotions, and in every Church went up and down, and plied all the Gods with prayers, with vows, and humble supplications. As the City was thus perplexed and in suspence; first there came some flying news, that two Horsemen of Narnia were come out of the battail, and returned to the camp which lay to guard and keep the streights and passages of Umbria, who had brought word thither, that the enemies were defeated. At the first, they rather lent their ears to hear these tidings, than bent their minds to entertain the same; as being greater than they might in heart conceive, and more joyful than they could assuredly believe: and the exceeding swiftnes of the rumor hindred the credit thereof, because it was F reported withal, that the battel was fought but two dayes before. Then were letters brought from L. Manlius Acidinus, sent out of the camp, which confirmed the arrival of those Horsemen of Narnia. Those letters were brought through the common place, unto the Tribunal of the Prætor: whereupon the Lords of the Senat were sent for out of the Councel-house. But the people kept such a thrusting and thronging about the door of the Senat, that the messenger could not passe thither, but was haled and pulled by the people, questioning with him, and calling hard upon him, that the letters should be read at the market cross, and in the Rostra, before they were opened in the Senate. But at the last, they were restrained by the Magistrats and caused to void, and hardly could the joy be contained among so unruly people, who had no measure nor rule of their affections. Well, the letters were first read in the Senat, and then in the assembly of the people:
G and there, according to the divers dispositions of men, some took joy and contentment of mind, as upon a certainty: others would give no credit, before they either heard the messengers speak directly from the Consuls, or saw their letters. After this, word came, that there were Embassadors themselves at hand. And then indeed, there ran to meet them, of all sorts, young and old, every one desired to be the first, to see and to hear these so glad tidings. And they went out so far as the bridge Milvius, and all the way along, was full of people. These Embassadors or messengers, were L. Veturius Philo, P. Licinius Varus, Q. Cecilius Metellus. Who being accompanied with people

queſtioned with themſelves, others enquired of their train and retinue, what news, and how the World went. And as any one had caught an end from them, that the army and Captain General of the enemies was ſlain, or the Roman legions ſafe, and the Conſuls alive and well, he would immediatly impart his joy unto others. Much ado had they to come into the Curia, and more ado there was, to keep out the multitude, that they were not mingled among the Lords of the Senate. But at laſt the letters were read in the Senat. From thence were the Embaſſadors brought into the general aſſembly of the people. And L. Veturius after he had read the letters, explained himſelf from point to point in order, how every thing was done, with great applauſe; and afterwards, with a general ſhout of all the aſſembly, who hardly could conceive in their minds ſo great joy. Then they ran divers wayes, ſome to the Temples of the Gods to render thanks, others to their I own houſes, to communicate with their wives and children ſo lucky and fortunate tidings. And the Senat decreed a ſolemn proceſſion for three dayes together, forasmuch as M. Livius and C. Claudius the Conſuls, with the ſafety of the legions had vanquiſhed the enemies, killed their General, and put their army to the ſword. This proceſſion C. Hoſtilius the Pretor, publiſhed in the open aſſembly of the people: and it was celebrated and ſolemnized both by men and women. All the Temples for three dayes fully, were likewiſe repleniſhed with the one ſex and the other. For the Matrons and Dames of the City, in their beſt apparrel, together with their children, yeelded praiſe and thanks to the immortal Gods, as if now they had been freed from all fear, and the war come to a final end for ever. This victory altered the very ſtate and courſe of the commonweal, ſo as from that time forward, as in time of ſetled peace, men durſt make contracts, buy and K ſell, borrow and lend, yea, and pay debts to their creditors.

C. Claudius the Conſul, ſo ſoon as he was entred into the camp again, cauſed the head of Aſdrubal (which he had preſerved with great care and brought with him) to be thrown out before the Corps de guard and ſtations of the enemies, and that the African captives, ſhould be ſhewed bound as they were in chains: and two of them to be ſent looſe unto Annibal, to declare and recount in order, how every thing hapned. Annibal having at once received this double blow, mourning as well for the publick loſſe of the ſtate, as for the calamity hapned in his own houſe, fetched a deep ſigh (by report) and ſaid: Ah, I ſee well the hard fortune of Carthage. And diſlodging from thence, becauſe he would bring together all his forces (which being diſperſed aſunder, he was not able to hold and maintain) into the utmoſt angle of Italy, (the Brutians country) L he brought thither as well the Metapontins, even the whole ſtate of them, who abandoned their own Towns and Cities, as alſo the Lucans, as many as were ſubject unto him, and under his obedience.

The eight and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

WHen it seemed that Spain was eased as much of war, as Italy charged therewith, by the voyage of Asdrubal thither: behold, all of a sudden there arose other troubles there, equall to the former. And as for the Provinces of Spain at that time, they were possessed between Romans & Carthaginians in this manner. Asdrubal
C the son of Gisgo, was retired with his power far within the country, even to the Ocean and Gades. But the coasts bordering upon our sea, and in manner all Spain bending toward the East, was held by Scipio and subject to the Roman Empire. Hanno the new General, being passed out of Affrick with a fresh army, and entred into the room of Asdrubal the Barchine, joyned with Mago: and when he had put in arms within a short time, a great number of men in Celtiberia, which lieth in the midst between the two seas; Scipio sent forth against him; M. Syllanus made ten thousand foot, and five hundred horsemen. This Syllanus made such speed by taking as long journies as possibly he could (considering how much hindred and troubled he was, both by the roughness of the waies, and also by the straights, environed with thick woods, and forrests, as most parts of Spain are) that notwithstanding all those difficulties, he prevented not only the messengers, but also D the very fame and rumour of his coming, and by the guidance of certain fugitive revolts out of Celtiberia, he passed forward from thence to the enemy. By the same guides he had intelligence, and was for certain advertised (being now some ten miles from the enemy) that about the very way where he should march there were two camps: namely, on the left hand the new army aboveseid of Celtiberians, to the number of more than nine thousand lay encamped, and the Carthaginians on the right. As for this Leaguer it was wel defended and fortified with corps de guards, which watch and ward both night and day, according to the good order and discipline of war. But the other was as much neglected, dissolute, loose, and out of order, like as commonly barbarous people and raw souldiers are, and such as fear the less, by reason they are at home within their own country. Syllanus thinking it good policy to set upon them first, gave commandment to E march under their ensigns and colours, and bear toward their left hand as much as they could, for fear of being discovered in some place or other by the guards and Sentinels of the Carthaginians. And himself in person, having sent before certain vant-courriers and espials, with his army advanced apace directly toward his enemy. Now was he approached within three miles of them unespied, and not descried at all. For why? a mountain country it was, full of roughs and crags, overspread and covered with woods and thickets. There in a hollow valley between, and therefore secret for the purpose, he commanded his souldiers to sit them down and take their refection. In this mean time the espials came back and verified the words of the fugitives aforesaid. Then the Romans, after they had piled their packs, their trusses and baggage in the midst, armed themselves, and in order of battell set forward to fight. When they were come within a mile of F the enemies, they were discovered by them, who began suddenly to be affraid. Mago at the first outcry and alarm, set spurs to his horse, and rode a gallop out of his Camp to succour. Now there were in the army of the Celtiberians, four thousand footmen targettiers, and two hundred horse. This Troop being in manner the flower and very strength of the whole army, and as it were, a full and compleat legion he placed in the vanguard; all the rest, which were lightly armed, he bestowed in the rereward for to succour and rescue. As he led them forth thus ordered and arranged they were not well issued without the trench, but the Romans began to lance their javelins and darts against them. The Spaniards to avoid this volley of shot from the enemies, couched close under their shields, and defended themselves, and afterwards they rose up at once to charge again upon them. But the Romans standing thick, as their manner is, received all their darts in G their targets, and then they closed man to man, and foot to foot, and began to fight at hand with their swords. Howbeit, the ruggedness of the ground, as it nothing availed the swiftness of the Celtiberians (whose guise is to run to and fro in skirmish and keep no ground) so the same was not hurtfull at all to the Romans who were used to a set battell, and to stand to their fight: only the straight room, and the trees and shrubs growing between, parted their ranks and files asunder, so as they were forced to maintain skirmish either singly one to one, or two to two at the most, as if they had been matched to cope together even. And look what thing hindered the enemies in their flight, the ſame yielded them, as it were, bound hand and foot unto the Romans, for to be killed. Now when all theſe targettiers wel-near of the Celtiberians were ſlain; their light armed ſouldiers, and the Carthaginians alſo, who from the other camp ran to ſuccour, were likewiſe diſarraied, diſcomfited and hewn in pieces. So there were two thouſand footmen, and not above, and all the horſemen (who ſcarce began battell) fled with Mago and eſcaped. As for Hanno the other Generall, together with them who came laſt, and to the very end of the fray, was taken alive. But Mago fled ſtill: and all the Cavalry, with as many as remained of the old footmen followed after, and by the tenth day arrived in the Province of Gades, and came unto Aſdrubal. The Celtiberians, that were but new ſouldiers, ſlipt into the next woods out of the way, and ſo from thence fled home.

This fortunate victory hapned in ſo good a time, not ſo much ſtifled the preſent war in the very birth, as it cut off the matter and maintenance of future troubles, in caſe the enemies had been let alone, and ſuffered to ſollicit and ſtir other nations to take armes, like as they raiſed the Celtiberians already. Whereupon, Scipio having highly commended Syllanus, and conceived great hope withall to diſpatch quite and make an end of the wars, in caſe himſelf lingred not the matter, and made long ſtay; purſued the remnant behind, and ſet forward into the utmoſt Province of Spain againſt Aſdrubal. But Aſdrubal, who hapned then to lye encamped in * Bætica for to keep his Allies in obedience and faithfull alleageance, all on a ſudden diſlodged, pluckt up ſtandards, and away; and more like one that fled than marched, led his army farther into the country, even as far as the Ocean, and to Gades. But ſuppoſing, that ſo long as he kept his forces all together, himſelf was the only mark which the enemy would ſhoot at, before that he cut over the ſtraights of Gibraltar to Gades, he brake up his whole army, and ſent them away here and there to their ſeverall Cities, both to ſave themſelves within the walls, and to defend the walls by force of arms. Scipio, ſo ſoon as he perceived that the war was thus divided into ſundry parts, and that to lead about his forces from City to City, was rather a long and tedious peece of work, than either difficult or much availeable, retired back. But becauſe he would not leave that country clear in the hands of the enemies, he ſent his brother L. Scipio with 10000 foot, and 1000 horſemen, to aſſail the mightieſt and wealthieſt City in thoſe parts, which the barbarous people call Oringis. This City is ſeated in the confines of the Meleſſi (a nation meer Spaniards) the ſoil fruitfull, and the inhabitants there find ſilver mines. This was the fortreſs of Aſdrubal, and his place of ſafe retreat, when he made outroads all abroad into the midland countries of the main and ſpoiled the people. Lucius Scipio having pitched his Camp under the ſaid City; before that he entrenched and blocked the town, ſent certain to the gates, who by parling near at hand, might feel and ſound the diſpoſitions of the Citizens, and perſwade with them to make triall of the Romans friendly alliance, rather than their forcible violence. But perceiving by their anſwers no mind at all nor inclination to peace, he caſt a trench, and raiſed a double rampier about the town, and divided his army into three parts, to the end that one of them ſhould ever follow the aſſault, whiles the other twain took reſt and eaſe. And when the firſt troop and regiment of them began to give a camiſado, there followed a fierce, cruell, and doubtfull skirmiſh. For they could not eaſily either come under the walls, or bring ſcaling ladders to ſet to, by reaſon of the ſhot that light upon them. And ſuch as already had reared up ladders to the wall, ſome of them were puſhed off with certain forks provided for that purpoſe, others were caught hold of with iron hooks from above, and were in danger to be hung up in the air, hoiſed aloft, and fetcht over the walls. Scipio ſeeing that the conflict was unequall, by reaſon of the ſmall number of aſſailants, and that the enemies had the advantage beſides, in that they fought from the wall top; cauſed that firſt regiment to retire, and with the other twain at once gave a freſh aſſault to the town. This ſtroke ſo great a fear into them who were already wearied with fighting, that not only the townſmen ſuddenly abandoned the walls and fled, but alſo the Carthaginian garriſon ſouldiers, for fear leſt the City was betraied, forſook alſo their ſtations and places of guard, and gathered themſelves into one place. But then the townſmen were affraid, leſt if the enemies put themſelves within the City, they ſhould be maſſacred every where as they came in their way, without reſpect and difference who were Carthaginians, or who were Spaniards. Whereupon they ſet one gate open on a ſudden, and in great numbers ran out of the town, bearing their targets before them againſt the darts that were ſhot afar off, and ſhewing aloft their naked right hands, in token that they had laid aſide their ſwords. But whether the enemy could not well diſcern them ſo far off, or whether they ſuſpected ſome crafty and deceitfull practice, I wot not, but they fell upon theſe that fled and yielded unto them, and ſlew them downright, as well as if they had affronted them in the face of a battell, and at the ſame gate entred the City with bloudy banners. In other parts likewiſe they fell to hewing down the gates with axes, and to break them open with crows of Iron. And as every horſeman got into the City, he rode amain (according to the direction given by the Generall) into the market place, to be poſſeſſed thereof. And to theſe horſemen were aſſigned the Triarii for aid and aſſiſtance. The Legionary ſouldiers beſides ran over all the other parts of the City, ſpoiling and killing all that ever they met, ſave ſuch as defended themſelves with their armour. All the Carthaginians were taken priſoners and committed to ward, likewiſe of townſmen about three hundred, ſuch as had ſhut the gates; but unto all the reſt the town was rendred again, and each man had his own goods delivered and reſtored unto him. There were ſlain at the aſſault of that City, of enemies almoſt two thouſand: but of Romans not above

fourſcore

* Andeluſia.

A fourſcore and ten. As by the winning of the town, they that were imployed there took great joy and contentment: ſo in their return to their Generall himſelf, and the reſt of the main army, they made a goodly ſhew as they marched with a mighty multitude of priſoners led before them. Scipio having praiſed his brother in the moſt honourable terms that he could deviſe, and namely, for this exploit of forcing Orinx, making him equall in glory to himſelf for the conqueſt of Carthage: becauſe winter drew on, that he could neither give the attempt upon Gades, nor yet follow at once upon the army of Aſdrubal, ſo diſperſed as it was in ſundry parts over the Province, conducted his forces back again into the Province of Spain, that lieth on this ſide Iberus: and when he had diſmiſſed his legions into their ſeverall ſtanding camps to winter in, and ſent his brother L. Scipio to Rome, together with Hanno the Generall of the enemies, and other Gentlemen priſoners, he B withdrew himſelf to Taracon.

In the ſame year the Roman Armado being ſet out under the conduct of the Admirall M. Valerius Lævinus the Pro-Conſul, made a voyage from Sicily into Affrick, and forraged all over the Territories of Utica and Carthage, inſomuch as they drave booties out of the very utmoſt Confines of the Carthaginians, and even about the walls of Utica. As they ſailed back for Sicily, they were encountred by the Carthaginian fleet, conſiſting of ſeventy long ſhips of war, whereof ſeventeen were boorded and taken, four ſunk in the deep ſea, the reſt were put to flight and diſperſed. Thus the Roman Captain Valerius, after victories atchieved both by ſea and land, returned with rich prizes of all ſorts to Lilybæum: and hereupon by reaſon that the ſeas were open and cleared of the enemies ſhips, great ſtore and abundance of grain was brought to C Rome.

In the beginning of that ſummer wherein theſe things hapned, P. Sulpitius the Pro-Conſul, and King Attalus, after they had wintred in Ægina, as is aboveſaid, with a joint navy paſſed over from thence into the Iſland Lemnos. The Romans were twenty five Galliaces of five ranks of oars, and the King had thirty five. Philip for his part becauſe he would be ready at all aſſaies to meet with the enemy either by land or ſea, went himſelf in perſon down to the ſea-ſide, as far as Demetrias, and made proclamation, that all his forces ſhould by a certain day meet together at Ariſſa. Upon the fame that went of the Kings coming, there repaired ſundry Embaſſies from the confederate States of all parts unto Demetrias. For the Ætolians having taken heart unto them, as well for the ſociety with the Romans, as upon the coming of Attalus, waſted and ſpoi-D led their borderers. And not only the Acarnanians and Bœotians, and they that inhabit Eubœa, were in great fear, but alſo the Achæans; whom over and beſides the war from the Ætolians, Machanidas alſo the Lacedæmonian tyrant terrified, who encamped himſelf not far from the confines of the Argives. All theſe States made report what perils were like to enſue both by ſea and land to their ſeverall Cities, and beſought the King his aid. Moreover there came unto him out of his own Realm no good tidings of peace and quietneſs, for that Scerdiletus and Pleuratus were gone out and rebelled: and of the nations of Thrace, the Medi eſpecially were ready to invade the frontiers adjoyning upon Macedony, in caſe the King ſhould fortune to be buſied and occupied otherwiſe in any long wars. The Bœotians likewiſe themſelves, and other nations inhabiting the more inland parts of Greece, had given intelligence, that the paſſages of the forreſt E Thermopylæ, where as the narrow gullet of the ſtreights yieldeth ſmall paſſage, were ſtopped up by the Ætolians with a trench and palliſado, that it might give no acceſs at all unto Philip, for to come and defend the Cities of the Allies. Thus many troubles coming faſt and thick one upon another, had been able to have rouzed and awakened even a ſleepy and ſlow Captain, and made him to look about him. Theſe Embaſſadors he diſpatched and ſent away, promiſing every one of them help and ſuccour, as time and occaſion would permit: and willing them each one for the preſent to provide thoſe things that were moſt urgent and important. Then he ſent a garriſon unto that City from whence new came, that Attalus having paſſed with a fleet from Lemnos, had waſted and forraged all the territory about it. And he ſent Polyphantes with a ſmall power into Bœotia, and Menippus likewiſe, one of his own Captains and Cavaliers, unto *Chal-*F cis, with a thouſand targettiers, called Peltati, (now the Peltæ are certain ſmall bucklers or targets, nothing unlike unto the Spaniſh Cetræ) unto whom were joyned five hundred Ænians, that they might be able to guard all the parts of the Iſland: himſelf in perſon went to Scotuſa, and there he appointed the Rendezvous that all the forces of the Macadonians ſhould be brought thither from * Lariſſa. News came unto him there that the Ætolians had ſummoned and proclaimed a generall Diet or Councill at Heraclea, and that King Attalus would repaire thither to conſult about the managing of the whole war. And with an intent by his ſudden coming to trouble this ſolemn aſſembly and meeting of the States, he took great journeys in his march, and led his army toward Heraclea: but the Councill was newly diſſolved when he arrived thither. Howbeit, he deſtroyed all the ſtanding corn, which was near-hand ripe, G ſpecially in the vale along the Gulph of the Ænians, and ſo reduced his army back again to Scotuſa: and there leaving his whole power, he retired himſelf to Demetrias, attended only with his royall guard. And becauſe he might from thence be ready to meet with all ſudden ſtirs and invaſions of the enemies, he ſent out men of purpoſe into Phocis, * Eulœa, and * Peparethus, to chuſe out certain high places for beacons, from whence the fires might be ſeen afar off. And himſelf ſet up one watch tower upon Ciſſæus (a mountain, the top whereof is of an exceeding height) that upon the ſignall of the beacons on fire from afar, he might in the minute of an hour have intelligence, ſo ſoon as the enemies went about any trouble whatſoever. But the Roman Generall, and King Attalus, paſſed the ſeas from Peparethus to Nicea, and from thence ſailed with their Armado to Eubœa, unto the City Oreum, which as a man beareth his courſe from the gulph of Demetrias to Chalcis and * Euripus, is the firſt City of Eubœa that ſheweth it ſelf upon the left hand. And thus it was agreed between Attalus and Sulpitius, that the Romans ſhould give the aſſault from the ſea ſide, and the King with his forces on the land. Four daies after the fleet was arrived, they preſented themſelves before the City to aſſail it. For, that time between was ſpent in ſecret talk and conference with Plator, who was appointed by Philip governor and Provoſt of the City. The City had within it two Citadels, the one commanding the ſea, the other ſituate in the very heart and midſt of the town. From thence there is a way under the ground that leadeth to the ſea: at the end whereof there ſtood a fabrick or tower five ſtories high, a ſingular bulwark and place of defence. There at firſt began a moſt ſharp and cruell conflict, by reaſon that the turret was well furniſhed with all kind of ſhot and artillery: and likewiſe from out of the ſhips there was planted much ordnance, and many engins bent to impeach and aſſault the ſame. Now when every mans mind was amuzed, and eye fixed upon this hot and eager fight, Plator received and let in the Romans at the gate of the other Citadell that ſtood over the ſea, and ſo in the turning of an hand it was ſurprized and won. The townſmen being expelled and chaſed from thence, retired and betook themſelves into the middle of the City unto the other fortreſs. But certain ſouldiers were ſet of purpoſe there to ſhut the gate upon them: and ſo being excluded, they were killed and taken priſoners in the midſt between. The garriſon of the Macedonians ſtood round together under the Caſtle wall, and neither fled openly amain, nor yet began to fight, as if they meant to ſtick to it unto the end. For whom Plater obtained pardon of Sulpitius, and having embarked them, brought them to Demetrium of Phthiotis, and there ſet them aſhore, and himſelf returned to Attalus.

* Stretcho de Negroponte.

Sulpitius bearing himſelf bold for this ſo good and ſpeedy ſucceſs, immediatly ſailed with his victorious Armado againſt Chalcis. Where the event in the end anſwered nothing unto his hope and expectation. The ſea lying broad and large on both hands, gathereth in that place to a narrow room, ſo as at the firſt ſight it maketh a ſhew of a double peer or haven, opening upon two divers mouths, but in very truth, there is not lightly to be found a worſe harbour, and a more dangerous rode for ſhips. For not only for the exceeding high hils on both ſides of the main, the winds ariſe ſuddenly and blow bluſterous, but alſo the very ſtraight it ſelf of Euripus ebbeth and floweth ſeven times in the day, as the voice goeth, at certain ſet and ordinary hours; but without all order, as the winds drive, the ſea turneth and rolleth hither and thither, working up and down, and like a flowing ſtream runneth forcibly and with great violence, as it were, down a ſteep hill: ſo as neither night nor day the ſhips there riding have any reſt and repoſe. As the Roman Armado was thus engaged within ſo dangerous a rode: ſo the town of the one part was environed with the ſea, and on the land-ſide ſurely fortified; beſides the defence of a ſtrong garriſon there, and the aſſured loyalty of the Captains and principall heads and rulers; whereby it was chiefly guarded, which at Oreum was but vain, fickle, and unſtedfaſt: by means whereof it was tenable and impregnable. The Roman Generall in this caſe, conſidering how he had begun a raſh enterpriſe, and ſeeing many difficulties on every hand, wrought wiſely yet in this one point, that he ſoon gave over, becauſe he would ſpend no time in vain, and paſſed over with his fleet from thence to Cynus of Locris (a town of Merchandiſe belonging to the City of Opus, ſituate a mile from the ſea.) Philip had warning by the beacons on fire that appeared from Oreum: but by the fraud of Plator, the other were with the laſteſt ſet a burning from the watch-tower aboveſaid. And foraſmuch as he was not ſtrong enough at ſea, he could not with his navy have eaſe acceſs into the Iſland. So that ſervice was delaied and altogether neglected. But he beſtirred himſelf quickly to the ſuccour of Chalcis, ſo ſoon as ever he eſpied the fire from the beacon. For albeit Chalcis it ſelf be a City of the ſame Iſland, yet it is divided from the Continent by ſo narrow an arm of the ſea that there is no more but a bridge between it and the land: and on that ſide it hath more eaſie acceſs than by water. Philip having diſſeized the garriſon there, caſt down the fort, and diſcomfited the Ætolians who kept the ſtraight paſſage of Thermopyla, came from Demetrias to Scotuſa, from whence he departed at the third watch: and when he had driven and chaſed the enemies in great fear to Heraclea, himſelf in one day reached to Elatia in Phocis, a journey above 60 miles. The very ſame day in manner the City of Opuntii was taken by K. Attalus and put to the ranſack. The whole pillage thereof, Sulpitius had granted to the King, in regard that Oreum a few daies before was ſpoiled and rifled by the Roman ſouldiers, and the Kings men had no ſhare with them. Now was the Roman Armado retired to Oreum: and Attalus not ware of Philip his coming, ſpent time in exacting monies from the chief and principall Citizens. But ſo ſudden and unexpected was this accident of his approach, that had not certain Cretenſians by good hap gone forth a forraging far from the City, and deſcried the march of the enemies a great way off, he might have been overtaken and ſurprized. Attalus unarmed and out of order as he was, made haſte & ran amain to the ſea-ſide for to recover the ſhips. And even as he and his men were looſing from the land and lanching into the ſea, Philip came, and from the very ſhore put the mariners and ſailers in great fear. From thence he returned to Opus, crying out upon God and man, and blaming his ill luck, that he had miſſed ſo narrowly the opportunity of ſo great an exploit, and let it go, as it were, ſnatched out of his very eye. In the fit of anger he reproved and rebuked

A the Opuntians, for that being able to hold out the ſiege untill his coming, ſo ſoon as they ſaw the enemy they preſently had yielded themſelves in a manner voluntary into his hands. When he had ſet things in order at Opus and thereabout, he took his journey to Torone. Attalus at the firſt retired himſelf to Oreum: but upon the news arrived, how Pruſias the King of Bithynia had invaded the frontiers of his kingdom, he left the Roman affairs and the Ætolian war, and from thence ſailed over directly into Aſia. Sulpitius alſo retired his navy unto Ægina, from whence in the beginning of the ſpring he had departed and taken his voyage. And Philip forced and won Torone, with as ſmall ado as Attalus before had taken Opus. That foreſaid City Torone was inhabited by certain that were fled and driven out of Thebes in Phthiotis. For when the City was taken by Philip, and they fled for protection unto the Ætolians, (to whom they recommended and com-B mitted themſelves) the Ætolians gave unto them that place to ſeat themſelves in, being a City waſted and in manner deſolate by the former war of Philip. Then Philip having recovered Torone again, as is aforeſaid, departed from thence, and won Tritonum and Drymas, two ſmall and baſe towns of no account in Doris. From whence he came to Elatia, where he had given commandment, that the Embaſſadors of Ptolomeus and the Rhodians, ſhould give attendance untill his coming. Where, as they were treating about the making an end of the Ætolian war (foraſmuch as thoſe Embaſſadors to the ſame effect had lately preſented themſelves at Heraclea, in the Councill and aſſembly of the Romans and Ætolians) tidings came, that Machanidas purpoſed and determined to ſet upon the Eleans, as they were preparing to exhibit the ſolemn Olympian games. Philip ſuppoſing it good to prevent that, courteouſly anſwered the Embaſſadors and gave them their C diſpatch: ſaying that as himſelf was not the cauſe of that war, ſo he would not hinder and ſtay the concluſion of peace upon any equall and reaſonable conditions. And ſo with a power lightly appointed he marched through Bœotia to Megara, and from thence went down to Corinth: where having furniſhed himſelf with victuals, he marched forward to Phlios & Phaneus. And being now come as far as to Erea, and hearing there that Machanidas upon the rumour of his coming for fear was fled back to Lacedæmon, he returned to Ægium, unto the generall Diet and Council of the Achæi: ſuppoſing withall, that he ſhould find there the Punick armado, which he had ſent for to come thither, becauſe he might be able to do ſomewhat alſo by ſea. But ſome few daies before the Carthaginians had ſailed over into Phocæa, and from thence were gone to the havens of the A-D carnanians, ſo ſoon as they heard once, that Attalus and the Romans were departed from Oreum, fearing that they would make out after them, and leſt they ſhould be overtaken and ſurpriſed within Rhium, which is the very mouth of the Corinthian gulph. Philip verily grieved hereat, and was wonderfully troubled in mind, ſeeing what haſte ſoever he made himſelf in all his empriſes, yet he came too ſhort and effected nothing in due time: as if fortune in taking all things out of his very eye-ſight, had deluded, diſappointed, and mocked all his ſpeedineſs and expedition. Howbeit, in that ſolemn Diet and aſſembly, he diſſembled his grief, bit in his paſſionate affections, and thus with an haughty mind he ſpake and ſaid, "That he called both God and man to witneſs, that he "had forlet no opportunity of time nor vantage of place, but when and whereſoever he heard but "any inckling of the enemy, and the leaſt ruſtling of armour, thither he had made all haſte that E "poſſibly he might: but he could hardly deviſe and conceive, whether himſelf were more ventu-"rous in ſeeking war, than the enemy nimble and quick in avoiding the ſame. So Attalus at Opus, "ſo Sulpitius at Chalcis, and ſo the other day Machanidas eſcaped out of his hands and got a-"way. But ſurely (quoth he) his running away will not alwaies proſper and ſpeed well: neither is "that to be counted a dangerous war, wherein a man may be ſure (if he but meet his enemy once) "to have the upper hand. That which is the principall point of all, thus much have I got yet at "the enemies hands, that they confeſs thereby, how they are not able to make their parts good "with us: and I doubt not, but ſhortly I ſhall atchieve the victory of them, and the event and for-"tune of their fighting with me, ſhall be no better than their preſent hope. The Kings allies were glad to hear him ſpeak thus. Then he retired unto the Achæans, Erea, and Triphylia, and delive-F red again Alipheræ unto the Megalopolitans; for that they proved by good evidence, that it belonged by right to their territory and confines. Thus having received of the Achæans certain ſhips, to wit, three Galliaces or Carvels of four banks of oars, and as many gallies of two ranks, from thence he cut over to Anticyræ. And then with ſeven Carvels of five ranks of oars, and more than twenty barks beſides, which he had ſent into the gulph of Corinth to joyn with the Carthaginian navy, he made ſail to Erythræ in Ætolia, near unto Eupalium, and there diſbarked and landed his men. But the Ætolians were advertiſed aforehand of his arrival and coming aſhore: for all the people that inhabited either the country towns and villages, or the Caſtles near to Potidania and Apollonia, were fled into the mountains and woods. As for the cattell, which in that hurry and haſte that they made could not be driven away with them, thoſe they preyed upon and brought them to the ſhips. With theſe and all the reſt of the booty he ſent Nicias the Prætor of G the Achæans to Ægium, and ſent forward to Corinth: and from thence he commanded that the land forces ſhould be conducted and march by land through Bœotia: whiles himſelf ſailing from Cenchræa along the coaſt of Attica, above the point or cape of Sunium, paſſed even through the midſt of his enemies armados, and arrived at Chalcis. Then after he had commended the Citizens there for their fidelity and vertue, in that neither fear nor hope was able to change and turn their reſolute minds, and exhorted them for the time to come, to continue ſtedfaſt in their alliance and allegeance, if they made more reckoning of their own fortune, and loved it better than the condition of the Oritans and the Opuntii; he sailed from Chalcis to Oreum. And when he had committed the government of the State, and the guard of the City, unto those principall Citizens, who chose to flie when the City was lost, rather than to yield themselves unto the Romans, himself passed over from Euboea unto Demetrias, from whence at the first he took his voyage to the aid and succour of his friends and Allies. After all this, having appointed and set out at Cassandrea keels for an hundred long ships of war, and taken up a number of shipwrights to finish out the rest of the work: seeing that all Greece was now in quiet, both because Attalus was departed from thence, and also for that himself had in good time succoured his allies and confederats, who were in some trouble and distress, he returned back again into his own Realm, for to make war upon the Dardanians. H

In the latter end of that summer, wherein these affairs thus passed in Greece, when Q. Fabius Maximus the father being sent as Embassador from M. Livius the Consul unto the Senat at Rome, had brought word and made report, That the Consul judged L. Porcius with his legions to be sufficient for the Province of France, and that himself might well be spared, and depart from thence, and the Consular army withdrawn out of those parts: the Lords of the Senat gave order and determined that not only M. Livius, but C. Claudius also his Collegue, should return to the City. This difference only between the one and the other appeared in the decree, in that they gave direction, that the army of M. Livius should be brought home, but the Legions of Nero should remain still in the province, and be opposed against Annibal. The Consuls by entercourse of their letters passing between, agreed thus together, That like as they had with one mind and consent made war and managed the affairs, so, albeit they were in divers parts far asunder, yet they should meet in one place, and at one time make repair to the City of Rome: and that whether of them twain came first to Preneste, he should there attend the coming of his Collegue. And it fortuned so, that they arrived both upon one and the same day at Preneste. From whence they sent an edict before, that the third day after the Senat should generally assemble together in the Temple of Bellona: and so they were met upon the way with a multitude of people, who accompanied them as they returned into the City. And they were not content all of them in generall to salute them and welcome them home, but every man was desirous particularly to take the Consuls by their victorius right hands: some with congratulations, wishing them joy, others with thanksgiving, acknowledging that by their good means and vertue the Commonweal was preserved and set upright. Now when they had related in the Senat house (as the manner was of all Generals) what acts they had atchieved, and withall demanded, that for their valiant and faithfull service to the Commonweal, first, due honour should be rendred to the almighty gods, and then they themselves allowed to enter the City in triumph: the LL. of the Senat made answer, That they for their parts were ready and willing to consider first and principally of the merits and goodness of the gods, and next and immediatly of the good deserts of the Consuls: and as they decreed divine processions and supplications in the name of them both, so they granted triumph, as well to the one as to the other. But the Consuls, because they would not divide their triumph (since that they had managed the wars with one accord and common consent) thus agreed between themselves, That forasmuch as the battell was fought within the Province of M. Livius, and the very day of the field fought it fortuned to be his turn to take the sign of birds, and to have the entire rule; and besides, the army of Livius was brought back and came to Rome already, but that other of Nero could not be removed out of the Province: therefore M. Livius should ride in a chariot drawn with four steeds into the City, with his souldiers following after, and C. Claudius presently come after mounted on horseback without his souldiers. Thus the triumph was communicate to the one and the other, and encreased the glory of them both; but especially of him, who the more that he exceeded his Collegue in desert, the more he yielded and gave place unto him in honour. "Lo said every man, he there on horseback travelled in six daies space the whole "length of Italy from one end to the other, and fought the very same day with banner displaied "against Asdrubal in Gaul, when as Annibal thought verily he lay encamped against him with his "army in Apulia. See how one and the same Consul, in the defence of the one part of Italy and "the other, against two Captains may, against two noble Generals of two armies, in one place employed his advice and counsell, and in another opposed his body and force of arms. Behold (say "they) the very bare name of Nero was sufficient to keep Annibal within his camp: and what was "it else, that discomfited and defeated Asdrubal, but even his only coming? Let the other Consul therefore be set up on high, and rid in a chariot drawn with as many horses as he will; all "while that the true triumph indeed passeth through the City upon one horse only. Nay, if Nero "went but on foot, he would be memorable for ever hereafter, as well for the refusall of glory in "that triumph, as for the winning of honour in that war. With these and such like speeches they entertained Nero as they beheld him, and so accompanied him even to the very Capitoll. They brought into the Treasure-house of the City in coin * thirty hundred thousand * Sestertii, and 800 00 Asses. Among the souldiers, M. Livius divided * six and fifty Asses to them apiece. And C. Claudius promised as much to his souldiers that were absent upon his return to the army. This was noted and observed in the triumph, that the souldiers uttered more ditties and rimes full of pleasant conceits and jests (as their manner was) upon C. Claudius than their own Consul: and that the gentlemen and horsemen highly extolled and magnified above all the rest L. Veturius, and Q. Cecilius the two Lieutenants, and exhorted the Commons to create them Consuls against the I K L M N O

A next year: likewise, that the Consuls for the time being, confirmed this prerogative choise and election of those gentlemen, with their own assent and authority the morrow after, in a frequent assembly before the people, giving honourable testimony of the valiant and faithfull service of those foresaid Lieutenants in that war.

Now the time drew near of election of new Magistrates: and when it was thought good by the Senat, that a Dictator should call that solemn assembly for the said election; C. Claudius the Consul nominated for Dictator his Collegue M. Livius. And Livius named Q. Cecilius General of the horsemen. So there were created Consuls by M. Livius the Dictator, L. Veturius, and Q. Cecilius even he who then was Generall of the Cavalry. After this, they went to the election of the B Prætors, and chosen there were C. Servilius, M. Cecilius Metellus, T. Claudius Asellus, and Q. Manlius Thurius, who then was Ædile of the Commons.

When these elections were finished, the Dictator having resigned up his office and dismissed the army, by vertue of an act of the Senat took his journey into the Province of Tuscany, to sit in commission and make enquiry, what States either of the Tuscans or Umbrians intended and plotted to revolt from the Romans, and to turn to Asdrubal at his coming into those parts: and who they were that had assisted him either with auxiliary souldiers, or with victuals, or with any aid and help whatsoever. And these were the acts for that year, as well at home as abroad in the wars.

The great Roman Games were wholly renued and set out again three times by the Ædiles of C the chair Cn. Servilius Cæpio, and Serv. Cornelius Lentulus. Likewise the pastimes and plaies, called Plebeij, were once fully renued and exhibited again by M. Sempronius Matho, and Q. Manlius Thurinus Ædiles of the Commons.

In the thirteenth year of the second Punick war, when L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Cecilius Metellus were Consuls, both of them were appointed by the Senat to make war upon Annibal in the Province of the Brutij. Which done, the Prætors cast lots: And to M. Cecilius Metellus fell the jurisdiction of the Citizens; to Q. Manlius, of the forreiners. C. Servilius his lot was to govern Sicily, and T. Claudius Sardinia. As for the armies, they were divided in this manner: one of the Consuls had the conduct of that which was under C. Claudius the Consul of the year before. The other Consul had the leading of that (namely, two full legions) which C. Claudius the Pro-Prætor before D commanded. M. Livius as Pro-Consul, whose government was prorogued for another year, received the charge of two legions of voluntaries in Hetruria, at the hand of C. Terentius the Pro-Prætor. And Q. Manlius was appointed by a decree of the Senat to deliver over his jurisdiction to his Collegue, and to take the charge of Gallia with the forces there; whereof L. Porcius the Pro-Prætor was Captain: and he had in commission to waste the lands of those Gauls who were revolted to the Carthaginians upon the coming of Asdrubal. C. Servilius was assigned with the power of the two Cannian legions, to defend Sicily, like as P. Manlius had before. Out of Sardinia the old army was withdrawn, which was under the governance of A. Hostilius: and the Consuls enrolled one new legion, for T. Claudius to sail over with. Quintus Claudius, and C. Hostilius Tubulus, had both of them their commissions newly sealed for one year longer, the one to govern Tar-
E tum, and the other to rule Capua. M. Valerius the Pro-Consul, who also was Admiral for the sea-coast and river along Sicily, was commanded to give up thirty of his sail unto C. Servilius, and with all the rest of the Navy to return to the City of Rome.

As the City was in suspence and stood doubtfull for the variable event of so great a war, attributing the causes of all weal and woe, of prosperity and adversity to the gods; behold many prodigious tokens were reported to have hapned. Namely, That in Tarracina the Temple of Jupiter, and at Satricum the Chappel of the goddess Matuta, were blasted with lightning from heaven. And the inhabitants of Satricum were no less terrified with two serpents that were crept into the temple of Jupiter at the very doors. From Antium there was word brought, that the harvest folk as they were reaping spied certain ears of corn bloudy. At Care there was a sow that farrowed a pig
F with two heads, and an ewe yeaned a lamb both male and female. It was reported also, that at Alba there were two suns seen: and at Fregellæ by night the day-light appeared. Also in the territory of Rome, by report, an Oxe spake: and the altar of Neptune within the Cirke Flaminia brake out into much sweat: and the Temples of Ceres, Salus, and Quirinus were blasted and smitten from heaven. The Consuls were commanded to expiate and purge these fearfull sights with sacrificing of greater beasts and to make supplication one day. Which was done according to the decree of the Senat. But above all the wondrous signs, either reported from abroad, or seen at home, the minds of men were put in fear, for the going out of the fire in the Chappell of Vesta. For which cause the Vestall Virgin who had the charge that night to look unto it, was by the commandment of P. Licinius the Bishop well and throughly scourged. And albeit this hapned by humane negligence, and that the gods portended nothing thereby yet it was thought good that an expia-
G tion thereof should be made with greater sacrifices, and a solemn supplication held in the Chappel of Vesta.

Before that the Consuls went forth to the wars, they were put in mind by the Senat to take regard and order for the Commons, and to procure their reducing again into the country, and placing them in their lands and farms. For seeing that by Gods goodness the war was removed far from Rome and Latium, the country towns might be without fear of danger inhabited and frequented again: neither was it a meet thing, that they should have more care to inhabit Sicily than

Italy. But the matter was not easily to be compassed and effected by the people, for that many of H the free-holders were consumed up in the wars: and great scarcity there was of servants and hines to till the ground: besides, the cattell was driven away in booties, and the manor houses were either ruinate or burned. Howbeit, a great sort were compelled by the authority of the Consuls to repaire again into their country habitations. The motion hereof was first occasioned by the Embassadors of Placentia and Cremona; who made complaint, that their territories were much damnified and wasted by the incursions and rodes of the Gauls their next neighbours bordering upon them: and that many of their own naturall inhabitants were fled and gone away, so as their Cities were not well peopled, and their country lay waste and desert. Whereupon Manlius the Prætor had commission to defend and guard the Colonies from the enemy. And the Consuls by vertue of an act of Senat made an Edict and Proclamation, that all Citizens of Cremona and Pla- I centia, should by a certain day return into their Colonies. And then, they themselves in the beginning of Spring took their journey, and set forward to war.

Q. Cecilius the Cos. received the army of Cl. Nero: and L. Veturius of Q. Claudius the Pro-Prætor, and made up the full number of all the companies with those new souldiers whom he himself had enrolled. The Consuls led their army into the territory of Consentia, and having forraged and spoiled here and there, and being heavily laden with good booties, they were in a narrow and streight passage much troubled by the Brutii and the Numidian archers: insomuch as not only their prizes were in danger to be lost, but they themselves that were armed in some jeopardy. Howbeit, the alarm was greater than the skirmish, and the booty being sent before, the legions escaped safe into places of security. And so from thence they went into the Lucans country. All that K nation without any fight returned under the obedience of the Roman Empire. With Annibal that year was nothing done: for neither he himself made offer of war, upon the fresh hurt and loss received as well in publike as private, nor the Romans provoked him as long as he was quiet. For they were all of this judgment, that there was such metall and valour in that one commander, although all things else about him went to wrack, that they held it no good policy to provoke him, and wake a sleeping dog. And verily I wot not what to make of him; whether he were more to be wondred at in adversity than in prosperity. For why? warring as he did in his enemies land for the space of thirteen years, so far from home, in much variety of fortune, with an army not consisting of naturall Citizens and subjects, but mingled of a confused riff-raff-and medley of all nations, having neither the same laws, nor manners, and customes, nor language; differing in fashions, in habit, in apparell, in armour, in rites, in religion, nor serving, as it were, the same gods: he had so knit and united them in one link and streight band, that they mutined neither among themselves, nor against their Generall, notwithstanding oftentimes there wanted money for pay, and victuals in their enemies country: for default whereof, in the former Punick war, many outrages were committed both among Captains and souldiers. But when Asdrubal the Captain together with his army was defeated and overthrown, in whom they reposed all their hopes of victory; and when they were fain to quit, as it were, all Italy besides, and to retire themselves into an angle and corner of Brutium; who would not think it a marvellous matter, that there was no stir nor commotion in his Camp? considering that over and besides all other difficulties, he had no means nor hope else to maintain his army, but out of the Brutians country; And say, that it were all wholly tilled, sowed, and well husbanded, yet a small thing it was to find and feed so huge an host. Moreover, a great part of their youth was set away from the tillage of the fields and grounds, and wholy employed in warfare: to say nothing of the naturall guise and corrupt usage of that nation, which in time of war was wont to live and maintain the same by robbing and thieving. Neither had he any succour at all sent from home out of Carthage: whiles they all were studious and carefull only to keep Spain, as if all had gone well with them in Italy. L

In Spain the fortune was in some respect all one and the same, in other far unlike and different: the same, in regard that the Carthaginians being defeated in a fought field, and having lost their Captain, were driven to the utmost coast of Spain, even as far as the Ocean sea: different, in that N
Spain is a country more apt and commodious to the reparation of new war, not only than Italy, but also than any land in the world, as well for the site of the region, as for the nature of the people. For although it were the first nation of all the main and continent, that the Romans went first in hand withall to reduce into the nature of a Province; yet it was the last of all others that was subdued, and but lately in our daies even under the conduct and happy fortune of Augustus Cæsar. There at that time Asdrubal the son of Gisgo, the greatest and noblest Captain in all these wars (next after the Barchin house) returned from Gades, and hoping by the help of Mago the son of Amilcar, to wage war afresh, took musters throughout the farther part of Spain, and armed to the number of fifty thousand foot, and 4500 horse. And as for the Cavalry, all writers in manner do agree: but for the Infantry, some write, there were 70000 brought unto the City Silpia. O
There upon the open plains sate these two Carthaginian Captains down, because they would not seem to fall off and refuse battell.

Scipio, when news came unto him of so puissant an army levied, supposed that neither with the Roman legions he was sufficient to match such a multitude, unless he opposed the aids of the Barbarous nations, if it were no more but for shew and outward appearance: nor yet was to repose such assured confidence in them, as in the fundamentall strength of his army, that in case they

A ſhould give him the ſlip when the time came, (the only occaſion of the overthrow of his father and uncle) they might do much hurt to the main chance and totall ſum of all. And therefore he ſent Syllanus before unto Colcas, (a Lord over the ſignory of eight and twenty towns) for to receive of him thoſe horſe and foot which he had promiſed to levy in the winter time. Himſelf departed from Taracon, and gathered ſome ſmall aids of his allies that inhabit along the way as he marched, and ſo came to Caſtulo. Thither Syllanus brought alſo certain auxiliaries to the number of three thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe. From thence he went forward to the City Baſula, being in all of Citizens and Allies, with footmen & horſemen together, one with another 45000 ſtrong. ſtrong. As they were pitching their tents and encamping, Mago and Maſaniſſe, with all their Ca-B valry ſet upon them: and no doubt, had troubled them mightily as they were making their defences, but that certain troops of horſemen hidden behind an hill, whom Scipio fitly for the purpoſe had there beſtowed, ſuddenly at unawares ran upon them and recharged them as they were looſely ridden forward without order and array. Theſe had not well begun skirmiſh with them, but they diſcomfited the forwardeſt of them, and ſuch eſpecially as engaged themſelves near to the trench, to impeach and annoy the pioneers and labourers at work: but with the reſt that kept to their colours, and went orderly in their ranks, the fight was longer, and for a good while continued doubtfull. But when the ſquadrons which ſtood ready appointed in their guards and ſtations, were firſt brought forth; and after them, the ſouldiers alſo from their work and fortifications were willed to take arms; and ſtill more and more continually came freſh and in heart, in place
C of thoſe that were wearied, ſo as now from all parts of the Camp there was gathered together a full power and ran to the battel; then the Carthaginians and Numidians turned their backs plain and fled. And at the firſt they went away by troops and companies keeping their order and array ſtill, and not disbanded for haſte or fear. But afterwards, when the Romans began once more eagerly to play upon the hindmoſt of them, ſo as now their furious violence could no longer be reſiſted; then without all regard of ranks or files, they forgot their array, and ran on all hands by heaps, ſeeking every man the next way he could to eſcape. And albeit by this skirmiſh, the Romans were more encouraged a good deal, and the enemies hearts much danted: yet for certain daies enſuing there never ceaſed excurſions and bickerings maintained by the horſemen & thoſe that were lightly armed. Now when by theſe ſmall ſcufflings they had made ſufficient triall on both ſides of D their ſtrength, Aſdrubal firſt led forth his forces into the field, & then the Romans likewiſe came forward ready to receive them. But when both armies ſtood without their Camp, arranged in battel array, & neither of them gave the charge: when the day drew toward ſun-ſetting, Aſdrubal firſt retired with his men into the Camp, and after him the Roman General likewiſe. Thus continued they for certain daies together. Aſdrubal was evermore the firſt that came abroad, and the firſt again that ſounded the retreat to his ſouldiers, wearied with long ſtanding. But of neither ſide they made out to skirmiſh, or diſcharged any ſhot, or gave alarms, and ſet up a cry. Of the one part the Romans, on the other the Carthaginians, together with the Affricans ſtood in the main battel: and the allies of either ſide kept the wings, and thoſe were Spaniards, as well in the one army as the other. But in the front of the Carthaginian battel were the Elephants placed, who afar off made a E ſhew as if they had been Caſtles. And throughout both armies this word went for current, that when the time came, they would ſo fight as they ſtood day by day arranged: namely, that the main battels of the Romans and Carthaginians, between whom was the quarrel & occaſion of the war, with like courage of heart and force of arms would encounter and cope together. Scipio perceiving this once to go for good, & to be ſtifly ſetled in their opinions, altered all on ſet purpoſe againſt the day that he minded indeed to give battel. And over-night he gave a watch-word and token throughout the camp, that both horſe and man ſhould take their dinner before day, and that the horſemen in arms ready appointed ſhould hold their horſes ſadled and bridled. Now before it was broad day light he ſent out all the Cavalry together with the light armour, to charge upon the Corps de guard and ſtanding watch of the enemies. And himſelf ſtraight after advanced F forward with the whole ſtrength of the legions armed at all pieces. And clean contrary to the conceived opinion and perſwaſion both of his own men, and alſo of his enemies, he ſtrengthened the wings with Romans, and marſhalled the main battell with the allies. Aſdrubal raiſed with the clamour and ſhout of the horſemen, leapt forth of his pavilion, and perceiving a tumultuous alarm and fearfull ſtir of his own men before the rampiar and trench, and ſeeing afar off the glittering enſighs of the Legions, and all the plains over-ſpread with enemies, preſently made forth all his Cavalry againſt the foreſaid horſemen. Himſelf with the battell of footmen iſſueth out of the Camp, and made no change nor alteration at all in the marſhalling of the battaillons, otherwiſe than he uſed the daies paſt. The horſemen continued the fight a long time doubtfully: neither could it be determined by it ſelf, becauſe evermore, as any of them were put back (which happned on both parts in manner by turns) they retired ſafely into the battels of footmen.
G Now when as the battels were not paſt half a mile aſunder one from another, Scipio ſounded the retreat, and opened his ranks, and received all the horſemen and light armed ſouldiers within the middle ward: and having divided them in two regiments, he beſtowed them for ſuccours and ſupplies behind the wings. Now when the time was come to joyn in skirmiſh, he commanded the Spaniards (and thoſe were the main battell) to take ſure footing and go ſteadily together: fair and ſoftly himſelf out of the right wing (for, that point he commanded) diſpatched a meſſenger to Syllanus & Martius, willing them to ſtretch out that wing on the left hand, like as they ſaw

him to draw it at length on the right: with direction alſo unto them, that they together with the light horſemen and light appointed footmen ſhould encounter and cloſe with the enemy, before that both battels might meet and joyn together. Thus having enlarged out at full their wings, they with three ſquadrons of footmen, and as many cornets of horſemen, together with the light armed skirmiſhers, advanced with full pace directly afront the enemies whiles the reſt followed ſidewaies acroſs. Now there was a void piece of ground in the midſt between, by reaſon that the Spaniards enſigns went but ſlowly forward: and the wings had been in conflict already, when the flower and ſtrength of the enemies battell, conſiſting of old beaten Carthaginians and African ſouldiers, were not yet come within the darts ſhot, neither durſt they put in to ſuccour them that were in fight, for fear they ſhould open the main battell for the enemy that came directly againſt them. Their wings were much diſtreſſed in the fight on every ſide: For the horſemen, the light armed ſouldiers, and the skirmiſhers, having wheeled about and fet a compaſs to environ them ran upon them on their flanks. The cohorts of footmen charged upon them afront, and all to break off their wings from the body of the battell. And as now in every reſpect the fight was unequal, ſo the rabble of camp-followers, Balear Iſlanders, and raw untrained Spaniards, oppoſed againſt the approved Roman and Latine ſouldiers, pulled down aſide. The day went on ſtill, and Aſdrubal his army began to faint: and no marvell, for they were ſurpriſed and taken on a ſudden, betimes in the morning, & were forced in haſte to enter into the field & go to battel before they had refreſhed and ſtrengthened their bodies. And to that purpoſe Scipio had drawn the day on length, & trifled out the time, that the battel might be late. For it was the ſeventh hour [or one a clock after noon] before the enſign of footmen charged upon the ſide points. And a good deal later it was ere the main battels fought and joyned together: ſo that the heat of the noon ſun, the pain of long ſtanding in armor, and hunger and thirſt came all together to enfeeble and ſpend their bodies, before that they came to hand-ſtrokes and to buckle with their enemies: which was the cauſe that they ſtood leaning and reſting themſelves upon their ſhields. And over and beſides all other troubles, the Elephants alſo affrighted and madded with this tumultuous and diſordered manner of fight of horſemen, skirmiſhers, and light armed ſouldiers together, ran from the wings, upon the main battel. The Captains therefore themſelves, being thus tainted, as well in courage of heart, as in bodily ſtrength, gave ground and retreated. Howbeit they ſtill kept their arraies, as if the whole battel had retired whole and ſound by the commandment of their General. But when the winners and conquerers on the other part were ſo much more forward to charge upon them more hotly on every ſide, becauſe they ſaw them to loſe their ground and ſhrink back, ſo as their violence could not well be endured; then albeit Aſdrubal held them ſtill together, and did what he could to ſtay their flight, crying oftentimes aloud unto them, that there were hills behind them, and places of ſafe retreat, if they would retire in good ſort, moderately, and in order; yet when they ſaw their enemies preſs ſo hard upon them, killing and hewing in pieces thoſe that were next unto them, fear was above ſhame, and ſo immediatly they ſhewed their back parts, and ran away all at once as faſt as they could. Yet at firſt, when they came to the root and foot of the hils they began to make a ſtand, and rally the ſouldiers again into order of battel, ſeeing the Romans to make ſome ſtay of advancing their enſigns up the hill. But afterwards, when they perceived them to come luſtily forward, they began again to flie afreſh, and ſo in fear were forced to take their Camp. Neither was Scipio himſelf far from their trench and rampier, but in that very brunt had been maſter thereof, but that immediatly upon the hot gleams of the ſun, when he ſhineth in a watery ſky full of black and rainy clouds, there powred down ſuch a ſtore of ſhowers and tempeſts, that hardly could he himſelf after his victory recover his own camp. And ſome there were alſo that made it a ſcruple and matter of conſcience to attempt any more for that day. The Carthaginians, although they had great reaſon to repoſe themſelves, and take their neceſſary reſt, ſo wearied as they were with travell, and ſore wounded, eſpecially ſeeing the night was come, and the ſtormy rain continued: yet, becauſe their fear and preſent danger wherein they ſtood gave them no time to loyter and ſlack their buſineſs, againſt the next morning that the enemies ſhould early aſſail their Camp, they gathered up ſtones from out of the vallies near about them, and piling them one upon another, amended the heighth of their rampier, purpoſing to defend themſelves by the ſtrength of their fence, ſeeing ſmall help and remedy in force of arms. But the falling away of their Confederats was the cauſe that their departure and flight from thence, ſeemed more ſafe than their abode there would have been. This revolt was begun by Altanes, a great Lord of the Turdetans: for he with a great power of his followers and retainers fled from the Carthaginians to the adverſe part. Whereupon two ſtrong walled towns, together with their garriſons, were yielded by the Captains unto Scipio. Aſdrubal therefore, fearing leaſt this miſchief might ſpread further, now that their minds were once ſet upon rebellion, diſlodged about the midnight following, and removed. Scipio ſo ſoon as he was advertiſed at the break of the day, by thoſe that kept ſtanding watch in their ſtations, that the enemies were gone; having ſent his horſemen before commanded the ſtandards and enſigns to be advanced, and led ſo ſpeedy a march, that if they had gone ſtraight forward and followed their tracks directly, they had no doubt overtaken them: but believing certain guides, that there was a ſhorter way to the river Bætis, they were adviſed to charge upon them as they paſſed over. But Aſdrubal ſeeing the paſſage of the river ſtopped againſt him, turned to the Ocean: and even at the firſt they departed in great haſte, as if they fled, which was the cauſe that they got the ſtart of the Roman legionary footmen, and won a good

ſpace

A space of ground before them. But the horſemen, and light appointed footmen plaied one while upon their tails, ſtanked another whiles their ſides, and by this means with charging and recharging they wearied them and ſtaied their march. And when as upon many of theſe troubles by the way, their enſigns were fain to ſtand, and forced to maintain skirmiſh, ſome time with the horſemen; and ſomtimes with the light javelottiers and auxiliary footmen behold the legions alſo came on apace and overtook them. Then there was not ſo much fighting and reſiſtance, as maſſacre and ſlaughter of them: down they went with them and killed them like ſheep, ſo long, untill their Leader himſelf began to flie, and eſcaped into the next mountains, together with 7000 half naked and unarmed. All the reſt were either ſlain or taken priſoners. Then the Carthaginians began to B encamp and fortifie in all haſte and tumultuous ſort upon the higheſt mount they could find: from whence (by reaſon that the enemies had aſſaied in vain to get up the hill, having ſo difficult an aſcent) they had not ſo much ado to defend themſelves. But, the place being bare and naked, and diſfurniſhed of all commodities for their reliefe, they were not able to hold out the ſiege for a few daies. And thereupon the ſouldiers fell apace to forſake their own Captain, and to go to the enemy. So that at the length the General himſelf in the night ſeaſon abandoned his army, and having got ſhipping (for the ſea was not far off) he embarked and fled to Gades. Scipio being advertized that the Captain of his enemies was fled, left with Syllanus ten thouſand footmen, and a thouſand horſemen to continue the ſiege of the Camp. Himſelf in perſon with the reſt of his forces within ſeventy daies returned to Taracon, for to examine and hear incontinently upon his C arrivall the cauſes of the Princes and States: that upon the true eſtimate of their deſerts they might be rewarded or chaſtiſed accordingly.

After his departure, Maſaniſſa having had ſecret conference with Syllanus, about inducing his people alſo to be pliable and to hearken unto a change, paſſed over into Affrick with ſome ſmall retinue. At which preſent time verily the occaſion of his ſudden alteration was not ſo evident and apparant, as afterwards his moſt conſtant truth and faſt alleageance obſerved unto his dying day was a good proof and argument, that even then he entred not into this deſignment and action, without good and important cauſe. Then Mago, in thoſe ſhips that Aſdrubal had ſent back, paſſed over to Gades. The remnant, thus forlorn of their Captains, ſome by way of voluntary yielding and ranging themſelves to the adverſe part, others by flight, were ſcattered among the next D Cities, and no troop remained of them behind of any mark and reckoning to ſpeak of, either for number or ſtrength. In this manner, and by theſe means eſpecially were the Carthaginians driven all out of Spain, by the conduct and happy fortune of P. Scipio, in the thirteenth year of the war, and in the ſixth of Scipio his government in that Province and command of the army. And not long after Syllanus returned to Taracon unto Scipio, and brought word that the war in Spain was fully ended. And L. Scipio was ſent with many noble perſons captives, as a meſſenger to carry tidings to Rome of the conqueſt of Spain. And when all other took ful contentment and infinite joy at theſe news, and abroad in all places highly magnified the glory of this ſervice, he alone who was the man that did the deed (as one who had an inſatiable deſire of vertue and true honour) made but ſmall reckoning of the recovery and winning of Spain, in compariſon of thoſe matters E that he hoped for, and conceived in that high and magnanimous ſpirit of his, which he carried with him. For now he caſt in mind and aimed at the conqueſt of Affrick and great Carthage: and therewith, to make perfect and conſummate that glorious war to his own immortall honour and renown. And therfore, ſuppoſing it was now a good time to begin the way to thoſe high exploits, and to lay plots, to prepare aforehand, yea, and to win unto him the hearts of the Princes and nations, he determined firſt of all other to ſound and aſſay King Syphax. This Syphax was King of the Maſaſyli, a people bordering upon the Moors, and abutting upon that part of Spain eſpecially where new Carthage is ſituate. At the ſame time the King was in league with the Carthaginians: which Scipio ſuppoſing that he would obſerve no more ſurely and preciſely, than commonly the Barbarians uſe, (whoſe fidelity dependeth upon Fortune) ſent C. Lælius with rich F gifts and preſents, as an Orator to treat with him. The barbarous Prince was glad hereof, both becauſe the Romans then proſpered every where; and alſo the Carthaginians in Italy lived by the loſs; and in Spain went down to the ground, where they had nothing left: and thereupon he condeſcended to entertain the friendſhip of the Romans. But for the confirmation of this amity, he neither would give nor take aſſurance, but only in the perſonall preſence of the Roman Generall himſelf. So Lælius having obtained the Kings royall word and warrant that Scipio might come unto him with ſafe conduct and ſecurity, returned unto Scipio. Now for him that aſpired to the conqueſt of Affrick, it was a matter of great conſequence and importance in all reſpects, to make himſelf ſure of Syphax, the moſt mighty and puiſſant King of all that Land, who had aforetime made proof what the Carthaginians could do in war, and the confines and marches of whoſe kingdom lay fitly upon Spain, and but a ſmall arm of the ſea between. Scipio thinking it therefore to G be a matter worth the adventure with great hazard, (for otherwiſe it might not be) leaving for the defence and guard of Spain L. Martius at Taracon, and M. Syllanus at new Carthage, (whether he had travelled by land from Taracon, and taken great journies) himſelf and Lælius together looſed from Carthage with two great Carvels of five banks of oars, and paſſed over into Affrick, through the calm and ſtill ſea, moſt of all rowing, and otherwhile alſo making ſail with a gentle gale of wind.

Haply it ſo fell out that the very ſame time Aſdrubal, driven out of Spain, was entred the haven ven with ſeven gallies of three courſe of oars, and rid at anchor near unto the ſhore for to be ſet H a land. When he had a kenning of the two Carvels aforeſaid, which albeit no man doubted but they were enemies, and might have been boorded by them being more in number, before they could gain the rode; yet hereupon enſued nothing elſe but a tumult and hurry among the mariners and ſouldiers together, in vain preparation of their ſhips and their armour. For the wind being ſomewhat big and high drave the Carvels with full ſail out of the main ſea into the haven, before that the Carthaginians had any time to weigh anchor: neither durſt any of them proceed to further dealing within the Kings Rode. So Aſdrubal firſt ſet a ſhore, and within a while Scipio and Lælius landed, and went all to the Court. Syphax took this for a great honour done unto him (as indeed it was no leſs) that there were come to him at that time, and in one day two Generall Captains of two moſt mighty and puiſſant States, to ſue for peace and amity with him. He invi- I ted both of them friendly, and gave them entertainment: and ſince it was their fortune to enter under one roof and the ſame houſe for to be lodged in, he endeavoured to draw them to a parley, and to make an end of all quarrels, grudges, and controverſies between them. But Scipio denied flatly, "that either there was any private malice or hatred between him and Aſdrubal, that ſhould

"need an end with conference and ſpeech: and as for State-matters, he might not treat with a
"profeſſed enemy as touching them, without expreſs warrant and commiſſion from the Senate.
But when the King laboured greatly with him, that he would find in his heart and not think much to bear Aſdrubal company at meat and meal (becauſe he would not ſeem to exclude either of them from his boord, he yielded thereunto, and was content. So they ſupped both twain together with the King, and Scipio and Aſdrubal ſate both at one table in one meſs, and upon one bed, for K ſo it was the Kings pleaſure. But ſo courteouſly Scipio behaved himſelf (as he was a man that naturally knew how to carry himſelf with a grace and dexterity in all things, and in every place whereſoever he came) that by his fair language and eloquent ſpeech, he won not only the favour of the barbarous Prince Syphax (who before was not acquainted with the Roman faſhions) but alſo the good will and love of Aſdrubal, a moſt malicious and mortall enemy: who ſeemed to have him in more admiration upon this one meeting and communication in preſence perſonall, than for all his feats of arms atchieved in war, and made no doubt but reckoned fully that King Syphax and his Realm would preſently be at the devotion of the Empire of Rome. Such a regular gift had that man to win love and favour. And therefore the Carthaginians were not ſo much to ſeek how Spain was loſt, as to conſider and think how they might keep and hold Affrick. For L thus they conceived, That this noble Knight and worthy Roman Captain was not come thither wandring at a venture, nor as a traveller to ſee countries, and to ſolace himſelf with walking along the pleaſant and delectable coaſts, leaving the Province which he had newly ſubdued, leaving his armies which he commanded, ſailing thus with two ſhips only into Affrick, and committing himſelf unto an enemy country, and into a Kings hands, of whoſe fidelity and protection he had no experience: but no doubt upon ſome great hopes to compaſs the conqueſt of Affrick. And this was it that long ſince Scipio had in ſecret purpoſe and deſignment, this was it that openly he fretted and ſtormed at, namely, that he warred not himſelf as well in Spain, as Annibal in Italy. Well, Scipio having concluded a league with Syphax, departed out of Affrick; and notwithſtanding he was toſſed upon the ſea with variable winds, and thoſe for the moſt part boiſterous and raging yet up M on the fourth day he arrived at New Carthage.

As Spain generally was at peace and reſt for any Carthaginian war, ſo it was well known that certain particular States, in regard that they were touched with the guilt of treſpaſſes committed, were quiet for fear, rather than for any loyall alleageance. Of which the moſt notorious, as well for their own greatneſs and power, as for their fault and tranſgreſſion, were Illiturgum and Ca-ſtulo. The Caſtulonians had been Roman Confederates in time of proſperity, were revolted unto the Carthaginians, upon the defeat of the two Scipios and their armies. The Illiturgians beſides their revolt and rebellion, added this wickedneſs, in that they betraied and murdered the Romans who fled unto them for ſuccour after that overthrow. Theſe two nations, if Scipio at his firſt coming had proceeded in rigour to revenge (whiles the States of the country ſtood in ſuſ- N penſe) he ſhould have regarded their deſert more than his own good and commodity. But when all troubles were compoſed and reduced to quietneſs, he thought it then a convenient time to puniſh and chaſtiſe them accordingly. And therefore he called L. Martius from Taracon, with a third part of his forces, and ſent him to aſſail Ceſtulo. Himſelf with the reſt of the army marched toward Illiturgum, and within five daies preſented himſelf before it. The gates he found ſhut a-gainſt him, and all preparation and furniture for defence and to withſtand the aſſault. For their conſcience bare them witneſs what they had deſerved, and there needed no other defiance or intimation of war againſt them than the privity of their wicked fact. Hereupon Scipio took occaſi-on to exhort his ſouldiers, and began in this wiſe. "The very Spaniards themſelves, quoth he, by Scipio to his ſouldiers. "ſhutting their gates declare plainly what they juſtly are to fear: and therefore ye ought to war O
"with them in more hoſtile malice and deadly hatred than with the Carthaginians. For with "them the quarrel was maintained, as it were, without anger and rankor, only for ſoveraignty and "glory: but of theſe men ye are to take vengeance for their diſloyall treachery, for their cruelty "and wicked villany. And now the time is come, to revenge not only the unworthy death of "your fellow ſouldiers, but alſo the like falſhood prepared for your ſelves, in caſe your hap had "been to have fled for refuge thither at any time: yea, and to ſhew exemplary juſtice, to teach all

"poſterity,

A posterity, that no man hereafter be so heady as to wrong any Citizen or souldier of Rome, in what poor estate so ever he be, without fear of condign punishment. Upon this exhortation and comfortable words of the Generall, they bestirred themselves and divided the scaling ladders amongst choise men out of every company. And having so parted the army between them, that Lelius the Lieutenant had the conduct of the one half, they gave assault with great terrour unto the City in two places at once. But neither any one generall captain, nor many principall Citizens encouraged and heartned the townsmen manfully to defend their City, but only their own fearful & sinfull conscience: for they wist well and remembred, yea, and put one another in mind, that it was their punishment and not victory that the Romans sought for. And as for themselves, since they were to lose their lives, this was the only point that they were to consider upon, namely, where B they were best to die, whether in fight and in the field (where the fortune of battall was common, and oftentimes lifted up the conquered, and put down the conqueror) or after their City burnt and raced, to yeeld up breath in the sight of their wives and children taken captives amid the torments of whipping and hard irons, when they had endured all villanies and indignities. Whereupon not only the serviceable youth for war, not only men I say, but women also and children, even above the bodily strength of that age, or courage of that sex, were ready and presented themselves to defend the wals. Some brought weapons to the defendants, others carried stones up to the wals unto them that were fortifying and repairing the breaches. For why? they stood not upon their liberty alone, which whetteth the stomacks of valiant & magnanimous men only, but they C set before their eies all extremities of torture and punishment, yea, and the shamefullest death that that could be devised: and their hearts were incensed to undergo all pains and peril, by striving avie together, and seeing one another to hazard themselves. In so much as they stood to it, and fought so resolutely, that even that noble army which had subdued all Spain, took the repulse often times at the hands of the youth of one City, was driven from the wals, and finally to their honor received some foil in fight and began to fear. Scipio seeing that, and doubting lest upon so many bootlesse attempts the enemies might take heart and his own souldiers be tainted, thought good to enter himself personally into the action, and to take part in that dangerous service. Having therefore rebuked his men for their cowardise, he commanded the ladders to be brought and set to, threatning that himself would scale the wals, if the rest made hasting and thus drew back. With D that he made no more ado, but approached under the wals in great peril of his person. Whereupon the souldiers respecting the dangerous state of their Generall, and fearing greatly of his behalf, set up a shout on all hands, and began to rear ladders in many places at once. Lelius likwise on the other side plied the assault and gave not over. Then at last the townsmen, for all their resolute resistance, were overcome; the defendants overthrown and beaten from their standing, and the wals possessed by the enemies. The castle also on that side which was thought impregnable, was in that brunt and tumult taken. For there were certain Africans serving then among the Romans (fled before the enemy) who whiles the townsmen were wholy turned to defend those places that seemed to be exposed unto danger, and the Romans climbing and entring where they could, espied one part of the City much higher then the rest; which because it was compassed E about with an exceeding high rock, was neither fortified otherwise with bulwarks, nor manned with any defendants at all: and being men (as they all are) light and agile of body, and nimble by reason of much practise and exercise, they climed up the rock where they could meet with any crag therof to bear out unequally from the rest, and to yeeld them hold and footing: but when they came to a plumb upright steep place, and where the cliff was even and smooth, they fastned certain great iron spikes and nailes, which they caried about with them of purpose, and stuck them a prety distance asunder, like greeces and stairs to climb upon: and ever the formost pluckt him up by the hand that followed next, and the hindmost heaved up those that went before them, untill they were gotten up to the top; and then they ran down with an outcry into the City, which was already won by the Romans. Then it was well seen that they forced this City from very de- F spiteous anger and deep hatred. There was no thought of taking any prisoners alive, there was none that once minded any pillage, notwithstanding all lay open unto them for to be ransacked and rifled. But down they went with the unarmed as well as the armed, killed men and women one with another: nay, their cruell mood was such, as they spared not the sucking babes. Then they set fire on their houses: and what the fire saved they raced and pulled down; so cancred a mind they had, and so bent they were, to leave no monument and token of such a City, and utterly to abolish and root out the memoriall of those enemies.

After this, Scipio led his army against Castulo. This City was defended not only by Spaniards who thither were repaired out of others parts, but also by the reliques of the Carthaginian army which were scattred abroad in their flight, and thither fled. But ere Scipio was come before the G town, they had heard the newes of the woful calamity and destruction of the Illiturgians: by reason whereof they were all terrified and in despaire of themselves: and as it falleth out in such variety of causes and deserts every man sought means to shift for himself the best he could, without regard of his neighbour. And at first they began to have a secret jelousie and suspition one of another, but afterwards they brake out to open dissention: insomuch as the Carthaginians and Spaniards divided themselves, and parted asunder. Cerdubelus openly advised the Spaniards, and perswaded with them, to yeeld. Himilco was the Captain over the Auxiliary Carthaginians, whom Cerdubelus (upon promiſe ſecretly before made and protection granted) betraied, together with the whole City beſides, into the Romans hands. This victory was purſued with leſs cruelty: for neither was the offence on their behalf committed ſo heinous; and the heat and choler of the Romans was well cooled and allaied, by reaſon of their voluntary ſurrender. From thence was Martius ſent againſt others of the barbarous people, to reduce unto ſubjection and obedience, as many as yet were not fully ſubdued. H

Scipio returned to new Carthage to pay his vowes unto the gods, and to exhibit and ſet out a ſpectacle of ſword-players at ſharp, which he had prepared for the honor of his father and uncle deceaſed. This paſtime and ſolemn ſhew was not performed by thoſe kind of men, out of which maſters of fence ule ordinarily to make choice, namely, ſuch as were picked out of bondſlaves and freed men, that uſe to make ſale of their bloud for mony, but all thoſe that he imploied in combat, were ſuch as offred themſelves and their ſervice voluntary and without hire. For ſome were I ſent unto him from the LL. of the country, to make ſhew & proof of the valour ingraffed naturally in that nation; others of their own accord profeſſed to fight, for the love of the Generall himſelf, and to ſhew him pleaſure: and ſome there were again, who upon emulation of glory were drawn to make challenge, whiles others that were defyed refuſed not, but ſtrove to get the victory. There were alſo divers that determined thoſe controverſies by the ſword, which by arguing & pleading they either were not able or not willing to end: having agreed among themſelves that the matter in ſuit ſhould fall to him that chanced to have the upper hand. And thoſe were no mean perſons of baſe degree and parentage, but of noble deſcent and famous houſes: as namely, Corbis and Orſua, two *[brethren] couſin germans by the father ſide; who differing and being K
* Fratres patrueles. at variance, about a principality of a City and State which they call Ibes, made profeſſion to trie the title at the utterance by dint of ſword. Corbis was the elder of the twain; but Orſua his father had been the laſt Prince before, and received that Seignory after the death of his elder brother. And when Scipio was very deſirous to debate and decide the matter with words, and to appeale their anger and mood, they both made anſwer and ſaid, that they had denied to the common kinsfolk of either party, and that they would have no other god nor man to be their judge, but only Mars. Both of them were fierce; the elder preſuming of his ſtrength of body, the yonger bearing himſelf upon the flour of his freſh youth: wiſhing rather to die both twain in fight, then the one to be ſubject to the dominion of the other. In concluſion when by no meanes poſſible they could be reclaimed from this furious rage of theirs, they became a goodly ſhew and L pageant to the whole army, and a ſingular example to prove what a miſchievous malady among mortall men, the love of lordſhip is, and the deſire of ſoveraignty. The elder, through practiſe of his weapons and cunning ſlight, ſoon overcame the foolhardineſſe and inconſiderat fiercenes of the yonger. After this paſtime of the ſword-fight, followed the funerall games and plaies which were ſet forth magnificently, according as either the wealth of the province, or the furniture of the army might affoord.

In this mean time, the Lieutenants plied and ſped their buſineſs nevertheleſſe, according to their commiſſions: for Martius having paſſed the river Batis (which the peaſants of that country called Certius) received two moſt rich and worthy Cities, ſurrendred into their hands by compoſition, without any aſſault. Now, there was another City called Aſtapa, which ever ſided with M the Carthaginians: and yet it deſerved not ſo much anger and indignation in that regard, as for that, (letting aſide the neceſſities that follow war) it ever bare a ſpiteful hatred againſt the Romans: neither was the town either for naturall ſituation ſo ſtrongly ſeated, or by mans hand ſo ſurely fortified, that the inhabitants therein ſhould take more heart, or preſume the rather to be luſty and bold. But the naturall diſpoſition of the people delighting in robberies, moved them to make rodes and invade the territory of the allies of the people of Rome bordering upon them: and to catch and take priſoners any ſouldiers, ſcullions, lackies, and followers of the camp, or merchants of the Romans, whom they could light upon ranging abroad. Yea, and when there happed a great company of them together, to paſſe through their marches and confines, (for in no wiſe might a few travel in ſafety) they were ſurpriſed by an ambuſhment laid for them, and being environed in N a place of diſadvantage, were ſlain every man. When the army was come before this town to aſſault it, the townſmen carrying a guilty conſcience for offences committed, thought it not the ſafeſt courſe for themſelves, to yeeld and give up the place to the enemies whom they had ſo much provoked againſt them: and ſeeing no hope at all to ſave their lives, either by the ſtrength of their wals, or force of arms, they reſolved to execute upon themſelves, and thoſe things that was neereſt and deereſt unto them, a foul, deteſtable, and cruell fact. They ſet out and appointed a compaſs of ground within the market place where they beſtowed and laid on a heap the moſt precious goods that they had. Upon which they commanded their wive and children to ſit, and then they piled about them billets of wood, and laid faggots upon, of ſmall young twigs. And after this "they gave in charge to fifty luſty tall fellows armed that ſo long as the battell continued doubtfull, O "they ſhould defend and guard all their goods, & the bodies of thoſe perſons more dear unto them "then all the goods in the world: but in caſe they perceived their own ſide to goe down and "have the worſe, and the City at the point to be loſt, they ſhould then wot well and be aſſured, "that all they whom they ſaw going forth to battell, would ſurely loſe their lives in that very "fight and skirmiſh. And herewith they beſought them in the name of the gods both ce-"leſtiall and infernall, to be mindfull of their liberty, which that day was to take an end,

A "either by honourable death or ſhamefull ſervitude: and to ſuffer nothing to remain, upon which "the enemy in his furious anger might exercíſe his cruelty: & conſidering they had both fire and "ſword in their hands to do the deed, to let thoſe friendly and faithful hands, conſume and diſpatch "the things which were ſure to be loſt and periſh, rather then the proud enemies inſult over them "and make a ſcorn of them. To theſe exhotations they adjoyned a fearfull and horrible curſe, to as many as either for hope of life, or upon timorouſneſs of heart & fear of death, ſhould alter their mind and reſolution. Whereupon all at once they ruſhed out of the gates ſet wide open, and with a mighty tumult and ſhout, made a ſally. Now there was no ſet guard and ſtation of any force oppoſed to reſiſt them, becauſe the enemies feared nothing leſſe, then that they durſt once iſſue forth of the gates. Some few troops of horſe and the light armour, of a ſuddain were ſent out of the B camp to make head, and they encountred them. Between whom there was a skirmiſh hotter and ſharper in regard of courage and violence, then ordered by any skill and good government. And therefore the horſmen were diſcomfited, that firſt preſented themſelves againſt the enemy, yea, & put the light armed footmen alſo in great fear. And ſurely they had proceeded to have fought even under the very rampiar, but that the main ſtrength of the legions, who had but very ſmall time to be marſhalled and arranged, put themſelves in array and came into the field. And yet for all that, they were diſtreſſed for a while about the enſigns, by reaſon that they ran as blind mad men in their furious fit & as bold as witleſſe fools for want of ſence, even upon the ſword and their own deaths. But afterwards, the old experienced ſouldiers, having ſtifly ſtood out againſt the firſt raſh brunt and violent ſhock of the enemies, yea, and killed the formoſt, bridled and ſtaied the rage of thoſe C that ſeconded them: and when they aſſaied with in a while after, to enter forward themſelves & break in upon them, & ſaw none of them to give one foot of ground, but every one reſolute to die in the very place where he ſtood, they opened their battell in the mids (a thing that they might eaſily do, conſidering the multitude of the ſouldiers) compaſſed and environed the wings of their enemies, who fighting round in a ring, unto the laſt man were ſlain every one. Thus were they that were in arms and made reſiſtance manfully dealt withall by their enemies according to the rigor of war, and in the angry mood of ſouldiers; and ſuch was their end. But within the City there was fouler work, and a more cruell butchery and ſlaughter committed, when the feeble unarmed and naked multitude of women and children were murdred by their own neighbours and citizens, who having ſet the foreſaid pile of wood on fire, fell to maſſacre them, and flung their bodies when D they were but half dead, into the light fire under them; ſo as their ſtreams of bloud guſhing out of their veins, were ready to quench the flame beginning to break forth. And in the end, when they themſelves were even wearied with the pittifull ſlaughter of their own friends, they caſt themſelves armour and all into the mids of the ſaid fire. When this maſſacre was done and ended, the Romans entred the City with victory. And at the firſt ſight of this monſtrous object, they wondred for a while and ſtood aſtonied. But afterwards when they ſaw the gold and ſilver glittering within the heap among others goods, they were ready and deſirous (as the nature of man is greedy of ſuch things) to rake and pull the ſame out of the fire: but ſome of them were caught with the flame and burnt; others flaſhed and half ſinged with the hot ſteam of the vapour and breath iſſuing from the light fire, ſuch (I mean) as were formoſt, & could not retire themſelves back, E by reaſon of their exceeding preſſe behind, that thruſt them ſtill forward. Thus Aſtapa was deſtroied by fire and ſword, and yeelded no pillage to the enemies. And wen Martius had all the reſt of the coountry yeeled unto him for fear of force, he led back his victorious army to Carthage unto Scipio.

About the very ſame time there came from Gades certain fugitive renegates, promiſing to betray the garriſon of the Carthaginians lying there, and likewiſe the captain of the garriſon, together with the navy. Now had Mago reſted there after his flight, and having gathered together the ſhips in the Ocean, levied and raiſed certain aids, as well beyond the narrow ſeas along the coaſt of Africk, as alſo out of the parts of Spain next adjoyning unto him, and all by the means of captain Hanno. When as between the Romans and thoſe fugitives, there had paſſed faithfull promiſe and ſecurity to and fro, both Martius was ſent thither with certain ſquadrons and compa- F nies lightly appointed; and alſo Lelius with 7 Triremes [of three banks of oars] and one great galiace of five, for to war joyntly together by common counſell, as well by ſea as land. Scipio himſelf lay ſick of a grievous malady, but much worſe by report then it was, by reaſon that every one (as men commonly have a deſire & delight, to foſter & multiply rumours for the nonce) made ever ſomewhat of his own head, and put into the reſt of the news that he heard: which brought the province out of frame and cauſed great diſorder, eſpecially in the moſt remote parts thereof: whereby it was well ſeen, what a world of troubles would have enſued upon ſome calamity indeed, when a vain rumour only, was able to raiſe ſuch ſtorms and tempeſts. For neither the Allies continued loiall in their alleageance, nor the army dutifull in their wonted obedience. Mandonius & Indibilis, who made full account of the whole kingdome of Spain, now that the Carthaginians G were driven out and expelled, ſeeing nothing anſwerable to their hope and expectation, and themſelves diſappointed of their deſignments, raiſed peaſants and inhabitants of their own countries (and thoſe were the Lacetans) & ſollicited the youth of the Celtiberians: the country alſo of the Sueſſetans and Sedetans, that were confederat States with the people of Rome, they waſted in all manner of hoſtility. Beſides, there aroſe a civil mutiny and diſſention within the camp at Sucro; where there lay eight thouſand ſouldiers, as a guard and garriſon for all the nation that inhabit on this ſide Iberus. Whoſe heads were ſet awork, and began to be buſie not at that time when doubtful & ſuſpicious rumours were ſpread of their General, how he was in danger of death, H but long before, upon a licentious courſe of life that they had taken to, and ſo much the rather, for that now in time of peace they were held in, more ſtreightly and neerly, who before were uſed in their enemies land, during the wars, to break out in more looſe manner, and to live upon rapine and robberie. At the firſt they began to mutter and whiſper ſecretly theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches:

If there be war ſtill in the province of Spain, what do we here among peaceable people? And if the war be ended, and the time of the commiſſion come out and expired, why are we not had again back into Italy? Then they proceed to demand their pay very malapertly, and more lauciely than might ſtand with the duty and modeſty of ſouldiers: yea, and the Sentinels and corps de guard would not ſtick to give reproachfull terms and tanting words to the Tribunes or Marſhals, when they went the round: and ſome of them made no bones to enter by night into the peaceable ter- I ritory about them, for to fetch in booties and prizes; untill at length openly at noon day, they departed from their colours without paſport and licence. All things they did as tranſported away with luſt and ſelf-will of ſouldiers, not guided by the order and diſcipline of warfare, nor directed by the commandment of their captains and rulers. Nevertheleſſe, there was retained ſtill a form of Roman camp among them: and that upon this only hope that the ſouldiers had of the Tribunes aforeſaid: whom they ſuppoſed in time would come to the bent of their bow, enter into the ſame furious courſes, and have their hand in the mutinies, and follow them in their rebellion: and therfore they were well content with them to ſit judicially in Marſhall court, in the uſuall place of Principai, to miniſter law and execute juſtice: alſo to call for the watchword and ſignall of them, yea, and orderly to go to their watch and ward in their courſe and due times. And K whereas in very deed they had caſt off all reverence and obedience of government, yet they would ſeem to ſhew a kind of loiall and dutiful diligence; in that (forſooth) they would be commanders of themſelves, and keep ſome order without conſtraint. But in the end the mutiny broke out into open ſedition: namely, when they perceived once, that Tribunes miſliked and reproved their doings and endeavoured to croſſe their deſignes, yea, and denied flatly and openly to tak part with them in their follies and furious outrages. Whereupon they diſſeized the Tribunes of their judiciall places in the Principia, yea, and diſpoſſeſſed them quite of all room in the camp, and by a generall conſent conferred the ſoveraign rule on two common ſouldiers, the captains of this their ſeditious commotion, Albius Calenus, and C. Atrius Umber. Who not contented with the
* markes and ornaments of the Tribunes, were ſo bold as to handle the rods and axes, even the L very roiall enſigns of ſoveraign rule; never thinking how thoſe knitches of rods, and axes ſticking within them, which they cauſed to be born afore them to the fear of others, were ready to light upon themſelves, to ſcourge their backs and ſides, and to chop off their own heads not long after.
The ſuppoſed death of Scipio, whereupon they vainly built, was it that blinded their wits and minds: upon the rumour whereof, being already noiſed abroad, they had no doubt, but all Spain generally would be up in armes. In which garboil and hurliburly, they made reckoning, that they might levy monies of the confederat States, and ſpoil and pill the Cities neer unto them. And amid theſe troubles, when all were in an uprore, and every man would venture to do every thing at his pleaſure, then they ſuppoſed their own deeds and actions would be leſſe eſpied and marked.
Now when as they looked every day ſtill to hear freſh newes, not of his death only, but alſo of his M funerals; and ſeeing there came none at all, but rather, that the former tidings were checked, and proved but a flying tale without head or foot, then they began to make ſemblance of enquiring after, & ſeeking out the firſt authours who raiſed thoſe falſe reports: then they ſeemed to be angry alſo and offended with them, to the end, that they forſooth might be thought rather to have beleeved things inconſiderately, than to have deviſed ſuch a matter themſelves purpoſely. Theſe leaders and captains thus diſappointed and abandoned, began now to dread and ſtand in horror of their own enſigns of magiſtracy that were carried before them, and in ſtead of that imaginary rule which they uſurped, they feared greatly, that the very edge indeed of the true and lawfull power of authoritie would be ſhortly turned upon them. As the ſedition was thus daſhed, by occaſion, that it was credibly and for certain reported, firſt, that Scipio was living; and within a while N after, that he was recovered and in health: there came ſeven Tribunes or Colonels, ſent from Scipio himſelf. At whoſe firſt arrivall at the camp, the ſouldiers grew more angrie and waſpiſh then before: but anon upon fair words and ſpeeches, wherewith the Colonels entertained thoſe of their acquaintance, with whom they had communication, they were well contented and appeaſed. For firſt they went about to their pavilions from one to another, and afterwards to the Principia and the Pretorium, where they hapned to ſpie ſome knots of ſouldiers met together and talking one with another: and ſo ſpake unto them, as if they rather queſtioned with them what the cauſe ſhould be of their anger and ſuddain commotion, then blamed them, or laid any action to their charge. The reaſon commonly pretended, was this, that their wages was not duly paid at the day. Beſides, they alledged, that whereas at the ſame time, when upon O
"the trecherous fact of the Illiturgitans, there followed the loſſe and death of two Generals, and "the defeat of their two armies, they by their vertue had defended the Roman name and ho"nour, and likewiſe kept the province to their behoof, the Illiturgitans had indeed received con"dign puniſhment for their offence and treſpaſſe, but there was none that had requited and re-"compenced them for their good ſervice accordingly. Beleeve me (ſay they again) your com"plaints are juſt and requeſts reaſonable, and we will make relation thereof to the Lord Generall:
"and glad we are in our hearts, that it is no worſe, and that the caſe is no more incurable than it is:

for

* Certain officers or ſergeants going before them with vine rods

A "for God be thanked, P. Scipio and the common-weal, are both ſufficient and alſo willing to make " you amends for all.

But Scipio, a man though uſed to the wars, yet altogether unacquainted with ſtorms of ſouldiers mutinies, was much troubled in ſpirit and perplexed, for fear the army might exceed meaſure in tranſgreſſing or himſelf paſs his bounds in puniſhing; for the preſent he thought good to deal gently with them ſtill, as he had begun, and ſent abroad the collectors about the Tributary Cities to gather up the revenues, thereby to put them in good hope of pay, and that with ſpeed. And hereupon there went out an edict and proclamation, that they ſhould repair to Carthage, there to call for their wages, either by companies apart one after another, or altogether in general, whether they would themſelves.

B And now by this time, the ſudden pacification of the Spaniards that were about to rebell, ſtilled the ſedition of the ſouldiers quite, which of it ſelf began to cool and ſlake already. For Mandonius and Indibilis, after it was reported that Scipio was alive and livelike, gave over their enterprize, and were retired again within their confines. So as now the ſouldiers had neither Citizen nor forreiner, to take part with them in their folly & furious rage. And when they had caſt all about what courſe to take and what ſhift to make, they found no other evaſion, but the moſt common refuge and retreat of all lewd counſels and bad deſignments, even to commit themſelves either to the juſt wrath of their Generall, or elſe to his clemency and mercy, whereof they were not paſt all hope and in utter deſpair. For why? he had not pardoned even the very enemies, with whom he had fought in battell. And as for their mutiny, it was as yet without bloodſhed, and no hurt C done: and as it ſelf was not cruel and outragious, ſo it had deſerved no extream and rigorous puniſhment: thus reaſoned they and comforted themſelves, as naturally men are too prompt and eloquent, to extenuate, to palliat and cloke their own faults, more I wot, then they ſhould. This was their only doubt, whether they were better to go by cohorts and ſquadrons, or all at once to command their pay. In the end they were of opinion, that the ſafer way was to go all in one train. At the very ſame time, whiles they among themſelves laid their heads thus together in the camp, there was a councel held at new Carthage about them, and much diſpute there was, and variety of opinions, whether they ſhould proceed againſt the heads and Captains only of the ſeditious (who were in number not above five and thirty) or by cutting off the greater ſort to puniſh this D ſo odious example and preſident of a rebellion rather then a mutiny. But the milder ſentence took place, namely, that from whence the offence began, there the puniſhment ſhould reſt. And for the multitude, ſome chaſtiſement and rebuke was ſufficient for their correction. When the Councel was diſmiſſed and broken up, to the end that it might be thought abroad that they ſat about nothing elſe but this which they pretended, they publiſhed an edict throughout all the army in Carthage, for an expedition or journey againſt Mandonius and Indibilis; and gave commandment to make proviſion of victuals for certain daies. And thoſe ſeven Tribunes, who had before gone to Sucro for to appeale the mutiny there, were now ſent to meet that army again: and having five names apeece given them of the principal authors of the foreſaid tumult, they had a direction unto certain meet perſons for the purpoſe, to ſhew them good countenance, to ſpeak fair unto them, E and courteouſly to invite them home to their houſes, and afford them kind and friendly entertainment; and after they had made them good cheer and brought them to bed, to take them being faſt aſleep upon their liberall drinking of wine, and to bind them ſure hand and foot. Now when they were not far off from Carthage, they underſtood by thoſe whom they met and encountred upon the way, that all the whole army, was the next day following to ſet forth againſt the Lacetans: which tidings not only rid them of all fear, which ſecretly ſurpriſed and poſſeſſed their minds, but alſo made them exceeding glad and joyous, for that they ſuppoſed their Generall being now left alone with their forces, they might do with him what they would themſelves, rather then be at his commandment and devotion. And about ſun-ſetting they entred the City, and perceived the other army providing and making all ready for the voiage above named. Received they were F and welcomed with gentle words, deviſed and framed on purpoſe: namely, that the L. Generall took great joy and contentment for their coming, for that they were come ſo juſt before the ſetting out of the other army: and ſo they went to repoſe and make much of themſelves. And without any ſtir and tumult at all, the ringleaders of the ſedition, were by the means of thoſe Tribuns entertained and lodged in the houſes of certain perſons of good behavior and meet for that purpoſe, and there apprehended and impriſoned. At the reliefe of the fourth watch, the cariages of that army, whoſe expedition was pretended, began to ſet forward on the journey: and ſomewhat before day the ſtandards and enſigns advanced, but the whole army was deteined and ſtaied at the gates, and certain warders ſent to keep all the paſſages and wayes, that no man ſhould go forth of the City. Then were thoſe ſouldiers who came the day before ſummoned to an audience: and they ran boldly into the market place to the Tribunall of the General, (as if G with their outcries and clamours they would have put him in ſome fear and dread of them. And at one time both the Lord Generall himſelf in perſon aſcended up the Tribunall, and with all the armed ſouldiers were brought again from the gate, and enclozed round about at their backs the unarmed multitude gathered together to hear an Oration. Then were they danted, as luſty as they were before, and all their courage cooled: and (as they confeſſed afterwards themſelves) nothing terrified them ſo much, as the healthful ſtrength and freſh colour of the L. Generall beyond all their expectation, whom they thought verily to have found ſick and crazie: yea, and his countenance and face so vigorous and couragious, as they never remembred to have seen him so H lusty in any battell before. For a while he sat still and said never a word, untill he was advertised that the Captains of the mutiny were brought into the place and all things else in readinesse.

Then after silence made by an Oyez of the cryer, in this wise he began and said.

" I would never have beleeved that I should have wanted words and proper language unto " mine own army: not because I have exercised my self at any time rather to make eloquent " speeches then to manage valiant actions, but for that being alwaies from mine infancy almost " trained up in the camp, I have been acquainted with the natures and humours of souldiers. But " in what manner I should speak unto you, neither my wits will give me advice, nor my tongue " afford me utterance: you, I say, whom I wot not so much as by what name to call. Should I
" term you Citizens, who have revolted from your native country, or souldiers, who have re- I
" nounced your Generall, refused to be under his command, his charge and government, and " made no conscience to break the oath of your alleageance? Last of all, should I give you the " name of enemies? Now surely, me thinks I agnise the bodies, the faces, the apparel and habit of " mine own natural Citizens: but contrariwise, I see plainly the deeds, the words, the intents and " minds of arrant enemies. For what have ye wished and hoped for else, but the Ilergetes and the " Lacetanes have done the like? And yet I must needs say, that they had to follow for their cap" tains in their outrage, Mandonius and Indibilis, two Princes of royall bloud: whereas you im" posed the soveraign command & government upon Vmber Atrius, & Calenus Albinus two base " companions. Denie it now hardly if you wil, that you all either were in the action, or willing in " the intention. Verily I can easily beleeve you in so disavowing, and namely, that all this proceed- K
" ed from the folly of some brainsick fellows among you. For the trespasses committed are of that " quality and consequence, that if the whole army were therein culpable, the expiation & purging
" therof could not be procured without great sacrifices and exquisite punishment. Full against my " will I touch these points, as sores and gals that will not abide the rubbing: but unlesse they be " touched and handled too, they cannot possibly be cured and healed. I assure you, for mine own " part, I thought verily, that when the Carthaginians were driven out of Spain, there was neither " place nor person throughout the whole province, that had envied my life and health: such hath " been my carriage, and so have I demeaned my self not only with Allies, but also with enemies. But " see, how much I have been deceived! even in mine own camp, the news of my death was not on" ly received with joy, but expected also with a longing desire. I speak not this, that I would have " any man to imagin that I conceive, how all in generall are guilty of this fact (for if I were per- L
" swaded in my mind that my whole army wished my death, I would here die presently before " your eyes; for what good would my life do me, repined of my souldiers and fellow Citizens?)
" But the multitude of every people is like the seas in nature; which of themselves are unmoveable
" and stir not as the winds blow, as the gales go and come, so are they either calm or troublesome
" and unquiet: and even so the cause and source of all this fury and outrage, is in some few heads " and leaders. As for you, ye have caught the infection from them, and plaied the fools with them " for company. Surely I am thus perswaded of you this day, that ye know not yet, to what enor" mous height of folly ye have proceeded; what mischievous act ye were entred into against mine
" own person; what you attempted against your native country, your wives and children; what " you enterprised against the gods and witnesses of your loyall oath; what ye have done against M
" the sacred auspices and happy fortune, under which ye have served in warfare; what ye have " committed against the custome & law of war, against the discipline of your ancestors; & final" ly, how prejudiciall and offensive your designes have been against the soveraign majesty of the " Roman empire. As for my self, I am willing to say nothing: content I am to think, that ye ra" ther gave credit to my death rashly and inconsideratly, then hearken therto willingly and gree" dily. And it may be, that I have so behaved my self, that no wonder it is, if mine army be wea" ry of me and of my government. But what harm hath your country deserved at your hands " which to betray, ye should complot with Mandonius & Indibilis? How hath the people of Rome
" offended you, that you have deprived the Kn. Marshals and Colonels created by the voices of " the people, of their lawfull rule and authority, and conferred the same upon privat persons? N
" And being not therewith contented, to have and acknowledge them for your Colonels; you,
" even you the army of the Romans, have taken the knitches of rods belonging only to the Ge" neral, and bestowed them upon those that never kept so much as a bondslave of their own to " command. Albius and Atrius forsooth, set up their pavilions in that chief place and State in " the camp, where the soveraign magistrat ought to quarter: with them the trumpet sounded:
" from them the signall and watch-word was demanded: they sat as judges in the Tribunal seat
" of Scipio the Pro-consul: upon them the Lictors and Sergeants attended: for them they made
" way & voided the place, against they should go forth & march in their state: and before them " were the rods born, and the axes withall. When it raineth stones, when thunderbolts are shot,
" when lightnings flash from heaven, when beasts bring forth strange uncouth and monstrous O
" young ones, contrary to the course of nature, you take them for prodigious signs and fearfull " tokens. Nay this is a monstrous sight and wonder in deed, which by no sacrifices of beasts, by " no supplications and praiers, can be purged and expiat, without the bloud of them that have " commited so hainous a fact. And albeit no wicked crime can be founded upon any reason, yet
" would I gladly know of you (as in a case that indeed should not be once named and remembred)

" what

A "what was in your mind? what imagined you? and what was your designment? There was in "times past a legion sent to Rhegium, there to lie in garrison. Traiterously and villanously they "murdered the principal citizens there, and for ten years space possessed and kept that wealthy "town to their own behoof. For this notorious and beasty fact the whole legion, even four "thousand men and no fewer, were in the market place of Rome beheaded every one. And "yet they at the first followed not for their captain * Atrius Vmber, one little better then a lan-
"der, skullian, and follower of the camp, a man of an unlucky and unfortunate name, but Decius
"Jubellius a Tribune or Kn. Marshall; neither joyned they with Pyrrhus, nor with the Samnits and "Lucans, professed enemies of the people of Rome. Wheras ye, have plotted in counsell, and meant "to have banded in arms together with Mandonius & Indibilis, their purpose was to have seated B "themselves for ever in Rhegium, like as before them the Campanes, who took Capua from the "Tuscans, the old inhabitants: and the Mamertins likewise; who possessed themselves in Sicily of "Messana, and never minded to molest and make war either upon the people of Rome, or any of "their allies and confederats. But tell me I pray you, intended ye to have made your continuall re"sidence, and to have dwelt at Sucro where if I your General at my departure out of the province,
"when my time and commission was expired, should have left you behind me, ye might have "cried out upon me, and called for vengeance to God and man in regard of hard measure and "wrong offered unto you, in that ye might not be permitted to return home to your wives and children. But alas, wife and children were clean excluded out of your mind: & ye thought no more "upon them, then of me or of your native country. Well, I will follow on still, and discourse upon C "your plot and designs, wicked and ungracious though they were, yet haply not altogether so foo"lish & sottish in the highest degree as may be supposed. Imagined ye being eight thousand men in "number, (and say that ye were all of better account & reckoning then Albius & Atrius are, un"der whom ye submitted your selves) to have been able for to defeat the people of Rome of the "province of Spain? so long as I lived, and the other army stood sound and strong: wherwith in "one day I forced new Carthage; with which I discomfited, put to flight, and chased out Spain, four "brave Generals, and as many puissant armies of the Carthaginians? But let that go by, and to lay "aside my name, and to speak of no more abuse but this, that ye were very credulous and quick"ly beleeved that I was dead. How then? what if I was departed this life and gone indeed? Had "the common-wealth together with me yeelded up her ghost? Would the main state and empire D "of Rome have fain to the ground with me at once? Forsend (O Jupiter, almighty and most gra"cious) that ever a City founded first most happily, with the approbation of the gods, built eter-
"nally for ever to endure, should be compared and made but equal with this frail and mortall body
"of mine. Flaminius, Paulus, Gracchus, Posthumius Albinus, M. Marcellus, T. Quintius Crispi-
"nus, Cn. Fulvius, two Scipios, my father and uncle both, so many noble warriors and captains
"have been slain in this one war; and they are dead and gone: yet the people of Rome continu-
"eth on foot and overliveth them, yea, and shall still, when a thousand more of them shall die, ei"ther upon the edge of the sword, or upon some sickness or other. How should then the state of "the people of Rome be enterred & buried with the dead corps of me, but one man and no more?
"Even you your selves (to go no farther to seek examples) here in Spain, when my father and un-E "cle two Generals, were killed, chose Septimius Martius for your captain, to lead against the Car"thaginians, being in the ruff and jollity of their fresh and late victory. I speak now, as though if "I had miscarried, Spain had been left destitute and without a Commander and Generall. M. Syl-
"lanus who was sent with me in the province, joined in the same commission and of equall au"thority; L. Scipio my brother, and C. Lalius, both Lieutenants generall: would these have sit still "and done nothing? would these have failed to maintain and recover the majesty of our empire?
"What? could ye have compared army for army, captains for captains with them? was either your "reputation and credit, or your quarrel and cause comparable? and suppose that in all these regards, "ye have been superiour and gotten the vantage, would ye indeed with the Carthginians, have
"born arms against your native country? against your fellow citizens? would ye in very truth, that A- F "frick should have commanded Italy; and Carthage the City of Rome? And for what demerit and "great trespasse, I pray you, that your country had committed? Coriolanus long ago, being wrong"fully condemned and unworthily banished, seeing himself to live a miserable exiled man, was mo"ved to take armes and to come against his country to assail it. A privat regard of love and natu-
"rall kindnesse, reclaimed them from publick parricide. But what grief of heart, what fit of an"ger hath incited and provoked your? Set case your wages was paid later by some daies, whiles
"your General lay sick; was that a sufficient cause for you to give defiance to your country & pro-
"claim open war against it? was that enough to cause you to revolt from the people of Rome, and "turn to the Ilergetes? and to spare no law of God and man, but to break all and make shipwrack
"of conscience and common honesty? now surely, souldiers, ye were out of your wits, and fools G "ye were in the highest degree. I was not my self farther out of frame and sicker in body, then "ye were in your mind and understanding. I tremble to think upon it and to reherse, what folk be-"leeved, what they hoped, what they wished. Let all be forgotten and buried in oblivion, if it be "possible: if not let us not speak of it yet, howsoever we do, but rake it up in deep silence. I cannot "deny, but my words have seemed sharp and bitter unto you, and all this my speech very rigorous.
"But how much more cruell think ye are your deeds, then my words tart and sour? And if ye "deem it reasonable, that I should bear & put up the things that ye have done; wil ye not abide then

and

* Atrius Vmber: alluding to Ater, black and Vmbra a dark shadow.

" and take in good part, and patiently to hear me to tell all that I can say? But these matters I wil H " lay no more in your dish from henceforth; ye shall be checked no more for them. Would God ye
" could as soon forget them, as I will put them out of my remembrance. And therefore as touching
" you all in generall, if ye repent and be displeased with your selves for your fault and folly, I shall " be content and think you punished to the ful. But as for Albius Calenus and Atrius Umber, with " the rest of the authors of this cursed and detestable mutiny, they shall make amends for their " trespasse and transgression, even with their heart-bloud; and they shall surely die for it. The " spectacle of their exemplary punishment ought not to seem unto you grievous and odious, but " rather a pleasant and delectable sight, if ye have any grace in you, and be come again to your right
" wits. For their intent was to hurt and do mischief to no man alive, more then to your selves.

He had scarce made an end of his speech, when all at once, according to the order given before- I hand, there was presented to their eies and ears a terrible and fearful object on all sides. For the army which had environed the assembly round about clattered their swords & bucklers together. The common crier was heard to cite by name all those that were condemned there, in the presence of the whole audience. Stripped they were naked, and haled forth in the mids of them all, and every thing brought out at once for to accomplish the execution. Thus were they bound to the stake, whipped with rods, and their heads chopped off. So benumned they were all and astonied for fear, that were present at the sight thereof, that there was not heard amongst them all one shrewd & hard word, in misliking the rigor of the punishment, no, nor so much as one grone or secret sigh. Then their bodies were al drawn at one side, the place was made clean, & purged & al the souldiers were called by name & before the Colonels & Kn. Marshals, sware alleageance, and K to be true souldiers unto Scipio. And every one according as he answered to his name, had his wages truly paid. This was the issue and final end of the souldiers mutiny, which began at Sucro.

At the same time, Captain Hanno sent by Mago from Gades with a small power of Africans, sollicited the Spaniards about the river Batis, for mony, to rebel and put in arms upon a four thousand able men. But afterwards he was forced by L. Martius to quit his camp, and having lost the greatest part of his men in the very tumult of taking the camp, yea, and some in the flight, whom the horsmen pursued in chase and slew as they ran straggling, himself with few others escaped away. Whiles these things hapned about the river Batis, Lælius in the mean time having passed through the streights into the main Ocean, arrived with his navy at Carteia. This is a City standing on the sea coast bounding upon the Ocean, even in the mouth of the river, where it first open- L eth from the streights into the broad sea. Now there was some hope (as hath been aforesaid) to gain the City of Gades without any assault, by treason, for as much as there came some into the Roman camp, that of themselves made offer and promise thereof. But the treason brake forth too soon and was revealed before it was ripe, the conspirators were all apprehended, and sent by Mago unto Adherbal the Pretor, for to be conveied to Carthage. And Adherbal having embarked those traitors in a Caravel or Gallion of five banks of oars, and sent her afore, because she was slower of sail than those of three banks; himself with eight three-banked gallies, followed a prety way after. The said Caravel of five course of oars, was not so soon entred the straights, but Scipio also being embarked in another Caravel of the same sort, made out of the haven of Carteia with seven Gallies of three ranks of oars and invested Adherbal and the foresaid Gallies: sup- M posing verily, that the enemies Caravel being taken tardy in the very current, was not able against the tide to reire. Adherbal being thus surprised on the suddain, for a while stood in fear and doubt what to do; whether he had best to follow on after his own Caravell, or turn the prows and beaks of his gallies, and make head against the enemy. Thus whiles he stood at a bay lingring, he lost the opportunity of shifting and avoiding a battell: for now they were come within the dart shot, and the enemies on every side were ready to charge. And the current was so strong, that they were not able to rule and manage their ships as they would. But the manner of fight was nothing at all like to a sea-battell, for as much as they could do nothing to their mind, nothing by skil and dexterity, nothing by counsel and advice. The nature onely of the narrow sea, the violence of the current was all in all, and ruled the conflict, driving the ships one against another, as well up- N on their own fellows as upon their enemies: notwithstanding they rowed and laboured what they could to the contrary. So as one while ye should see a ship that fled and scudded away, whirled about back again with a witnesse by the waves, upon those that had her in chase: and likewise another that seemed to follow and pursue after her enemie, if she hapned once into a contrary course of billowes, to turn top and tail, and seem to flie. And in the very conflict it so fell out, that when as one vessell ran with her beak head full butt upon another, she was forced by waves to turn her side, and receive in her flank the push of her enemies. And contrariwise, when as one lay with her flank opposite to the enemie, suddainly all at once she should wind and whirle again upon her prow. As the gallies fought thus doubtfully together, hap hazard, at the pleasure and will of Fortune; the Roman Caravell (were it because of her weight she was able to stand more O steady against the surging billows, or by reason that she had more ranks of oars that cut the waves, and so was more easily ruled) chanced to sink two of the smaller gallies of the enemies; and running fast by one with a forcible violence wiped away clean all the oars of one side, and had no doubt spoiled and marred all the rest that she would have invelted and charged upon. but that Adherbal, with the other five made sail, and got over into Africk. Lælius having sailed back to Carteia with victory, and heard what had been done at Gades, namely, how the complot of betraying

A betraying the Iland was diſcloſed, the conſpirators ſent bound unto Carthage, and conſequently all their hope fruſtrate and turned to nothing upon which they came to Gades; diſpatched meſſengers to L. Martius, giving him to underſtand, that unleſſe they meant ſtill to lie before Gades, trifling away the time and doing no good, the beſt way was to return unto Scipio the lord Generall: and ſo with the conſent of Martius both of them within few daies repaired to Carthage. Upon whoſe departure Mago had not onely a time to breath himſelf being frighted as he was with a double fear both by land & ſea; but alſo hearing that the Ilergetes were revolted, conceived ſome hope to recover Spain again, and addreſſed his courriers to the Senat at Carthage: who by relaB ting not only the civil mutiny that aroſe in the Roman camp, but alſo the rebellion of the confederats (and all by way of amplification and enforcing every thing to the higheſt degree) ſhould encourage and exhort them to ſends aids for to regain the dominion of Spain, left unto them by deſcent over their anceſtors. Mandonius & Indibilis who were retired for a time into their confines, untill they knew how the ſedition ſped and what was the iſſue thereof, reſted ſtil in ſuſpence. For if the naturall citizens had their treſpaſſe forgiven, they made no doubt themſelves but they might be pardoned alſo. But when it was publiſhed abroad how ſeverely and ſharply they were puniſhed, they ſuppoſing their own tranſgreſſon to deſerve the like puniſhment, ſollicited their own people again to take arms: and thus having levied and aſſembled the ſame power of aids which they had before, they paſſed into the Sedetants country, where at the beginning they lay in ſtanding C camp, being in all 20000, and 2500 horſe ſtrong.

Scipio after he had ſoon reconciled and won again the heart of his ſouldiers, as well by making true paiment of their wages, to the faulty and innocent alike, as alſo by ſhewing a loving countenance, and giving friendly words unto all indifferently; before that he diſlodged and removed from Carthage, aſſembled them all together to an audience. "Where he inveighed bitterly and at large againſt the falſhood and trechery of the lords of the country that rebelled: and proteſted be- Scipio to his ſouldiers.
"fore them all, that he went not now to be revenged of them for their wickedneſs with the ſame "mind, wherewith lately before he had cured the folly, and reformed the error of his naturall
"citizens: for then quoth he with grief and grone, yea, and with tears like as one that rent and cut
"his own bowels, I expiated and purged either the inconſiderat folly, or the wilful malice of eight D "thouſand men, with the head of thirty perſons: but now I go with joy and glad heart, yea, and "with a reſolution to execute and maſſacre the Ilergetes. For neither are they born in the ſame land
"with me, nor linked now in any ſociety at all unto me: the only bond of faith and amity which "was between us, that they have themſelves firſt impiouſly broken. But in my own army, beſides
"that I ſee they all are either Roman citizens or elſe allies, and thoſe not Aliens but meer Latins:
"this doth me good and moved me much, that there is not among them ſo much as one ſouldier "to ſpeak of, but was brought out of Italy either by mine uncle Cn. Scipio (who was the firſt of "the Roman name that came as L. Deputy into this province) or elſe by my father who was Con-
"ſul, or laſt of all by my mine own ſelf. They are every one of them wel acquainted & inured with "the name of Scipios, and uſed to their fortune and government: whom I gladly would conduct E "home ſafe with me to deſerved triumph, and whom I hope to find ready to aſſiſt me with their "favour when I ſtand for a Conſulſhip, as if it were a matter that concerned the honor of them
"all in generall, as well as mine particular. And as for the expedition now in hand, whoſoever
"taketh it to be a war, little remembereth the noble acts by me atchieved: for ſurely I make more
"reckoning of Mago and his exploits, who is fled with a few ſhips as it were out of the compaſſe
"of the world, in an Iland environed with the Ocean ſea, then I do of the Illergetes. For there
"in that place is not only a Carthaginian captain, but all the Carthaginian forces and ſtength that "now remain. Here are none but theeves and robbers, and their leader; who peradventure
"may be of ſome power and ſufficiency to forage the fields, to burn the houſes, to drive away ſome
"cattell of their neighbours, but to come to hand-ſtrokes in a ſet fight and ranged battell, they are F "of no valour and worth at all: who no doubt will come into the field, truſting upon their good
"footmanſhip to run away in the rout, more than upon any force of arms to maintain the fight.
"And therefore I have thought good to put down and ſuppreſſe theſe Ilergetes, before I depart out "of the province; not for any preſent danger at all, or fear of greater war that I ſee may ſpring
"from thence; but firſt and principally, that ſo ungracious and wicked a rebellion ſhould not re"main unpuniſhed; and next becauſe it might not be ſaid, that in a province ſo ſubdued, as wel by "ſingular proweſſe as rare felicity, there was left one enemie behind of the Romans. And therfore
"in the name of the gods follow after me, not ſo much to make juſt war (for ye are not to deal
"with enemies any way comparable unto you) as to take vengeance of wicked men, and to puniſh
"graceleſſe perſons. When he had finiſhed his ſpeech, he diſmiſſed them, with commandment to G be ready the next morrow to put themſelves in the journey: and after that he ſet once forward, by the tenth day he came to the river Iberus, and when he had paſſed over, within 4 daies more, he encamped in the ſight of his enemies. Now there was a plain there, environed round about with mountains: into which vale between, he cauſed the cattell (and thoſe were for the moſt part driven out of the enemies countrie) for to be put forth to graſing and all to provoke the anger of the fiere and ſavage enemies: and ſent out withall, the light appointed archers to guard them: he took order beſides, that when theſe were one in skirmiſh with the vancurriers of the enemies, Lelius with his Cavalry ſhould cloſely from ſome covert place give a ſuddain charge. And for this purpoſe, there was a hill that bare out handſomely to hide the ambuſh of thoſe horſemen.

And

And presently without any delay, they came to skirmish: for the Spaniards made out to to the H cattell, so soon as ever they discovered them a far off: the archers again and darters of the Romans ran upon the Spaniards as they were busie in their booty. And at first they terrified them, and skirmished with their shot: but afterward, when they had spent their arrows and darts, which were better to begin a fray, then determine a battell, they drew their naked swords and began to fight close together foot to foot. And surely the skirmish of the footmen had been doubt-fully decided, but that the horsemen came upon them: who not only affronted the enemies in their face, and trampled them all under their horsefeet that came in their way, but also some of them having wheeled about and set a compasse along the hill-foot, presented themselves at the back of the enemies, so as they enclosed and shut up the most part of them in the middle between. Insomuch as there ensued a greater slaughter, then commonly upon light skirmishes by way of such I rodes and excursions. But the barbarous people by this discomfiture were rather kindled and enflamed to anger, then daunted any way or discouraged. And therfore, because they would not seem to have been dismaied or affrighted, the morrow morning by day-light, they shewed themselves in battell array. The streight and narrow valley, as is beforesaid, was not able to receive and contain all their power: for two third parts welneer of the infantry and all the horse were come down into the plain field; and the rest of their footmen besides, stood together quartered on the side of the hill. Scipio judged that the scantnesse of the ground made for him both because it seemed that the Roman souldiers were more fitted to fight in a small room then the Spaniards: and also for that the enemies were engaged within that place, which was not able to contein the the whole multitude: and therefore he devised a new stratagem besides. For considering that he K could not in so narrow a space bring his own cavalrie about to compasse and charge the wings and points of their battell, and that the horsmen which the enemies had arranged together with their infantry, would serve them in no stead; he gave direction unto Lælius to conduct the horse as closely as he could about the hils, and to keep off the squadrons of the cavalry so far as possibly might be from the skirmish of the Infantry. Himself directly turned all the ensigns of the footmen opposit against the enemies, and marshalled the forefront with four cohorts only, because he could not stretch out the battell any broader: and then without delay he made hast to begin the conflict, to the end, that while the enemies were amused and occupied in fight they should be withdrawn from espying the horsmen as they traversed over the hils. Neither had they an eye of them at all, whiles they were brought about, before they heard the noise and tumult of themas L they charged upon their backs. So they fought asunder in two severall places: and battels of foot, and as many of horse encountred & joyned along the plain, because the streightnesse of the ground would not admit both horse and foot to fight together in one plot at once. Now when as the infantry of the Spaniards could not help the men of armes, and they again were a little succoured by the Cavalry, but that the footmen trusting upon the Cavalry, were without good direction put rashly to fight in the plain ground, and so beaten down and slain; and the horsemen being enclosed round, could neither abide the enemies footmen afront them (for by this time their own infantry was overthrown and defeated) nor yet endure behind them the hot assault of their horsmen; they left their horses, cast themselves into a ring, and after they had stood so at defence long time, were slain every one to the last man: there was not I say one footman or horsman left M of all those that fought in the valley. As for that third part which stood upon the hill side, rather to behold the fight in a place of security, than to take part with their fellows in the battell, they had both time and space to shift for themselves and escape. Among whom, were the Princes also themselves in person, Madonius and Indibilis: who were slipt away in the first tumult of the fight, before all the battailons were environed. The same day was the camp also of the Spaniards forced, and therein besides other pillage, were taken prisoners almost three thousand men.
Romans and allies there died in that fight upon a 1200, and above three thousand were sore hurt.
The victory no doubt had been obteined with lesse bloudshed, if they had fought in a more open piece of ground, where there had been better scope to flie away. Then Indibilis giving over clean to think any more of wars, & supposing nothing safer, then to have recourse to the approved good- N nesse and clemency of Scipio, sent his brother Mandonius unto him: who fell postrat down at his feet, blaming much (as the cause of their folly) the fatall rage and fury of the time; wherein not only the Illergetes and Lacetanes, but also the Roman camp, as it were by some contagious and pestilent infection, became frantick and besides themselves: and said withall, that the condition of himself, his brother, and their followers and subjects was such, as they were ready if if were so thought good, either to yeeld up their lively breath unto Scipio, at whose very hands they had once received the same; or if they might now be pardoned and saved, to devote and employ their lives for ever hereafter wholly in his service, as being now twice due unto him alone, and no other. Once after they presumed upon confidence in their innocent cause, when as yet they had no experience of his clemency: but now contrary wise they reposed all their full hope in O the mercy of the conqueror, and nothing trusting in the goodnesse of the quarrell. Now it was an old custome among the Romans, not to exercise the absolute authority of the government upon any (as they did to peaceable subjects) with whom they were neither confedered in equall and re-ciprocall covenants, nor linked in the bands of amity; before they surrendered up unto them all rights, as well divine as humane: before I say they had received hostages of them, taken armor from them, and planted garrisons in their towns and Cities. Scipio after he had sharply rebuked

A and roundly ſhaken up Mandonius there preſent, and likewiſe Indibilis that was abſent, ſaid, that for their wicked parts & lewd demeanor, they had worthily deſerved death: but live they ſhould by his goodneſs and the gracious favour of the people of Rome. And moreover he promiſed neither to deſpoil them of their armour & weapons (the ſeizing whereof was put a pawn and aſſurance unto ſuch as feared rebellion; for as for him, he left unto them their armour freely to uſe at their pleaſure, and their hearts and minds ſecured from fear) nor proceed in rigor and cruelty againſt the guiltleſſe hoſtages, but againſt their own perſons, if they went out and revolted again: nor yet would be content himſelf to be revenged of diſarmed and naked enemies, but the offenders & tranſgreſſors ſhould in their armes ſuffer for their deſerts. And now ſince they had tried both fortunes, as well the one as the other, he put unto their choiſe, whether they had rather have the Ro-B mans pacified or diſpleaſed, friends or enemies? So Mandonius had a fair delivery; only there was an impoſition and fine laid unto him and Indibilis, of a ſum of money for ſouldiers pay. Scipio himſelf after he had ſent Martius before into the farther part of Spain (beyond the river Iberus) and Syllanus back again to Tarracon, ſtaid ſome few daies untill the Illergetes had made payment of the monies that they were charged with: and then with all his ſouldiers lightly appointed without carriages, marched in a running camp to overtake Martius, who by that time approached neer unto the Ocean.

The treaty which Maſaniſſa began before time, was upon ſundry occaſions put off ſtill and deferred. For the Numidian Prince was very deſirous to parley & commune with Scipio himſelf in perſon & in the right hand to aſſure him of fealty: which was the very cauſe then, that Scipio took C ſo long a journey ſo far out of his way. Maſaniſſa being now at Gades, and advertiſed by Martius that Scipio was coming and neer at hand, ſhewed falſe ſemblance to Mago, made many excuſes, & found much fault, namely, that their boutes being pinned up and peſtred within the Iland, were weineer loſt and ſpoiled: and that by their long abode there, not only they made others feel the want and ſcarcity of all things, but alſo taſted thereof themſelves: and beſides that his men of arms for very eaſe and idleneſſe, became feeble and unluſty. By which ſuggeſtions he perſwaded with Mago, and prevailed with him ſo much, as to ſuffer him to croſſe over into the continent, under colour to waſt and ſpoil the land of Spain next adjoyning. When he was paſſed over, he D ſent before him three principall Numidians, gentlemen of mark, to appoint both the time and the place of their meeting and conference, and gave order, that Scipio ſhould detein ſome of them with him as pledges: the third was ſent back, to conduct Maſaniſſa to the appointed place, according as he was commanded, and ſo with a ſmall company they met for to emparle and commune together.

Now was Maſaniſſa the Numidian King poſſeſſed before with a wonderful admiration of Scipio and his vertue, by reaſon of the fame that was blazed abroad of his noble acts: and had conceived with all and imagined, that he was a man right perſonable, of a mighty big and goodly ſtature, but when he once ſaw him in place, he grew into a far greater reverence and honor of his perſon.
E For beſides the exceeding majeſty and port that naturally he carried with him, his goodly long buſh of hair well became and graced him; the habit alſo and attire of the body, manly & ſouldier-like, not brave nor tricked up deintily and delicately, much adorned and ſet him out. And for his age he was in the beſt & height of his ſtrength: which ſeemed upon his late ſickneſs, more full, more ſmug and freſh, as if the very prime and flour of his youth had been renewed, and himſelf caſt again in a new mould. The Numidian (at their firſt meeting) almoſt aſtonied, gave him thanks for ſending back his brothers ſon unto him, ſaying: "That ever ſince that time, he ſought to eſpie
F "ſome occaſion and fit opportunity, which now at length by the goodneſs of the immortall gods be-"ing preſented unto him, he had not neglected and let ſlip: Proteſting that he was moſt deſirous "both to do him favour, and to gratifie the people of Rome in any kind of ſervice: in ſo much "as there was no one forreiner more earneſt & ready to advance and better the State of the Romans "then himſelf: which (albeit he had been willing unto heretofore) he could not poſſibly ſhew in "effect, ſo long as he was in Spain, a ſtrange country, and unknown unto him; but in that wherein G "he was born & brought up in hope of ſucceſſion in his fathers Kingdom, he would be moſt for-"ward to perform. For, in caſe the Romans would ſend but Scipio as L. Generall into Africk, he "made no doubt but hoped aſſuredly, that Carthage had not long to continue and ſtand, but ſoon "would come to a finall end." Scipio for his part was glad both to ſee him, and hear him ſo ſpeak; knowing this full well, that of all the cavalry of the enemies, Maſſaniſſa and the Numid-ians went ever away with prick & prize & the young man himſelf in his very countenance carried with him a good ſhew of a brave and hanty mind. So after faithfull promiſe given and received on both parts, Scipio retired to Tarracon: and Maſaniſſa when he had by the permiſſion of the Romans foraged the coaſts next adjoyning, becauſe he might not ſeem to have paſſed over into the main land for nothing, returned into Gades.

When Mago now being in utter deſpair of Spain (whereof he had conceived great hopes, and bare himſelf ſo proudly; firſt upon the mutiny of the ſouldiers, and afterwards upon the revolt & rebellion of Indibilis) made preparation to ſail over into Africk, there came a meſſage unto him from Carthage, that the Senat there had given order and direction, That he ſhould tranſport the armado which he had at Gades, and paſſe into Italy: and there to take up and wage all the able men that poſſibly he could levy, either of Gauls or of Ligurians; & ſo to joyn with his power unto Annibal: and not to ſuffer that war to quail and ſlake now, which was enterpriſed with greateſt force and endeavor, and yet, with greater favour of fortune. For this exploit, both treasure was H brought from Carthage to Mago: and himself also raised as great sums as possibly he could of the Gaditanes, having not only emptied the common treasure of the Iland, but spoiled also the temples, yea, and forced all privat persons to bring abroad all their gold and silver whatsoever. As he sailed along the coast of Spain, he landed his souldiers not far from new Carthage: and after he had wasted and overrun the territories by the Sea side, he approached neer with his fleet, and rid at anchor before the City: where all the day long he kept his souldiers within their ships, and by night set them ashore, and led them toward the part of the wall, whereas Carthage was by the Romans won: supposing that the City was not sufficiently defended with a stronge guard, and that some of the townsmen, upon hope of a change and alteration, would rise up in armes and rebell. But there were come posts out of the country in all hast beforehand, who had brought news, I as well of the foraging of the country & fearfull flight of the rusticall peasants, as of the coming of the enemies. Moreover the armado was descried also in the day time, & it was apparant, that they made not choise to anchor even just in the rode before the City, for nothing. And therefore the the City souldiers stood ready, well appointed, and in armes, and kept within that gate, which turned toward the lake and the sea. And when the enemies, souldiers and marriners confusedly together, were come in great disorder under the walls, with more tumultuous noise then forcible violence: the Romans at once suddainly set open their gate, and with a great crie and shout, made a sally upon them, charged the enemies, troubled and disordered them & at the first onset & volly of shot discomfited and put them to flight, yea, and with much slaughter chased them to the shore: and but that the vessels stood close to the strand, ready to receive them abroad as they fled so K fearfully, there had not been one left alive, either in the flight or fight. Nay, they that were in the very ships were in great affright & peril, whiles to prevent the enemies of breaking in upon them pell mell with their own company, they pull'd up the ladders, drew in the planks, cut a two the ropes whereby the ships were fastened to the banks, yea, and the very cables for hast, that they might have no hinderance by weighing anchor: so that many there were, who in swimming to the ships, because they knew not in the darke night, which way to go or what to avoid, perished miserably. The next day, when the armado was fled from thence back again into the Ocean from whence it came, they were found slain eight hundred men: and of armors and corslets between the City wall and the sea shore, two thousand.

Mago being retired to Gades, was excluded from thence, and arrived with his fleet at Cimbis, L a place not far from Gades. From whence he sent Embassadors, to complain that the gates were shut against him, being their allie and friend: and when the Gaditanes excused themselves and said, that it was long of an uprore of the multitude, who were offended & aggrieved for certain robberies committed, and spoil made by the souldiers at their departure, and when they were ready to be embarked; he trained forth to parly their head magistrats (whom the Carthaginians call Suffetes) together with the chief Treasurer: and after they were scourged and their skin pitteously torn, he commanded them to be roundly trussed up and crucified. From thence he sailed to Pity-usa, an Iland distant from the main an hundred miles, inhabited at that time by Carthaginians, where the fleet was friendly and peaceably received: & not only provided for liberally of store of victuals, but also furnished with lusty men, for marriners to serve at sea, yea, and with armor and M munition for souldiers. Upon which forces Mago bare himself confident and bold, and setting sail fell within the Balear Ilands, that were fifty miles off. Now there are two of these Ilands called Ba-leares, the one greater then the other, and more mighty both in men and munition: having an haven and harbour where Mago supposed that he might commodiously winter in. But the Ilanders withstood his navy with as great hostility, as if they had been Romans that had inhabited the I-land, they could not have done more. And as now adaies they use for the most part slings, so at that time they practised no other kind of weapons at all. And in no nation besides, can ye find one speciall person, so much to excell in that feat, as all the Balears generally do exceed and surpasse others in the cast and slight thereof. And therefore they discharged and levelled among them, as the armado approached the shore, such store of stones flying about their ears as thick as hail, that N they durst not enter the haven, but turned their ships into the main sea again. Then they put over to the lesser * Iland of the Balears, which as it was fertile in soil, so for men and armor it was nothing so strong. Whereupon they disbarked and came a land, and above the haven in a strong and well fenced place they encamped. And having gotten to be masters both of the City and territory about it, without any force of armes and conflict, they levied and enrolled there among them two thousand auxiliary souldiers, whom they sent to Carthage for to winter, and then they drew up their ships aland into the dock. When Mago was once departed from the Ocean sea coast, the Gaditans surrendred themselves to the Romans.

* Minorique, as the greater is called Majorique.

These were the acts atchieved in Spain, under the conduct & fortunat government of P. Scipio, who having delivered the charge of the province to L. Lentulus, and Manlius Acidinus, return- O ed to Rome with a fleet of ten sail. He had audience given him in the Senat, assembled in the temple of Bellona, without the City: where he discoursed before them in order from point to point, of all the affairs and exploits that he had done in Spain: Namely, how often he had fought in set and ranged battels: what a number of towns he had forced and won from the enemies; what nations he had subdued and brought in subjection under the state of Rome; how at first
he

A he passed into Spain, against four general captains and four victorious armies; and now had not left one Carthaginian in all those parts. Yet for all these noble deeds, he rather assaied what hope he might have of a triumph, than made any hot & earnest sute therefore: because it was never seen to that day, that any one had triumphed who made war, being himself no principal Magistrate. After the Senat was risen and dismissed he entred the City: and caused to be carried before him into the Chamber of Rome, of silver in bullion, 14342 pounds weight; and in coin besides, a great quantity. Then L. Veturius Philo held the solemn assembly for creation of Coss. and all the Centuries in general, with exceeding favour and affection elected P. Scipio Cos. and for to be his companion in government, P. Licinius Crassus the Archbishop was joyned unto him. But this assembly (as we find in records) was celebrated with more frequency of people, than ever any had been B known during this war. For they repaired and met from all parts, not only to give their voices, but also to see Scipio: nay they ran in great numbers to his house, and into the Capitoll, when he sacrificed and slew an hundred oxen in sacrifice for the honour of Jupiter, according to his vow which he had made in Spain. And all mens minds gave them, and they were assuredly perswaded in their hearts that as L. Lutatius finished the former Punick war, so P. Cornelius would make an end of that which was now in hand: and like as he had driven all the Carthaginians forth of Spain, so would Scipio hunt them out of Italy: and every man in his conceit wished and assigned unto him the Province of Affrick, as if the war in Italy had been fully brought to an end. Then ensued the election of the Prætors. And two were created that were then Ædiles of the Commons, to wit, Sp. Lucretius, and Cn. Octavius: and of private persons, Cn. Servilius Scipio, and L. Æmylius C Pappus. In the fourteenth year of the Punick war, P. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus entred their Consulship. And unto the Consuls were the Provinces appointed: namely, unto Scipio was Sicily granted without casting lots, and that with the consent and good liking of his Collegue, because he being the Archbishop, was by vertue of that dignity kept still in Italy, for to see to the sacrifices, divine service, and Church matters: and unto Crassus the country of Brutii was assigned. Then the provinces for the Prætors were put to the lottery: and the civil jurisdiction within Rome fell to Cn. Servilius: Ariminum (for so they called Gallia) unto Sp. Lucretius: Sicily was allotted to L. Æmylius: and Lardinia to Cn. Octavius.

The Senat assembled in the Capitol: where Publius Scipio propounded an Act, and it was confirmed by the authority of the house, That out of the money which himself brought into the D common treasure, he might be allowed to defray the charges of those plaies and games that he had vowed in Spain during the time of the Souldiers mutiny. Then he called the Embassadors of the Saguntins into the Senat house: and the most ancient man amongst them spake in this wise:

The Oration of the Saguntine Embassadors in the Senat of Rome.

"Although right honourable it be not possible to find any more miseries & calamities than we "have endured already in the maintenance of our faithful allegeance unto you even unto the end, "yet such have your deserts been to us ward, & so many favours have we received of your cap- "tain Generals, that we think not much nor repent of any damage or loss, that we have sus- "tained in that behalf. For first ye entred into the quarrel, & began the war for our sake; and ha- "ving once begun it, ye have continued therein for the full space of 14 years; and that with such "resolution, that oftimes, as ye have plunded your selves into extream peril & danger, so ye have E "engaged no less the State of the Carthaginians. For at what time as ye had within Italy a cruell "and bloudy war, & Annibal your mortall enemy, ye sent forth your Coss. with armies into Spain, "as it were to gather up the broken reliques of our shipwrack. Pub. and Cn. Cornelii the two bre- "thren, from the first time that they came into the Province, never ceased to devise and do what- "soever might either advantage us, or endamage our enemies. For first and formost they restored "unto us our town again: then having made enquiry throughout all Spain where any one of our "Citizens were sold as slaves, they delivered and redeemed them out of miserable servitude, and "recovered for them their former freedom. But see: When we were well-near come to this good "pass, that from our poor & pitiful estate we were raised up to a wished for and desirable fortune, "then Pub. and Cn. Cornelii your Generals suddenly died: whose death hapned in manner more F "lamentable and dolorous unto us than unto you. For then we thought verily thus of our selves, "That we were reduced from remote & distant places unto our ancient habitation for this pur- "pose, that we should perish once again, and see a second overthrow and destruction of our native "country: knowing thus much, that for to work our utter confusion there needed not a Cartha- "ginian captain or army to be the instrument and the means; for even the Turdetans alone, our "most ancient enemies, who were the cause also of our former ruin and undoing, were able with "their own forces to root us out clean, and extinguish our name. But behold, whiles we were in "these perplexities, immediatly beyond all our hope and expectation, ye sent among us this noble "Scipio here in place. In whose behalf we count our selves of all Saguntins most happy, because we "have seen him declared Cos. already, and shall be able to report the news unto our neighbours G "and fellow Citizens, that we have beheld with our own eyes, even our whole hope, our help, "our health and safety. Who having forced & won very many Cities and towns of your enemies "in Spain, at all times and in all places set the Saguntins apart from out of other prisoners & cap- "tives, and sent them home again into their own country. Finally, as for Turdetania, a nation so adverse and so dangerous enemies unto us, that if it should continue still in prosperity, Saguntum "could not possibly stand upright; he hath by force of arms so quelled and tamed it, that neither "we our selves, nor (be it spoken without arrogance) any of our posterity hereafter need stand in " fear of any danger from thence. We ſee before our eyes their City raſed, at whoſe inſtigation & H

" whom for to gratifie Annibal before had raſed Saguntum: and out of their lands now, we gather
" rents and revenues: which contenteth our hearts, not ſo much for profit & gain, as for quittance
" and revenge. In conſideration and regard of theſe benefits and good turns, which be ſuch, as grea" ter we cannot hope nor wiſh for at the hands of the immortal gods: the Senat and people of Sa- " guntum hath ſent us ten here in Embaſſie unto you, for to give you thanks in their name: & with-
" all, to rejoyce and congratulate in your behalf for the happy hand ye have made, and the fortu" nate exploits ye have atchieved theſe laſt years paſt, as well in Spain as in Italy; namely, that ye
" have ſubdued, and do hold in poſſeſſion all Spain, not only ſo far as to the river Iberus, but even " to the lands end, and the utmoſt point lying upon the Ocean ſea. And as for Italy, ye have left no " more ground in it for Annibal and the Carthaginians, than they empale within the compaſs of I " trench and rampier. Moreover, we have in ſpeciall charge, not only to render thankſgiving there" fore to almighty and moſt gracious Jupiter, the patron of the fortreſs and Caſtle of the Capitol,
" but alſo to offer & preſent unto him (if it might ſtand with your good grace and liking) this gol" den crown; and to ſet it up in the Capitol, in token and memorial of Victory. Which we hum" bly beſeech your HH. of your favour to grant unto us: and moreover, (if it pleaſe you) to ratifie
" and confirm for ever by your authority and approbation, all thoſe benefits, franchiſes, and privi-
" ledges, which your Generals have of their goodneſs vouchſafed to endow us with.

The Senat made this anſwer to the Saguntin Embaſſadors. " That both the raſing and alſo the " rearing again of Saguntum ſhould be a memorable example to all nations, of the faithful ſocie-
" ty and alliance, obſerved both of the one part and the other inviolate. And whereas their Gene- K
" rals had re-edified the City of Saguntum, and delivered the Citizens thereof from ſervitude and " bondage, they had therein done well and truly, and by direction according to the will and plea-
" ſure of the Senat. And whatſoever elſe was performed by them to the good and benefit of the " Saguntins, the Senat ſtood willing and contented therewith, and gave order therefore. As for " their preſent and oblation, good leave they had to beſtow it ſolemnly in the Temple of the Ca" pitol. After this order was given, That the Embaſſadors ſhould have their lodging appointed them, and preſents ſent unto them, and all other entertainment at the charges of the City, yea, and by way of a reward, an allowance of no leſs than ten thouſand Aſſes apeece.

Then were the other Embaſſadors admitted into the Senat-houſe, and audience given them.
Alſo the requeſt of the Saguntins was granted to go and ſee Italy for their pleaſure, ſo far forth as L they might with ſecurity of their perſons: and certain guides were aſſigned to conduct and accompany them, with eſpecial letters alſo directed unto all Cities and towns, for to receive the Spaniards friendly, and give them courteous entertainment.

Theſe things done, the Senators ſat in conſultation about the ſtate and commonweal, & treated concerning the levying of new armies, & the diſtribution of the Provinces. Now when as the common brute went that P. Scipio was deſtined & named to a new province of Affrick, & all men gave out with open voice, that he was the man to be ſent thither directly, without caſting lots for the matter: and himſelf beſides not reſting content now with mean glory, ſaid openly, that he was declared Coſ. not only for to maintain war but alſo to finiſh and make an end thereof once for all: which could not be effected by any other means, unleſs himſelf in perſon made a voyage with an M army into Affrick; proteſting moreover, That if the Senat croſſed and gainſaid this deſign of his he would propound it to the people, and carry it away clear by their voices: whiles the principal LL. and ancients of the Senat were nothing pleaſed with this reſolution of his, but durſt not ſay a word and ſpeak their minds, either for fear, or for courting of him, in hope of preferment; only Q. Fabius being demanded his opinion ſpake to the matter in queſtion to this effect.

The Oration of Q. Fabius.

" Right honourable and my LL. of the Senat, I know ful well, that many of you here aſſembled
" are of this mind & verily perſwaded, That we are ſet this day to no purpoſe, but even to conſult
" & debate of a matter clearly determined; & that in vain he ſhall ſpend words, who ſhall deliver
" his advice of the Province of Affrick as of a point as yet doubtful & not reſolved upon already.
" For mine own part, firſt I cannot conceive neither will it enter into my head, how Affrick can N
" poſſibly now be accounted as a Province & aſſigned certainly unto your Coſ. (let him be a man
" right hardy, & of as much valour as may be) conſidering that neither the Senat unto this day hath
" judged it, nor the people ordained & aſſigned it to any perſon in the nature and name of a Pro" vince. Furthermore, if it were ſo indeed without all peradventure: then in my judgment the " Coſ. hath done amiſs, who in making ſembiance to put a matter for to be debated, which is al" ready agreed upon, hath deluded and mocked the whole Senat, and not the Senator, who in his " courſe delivereth his opinion of the thing in queſtion. But I am aſſured, that in gainſaying and " croſſing this haſty voyage into Affrick, I ſhall incur the ſiniſter opinion & ſurmiſe of two things:
" the one is of my uſual lingring and ſlow proceeding in all mine actions (a courſe that naturally I " am given unto) which young men may term at their pleaſure, timorouſneſs and lazineſs; but ſo O
" long as I have no cauſe to repent therfore, I paſs the leſs. For ſurely hitherto the advices of others " have ever at the firſt ſight made a goodlier ſhew, and ſeemed more honourable; but by experi" ence, mine own waies have ſped better, and been found in the end more effectual. The other is,
" of backbiting, detraction, and envying at the glory and reputation of the Coſ. a man of ſingular " proweſs (I muſt confeſs) & whom I ſee to grow from day to day in greatneſs and honour. From " which jealouſie and ſuſpition, if neither my life paſſed and the carriage of my ſelf; if neither my

" Dictator-

A "Dictatorship with five Conſulſhips, nor ſo much glory which I have acquired as well in mana"ging the affairs of war abroad, as of civill policy at home (that a man would think I ſhould ra"ther be glutted therewith than deſire any more) be able to clear and aſſoil me; yet my years at
"leaſtwiſe may free me very well. For what concurrence and emulation can there be between me "and him, who is not of equall age with my very ſon? When I was Dictator, in the vigour and "flower of my ſtrength, in the very courſe and train of my greateſt and braveſt exploits, no man
"either in Senat or in the aſſembly of the people, heard me to refuſe and deny, That my own Ge"neral of Cavalry, who could not afford me a good word, but ever railed at me (a thing that was "never heard before) ſhould be made equall with my ſelf in command and government. And yet B "by good deeds rather than by fair words, I effected and gained thus much in the end, that he,
"who in the judgment of others was matched with me and made my fellow, confeſſed within a "while himſelf to be my inferior. Leſs reaſon have I then now, after I have gone through all de"grees of honors and dignities, to enter into contention & emulation with a young gentleman,
"of all others at this day moſt flouriſhing in the eyes of the world: unleſs forſooth it be a likely
"matter that I (a man weary not only of managing affairs, but alſo of this world, and of this life)
"ſhould look to have the Province of Affrick offered unto me, if it were once denied him. Nay
"verily, I have enough already: in that glory I am content to live and die, and ſeek for no more.
"It was ſufficient for me to hinder Annibal from atchieving the victory; to the end that by you,
"who now are gallants in the beſt of your ſtrength, he might be vanquiſhed & overcome. Meet it C "is then and great reaſon O P. Cornelius, that you ſhould bear with me and hold me excuſed, if I,
"who never in regard of mine own ſelf ſet greater ſtore by the fame and opinion of people, than
"of the good of the Common-weal) prefer not now your glory before the weal-publike. And yet
"I will not ſay, but in caſe there were no war at all in Italy; or the enemy of that quality as by con"quering of whom there were no credit & honour to be gotten: then he that would ſeek to keep "you ſtill in Italy, were it never ſo much for the good of the State, might ſeem to go about to dil-
"appoint and fruſtrate you (in putting you by the charge of the war) of the very means and mat"ter of your glory and renown. But ſeeing that Annibal is your object, ſeeing he is our enemy,
"who with an entire army ſtill holdeth Italy as it were beſieged now theſe fourteen years; will you
"not O P. Cornel. hold your ſelf well contented with this honour and reputation. That you being D "Conſul, ſhould drive that enemy out of Italy, who hath been the cauſe of the death of ſo many "brave men of ours, and of ſo many foils and overthrows that we have received; that, like as C.
"Luctatius had the name of finiſhing the former Punick war, ſo you may win the title of ending
"this other alſo. Unleſs that a man would ſay that Amilcar was a warrior and Captain worthy to "be preferred before Annibal; or that war of more importance than this; or that victory greater
"and more honorable than this is like to be, in caſe it happen that we may be conquerours under "your conduct and whiles you are Conſul. Whether would you chuſe rather to have drawn A"milcar away from Drepanum & the mountain of Eryx, than chaſed and hunted the Carthagini"ans and Annibal out of Italy? Nay ſurely, even your own ſelf (howſoever you embrace glory al"ready won than hoped for hereafter) would not take more joy & contentment, and triumph ra-E "ther for freeing and delivering of Spain than Italy from the wars. Annibal, I wot, as yet is not "come to that low ebb nor ſo down the wind, but that he which made choice of another war, "may ſeem well in ſo doing to ſtand as much in fear and dread, as in contempt of him. Why then
"addreſs you not your ſelf to effect this impreſs, and leave building theſe Caſtles in the air, and "hope by fetching theſe reaches and this compaſs, & going the longeſt way about, that when you
"are paſſed over into Affrick, Annibal will follow you thither; and not rather go the next way
"to work, and fight with Annibal where he is, and make no more ado? Are you willing indeed "and deſirous to win this honour of diſpatching quite the Punick war? Why, it is the courſe of "nature to defend and make ſure your own before you go in hand to aſſail the dominions of o"thers. Let us have peace firſt in Italy before we make war in Affrick: and let us firſt rid our ſelves "of fear ere ever we take occaſion to put others in fear; unleſs we had ſome greater quarrel. And F "if by your conduct and fortunate government, both theſe may poſſibly be effected; conquer
"Annibal here, and then go thither to aſſail Carthage a Gods name. But if the one or the other of "theſe victories muſt needs be left for new Conſuls to atchieve: as the former of the twain will "be the greater and more memorable, ſo it will open the way, and give the overture unto the o"ther enſuing upon it. For at this time, over and beſides that our treaſure and all the revenues and "finances of our ſtate, are not able to maintain and wage two ſundry armies both in Italy and in "Affrick: beſides, I ſay, that we want the means to keep two Armados afloat, and have nothing "left ſufficient wherewith to furniſh them with victuals and munition: who ſeeth not I pray
"you how far we engage our ſelves in peril and danger by this enterpriſe? P. Licinius ſhall war in "Italy and P. Scipio in Affrick. What will ye ſay if Annibal, (which God forbid, & my heart even "dreadeth to preſage, but that which once hath hapned may happen full wel again) upon the train G "of ſome new victory, fortune to go forward and aſſault the City of Rome? Where are we then?
"Shall we have time then to ſend for you our Coſ. out of Affrick, as we did for Q. Fulv. from Ca-
"pu? And what ſay you to this beſides, That the fortune of war is doubtfull & uncertain even in "Affrick, as well as in other places? Call to mind, and learn betimes by the examples of your own
"houſe and family, by your father and uncle; who within 30 daies were ſlain, & their armies de"feated: even there, where for certain years ſpace they had performed both by ſea and land moſt

"noble exploits: and highly renowned among forrain nations both the Roman people, and also H "your own name & family. The time will not serve, if I would do all this day do nothing else but "reckon and recount unto you, how many Kings, Emperors & General Captains there have been,
"who have entred rashly into their enemies countries, and received many foyls and overthrows
"thereby, as wel in their own persons, as in their whole armies. The Athenians, a most prudent &
"politick State, having left the war at home in their own country, and following the counsel and *He meaneth Alcibiades. "suggestion of one * young man, as hardy & valiant in arms, as noble in birth & parentage as your "self (none dispraised) sailed into Sicily with a brave and puissant navy; and there in one battell
"fought at sea, overturned and ruinated for ever their most flourishing City & Common-weal.
"But why seek I forrain examples of strangers, and stories of times too far past, and over-long ago.
"Let even this same Affrick, and M. Attilius, serve as a notable example of both fortunes, for our I "instruction & learning for ever. Now surely, P. Cornel, when you shal once discover Affrick with-
"in your view from the sea, you wil think then that your Provinces of Spain were matters of sport "in comparison of it. For what semblable proportion is there between them? When you were in "your voyage for Spain, you sailed in the calm sea peaceably along the coast of Italy and France,
"and arrived at Emporia, a friend City and Confederat: and when you had landed your men, you
"led them in security through all places to the friends and allies of the people of Rome, even as far "Tarracon. From thence ye journeyed all the waies by Cities and towns, furnished with Roman "garrisons. About the river Iberus you found the armies of your father and uncle, which remained
"upon the loss of their Generals more fierce and fell for the calamity that they had received than "before. You met there L. Martius their Captain and Leader, chosen (I must needs say) I know K
"not how in a hurrey by the souldiers themselves for the time: but otherwise I assure you, if no"bility of birth and the titles of dignities which he justly deserved had graced him, he was in all
"feats of arms and martiall knowledge, comparable to the very best warriors & noblest Captains.
"After this you assaulted Carthage without any empeachment, and took your time at your own "pleasure, even when there was not one of the three Carthaginian armies to aid & defend their "associats. As for all the exploits besides (without offence be it spoken & not to debase any good "service there) they are in no respect to be compared with the African war: where we shal find
"no haven open to entertain our Armado, no Country peaceable, no City confederate, no King "friendly, no place at all either to sojourn and rest in, or to march forward and pass through with "safety. Which way soever you cast your eyes, nothing but hostility threatning danger and perill L "unto us. Do you indeed trust Syphax, or rely upon the Numidians? Well, let it suffice that once "ye trusted them. Rash adventures speed not alwaies best. And oftentimes we see, that fraud see"meth faithfull, and maketh way of credit in small things, that in matters of greatest importance,
"and when the time serveth it may pay home and work a mischief with a witness. The enemies
"overcame not your father and uncle by force of arms before that the Celtiberians our Allies
"over-raught them by falshood and treachery: neither were your self in so much danger from "Mago and Asdrubal the chief Captains of your enemies, as from Indibilis and Mandonius, your "new friends and confederates. Can you repose any confidence in the Numidians? You, I say that "have experience of your own souldiers mutiny, and have seen them rise against you: As for Sy-
"phax and Masanissa, as they had rather themselves be the soveraign & most mighty in Affrick, M
"than the Carthaginians should; so surely they wish the Carthaginians to be the highest above "all others besides their own selves. Now at this time there is some emulation and heart-burning "among them, and all occasions of quarrell whet them on to maintain sides and factions, so long "as fear of forrain enemy is far enough off. Shew them once the Roman arms and forces, let "them see an host of strangers once, they will run I warrant you altogether then, as it were to "quench a common scarefire. You shall find that the very same Carthaginians will far otherwise "stand to the defence of the wals of their Country, their Cities, the Temples of their gods, their "Altars and private houses when going to battell they shall have their fearful wives to bear them
"company, their small children to go afore them in their eye; you shall find them, I say, stick bet"ter to it than they did in the quarrell and defence of Spain. But what and if the Carthaginians, N
"finding themselves strong enough upon the confidence of the generall concord of Affrick, of
"the fast fidelity of the confederate Kings, of the strength of their own wals, should fortune "themselves, when they shall see Italy destitute of your help, and disfurnished of their forces, ei"ther to make out a fresh army from Affrick and send it into Italy, or else give order and directi"on to Mago (who as it is well known for certain, is departed with his navy from the Balear "Islands, and lyeth floating and riding continually upon the Alpine Ligurians) for to joyn his "power with Annibal: It is a clear case, that we shall be in as great trouble, and as much affrigh-
"ted then as we were of late, when Asdrubal monnted over the Alpes, and came down into "Italy. Asdrubal, I say, whom you (that will with your army compass not only Carthage, but also "all Affrick) let go out of your hands, and suffered to pass over into Italy. But you will say, that O
"you have vanquished him. Say you so? I would not for any thing, not only in regard of the love
"I beare to the Common-weal, but also of the affection that I carry toward your self, that a van"quished man could find the way by you into Italy. Be content & suffer us to attribute all things "that have gone well with you or the Common-weal, during the time of your government, to
"your wisdom and policy; and contrariwise, whatsoever hath fallen out crosse and adverse, to im-"pute and assign the same to nothing else, but to the variable events of war, and to fickle fortune.

The

A under their hand: & decreed it was that they two, namely, L. Veturius & Q. Cæcilius, ſh ould either
" The better and more valiant that you are, the more need hath your native country, yea, and all
" Italy beſides, to keep you ſtill at home with them, ſo brave a captain, o rare a Protector. You
" annot your own ſelf diſſemble the matter, but confeſſe, That whereſoever Annibal is, there is " the very head, the fort & ſtrength of all this war; for as much as you pretend, that the only cauſe
" why you would paſſe into Africk, is to draw Annibal thither after you. Well then, be it here or
" be it there, with Annibal you muſt have to deal. Tell me then, whether are you like to be ſtronger
" Afric, your ſelf alone, or here where your own forces and the power of your Colleague ſhal be " joyned together? Is it poſſible that even the late example of Livius and Claudius, ſo freſh in " memory, ſhould not inform and teach us, what difference there is between the one and the o-B " ther? In whither place I pray you, will Annibal be more ſtrong in men and munition; here in the " utmoſt corner & angle of the Brutians country, where this long time he hath waited in vain for " aid from home; where he hath ſent for ſuccour and gone without; or neer unto Carthage, and in " the mids of Africk among his friends and allies? What kind of policy is this of yours, there to de" cide the quarell and try the whole matter, where your own forces are leſſe by a halfe moity, and
" the power of your enemies much greater and ſtronger; rather then here, whereas you may " fight with the power of two armies againſt one, toiled out of heart in ſo many b ttels, and wex-
" ried with long warfare, ſo tedious and grievous withall? Conſider with your ſelfe, what confor" mity and reſemblance there is, between your deſignes and your fathers. He, as Conſul having " made a jorney into Spain, to the end that he might encounter Annibal as he come down the Alps,
" returned out of his own province into Italy: and you, when Annibal is in Italy, purpoſe to a-C " bandon and leave Italy. And why? forſooth not becauſe you judg it good for the common-weal,
" but becauſe you think it an enterpriſe that may import you in great honour and glory: like as
" when you being captain Generall of the people of Rome, left your province at random and your " army at ſix and ſeven, without warrant of law, without order or act of Senat, hazarded in two " bothoms the whole ſtate and majeſty of the Empire of Rome; which at that time together with " the danger of your life, incurred the perill and jeopardy of the maine chance. To conclude, for " mine own part (my LL. of the Senat,) am of this mind, and this is my conceit, that P. Cornelius
" was not created Coſ. privatly for himſelf and his own behoof, but for the good of the common-
" weal and us all: and then the armies were levied and enrolled, for the guard of the City and de" fence of Italy; and not for the Coſſ. in their proud ſelf-conceit & overweening of themſelves.
D " after the manner of abſolute KK. to tranſport & lead into what parts of the world they liſt themſelves. When Fabius by this oration (premeditate and framed to the time) had through his authority land the long ſettled and comfirmed opinion that men had of his wiſedome, drawn unto his ſide a good part of the Senat and eſpecially the ancients; inſomuch as the greater number commended and the grave counſell of the old man, above the luſty and youthfull courage of the other gallant:
then Scipio by way of anſwer made theſe remonſtrances, and ſpake in this wiſe. "My lords of the
" Senat, even Fabius himſelf in the beginning of his oration, ſaid very well, that his opinion which " he was to deliver, might be ſuſpected of detraction and envy. Of which note, verily I dnrſt not " my ſelf tax and accuſe a man of his quality and reputation ſo much, as me thinks is not ſo well E " cleered as it ought to be the very ſuſpition it ſelf: and I wot not whether it be by a default of his " ſpeech & oration, or that the thing it ſelf is ſo pregnant. For in ſuch maner he extolled with good-
" ly words, and magnified his own dignities and renowned deeds, and all to quench the jealouſie
" and crim e of envy: as if my ſelf was to fear the danger of emulation and concurrence of ſome
" companion of the baſeſt degree and condition, and not of him; who becauſe he far ſurpaſſeth other " men, (which hight and pitch of honor I deny not, but I endeavour my ſelf to reach unto) would " not in any hand, that I ſhould compare with him. So highly hath he advanced himſelf in regard
" of his old years, c nſidering that he hath gone through all ranks and honour: and ſo low debaſed
" me, and put me down even under the age of his own ſon; as though the deſire and love of glory, " ſhould paſſe no farther then the length of mans life, and the greateſt part there of extended not F " to the memory of poſterity and the future time. This I hold for certain, that it is a thing inci" dent to the moſt magnanimous men and of greateſt ſpirit and courage, to have a deſire for to " match themſelves not only with them that live in their daies, but with moſt famous & excellent " perſonages, that ever were or might be in any age. And ſurely for mine own part, O Q. Fabius,
" I will not make it goodly, but frankly be wray my mind that way, namely, that I would full fain
" not only attain unto your praiſe-worthy acts and commendable vertues; but alſo (with your good " leave be it ſpoken) if poſſible I can, even to excell and ſurmount the ſame. Therfore let us not ca" ry this mind, either you towards me, or I to thoſe that are yonger then my ſelf, to be unwilling
" and think much, that any one citizen among us, ſhould prove equall to our ſelves: for in ſo do" ing, we ſhould offer wrong and do hurt not only to them whom we have envied and maligned, but alſo prejudice the common-wealth, & in maner the whole ſtate of all mankind. And thus much J " to your ſelf. He hath now (my lords) recounted, to what great perils I ſhould enter into by the A-" frick voyage: in ſuch ſort, as he would ſeem not only to have a carefull regard of the common" wealth and the army, but alſo to pity me and tender my caſe and fortune. Whence cometh, it that " you ſhould all on a ſuddain take ſo great c are for me? when my father and uncle both were ſlain,
" when their armies both twain, were utterly almoſt defeated and put all to the ſword; when " Spain was loſt; when 4 armies of Carthaginians, and 4 Generals, held all in fear by force of " armes; when there was a captain ſought for to undertake that war, and no man durſt be ſeen to " put himself forward, no man so hardy as to present and offer his service, but my self; and when H

" the people of Rome had commited the charge and government of Spain to me a young man
"but four and twenty years old: how hapned it that no man then took exception at my age, made
" mention of the enemies force, discoursed of the difficulty and danger of the war, or laid abroad
" the late and fresh defeat and death of my father and uncle? I would demand and glady know " whether we have susteined now lately, some greater calamity and losse in Africk than we re" ceived at that time in Spain? or if the armies at this present in Africk be more puissant, or the " captains more in number, or better in valour, then they were in Spain at that time? or whe" ther mine age then, was more ripe and sufficient to manage wars, then now it is? Last of all,
" whether it be better, more commodious & easie, to maintain war with the Carthaginian enemy
"in Spain, then in Africk? After that I have discomfited and put to flight four hosts of Cartha- I
" ginians; after I have either forced by assault, or reduced under mine obeisance (for fear) so ma" ny Cities; after I have vanquished and subdued all, even as far as to the Ocean sea, so many "princes and potentates, so many fierce and cruel nations; after I have so fully recovered Spain as " there is not remaining to be seen there so much as the footing and bare token of any war: an " easie matter it is, and all one to elevat and depresse the acts past that I have atchieved: as also
" par-die it will be, when I return with conquest out of Africk, to debase and make nothing of " those very things, which now to keep me back from thence, and to make them appear strange,
" are amplified with great words, & stretched upon the tainters to the full. He holdeth that there " is no accesse, no entrance into Africk, nor havens open to receive an armado. He telleth us and " alledgeth that M. Atilius was taken prisoner in Africk: as if M. Atilius forsooth at his first atri- K
" vall in Africk, had caught that harm and heavy misfortune. But he never remembreth and cal-
" leth to mind, how that even the very same captain, as infortunat as he was, yet found the baies
" open enough into Affrick: and the first year bare himself right valiantly and victoriously; & for
" mut from Carthaginian captains, continued invincible to the end. You shall never therefore " scare me with the example so much, (were it so, that the calamity you speak of, hapned in this " war, and not in the former; of late, and not forty years ago) that I should give over my intend" ed purpose and not sail into Africk now, because Regulus there was taken prisoner: as well as " I passed before into Spain, whereas the Scipios chanced to be killed. Or that I shall suffer that " Xanthippus the Lacedemonian was born into this world more hapy for Carthage, then my " self for Italy: but rather that thereby I should think the better of my self, considering that the L
" vertue of one only man can be of such consequence and to great effect. But we ought (you say)
" to consider the example of the Athenians, who leaving the war at home in their own country,
" passed over into Sicily unadvisedly. Seeing you are at so good leasure to tell tales and report
" true fabulous stories of Greece; why discourse you not rather of Agathocles the king of the Syra-
" sians? who seeing that Sicily a long time was troubled & vexed with the Punick war, sailed over
" into the self same Africk whereof we speak, and withdrew the war thither from whence it " came? But what need I to instruct and teach you by rehearsing old and forrain examples how
" materiall a thing it is and important to begin with an enemy first and put him in fear; and by " bringing another in danger, to remove the peril from our selves. Can there be a president found " more pregnant more present and fresh in memory to prove and enforce this point, then Anni- M
" bal himself? A great difference there is between the wasting and pilling the lands of others and " seeing of our own burnt and destroied. And he which giveth the assault to endanger another,
" is ever of more courage then he that standeth upon his own guard ard at defence only to save " himself. Moreover, the fear and dread is alwaies greater of things unknown unto us: but so " soon as a man is entred into the confines of a forrain country he may behold and see at hand (as " well the good as the bad) what may advantage and what may endamage the enemies. Annibal
" would never have thought and hoped, that so many States in Italy would have revolted unto " him as they did upon the overthrow at Canna. How much lesse account then may the Cartha" ginians make of any thing in Africk, to remain fast and assured unto them; who are fickle al- N
" lies to strangers without all truth and fidelity; proud lords & intollerable tyrants over their " own subjects, full of wrath & cruelty? Over and besides, we albeit (we were forsaken and aban" doned of all our confederats) stood alwaies upon our own forces, & maintained our selves with
" meer Roman souldiers; whereas in Carthage they have no strength of naturall citizens: the " souldiers that they have, are mercenaries all & waged for money partly Africans and partly Nu-
" midians, the most unconstant nations of all others by nature, and aptest to entertain changes & " innovations. Let me have no stay and hindrance in this place only; ye shall hear news at one " time that I am set over in Africk, that all the country there is up in a broil: that Annibal is rea" dy to dislodg and remove out of these parts: & also that Carthage it self is besieged. Expect you
" daily out of Africk better and luckier tidings, yea and oftner then ye heard out of Spain. These O
" hopes of mine, I ground upon the fortune of the people of Rome; upon the justice of the gods
" witnesses of the league broken by the enemies upon Syphax and Masanissa, both Kings, whose " truth and fidelity I will trust so far forth as I find them, and ever stand in fear and doubt of their
" falshood and trechery. Many things they are now, that by distance of place appear not, which " war once begun will soon discover. And this is a special point of a man indeed, & of a good cap" tain, in no case to be wanting unto fortune when she offereth her self, but to take all vantages
" that she giveth: and those acordents and occurrences which fall by chance to make use of them yea,

A "yea and by wisdome and counsell to frame them to his own purpose and designes. True
"it is, O Fabius, I shall have Annibal to beard and to match me; a souldier, I confesse, as "good every way as my self, but I will rather draw him after me, than he shall keep me back
"at home. Force him I will to fight in his own country, and Carthage shall be the price of my vi"ctory, rather then the decaied peeces, and half ruinat pety castles of the Brutii. Only provide, O
"Q. Fabius, that in the mean time whiles I am at sea in my voyage, whiles I am landing mine ar"my in Africk, whiles I approach Carthage with a running camp, the Common-weal sustein no "harm and damage here at home. See to this, I say, and be well advised, that it be not a shame-
"full reproach to say, that P. Licinius the Consul, a man of singular valour (who because he is the "high Priest, and by vertue therof, not to absent himself from the solemn celebration of sacrifices B "and divine service, was content and willing, that the charge of so distant a province should "not befall unto him by casting lots) is not able to perform that, now when Annibal is half defeated, and his heart almost broken, which your self was sufficient to effect when Annibal squar-
"red it out, and braved all Italy like a conqueror. But set the case, and suppose I say, that by this "course which I mean to take, the war be never the sooner brought to an end: yet surely it
"were for the honour of the people of Rome, and for the reputation and name which they have
"among forrain princes and States abroad, that they may see and know, that our hearts serve us "not only to defend Italy, but also to offend Africk. And that it might neither be thought and be-"leeved, nor spoken and noised abroad in the world, how no Roman captain durst adventure that "which Annibal hath already dared and done: and when as in the former Punick war, when all C "the quarell was for Sicily, our armies and armados so often assailed Africk: now that Italy is in "question Africk should lie still, and be at rest. Nay, rather let Italy be at repose and quier now
"at last, after so long travell and affliction and let Africk in her turn be fired and forraged ano"ther while. Let the Roman camp be pitched rather under the very wals and gates of Carthage,
"then we see once again from our wals the trench and rampier of our enemies, to invest our Ci"ty. Let Africk be the set place and feat of the war, let fright and flight, forraging and harrying
"of countries, revolt and rebellion of allies, and all other inconveniences and enormities that "follow war, which have lien heavy upon us these 14 years, turn from us thither. It shall content "and suffice me to have spoken as touching State-matters & the commonweal of the war present"ly in hand; and concerning the provinces and their government now in question and consultration. For it would require a long and tedious discourse, and the same impertinent altogether un-D "to you, as if Q. Fabius hath defaced and depraved mine acts in Spain, so I likewise should dis"grace him and diminish his glory, and set out my self and mine own reputation with goodly
"and magnificall words. But my LL. I will do neither one nor the other. And if in nothing else,
"yet at leastwise, yong man as I am, I will in modesty and government of my tongue, go beyond "him as old and ancient a personage as he is. Thus have I lived, and thus have I carried my self in "all mine actions, that without blazing of mine own praises, I can soon content my self with
"that good opinion which you of your selves have conceived and entertained of me.

Scipio had audience given him, with lesse indifference, and patience because it was commonly voiced abroad, That if the Senat would not grant him to have the province and empresse of Africk, he would immediatly propound and put it to question before the people. Whereupon Q.
E Fulvius, a man that had been four times Consul and Censor besides, required the Consul to speak his mind openly before the Senat, whether he would referr unto the LL. there assembled, to determine of the provinces, and stand to that which they should set down, or prefer the thing unto the people. When Scipio had made answer again and said, That he would do that which might be good and expedient for the service of the Common-weal: then Fulvius replied upon him and said: I demand not this question of you, as ignorant what either you would answer, or what you meant to do. For I know full well, that ye pretend no less your self, that you do but sound the Senat, and feel rather how they had enclined, then to stand to any advice of theirs in good sadness. And in case we do not presently grant you the province according unto your desire, you have a bill framed already to present unto the body of the people and Commonalty.
F And therfore (qd. he) my masters, ye that are Tribunes, I require your aid and assistance, in that I forbeat to speak unto the point and deliver mine opinion; in this regard, because I know that the Cos. will not approve and ratifie the same, howsoever the whole house will go with me, and allow my sentence. Hereupon arose some braul & debate amoug them, whiles the Cos. urged and enforced this point especially, and said, It was against all reason and equity, that the Tribuns should enterpose their authority, and not permit every Senator being requested to speak in his turn, for to deliver his mind and opinion. Then the Tribuns made a decree in this maner, if the Cos. be content that the Senat shall determine of the Provinces, we will and command, that all men rest in that which the Senat that ordein and judg: neither will we suffer the same to be propounded unto the people: if he be not content nor yeeld therto, then we will assist him who G shall refuse to speak to the matter. Then the Cos. requested a daies respit to confer with his Collegue, and so the morrow after he condescended to put all to the censure of the Senat. And in this wise were the provinces distributed and appointed: unto one of the Coss. Sicily was assigned, and thirty ships of war, with brazen beak heads (even the same that C. Servilius the year before had the charge of) with commission also to passe over in Africk, if he thought it were for the good of the Common-wealth. The other Consul had the government of the Brutii and the managing of the war against Annibal, with the power of that army which L. Veturius and Q. Cacilius had

caſt lots, agree between themſelves who ſhould remain ſtill in the Brutians country to follow H the wars there with thoſe two legions which the Conſul left; and that whether of them chanced to have that province his government ſhould be prorogued and continued for another yeer. The reſt of the Pretors alſo and Conſuls, who were to govern any province, or have the conduct of armies, had their commiſſion renewed and ſealed again for a longer term. Now it fell to Q. Cæcilius his lot, to make war together with the Conſul againſt Annibal in the Brutians country.

After this, enſued the games and plaies of Scipio; which were exibited and ſet forth, with great concourſe of people and exceeding applauſe and affectionat favour of the beholders. M. Pomponius Matho, and Q. Catulus were ſent as Embaſſadors unto Delphos, to carry thither an offring and ſtately gift of the booty and pillage of Aſdrubal: who preſented there a crown of gold weighing two hundred pound: alſo certain counterfets retembling the ſpoils, which were I made of ſilver, amounting to a thouſand pound weight. Scipio when he could not get leave granted to levy ſouldiers and take muſters which he greatly forced not of, obteined thus much yet, that he might have with him in his train voluntary ſouldiers: as alſo receive whatſoever the Allies would contribute and give towards the building of new ſhips, becauſe he had paſſed his word, that the City ſhould not be charged with ſetting out an armado. And firſt and formoſt, the States of Hetruria promiſed to help the Conſul, every one according to their ability. The Cærites came off, and granted to purvey corn and all kinds of victuals for the mariners and ſailers, the Populonians to provide iron the Tarquinians to find ſail-cloths, the Volaterrans to ſend all tacklings and furniture belonging to ſhips, and alſo corn: the Aretines to conſer 30 000 targets, as many morions or head-peeces, beſides javellins darts, faulchions, lances, and pikes, to the full K number of fifty thouſand, as many of the one ſort as of the other. alſo axes, ſpades and mattocks bils, ſithes, and hooks, and ſickles, meal, troughs and quern mils, as many as would ſerve to furniſh forty long ſhips or gallies: of wheat 120000 Modii, and all voyage proviſion for the Decurions, pety captains, Mariners and Ore-men by the way. The Perufines, the Clusines, the Ruſellans offred fir trees for the framing and making of ſhips, and a great quantity of corn. But for this work, he occupied only the fir hewn out of the publick foreſt and waſts. All the States of Vmbria, the Nurſines alſo, the Reatines Amiternines and the whole country of the Sabines, made promiſe to help him to ſouldiers: the Marſi, the peligni, and Marricines, in great number came of their own free wils, and were enrolled to ſerve at ſea in the navy. The Camertes, being allies and confederat to the Romans, but not tied to any ſervice, ſent a brave company of L hundred men well armed. And when as there were ſet out the keels or bottoms of thirty ſhips, twenty Caravels of five courſe of oars, and ten of four; himſelf in perſon plied the carpenters and ſhipwrights ſo, and ſet forward the work that 45 daies after the timber was brought out of the wood, theſhips were finiſhed, rigged, and furniſhed with all things, and ſhot into the water. So to Sicily he ſailed with thirty long ſhips of war having embarked therein almoſt ſeven thouſand of voluntary ſervitors. P. Licinius alſo for his part, came into the Brutians country unto the two conſultarie armies, of which he took unto him and choſe that which L. Veturius the Conſul had commanded, and ſuffered Metellus to have the leading ſtill of thoſe legions, which had been under his conduct before: ſuppoſing that he ſhould more eaſily employ them in ſervice becauſe they were acquainted already with his manner of regiment and governance. The Pretors M likewiſe went into their ſundry provinces. And becauſe mony was wanting for to deſray the charges of the wars, the high Treaſurers were commanded to make ſale of all that tract of the Campane country, which from the Greek Foſſe extendeth towards the ſea. And there was granted out a commiſſion to give notice of thoſe lands: and look what ground ſoever belonged to any citizen of Capua, it was confiſcat to the uſe of the people of Rome: and for a reward to him that gave notice, there was aſſigned the tenth part of the mony, that the land was rated and prized at. Alſo C. Servilius the City Pretor, had given him in charge to take order that the Campanes ſhould dwel where as they were allowed to inhabit by vertue of a decree granted forth by the Senat, and to puniſh thoſe that dwelt elſewhere.

In the ſame ſummer Mago the ſon of Amilcar, being departed from the leſſe Baleare Iſlands, N where he abode the winter ſeaſon, and embarked a choſen power of young and luſty men, ſailed over into Italy with a fleet of thirty ſhips headed with brazen piked beaks, and many hulks of burden: and there he ſet aland his ſouldiers, to the number of twelve thouſand footmen and welneer two thouſand horſe: and with his ſuddain coming ſurpriſed Genua, by reaſon that there lay no garriſons in thoſe parts to guard and defend the ſea coaſts. From thence he ſailed along and arrived in the river of the Alpine Ligurians, to ſee if he could by his coming raiſe ſome commotion and rebellion. The * Ingauni (a people of the Ligurians) fortuned to war at that preſent with certain mountainers the Epanterii. Whereupon Mago having laid up and beſtowed ſafe of the prizes and pillage that when he won in * Savo, (a town upon the Alpes) and left ten ſhips all O war riding in the river, for a ſufficient guard, and ſent away the reſt to Carthage for to keep the coaſts at home (becauſe there ran a mighty rumor, that Scipio would paſs the ſeas, and over into Africk himſelf, after he had concluded a league and amity with the Ingauni (whoſe favour he more affected and eſteemed then the other) ſet in hand to aſſail the mountainers. Beſides, his power increaſed daily: for that the Frenchmen flocked unto him in all parts, upon noiſe and voyce of his name. Intelligence hereof was given to the Senat by the letters of Sp. Lucretius who were with theſe news exceedingly troubled and perplexed, for fear leſt they had rejoyced in

A vain for the death of Asdrubal, and the defeat of his army two years before; in case there should arise from thence another war as great and dangerous as the other, differing in nothing else but the exchange of the General. And therefore they gave order and direction both to M. Livius the Pro-Consul, to come forward with his army of Voluntaries out of Tuscany into Ariminum: and also unto Cn. Servilius the City Prætor, (if he thought requisite and expedient for the Commonwealth) to commit the two legions of Citizens attending about Rome, to whomsoever he pleased, for to be commanded, and led forth of the City. So M. Valerius Lævinus conducted those legions to Aretium.

About the same time, certain hulks of the Carthaginians, to the number of fourscore, were B boorded and taken about Sardinia, by Cn. Octavius, governor of that province. Calius writeth, that they were loaden with corn and victuals sent unto Annibal. But Valerius reporteth, that as they were carrying the pillage taken in Hetruria and certain prisoners of the Ligurian mountainers, into Carthage, they were intercepted and surprized by the way. There was no memorable thing that year done in the Brutians country. The pestilence raigned as well amongst the Romans as the Carthaginians, and they died thereof alike on both sides. Many the Carthaginian army, besides the plague, were afflicted also with famine. Annibal passed all that summer time near unto the Temple of Juno Lacinia, where he built and reared an altar, and dedicated it with a glorious title of his worthy acts, engraven in Punick and Greek letters.

CAius Lælius being sent from Scipio out of Sicily into Affrick, brought from thence a huge booty, and declared unto Scipio the credence and message that he had from Masanissa, who complained of him that he had not as yet passed over with his fleet into Affrick. The war in Spain which Indibilis had raised was dispatched: himself slain in the field: and Mandonius was delivered by his own men into the Romans hands that demanded him of them. Mago, who was in France and Liguria, had out of Affrick sent unto him both a great power of souldiers, and also money to wage aids: with a commission and precept to join himself unto Annibal. Scipio crossed the seas from Syracuse into the Brutil, and recovered the City Locri, after he had discomfited the garrison there, and put to flight Annibal. Peace was concluded with Philip. The goddess Dame Idæa was brought solemnly to Rome from Pessinus, by occasion of a pro-

Scipio Nasica, the son of that Cneus who was killed in Spain, judged by the Senat a right good man, one that was very young, and had not been yet so much as Questor, was he that received her: for it was by the Oracle imported, that the said goddess should be received by the best man of the City, and so dedicated. The Locrians sent their Embassadors to Rome, to complain of the outrage and cruelty of Q. Pleminius the Lieutenant: in that he had unjustly taken away the money consecrated to Proserpina, and villanously forced their wives and children. Pleminius was brought bound with chains to Rome, and there died in prison. And when he had oftentimes fought to recover it again by war, he was in certain battels vanquished by Syphax *King of the Numidians, and utterly deprived of his royall dignity. # The nine and twentieth book of T. Livius.

SCipio after he was arrived in Sicily, diſpoſed his voluntary ſouldiers in order, and entrolled them by Centuries. Over and beſides them he had about him three hundred luſty tall fellows, for the flower of their age and ſtrength of body, the braveſt men of all others: but they wiſt not themſelves for what purpoſe they were reſerved; being neither aſſigned to any colours under a Captain, nor ſo much as armed at all. Then he made choice from out of the whole manhood and youth of Sicily three hundred men of arms, ſuch as for birth and wealth were the very principall and beſt in the Iſland, who were to paſs over with him into into Affrick: and he appointed them a day, upon which they ſhould all preſent themſelves in readineſs, furniſhed and appointed in the beſt manner with horſe and armor. This warfare ſo far from home was like to be irkſome unto them, and to bring with it much trouble, many difficulties and dangers, as well by ſea as land. The conſideration and fear hereof mightily diſquieted not only the parties themſelves, but alſo their parents and kinsfolk. Now when the day appointed was come, they ſhewed their horſes and armour. Then Scipio made a ſpeech unto them, and ſaid, "That he was given to "underſtand, that certain Sicilian horſemen ſtood in great fear and dread of this ſouldiery as I "being a ſore and painfull piece of ſervice: In caſe then (quoth he) there be any of you ſo min- "ded and diſpoſed indeed, I had rather you would now preſently be known thereof unto me, and "confeſs at once, then hereafter to whine and complain, and ſo to prove lazy lubbers and un- "profitable ſouldiers to the Common-wealth. And therefore utter your minds in plain terms, "and I will be content to hear you without offence. Whereupon, when as one of them took a good heart, and ſaid flatly, "That if it lay in his choice freely to do what he would, he was alto- "gether unwilling to ſerve: then Scipio anſwered him again in this manner, Forasmuch as (my "youth) thou haſt not diſſembled thy hearts grief, but ſpoken out what thou thinkeſt, I will ſoon "depute one in thy turn unto whom thou maieſt deliver thy armour, thy horſe and other furni- "ture of warfare, and whom thou ſhalt forthwith have home with thee, there to train, teach, & K "exerciſe him after thou haſt given him thy horſe and armor. The young man was glad hereof, and accepted the offer upon that condition: and ſo he aſſigned unto him one of thoſe three hundred aboveſaid, whom he kept about himſelf unarmed. When the reſt ſaw that horſeman in this manner diſcharged of his ſervice, and that with the favour and good will of the L. General: every man then began to ſpeak for himſelf, and to make excuſes, and took others in their ſtead. Thus for the three hundred Sicilians were ſubſtituted as many Roman horſemen, without any expences at all of the State. And the Sicilians themſelves had the charge of inſtructing and training them up. For the Generall had made an Edict and Proclamation, That whoſoever did not ſo, ſhould ſerve himſelf in perſon. This proved by report a brave cornet of horſemen above the reſt; and in many battels performed right good ſervice to the Common-weal. After this, he took a ſurvey of the legi- M gions or footmen: and all thoſe who had born arms longeſt in the wars he ſelected forth, eſpecially ſuch as had been employed under the conduct of Marcellus. For thoſe he well wiſt to have been brought under the beſt diſcipline of warfare, and alſo by reaſon of the long ſiege of Syracuſe, to be moſt skilfull in aſſaulting of Cities. For now they were no ſmall matters that he had in his head, but he plotted even the very deſtruction and ruin of great Carthage. After this, he divided his army and placed ſeverall forces in ſundry towns. The Cities of Sicily he enjoyned to provide corns he made ſpare of that which was brought out of Italy; the old ſhips he newly repaired and rigged, and with them he ſent Lelius into Affrick for to prey upon the country and fetch in prizes; the new which rid at Panormus he drew up to land, that they might all winter long lie upon dry ground, and be ſeaſoned, becauſe they were made in haſte of green timber. When he had prepa- N red all things neceſſary for war, he came to the City of Syracuſe, which as yet was not in good order and well quieted, ſince the great troubles of the late wars. For the Greeks made claim for their goods granted unto them by the Senat of Rome, which certain of the Italian nation detained and with-held from them by the ſame violence, wherewith in time of war they had poſſeſſed themſelves thereof. He ſuppoſing it meet and requiſite to maintain above all things, the credit of the State; partly by vertue of an edict and commandment, and partly by a civill courſe and proceſs of law againſt ſuch as were obſtinate and avowed their wrongs done, he forced them to make reſtitution to the Syracuſians. This act of his pleaſed not only them, but alſo all the ſtates of Sicily: and therefore they were more willing and forward to help him in the wars.

The ſame ſummer there aroſe in Spain great troubles, raiſed by the means of Indibilis the Iler- O gete, for no other occaſion or reaſon in the world, but becauſe in regard of the high admiration of Scipio, all other Captains beſides whatſoever were but deſpiſed. "Him they ſuppoſed to be the "only General that the Romans had left, now that all the reſt were ſlain by Annibal. And here- "upon it was (thought they) that when the two Scipios were killed, they had no other to ſend into "Spain but him: and afterwards, when the wars grew hot in Italy, he was the only man ſent for "over to match with Annibal. And over and beſides that, the Romans had now in Spain no Cap-

"tains

A "tains at all, but in bare name and ſhew: the old experienced army alſo was from thence with"drawn. All things are out of frame, and in great confuſion, & none there, but a diſordered ſort of "raw freſh water ſouldiers. And never they looked to have again the like occaſion & opportunity "to recover Spain out of their hands. For hitherto they had ever been in ſubjection to that day,
"either to the Carthaginians or the Romans, and not alwaies to the one or the other, by turns,
"but otherwiles to both at once. And like as the Carthaginians have been driven out by the Ro"mans, ſo may the Romans be expelled by the Spaniards, if they would hold together. So that in "the end Spain being freed from all forrain war, might be reſtored for ever to the ancient cu"ſtomes and rights of the country. With theſe and ſuch like ſuggeſtions and diſcourſes, he ſollicited and raiſed not only his own ſubjects and countrimen, but the Auſetans alſo, a neighbour-na-B tion yea, and other States and Cities that bordered upon his and their confines; ſo as within few daies there aſſembled together into the territory of the Sedetans (according to an Edict publiſhed abroad) thirty thouſand foot, and faſt upon four thouſand horſemen.

The Roman Captains likewiſe for thir part, L. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, left by ne-gleſted of the firſt beginning, the war might grow to a greater head, joyned their forces together, and marching through the country of the Auſetans, as peaceably as if they had been friends, (not-withſtanding they were known enemies) came to the very place where they were encamped and pitched themſelves within three miles of the enemies. At the firſt they aſſaied by way of Embaſſage to deal with them, and to perſwade them to lay aſide all arms and hoſtility: but they laboured in vain. Afterwards, when as the Spaniſh horſemen gave charge ſuddenly upon certain Ro-C mans that were forraging, the Romans alſo ſent out from their Stations and Corps de guard their Cavalry to reſcue: ſo the horſemen skirmiſhed, but no memorable act to ſpeak of was effected on the one ſide or the other. The next morrow by ſun-riſing the enemies all ſhewed themſelves armed and in order of battel, and braved the Romans within a mile of their Camp. The Auſetans were marſhalled in the main battel; the Ilergetes in the right point, and certain other Spaniſh nations of baſe and mean account in the left: between both thoſe wings and the battel of either hand they left certain wide and void places, whereas when the time ſerved they might put forth their horſemen. The Romans having embattelled and put themſelves in array after their old and uſuall manner, yet in this one thing followed the examples of the enemies, in leaving out certain open waies between the legions for the men of arms to paſs through. But Lentulus ſuppoſing that D the uſe of the horſe-ſervice would be advantagious to that part which firſt ſhould ſend out their Cavalry into the battell of the enemies, that lay ſo open with ſpaces between, gave commandment to Ser. Cornelius a Knight Marſhall or Tribune, to will and charge the Cavalry to ſet to with their horſes, and to enter thoſe open lanes between the enemies battaillons. And himſelf having ſped but badly in beginning the fight with footmen ſo raſhly, ſtaid no longer, but untill he had brought the thirteenth legion (which was ſet in the left wing oppoſite to the Ilergetes) out of the rereward into the vanguard, for to ſuccour and ſtrengthen the tweifth legion, which already began to ſhrink and give ground. After that once the skirmiſh there was equall and fought on even hand, he advanced forward to L. Manlius, who in the forefront of the battell was buſie in encouraging his men, and ſending ſupplies and ſuccours into all parts where he ſaw needfull: E ſhewing unto him, that all was well and whole in the left point, and that he had ſent out Cornelius, who with his horſemen, would like a tempeſtuous ſtorm come upon them, and ſoon overcaſt and beſpread the enemies round about. The word was not ſo ſoon ſpoken, but the Roman horſemen were ridden within the thickeſt of the enemies, and not only diſordered the arraies and companies of the footmen, but alſo at once ſhut up the waies and paſſages that the Spaniards could not make out with their horſemen. And therefore the Spaniards leaving to fight on horſe-back, alight on foot. The Roman Generals ſeeing the ranks and files of the enemies diſarrai-ed, themſelves in fright and fear, and their enſigns waving up and down every way; fell to exhorting, yea, to entreating of their own Infantry to recharge them with all their force, whiles they were thus troubled and disbanded, and not ſuffer them to come into order, and re-enforce F the battell again. And ſurely the barbarous people had never been able to abide their violent impreſſion, but that Indibilis himſelf their Prince and Lord, together with the men of arms that were now diſmounted on foot, made head againſt the enſigns of the footmen in the vanguard. Whereupon enſued a ſharp and cruell fight for a good while. At length, when as they that fought about their Prince (who firſt, although he were half dead, yet ſtood their ground and afterwards with a javelin was nailed to the earth) were overwhelmed with darts, and ſlain; then they began to flie on all hands: but the greater number were killed in the place, becauſe both the horſemen had no time nor ſpace to recover their horſes, and mount upon them again and alſo the Romans preſſed ſo hotly upon them after they were once diſcomfited, and never gave over untill they had ſtript the enemies quite out of their Camp. So there died that day thirteen thou-G ſand Spaniards, and well near eight hundred were taken priſoners. Of Romans and Allies, not many more than two hundred left their lives behind them, and thoſe eſpecially in the left point. The Spaniards, that either were driven out of their Camp, or eſcaped out of the battell, firſt ran ſcat-tered and diſperſed over the fields, and afterwards returned every man to his own City where he dwelt.

Then Mandonius ſummoned them to a generall councill: where they all bewailed their calamities & miſeries, greatly blamed the authors of the war, and agreed in the end to ſend their embaſſadors ſadors to give up their arms, and to yield their bodies. Theſe having excuſed themſelves and laid H the whole fault upon Indibilis & the reſt of the Princes who were the ſtirrers of the war, & were for the moſt part ſlain themſelves for their labour in the field, yielded up their armour and themſelves, and received this anſwer from the Romans: That they ſhould be received to mercy, and their ſubmiſſion accepted, if they would deliver alive into their hands Mandonius, and the reſt that were the breakers of peace. Otherwiſe, they threatned to lead their forces into the territories of the Ilergetes and Auſetans and ſo forward, of the other nations their complices in that rebellion.

With this anſwer the Orators departed, and related the ſame in the councill aſſembled. Where Mandonius and the reſt of their Lords were apprehended & delivered to the Romans for to be pu-niſhed and executed accordingly. So the States of Spain obtained peace again: and a double tribute for that year was impoſed upon them, and they enjoyned to provide corn to ſerve the army I ſix months beſides ſouldiers liveries, ſhort coats, and ſide caſſocks: and they received hoſtages welnear of thirty Cities. Thus the troubles and rebellions of Spain being begun and ended after this manner, without any great ado within few daies, all the force of the war turned upon Affrick.

C. Lælius being arrived in the night at Hippo Royall, by the break of the day, led forth with banner diſplaied in order of battel all his ſouldiers and mariners, for to harrey and ſpoil the country.
And finding the inhabitants there retchleſs and careleſs, and living in ſecurity as in time of peace, they did much hurt and annoied them ſore. Whereupon the news went in poſt to Carthage, ſet all on a hurry & put them in exceeding great fear. For it was reported, that the Roman Armado was arrived, and that Scipio the General was landed (for the rumour ran before, how he was paſſed over already into Sicily.) And becauſe they never deſcried the ſhips, nor diſcovered certainly what K power of men invaded and ſpoiled the country, they thought the moſt and doubted the worſt, as fear commonly maketh every thing more than it is. And ſo at firſt they were only affrighted and terrified; but afterwards they grew melancholly and troubled in ſpirit in theſe tearms, to think,
" That fortune ſhould ſo much be changed, that they, who a little before as noble conquerors had " lain encamped with an army before the walls of Rome, defeated ſo many hoſts of enemies, and
" either by meer force or meer love, held all the States of Italy under their Signory, ſhould now
" themſelves ſee the wheel ſo turn about, as they were like ſhortly to behold the waſting and ſpoi-
" ling of Affrick, and the City of Carthage beſieged: a thing that they were never able to en" dure with that valour and reſolution, nor to abide with ſuch ſtrength as the Romans had. For " the Romans had ever the Commons of Rome; they had alwaies the youth of Latium ready at L
" hand; who ſtill encreaſed more and more the new fry, and daily grew in number to make ſup-
" ply, and to repair & furniſh out ſo many armies that were defeated. Whereas, their natural peo" ple were neither in town nor country fit for ſervice, their aids were waged and hired for money
" from among the Affricans, a nation like to turn upon any accident, & to change with every gale
" and puff of vain hope, and were beſides falſe and unfaithful in their promiſe. For now the Kings
" already, Syphax and Maſaniſſa, the one upon conference with Scipio is ſecretly alienated from us
" in heart, and the other openly revolted in action, and become our moſt deadly enemy: ſo that " there remaineth neither help nor hope for us at all in any place. For neither Mago is able in Gaul
" to make any commotions and rebellion, nor yet to joyn with Annibal: And as for Annibal him-
" ſelf, he weareth apace, and decaieth daily both in fame and reputation, and alſo in ſtrength and M " forcible means. When their minds being thus diſquieted upon thoſe freſh and preſent tidings, they were faln to bewail and lament their wofull ſtate, the inſtant danger recalled them again to conſult by what means they might withſtand the imminent perils. So they thought good to take muſters in all haſte both in the City and the countries by, to ſend ſome to levy and wage the aids of the Affricans, to fortifie their City, to bring in ſtore of grain, to provide weapons and armor, to rig their navy & to ſend it out to Hippo, for to encounter the Roman Armado. Whiles they were deviſing theſe courſes, there came at laſt a poſt with news, that it was Lælius and not Scipio who was ſet aſhore; that there was landed no greater power than for to make rodes into the country for booties only: and as for the main ſtrength of the whole army, it remained ſtill in Sicily. So they had ſome reſpit to breath themſelves, & began to addreſs their Embaſſies to Syphax and to other N Princes, for to eſtabliſh and confirm peace and league between them. They diſpatched others alſo to Philip, who ſhould make promiſe unto him of two hundred talents of ſilver, in caſe he would take the ſeas and paſs over either into Sicily or Italy. Meſſengers alſo were ſent as far as into Italy unto their own Generals ſerving there, to will them to raiſe what troubles they could poſſibly, for to keep Scipio a work, and hold him back from coming into Affrick. And unto Mago were ſent not only thoſe meſſengers aforeſaid, but alſo five and twenty long ſhips of war, ſix thouſand footmen, eight hundred horſemen, ſeven Elephants, and great ſtore of treaſure beſides for to hire aids, whereby he might advance forward with his forces nearer to Rome, and joyn with Annibal. Theſe preparations were making, and theſe courſes deviſing at Carthage, when as Maſaniſſa upon the bruit that went of the arrivall of the Roman fleet, began to ſtart up and rouze himſelf; and ac- O companied with ſome few horſemen, came unto Lælius, buſie in driving ſtill great booties out of the country, which he found altogether diſfurniſhed of armour, and unprovided of guards and garriſons for defence. " He much complained that Scipio was ſo ſlack in his affairs, and grie" ved that he had not paſſed over ere this time with an army into Affrick, whiles the Carthagi" nians were thus affrighted, whiles Syphax was troubled with the wars of the borderers: of whom " he was thus much perſwaded, that if he might have reſting time to compoſe his own affairs

" to

A "to his mind, he would not continue faſt unto the Romans, nor deal in any thing faithfully and "ſoundly with them: willing him to ſollicit Scipio, yea, and to ſpur him on and importune him not "to ſtand longer at a bay and make delayes. And for his own part, notwithſtanding he were diſ-"ſeized of his fathers Kingdom, yet he would be ready to aſſiſt him with ſuch a power of foot and "horſe as were worth God amercy: adviſing Lælius withal not to make any longer ſtay in Africk, "for aſmuch as he believed verily, that there was a fleet already ſet out from Carthage, with "which in the abſence of Scipio, he might not with ſafety enter into conflict and battail. After this communication, Maſaniſſa was diſmiſſed, and Lælius the next day looſed from Hippo, with his ſhips laden with pillage and prizes: and being returned into Sicily, declared unto Scipio the counſel and credence that he had from Maſaniſſa.

B About the very ſame time thoſe ſhips which were ſent from Carthage to Mago, coaſting along the Albiganians and the Ligurians, arrived at Genua. It fortuned that Mago at that time lay with his fleet in thoſe parts: who upon the words of the meſſengers, & the commiſſion to raiſe as great forces as poſſibly he could, immediatly held a counſel of the Frenchmen and Ligurians: for of both nations there were great numbers in thoſe coaſts. "Where before them all he declared how he "was ſent unto them for to ſet them at liberty: and how (as they might ſee themſelves) to that "effect he was furniſhed with new aid and ſuccour from home. But what forces, and how great "an army was needful for the managing of the war in hand, it lay in them to determine. As for "himſelf, firſt and formoſt he knew full wel, that there were two Roman armies abroad, the one in "France, the other in Tuſkany: and that Sp. Lucretius would joyn with M. Livius: and therefore C "they themſelves were to put many a thouſand in arms, for to make head againſt two Generals, & "two compleat armies of Romans. The Frenchmen made anſwer again, That their will was good "enough, and they had an exceeding deſire to compaſs and effect the deſignment intended: but "for aſmuch as the Romans had one camp within their confins, and another in Tuſcany neer ad-"joyning, and in manner within ſight; if peradventure they ſhould be ſeen in the action to aid the "Carthaginians; incontinently both armies, as well the one as the other would in all manner of "hoſtility invade their territories: and therefore they requeſted him to deſire of the Gauls ſuch "things, wherein they might ſtand him in ſtead ſecretly under hand. As for the Ligurians, becauſe "the Romans lay far enough off encamped from their Lands & Cities, they might diſpoſe well e-"nough of themſelves as they liſt: and therefore it was good reaſon that they ſhould put their D "young & able men in arms, & bear a part in the managing of the war. The Ligurians refuſed not. Only they craved reſpit of two moneths, for to take the muſters. In the mean time Mago, having ſent away the Gauls, cloſely took up & preſt ſouldiers throughout their countrey Towns for mo-ney. And from the States of France, there was ſent ſecretly proviſion of victuals of al ſorts unto him.

Marcus Livius led his army of Voluntaries out of Tuſcany into France, and having united his forces unto Lucretius his power, was ready to receive and welcome Mago, if haply he removed out of the Ligurians countrey neerer to the City of Rome: but in caſe Mago kept himſelf quiet in a corner under the Alps, he minded alſo himſelf there to keep his ſtanding leaguer about Arimi-num, for the guard and defence of Italy.

After the return of C. Lælius out of Affrick, both Scipio was pricked forward by the inſtigations E and perſwaſions of Maſaniſſa: and alſo his ſouldiers, ſeeing great prizes brought out of the ene-mies Land, and every ſhip fraight therewith; were mightily incenſed and ſet on fire with a burn-ing deſire to be tranſported over thither with all ſpeed poſſible. But as they were plotting about this enterpriſe of greater importance, they thought alſo upon a leſſer that came between, name-ly, the winning again of the City of Locri, which in the general revolt of all Italy, had ſided alſo with the Carthaginians. The firſt hope that they conceived both to affect and effect this enter-priſe grew upon a very ſmall matter: by occaſion that in the Brutians countrey, the whole man-ner of ſervice was performed by way of robbing and roving, rather than by any ordinary courſe of war. The Numidians firſt began, and the Brutii ſoon took it up and ſeconded them: not ſo much becauſe they would keep the Carthaginians company, and do as they did; but for that of their own natural inclination they were prone, and ready enough to follow that courſe. At laſt the Roman ſouldiers alſo, infected as it were by their example, took delight in robberies: and ſo far forth as they might have leave of their Captains, would make inrodes into the territories of their enemies. It fortuned ſo, that when ſome of them were gone abroad a plundring, certain Locrians were intercepted, and brought away with them to Rhegium. In which number of cap-tives, were ſome carpenters and maſons, who as it chanced, were hired to work for the Car-thaginians in the Caſtle of Locri. Theſe were diſcovered and known by certain great men, and the principal citizens of the Locrians, who hapned then to live as baniſhed perſons in Rhegium; ſuch as by the contrary faction that banded with Annibal and had delivered Locri into his hands, were driven out of the City. Theſe men fell to queſtioning with them (as commonly their manner is, who have been long out of their own Country) of many matters, and among the reſt, how all things fared at home: who told them all accordingly; and therewith, put them in ſome good hope, that if they might be ranſomed, ſet at large, and ſent home again, they would betray the Caſtle unto them: for aſmuch as within it they dwelt, and the Carthaginians put them in truſt of all things there. They therefore, as men that were wonderful deſirous to return thither, as well for love of their native country, as for to be revenged of their adverſaries, out of hand paid their ranſome: and after they had given order how to work the feat, and in what ſort; as alſo agreed upon the ſigns and tokens which they ſhould mark from on high a far off, they were ſent back again. Then the exiled Locrians repaired unto Scipio at Syracuſe, with whom alſo were others of the baniſhed perſons of Locri: and there they related unto him the promiſes of the captives aforeſaid, and put the Conſul in very good hope that the effect would be correſpondent to their deſignment. With them were ſent two Tribuns or Marſhals, to wit, M. Sergius and P. Matienus with commiſſion to conduct three thouſand ſouldiers from Rhegium to Locri. Letters alſo were diſpatched unto Q. Pleminius the Vice-pretor, for to be aſſiſtant in this action. Who being departed from Rhegium, and carrying with them ſcaling ladders, proportioned to the height of the Caſtle wall fore-told unto them, about midnight gave a token by fire to thoſe that were to betray the Caſtle, from that place which they had agreed upon: who being in readineſs alſo, and looking wiſtly for them, put down likewiſe ladders of their own, made for the purpoſe; and in many places at once received them that climbed up: ſo as, before there was any alarm heard, they ſet upon the watch of the Carthaginians, faſt aſleep as they were, and diſtruſting no ſuch matter: who firſt were heard to grone as they lay a dying, but afterwards, to make a noiſe and keep a running and much ado, upon their ſuddain ſtarting from ſleep, all the whiles that they wiſt not what the occaſion was. At length, upon the diſcovery of the matter, one man wakened another, and every one called aloud to arm; crying out, that the enemies were within the Caſtle, and the watchmen ſlain. And without queſtion, the Romans had been put to the worſe and defeated quite, being far fewer in number than the enemies, but that there was an outcry and ſhout ſet up by them that were without the fortreſs; which ſo long as men knew not from whence it came, put them in in geat fear: and the tumult beſides by night made every ſmall and vain thing much greater than it was. By means whereof, the Carthaginians aſtonied (as if all places had been full of enemies) abandoned all fight, and betook themſelves into the other fortreſs (for two there were diſtant not far aſunder.) The Townſmen kept poſſeſſion of the City, as the prize and guerdon in the mids for the winners. But out of the two Caſtles there were light skirmiſhes every day. Q. Pleminius was Captain of the fort and garriſon of the Romans, and Amilcar over the Carthaginians: and both parts increaſed their ſtrength, by aids that they had coming unto them from the places adjoyning. Until at laſt Annibal ſhewed himſelf in perſon: and no doubt the Romans had never been able to hold out, but that the whole multitude of the Locrenſians ſore galled and grieved with the proud government and the covetous polling of the Carthaginians, took part with the Romans. When intelligence came to Scipio, that the Romans were diſtreſſed in Locri, and that Annibal himſelf was advancing thither: for fear leſt the garriſon alſo ſhould be in ſome hazard (as having no ready means to retire from thence) himſelf leaving at Meſſana his brother L. Scipio for the guard of the place, paſſed over from thence with his veſſels down the water, when he eſpied the current and the tide together to ſerve for a fare. Likewiſe Annibal having ſent out a vancurrier from the River Butrotus (which is not far from the City Locri) to ſignify unto his men, that by day light they ſhould give a hot charge with all their might and main upon the Locrenſians and Romans both, whiles he himſelf made an aſſault upon the Town behind, not looking for him, but wholly turned away and amuſed upon that other tumult. Now when as early in the morning he found the skirmiſh begun, he was not willing to put himſelf within the Caſtle, for fear of peſtering with over great a company the place ſo ſtreight and of ſo ſmall receipt: and for to ſcale the walls they had brought no ladders with them. So cauſing all their carriages and packs to be piled up in one heap together: he preſented all his footmen in battail array before the City, to terrifie his enemies withal: and with the Numidian horſemen he made a bravado under the walls, and rode about the City. Whiles the ladders and other ordinance meet to give an aſſault, were in preparing and making ready, he approached on horſeback neer to the wall, for to view on which part above the reſt, he might give the aſſault: and there he was ſhot with a quarel diſcharged from an engine called a Scorpion, which hapned to be planted next unto him. And being affrighted at this ſo dangerous an occurrent, he commanded to ſound the retreat, and fortified his camp aloof without the peril and ſhot of any dart. Now was the Roman fleet from Meſſana arrived at Locri, and had the day afore them: ſo as they were all ſet a land, and entred the City before the ſun ſetting. The morrow after, the Carthaginians began to skirmiſh out of the Caſtle: and Annibal being now provided of ladders, and having all things elſe in readineſs needful for the aſſault, came under the walls: with that, all upon a ſuddain the Romans ſet open a gate and ſallied out upon him, who feared nothing leſs than any ſuch accident: and thus ſetting upon them at unawares, ſlew two hundred of them. Annibal perceiving that the Conſul was there, retired with the reſt into the camp: and after he had ſent a meſſenger to them that were within the Caſtle, willing them to ſhift for themſelves, in the night ſeaſon he diſlodged and departed. They alſo who were in the fort, after they had ſet on fire the houſes which were in their keeping, of purpoſe by that tumult to cauſe the enemy to make ſome ſtay and tarry behind, ran away in manner of a rout and before it was night with good footmanſhip overtook their own company. Scipio ſeeing as well this Caſtle quit by the enemy, as their camp alſo empty, called the Locrenſes to a general aſſembly, and gave them a ſharp check, and rebuked them for their revolt. The principal Captains & Authors of that treſpaſs he put to death; and gave away their goods to the chief heads of the other faction, in reward and conſideration of their ſingular fidelity to the Romans. But as concerning the publick ſtate of the Locrians, he ſaid he would neither make nor medle therewith, either in giving to them, or taking ought at all from them. But willed them to ſend their Embaſſadors to

A Rome, and look what the Senat would award in equity, that fortune they ſhould abide. This one thing he was well aſſured of, that how ill ſoever they had deſerved of the people of Rome, yet they ſhould live in better condition under the ſignory of the Romans, provoked to anger as they were, than they had already under the government of Carthaginians, pretending love and amity as they did.

Then himſelf in perſon cut over to Meſſana with thoſe forces that he brought with him, leaving Pleminius his Lieutenant, and that power that won the Caſtle, in garriſon for the defence of the City. The citizens of Locri had been ſo proudly miſuſed, and ſo cruelly handled by the Carthaginians, after they were revolted from the Romans, that it ſeemed they could be content to abide any ſmall wrongs, not only patiently but alſo willingly and in manner with a glad heart. But ſo far B now exceeded Pleminius, Amilcar the former captain of the garriſon; ſo far went the Roman garriſon ſouldiers, before the Carthaginians in wickedneſs & avarice, that a man would have thought they had ſtrove together who ſhould paſs the other in ſinful vice and ungodlineſs and not in feats of arms and proweſs. For neither Captain nor ſouldier forbare to practiſe upon the poor Townſmen any enormous facts, which are wont to make the great & mighty men odious unto the poor and meaner perſons. They wrought and committed ſhameful villanies upon their very bodies; upon their wives and children. And their greedy avarice ſo far proceeded, that they could not hold their hands from ſpoiling and robbing the very religious and ſacred Temples. Inſomuch, as among other holy Churches which they polluted, they met even with the rich meaſure of Proſerpina, C which had lien ſtill in all ages, and untouched by all others: ſave only it was reported to have been pilled by Pyrrhus; who indeed carried away the ſpoil of her, but he deerly bought it, and paid full ſweetly for that ſacriledge. And therefore like as before time the Kings ſhips ſhaken with tempeſts, and torn and ſplit with the rage of the Sea, brought nothing at all in that wreck ſafe to Land, but only that ſacred mony of the goddeſs, which they had ſtoln and carried away; even ſo at this preſent, the very ſame mony (but in another kind of calamity and miſery) brought upon all them that were tainted in that wicked action of robbing the Temple, a ſtrange & frantick madneſs; which cauſed Captain againſt Captain, and ſouldier againſt ſouldier, to fare as if they were ſtark mad, and enraged as mortal enemies one with another. Pleminius had the chief rule and D command of all. As for the ſouldiers, ſome were under him, ſuch as himſelf had brought from Rhegium; others were commanded by the Tribuns or Colonels. Now it chanced that one of Pleminius his ſouldiers had ſtoln a ſilver cup out of a Townſmans houſe, and ran away when he had done; and the owners after him with hue and cry, and fortuned to come in the way, and to meet with Sergius & Matienus the two Tribuns or Colonels full in the face. Whereupon the cup was taken from him by the commandment of the Tribuns; and thence aroſe firſt a braul, and ſome hard words were dealt between; and from them conſequently they went to open clamors and loud outcries, until at length there grew a very fray between the ſouldiers of Pleminius and of the Tribuns: and according as they came ſtill one or other in time to help their own ſide, both the number and the riot increaſed at once. In the end, Pleminius his men went away with the E blows, and moaned themſelves unto Pleminius, running to him with open month and great indignation, ſhewing their bloudy wounds: and reporting beſides, what opprobrious words to his diſgrace had paſſed againſt him without ſpare, in the time of thoſe brawling fits. Hereupon in a great choler and boyling heat of bloud, he gat him forth of doors in all the haſt; convented the Tribuns before him, and commanded them to be ſtripped naked, and the rods to be brought forth ready for to ſcourge them. But whiles there was ſome time ſpent in turning them out of their apparel & uncaſing them (for they ſtrugled & made reſiſtance and called to their ſouldiers for help) al at once they came thick about them (for very luſty they were upon their freſh victory) and ran from all places, as if the alarm bell had been rung againſt the coming of ſome enemies. But when F they ſaw once the bodies of their Tribunes tewed with rods, then they fell into far more furious rage and a very fit of madneſs: and thus incenſed as they were, without all regard not only of the reverent majeſty of authority, but alſo of common humanity, they fell upon the Lieutenant himſelf, after they had moſt pitiouſly beaten and evil intreated his Lictors and Officers about him. Then having ſingled him out apart from his Miniſters and Sergeants, they cruelly mangled him, cut off his noſe, cropt his ears, and left him for dead. News hereof came to Meſſana, and within few dayes Scipio highed him apace to Locri in a gally directed with ſix banks of oars: who after due examination and hearing of the cauſe between Pleminius and the Tribuns, acquit Pleminius as innocent, and left him Governour of the garriſon of the place: but he judged the Tribuns guilty, as Malefactors, and cauſed them to be bound in chains for to be ſent to Rome unto the Senate: and ſo he returned to Meſſana, and from thence to Syracuſe. Pleminius not able to over-rule his G anger, and thinking that Scipio had dealt but coldly and negligently in the matter, and made too light of the injury which he had received, and not puniſhed the offenders accordingly; and ſuppoſing that there was no man elſe able to make true eſtimate of the cauſe, but he that in his own perſon had felt the indignity and hainouſneſs thereof; commanded the Tribuns to be haled before him, and after he had put them to all the cruel torments, that any mans body is able to abide, he put them to death: and not ſatisfied either with their dolorous torture whiles they were quick, nor with taking their lives from them, caſt their dead bodies forth into the fields, there to lie above ground unburied. The like cruelty he exerciſed upon the principal Burgeſſes of the Locrians, ſuch as he heard ſay went to Scipio for to make complaint of his wrongs and injuries. And look what foul and shameful pranks he had plaid afore with his friends and allies, proceeding of lust H and covetousnes; the same now in his fell and furious rage he multiplied and wrought in divers sorts: so as he brought infamy, hatred and obloquy, not only upon himself, but also made the world to think hardly, and to speak much shame of the General himself.

Now drew the time neer of the solemn election of Magistrats; when as there came letters to Rome from Pub. Lucinius the Consul, the tenor whereof was to this effect: That himself and his army were sore visited with a grievous sicknes: and that he could not possibly have staid there, but that the violent contagion and influence of the same malady, if not greater & more grievous, had not assailed the enemies. Seeing that therefore himself was not able to come unto the election, he was minded, if it might so stand with the good liking of the Lords of the Senat, to nominat as Dictator Q. Cecilius Metellus, for to hold the foresaid election. And as for the army of Q. Ceci- I lius, it was for the good of the Common-weal that it should be cassed and discharged, since that there was no imployment of them at this present; considering that Annibal was retired already with his forces into his standing camp, and taken up his wintring harbor; and again, the pestilence grew so hot in that leaguer of his, that if they were not discharged betimes, there was not one of them like to escape and remain alive. In these points, the LL. of the Senat granted out their commission unto the Consul, for to do according as himself thought to stand either with his own credit and trust committed unto him, or the benefit of the Common-weal.

At the very same time there was a certain religious opinion that had possessed of a suddain the whole City, by occasion of a certain Prophesie found in the books of Sibylla. When search was made into them and they diligently perused, about the raining of stones, which hapned so often K that year. The Prophesie ran in this form: "At what time soever an enemy of a strange and for-
"rain countrey, shall happen to make war upon Italy, he may be chased out of Italy and vanquish"ed, if the goddes dame Cybele of Ida, were brought to Rome from Pessinus. This Prophesie found by the Decemvirs, moved the Senat the more, for that, the Embassadors also who carried the oblation and present aforesaid to Delphos, related, That as they themselves sacrificed unto Pythius A- pollo, all the inwards of the beast killed for sacrifice, appeared good, and shewed prosperity: and the Oracle besides gave answer, That there was a far greater victory toward the people of Rome than that was, out of the spoils whereof they brought gifts and offered to the God at this present.
And for to make up and fully accomplish these hopes, they alleaged withal, how P. Scipio in de- L manding the Province of Affrick, did presage (as it were) before-hand in his mind the final end of this war. To the end therefore, that they might with more speed obtain this honorable victory thus fore-tokened, and offering (as it were) it self, by all lucky presagings of men and Oracles of the Gods, they thought and devised some mean to transport the said goddesses to Rome.

The people of Rome in those dayes was confedered with no States of Asia: howbeit the LL.
calling to mind, how long ago, upon occasion of a sickness, and to purchase health unto the people, Æsculapius was sent for likewise out of Greece, before it was joyned with the City of Rome in any league or society; and considering withal, that there was some friendship and amity begun already with King Attalus (in regard of the common war against Philip) and that he would be ready to do for the people of Rome, whatsoever lay in his power, they resolved to send unto him an honorable Embassage to wit, M. Valerius Levinus, who had been twice Consul, and had warred M in Greece; M. Cecilius Metellus, who had been a Pretor, and Servius Sulpitius Galba: likewise an Ædile, and two late Questors, C. Tremelius Flaccus, and M. Valerius Falco. For these five, they assigned five Qninquerems or Gallies of five ranks of oars, that according to the credit and dignity of the people of Rome, they should make a voyage into those Lands, with whom they were to win a reputation and Majesty to the Roman name and State. These Embassadors, as they held on their course toward Asia, so soon as they were put on Land at Delphos, repaired directly to the Oracle, for to know what good hope it might afford unto them and the people of Rome, of effecting that business and commission, about the which they were sent forth. And this answer by report, was returned to them again, That they should obtain their desire, and effectuate their purpose by the means of Attalus the King: advising them moreover, That when they had con- N veighed the said goddes down to Rome, they should take order, that the very best man of all others in the City, should give her lodging and entertainment. But to proceed, to Pergamus they came unto the King. Who having courteously received and welcomed the Embassadors, conducted them into Phrygia to Pessinus, and delivered into their hands that sacred and holy stone, which the inhabitants of the country said, was the Mother of the Gods, and willed them to carry it to Rome. Then M. Valerius Falco was sent back from the other Embassadors to advertise them at Rome, that the goddes was coming, and that they should seek out the best man in all the City, for to receive and lodge her in his house with all devotion that might be.

Now was Q. Cecilius Metellus nominated Dictator by the Consul in the Brutians country, against the solemn election of the Magistrats. His army was disbanded and cassed, and L. Veturius O Philo created master of the horse. Then the Dictator held the Election. In which were chosen Consuls, M. Cornelius Cethegus & P. Sempronius Tuditanus in his absence, who at that time had the government of Greece. After them were elected Pretors, T. Claudius Nero, M. Martius Ralla, L. Scri- bonius Libo, & M. Pomponius Matho. When the Election was finished, the Dictator resigned up his place of magistracy. The Roman Games were thrice renued and set forth, & the plaies Plebei seven times exhibited. The Ædiles of the chair were Cn. and L. Cornelius Lentuli both. This Lucius governed

A verned then the Province of Spain: created he was in his absence, and absent as he was he bare that dignity. The Ædiles of the Commons were T. Claudius Asellus, and M. Junius Pennus. That year M. Marcellus dedicated the Temple of Vertue, neer the gate Capena, the seventeenth year after it was vowed by his father at Clastidium in Gallia, during the time of his first Consulship. There died also this year a Flamine of Mars, namely, M. Æmylius Regillus.

For the last two years, the affairs in Greece had not been well followed. Philip therefore taking the vantage, that the Ætolians were forsaken of the Romans (the only aid upon which they trusted) forced them both to sue for peace, and to contract the same under what conditions and capitulations himself pleased: which if he had not made the better half, all that ever he could to accomplish in good time, P. Sempronius the Vice-Consul, sent to succeed Sulpitius in the govern-
B ment, had utterly defeated him whiles he waged war with the Ætolians: considering that he was ten thousand foot and a thousand horse strong, and had five and thirty tall ships of war, headed with brasen pikes before: a power of no small importance, I assure you, to aid and assist his allies. For the said peace was not so soon concluded, but news came to the King, that the Romans were arrived at Dyrrhachium; that the Parthines and other neighbour nations, upon hope of change and a new world, began to rise and rebel; and that Dimallum was already besieged and assaulted: for to that City the Romans bent their power (in stead of aiding the Ætolians unto whom they were sent) upon high displeasure and indignation, that without their advise and consent, yea, and C against the tenor of the accord and covenant they had made a peace with the King. Philip upon these advertisements, for fear lest some farther troubles might arise among the nations and states there bordering, took long journeis, & sped him apace toward Apollonia. Thither Sempronius was retired, after he had sent Lectorius his Lieutenant with part of his forces and thirteen ships into Ætolia to visit the country, and to see in what terms they stood, yea, and to disturb and break the peace if possibly he could. Philip wasted and spoiled the territories and lands of the Apollonians, and approching the City with his whole power, bad battail to Sempronius the Roman General. But after he saw once that he kept himself quiet within the City, standing only upon his guard and defence of the walls; distrusting also his own strength, as not able to force the City by assault: & desirous withal to entertain peace with the Romans as well as with the Ætolians, if he could; if not,
D yet at leastwise to have truce with them: without effecting any more (seeing he could but only rub an old sore, & renew cankred malice upon fresh contention & quarrel) he returned into his realm.

About the same time, the Epirots weary of long wars, after they had first sounded the disposition and mind of the Romans that way, sent their Embassadors unto Philip, to treat about a general and universal peace: affirming, that they had assured hope of an honorable end and agreement, if his highness would vouchsafe to come to a parly with P. Sempronius the Roman General. And soon they obtained thus much of him, as to pass over into Epirus, for the King himself was not unwilling thereunto. Now there is a City in Epirus, named Phœnice: there the King after communication had first with Eropus, Dardas and Philippus, Pretors of the Epirots, entred into an enterview also with P. Sempronius. At this solemn meeting and conference, Aminander the King of the Athamans was present, and other Magistrates of the Epirots and Acarnans. And first Philippus
E the Pretor began to speak and request, as well King Philip as the Roman General, to make an end of all wars, and likewise to give the Epirots leave to do the same. P. Sempronius propounded and set down the articles and conditions of peace in this wise, That the Parthins, Dimallum, Bargulum and Eugenium, should belong to the Seignory of the Romans, notwithstanding that they had obtained of the Senat by their Orators sent to Rome, to be annexed to the dominion of Philip King of Macedony. When they were agreed for peace upon those capitulations, there were comprised within the league on the Kings behalf, Prusias King of Bithynia, the Achæians, the Bœotians, the Thessalians, the Acarnans, and the Epirots: and on the Romans, the Ilienses, K. Attalus, Pleuratus, F Nabis the Tyrant of the Lacedemonians, the Eleans, the Messenians, and the Athenians. And hereof were instruments and Indentures ingrossed and sealed, and truce made for two moneths, until such time as Embassadors were sent to Rome, that the people might by their suffrages approve of the conditions in that form. So all the tribes in general granted the same, because the war now being intended and bent against Africk, they were willing for the present to be discharged of all other troubles.

P. Sempronius having concluded peace, departed unto Rome for to enter his Consulship. Now when as M. Cornelius and P. Sempronius were Consuls (which was the 15 year of the Punick war) the Provinces were assigned unto them in this manner, namely, unto Cornelius, Hetruria with the old army: unto Sempronius the Brutii, with the new legions that he was to enrol. And to G the Pretors in this wise were the Provinces allotted, that M. Martius should be Lord chief justice of the citizens pleas, and L. Scribonius Libo have the jurisdiction of foreiners, together with the government of Gallia. Item, that M. Pomponius Matho should rule Sicily, and T. Claudius Nero sit as L. Deputy in Sardinia. As for P. Scipio, his commission was renewed and continued for one year longer, with the command of that army and Armado which he had conducted before. Likewise P. Licinius had his commission newly sealed for to have the charge of the Brutians country with the power of two legions, so long as the Consul thought it good for the Common-weal that he should remain in the government of that Province. Also M. Livius & Sp. Lucretius, with the assistance of those two legions with which they had defended Gallia against Mago, continued still in their room for another year. Moreover Cn. Octavius remained in place, with commission, that when he had delivered up Sardina, & the legion there unto T. Claudius, himself should with 40 long ſh gallies ſcour the ſeas, and guard the coaſts along the river, within thoſe limits, for which the Senat had given order. Unto M. Pomponius the Pretor in Sicily were appointed the two legions of the Cannian army. And T. Quintius and C. H. Tubulus Vice-pretors, were to govern as they did the former year, the one Tarentum, and the other Capua; and both of them were allowed the old garriſons. As for the government of Spain, it was put to queſtion before the people, what two Vice-pretors their pleaſure was ſhould be ſent into that Province. And all the Tribes with one accord gave their grant, that the ſame Pro-conſuls L. Cor. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, ſhould ſit as Governors in thoſe Provinces as the year before. The Conſuls began now to muſter ſouldiers as well to enrol new legions for to be ſent into the Brutians country, as alſo to ſupply and fulfil the number of the other armies; according as they were directed by the Senate. And albeit Affrick was not yet openly declared a Province, but diſſembled by the LL. of the Senate, (of purpoſe I believe, that the Carthaginians ſhould have no inkling and intelligence thereof before hand) yet the whole City was in good hope, and made full reckoning that this year the war would be determined and ſought out in Africk, and ſo an end for ever of thoſe troubles. This perſwaſion of theirs had poſſeſſed their hearts with much ſuperſtition: and very forward men were, both to report, and alſo to believe many prodigious and ſtrange wonders, which daily were blown abroad & civulged more and more: To wit that there were two ſuns ſeen; that in the night ſeaſon between whiles it ſeemed day light; that in Setia there was a burning torch or blaſing Star reaching from the Eaſt to the Weſt; that in Tarracina the gate, and in Anagnia as well the gate as the wall in divers parts were blaſted and ſhaken with lightning; laſtly, that in the Temple of Juno Soſpita in Lanuvium, there was a noiſe and a rumbling heard, with a horrible crack. For the expiation and purging of theſe prodigies, there was a ſupplication holden for one day: and a novendial ſolemn ſacrifice was alſo celebrated, becauſe it had rained ſtones out of the ſky. Beſides all this there was ſome conſulation about the receiving of dame Idæa. For over and beſides that M. Valerius one of the Embaſſadors was returned & had brought word that ſhe would be very ſhortly in Italy, there came a new meſſenger with tidings, that ſhe was now already at Taracina. This deliberation (about no ſmall matter, namely, whom they ſhould give judgement to be the beſt man ſimply in the whole City) held the Senat much amuſed: conſidering that every one for his part was more deſirous of true victory, and pre-eminence in this behalf, than of any promotions, honors or dignities whatſoever, awarded unto them by the voices either of Senators or Commoners. In concluſon, they judged P. Scipio, the ſon of that Cn. who was killed in Spain, a very young man, and as yet not of full age to be a Queſtor, the very beſt man without exception in the whole City. Upon what motives of his ſingular vertues they were induced thus to deem of him, as I could willingly have delivered unto poſterity, what had been ſet down in record by the ancient and firſt writers of thoſe times: ſo I will not interpoſe mine own conceits, in gueſſing at a thing which hath lien dead and buried ſo long time. This P. Cornelius was commanded to go accompanied with all the dames of the City as far as to Oſtia, there to meet the Goddeſs, and then to take her forth of the ſhip, and being once ſet on land, to deliver her unto the foreſaid matrons for to be devoutly caried to the City. Now when the ſhip was arrived at the mouth of the river Tyberis, he, according as he was directed, went aboord in a pinnace, & lanched into the ſea: where he took the Goddeſs at the Prieſts hands, and brought her on ſhore. And the dames which were the nobleſt and chief of the City, amongſt whom, C. Quintia was the Lady moſt renowned, received her. This Clandia, who before time (as it is reported) was of no better name & fame than ſhe ſhould be, now by this religious and devout miniſtry, was for her chaſtity and continency recommended better to poſterity. Theſe women caried this Goddeſs charily & daintily in their hands, and took her by turns one in courſe after another. All the City came forth by heaps to meet her: and along the ſtreets as ſhe was conveighed, they ſtood at the dores with cenſers, making ſweet perfumes, & burning frankincenſe: yea, & praied unto her, that ſhe would willingly enter the City of Rome, and continue propitious & gracious unto it. Thus they tranſported her into the Temple of Victoria within mount Palatine, the day before the * Ides of April, which was alwayes after kept as a feſtival holyday. The N people with great frequency brought gifts unto Palatium, which they offred unto the goddeſs & ſolemnized a Lectiſternium. And thoſe plaies called Megaleſia came up then & were firſt inſtituted.

* 12 April.

* The Plaies called Megaleſia.

Now when the Councel were buſy and ſat about the ſupply of thoſe legions which were in the Provinces, there were certain of the Senators began to whiſper & blow into their heads. That the "time was now come, no longer to abide thoſe things which during the troubles and dange- "rous daies they made a ſhift to endure; conſidering that now at length by the goddeſs of the "Gods, all fear was paſt, and the dangers overblown. At which words the Lords of the Senat be- "ing in great expectation and attentive to hear out the reſt; they went on and ſaid, That thoſe I: "colonies of the Latins, which whiles Q. Fabius and Q. Fulvius were Conſuls refuſed to ſet out "ſouldiers, now almoſt for ſix years had intermitted their ſervice in the wars, as exempted from O "warfare altogether, and enjoyed that immunity as an honor and reward for their good deſerts: "whereas in the mean time, other loyal and obedient allies were by muſtering every year conti- "nually, waſted and conſumed, in performance of their faithful allegeance and dutiful ſervice to "the Empire of Rome. At this ſpeech, the Lords called not ſo much to mind a thing long ſorlet and almoſt worn out of remembrance as they were provoked to anger and grew very hot; & therefore would not ſuffer the Conſuls to paſs any other matter before, but decreed that they ſhould peremptorily

A peremptorily convent to Rome the Magiſtrats, and ten principal citizens out of every of theſe Colonies, to wit, Nepet, Sutrium, Ardea, Cales, Alba, Carſeoli, Sora, Sueſſa, Setia, Circeii, Narnia, and Interamna, (for theſe were the Colonies touched in that point above-named) and to lay upon them every one a double levy of footmen, to that number and proportion which they were charged with, when they ſet out moſt in the ſervice of the Roman wars, ever ſince that the enemies were come into Italy: beſides one hundred and twenty horſemen a peece. And in caſe any one of thoſe colonies were not able to make up that full number of horſemen, then to allow for every man of arms three footmen. Provided alwayes, that for foot and horſe both, ſuch ſhould be choſen and no other, as were moſt ſubſtantial and of the beſt behaviour, and be ſent to what place ſoever there was need of ſupply, even out of Italy. And if any of them refuſed thus to do, then the Con-
B ſuls had commiſſion to ſtay the Magiſtrats and deputies aforeſaid, and not to give them audience in the Senat, (although they ſhould require the ſame) before they had performed thoſe impoſitions. Moreover thoſe Colonies were enjoyned to pay every year a tax or tribute, and that there ſhould be raiſed and levied, one As in the thouſand, of their ſubſtance by the month; and be aſſeſſed in thoſe Colonies according to the rate and rule that the Roman Cenſors ſhould ſet down; which they gave order to be the ſame that was laid upon the people of Rome: and the information thereof to be exhibited and preſented at Rome by the ſworn Cenſors of the foreſaid colonies, before they went out of their office. By vertue of this Act of the Senate, the Magiſtrats and chief men of thoſe Colonies were ſent for, and compelled to repair to Rome: and when the Conſuls de-C manded of them, thoſe ſouldiers and tribute aforeſaid, they began all of them (but ſome more than others) to refuſe and gain ſay it, yea, and flatly to deny, that ſo many ſouldiers could poſſibly be made, nay, hardly were they able, although they ſhould ſtrain themſelves, to furniſh the bare ſingle number, according to the uſual proportion and old preſcript order: requeſting and beſeeching them, to give them leave to have recourſe unto the Senat, and there to make ſure for their releaſe: neither have we (ſay they) ſo much offended as thus hardly to be uſed, nor deſerved worthily to be undone. And ſay, we muſt needs miſcarry and be caſt away; yet neither our offence, nor the wrath of the people of Rome, can force us to find more ſouldiers than we have. But the Conſ. reſo-D lute in their purpoſe, commanded the Delegates and Committees of thoſe Colonies, to ſtay ſtill at Rome, and their Magiſtrats only to repair home and take muſters: for aſmuch as (unleſs the full number of ſouldiers which was ſet down unto them were brought to Rome) there was no Conſul there would grant them audience in the Senat. Thus when all hope was cut off, to have acceſs into the Senat, and to obtain a releaſe; thoſe twelve Colonies took a levy and enrolled the full number. Which was no hard matter to be done, conſidering how their youth was increaſed in that time of long vacation and intermiſſion of warfare. There was likewiſe another matter (by as long ſilence forlet and well neer quite forgotten) propoſed newly again by M. Valerius Lævinus: who ſaid, That it was meet and good reaſon, that thoſe private perſons which had credited forth their monies to the Common-weal, when himſelf and M. Claudius were Conſuls, ſhould now at laſt be ſatisfied, contented, and paid: neither ought any man to marvail why he (notwithſtanding the City were bound for the debt) had a ſpecial care and regard to call upon them for to E have it diſcharged: for, beſides that the Conſul for that year being, when thoſe ſomes of money were granted, was in ſome ſort properly obliged, to ſee that credit were kept; himſelf more over was the very man that made the motion of taking up thoſe monies, in regard that the City chamber was ſo empty of treaſure, and the Commons purſes ſo bare of money, that they were ſcarce able to pay the ordinary tribut. This overture made by the Conſul, was well taken of the Senat, who willed the Conſuls to put up this matter to the houſe: and ſo they entred an Act and decree, that the ſaid debts ſhould be diſcharged at three paiments; whereof the firſt ſhould be made preſently by the Conſuls then in place; the other twain, by the Conſuls that were to ſucceed in the third and fifth years next enſuing.

But there fell out one new object and occurrence, that drowned all other cares beſides, and wholly poſſeſſed the heads of the Senate, by occaſion of the miſeries and calamities of the Locri-F ans; whereof before that day, they had no knowledge nor intelligence, and now were by the coming of their Embaſſadors declared and divulged. Neither were the people provoked to choler and anger, ſo much at the lewd behavior and wicked pranks of Q. Pleminius, as the ſlacknes and negligence, or elſe the partiality and connivency of Scipio in dealing between them. Theſe Embaſſadors of the Locrians, ten in number, preſented themſelves before the Conſuls ſitting in the open Hall called Comitium; clad they were in homely weeds and courſe apparel, looking pale and poor on the matter; and carrying withal in their hands as tokens of humble ſuppliants, certain branches of the Olive, according to the manner of the Greeks, fell down proſtrate upon the ground before the Tribunal, with pitteous weeping and ſorrowful lamentation. The Conſuls demanded who they were: and they made anſwer again, That they were Locrians, who had endured at the G hands of Q. Pleminius the Lieutenant, and the Roman ſouldiers, ſuch indignities, as the people of Rome would not find in their hearts, that the very Carthaginians themſelves ſhould ſuffer and ſuſtain: beſeeching them to do them this favour, as to give them leave to have acceſs to the Lords of the Senat, there to make their mone and complain of their woful diſtreſſes. Being admitted into the Senate and audience given them, then the ancienteſt man of the company ſpake in this wiſe. "Right honorable (my LL.) I know full well (quoth he) how important it would be, "and available to the due eſtimate and weight of our complaints and grievance, in caſe ye were informed

The pitiful complaints of the Locrians before the Senat of Rome.

"informed ſufficiently and knew the truth, as well in what ſort Locri was firſt betraied unto Han- H
"nibal, as alſo after what order the garriſon of Annibal was thence expelled, and the City reſtored
"again under your obeiſance. For, if it may appear that the treſpaſs of our revolt, cannot be im"puted any way unto the publick counſel and conſent of our City; but contrary-wiſe, that our re"turn under your ſignory and dominion was not only performed with our good will, but alſo
"firſt wrought and compaſſed by the means of our helping hand and valour: ye have the greater
"cauſe to be diſcontented and diſpleaſed with your Lieutenant and ſouldiers, for offring us (your "good and loyal allies) ſuch abuſes, ſo cruel wrongs and unworthy indignities. As for the cauſe
"of our double revoltment and change, I think it good to defer the ſpeaking thereof to another
"time, and that for two reaſons: the one is, that the matter might be heard in the preſence of P. I
"Scipio, who recovered Locri, & was an eye-witneſs of all that we have done, be it good or bad:
"the other is this, that howſoever we be, yet we ſhould not have abiden thoſe calamities in ſuch "ſort as we have ſupported them. We cannot diſſemble (my LL.) nor conceal, how all the while "that we had the Carthaginian garriſon within our Caſtle, we ſuffered many foul outrages and "ſhameful villanies, both at Amilcar his hands (the Captain of the garriſon) as alſo from the Nu-
"midians and Africans: but what are they in compariſon of the abuſes & indignities that we en"dure at this day? May it pleaſe you (my LL.) to give us the hearing of thoſe things with pati"ence, that I ſhall utter even againſt my will with grievance. All the world at this day is in ſu-
"ſpence, & ſtandeth in great doubt, whether to ſee you or the Carthaginians, the Soveraign Lords "of the whole earth. But if they were to weigh and counterpoiſe the Roman and Carthaginian
"Empire, by thoſe injuries which have been offred to us of Locri, either from them or your gari- K
"ſon; and which at this day, more than ever before, we ſtill endure: there is none but would rather
"make choice of them to be their ſoveraign LL. than the Romans. And yet conſider, I pray you,
"and ſee how well affected the Locrians are towards you: when we were nothing ſo hardly uſed
"nor ſo ill entreated by the Carthaginians, yet we had recourſe unto your Captain General: and "now that we are miſuſed of your gariſon, and put to more ſorrow than if we were profeſſed ene"mies, yet we have run no whither with our complaints but unto your ſelves. Either ſhal you (my "LL.) vouchſafe to have compaſſion of our miſerable ſtate, or elſe we ſee not what we have left
"wherein we ſhould pray unto the immortal Gods, for to be good and propice unto us. Q. Ple-
"minius Lieutenant to the General Scipio, was ſent with a ſtrong garriſon and power of men to "recover Locri out of the hands of the Carthaginians; and with the very ſame garriſon was he left L
"there: but this Lieutenant of yours (for, the extremity of miſeries and afflictions wherewith we
"are driven, maketh us bold, and putteth courage in us to ſpeak our minds freely finding nothing
"at all in him of a man, my Lords, but the bare ſhape and outward form; nor of a Roman citizen,
"unleſs it be the habit of apparel which he weareth, and the ſound of the Latin tongue which he
"ſpeaketh. A very plague he is & no better, a monſtrous & ugly beaſt, like unto that, which ſome-
"times (if old tales and fables be true) haunted the narrow ſeas between us and Sicily, for to de-
"ſtroy all paſſengers that ſailed by. Who, if he could have been content himſelf alone to have pra"ctiſed & wrought upon us your allies, all miſchievous acts & pranks, of wickedneſs, of filthy luſt,
"and greedy covetouſneſs, we would peradventure in all patience & long ſufferance, have filled up
"that one gulf and pit were it never ſo deep, & ſatisfied one gorge never ſo unſatiable. But now M
"ſo great a delight & pleaſure hath he taken, that all lewd & licentious parts, all ſhameful acts and "villanies ſhould be commonly practiſed & in every place committed, that he hath made all your "Centineirs very Pleminii, yea, and your ſouldiers as bad as himſelf. All of them can skill now of "robbing rifling, ſpoiling, beating, wounding, and killing: they are all good at forcing of dames and "ladies of honor, at raviſhing and deflouring of young Virgins, at abuſing (againſt kind) of young-
"lings, free born and well deſcended, whom they pull perforce from between the arms, and out of "the very boſomes of their parents. Daily is our City aſſaulted and taken; daily is it ſacked and
"pilled, night and day, there is no place free, but ringeth again with the piteous ſhrikes and lamen"table plaints and cries of women and children, harried and carried away in every place. He that "were a ſtranger to theſe things, and knew nothing, might wonder well enough, how either we N
"can poſſibly hold out in ſuffering ſuch outrages, or they which are the doers, not yet be ſatisfied
"and full of committing ſo great wrongs and injuries. For neither will my tongue and utterance
"ſerve to deliver, nor needful is it and expedient for you to hear every thing in particular, what "we have ſuſtained. But in general I will compriſe and knit up altogether. I will abide by it that "there is not one houſe throughout al Locri, I dare avouch there is no perſon either one or other,
"exempt from the wrongs that he hath done. I ſay, & ſtand to it, that there is no kind of wicked-
"neſs, no manner of filthy luſt & uncleanneſs, no unſatiable avarice beſides, that he hath not aſſaied
"to practiſe upon as many as were capable thereof, & fit ſubjects to work upon. Hardly can a man
"deviſe and think, whether of theſe two miſchiefs incident to a City be more deteſtable, either
"when the enemies force it by aſſault in time of war, or when a peſtilent & cruel tyrant oppreſſeth O
"it by force & arms during peace. All calamities we endured before, that Towns won and loſt are "put unto. And now at this hour, more than ever (my LL.) Pleminius hath perpetrated upon us,
"our children & our wives, all thoſe exceſſive villanies that the moſt inhumane, cruel & outrage"ous tyrants can deviſe to exerciſe upon thoſe ſubjects, whom they keep down with oppreſſion &
"tread under foot. Yet one thing there is (right honorable) whereof both ſenſe of religion imprin"ted & engraffed naturally in our minds, conſtrains us to make particular complaint by ſpecialty:

A "and alſo our deſire is, that ye ſhould have the hearing, yea, and to aſſoil and diſcharge your Com"mon-weal of the ſcruple of conſcience, in caſe ye think it ſo meet and requiſite. For we have ob"ſerved and ſeen with our eyes, with what devotion and ceremonial reverence, you not only ho"nor and worſhip the Gods of your own, but alſo receive and entertain thoſe of ſtrangers and "forrainers. We have in our City a Chappel of Proſerpina, concerning the holineſs of which
"houſe, I ſuppoſe verily, that ye have heard ſome report and fame, during the war of King Pyr-
"rhus: who in his return out of Sicily, paſſing along the ſea ſide with his fleet by Locri, among o"ther ſhameful villanies and outrages which he committed againſt our City in deſpight of us, and
"for our fidelity ſhewed toward you, pilled alſo and robbed the treaſure of this Proſerpina, which "to that day had never been touched by any man whatſoever. And when he had ſo done, he em-B "barked the mony, & ſent it away by water, but journeied himſelf by Land. But ſee what hapned
"my LL. hereupon! His whole navy the morrow after, was all even toſſed, ſplit, & torn a pieces in "a moſt hideous guſt and horrible tempeſt, ſave only thoſe ſhips wherein that ſacred treaſure was "beſtowed, which were caſt upon our coaſt, & driven aſhore. Whereupon this King, as proud &
"fierce a Prince as he was, being taught by ſo great harms and loſſes, to believe that there were
"Gods in heaven that ruled all: made diligent ſearch for all the ſaid monies, and cauſed the ſame
"to be brought back again, and laid up in the treaſury of Proſerpina. And yet for all that, never ſped
"he well in any thing that he went about, from that day forward. Hunted he was and chaſed clean
"out of Italy: and coming by chance one night, & entering unadviſedly the City of Argos, he died
"an obſcure, baſe, and diſhonorable death. And notwithſtanding your Lieutenant, your Colonels C "and knight Marſhals heard of this and a thouſand more ſuch inſtances & examples which were "recounted unto them (not for to amplify and ſet out with the higheſt the great religion and "holineſs of the place; but as we and our anceſtors have had right evident proof, and that full "oftentimes, to ſhew the manifeſt power and puiſſance of that goddeſs) yet were they ſo hardy as
"to lay their theeviſh and ſacrilegious hands upon thoſe treaſures, that were inviolat and not to "be touched; and ſo by that curſed prize and booty have polluted themſelves, their houſes, and "your ſouldiers. Whoſe ſervice take heed my LL. as ye tender your ſelves and your credit, how "ye employ either in Italy or in Africk, in any of your affairs and wars there: before ye purge and
"expiat this foul and heinous fact: for fear leſt they make amends, and pay for this deteſtable for"feit not only which their own bloud, but alſo with ſome publick loſs & calamity of the whole D "State. And even already my LL. the ire and diſpleaſure of the goddeſs hath been well ſeen upon "your Captains and ſouldiers both, & at this preſent day continueth ſtill. Sundry times they have "been together by the ears, and ſcuffled one againſt another with banners diſplaied. Pleminius the "Captain bare up one ſide, and two Marſhals or military Tribuns another. Never fought they "more fiercely & ſharply with the Carthaginians in the field, than amongſt themſelves in fraies at "the ſword point. And through their furious rage they had given Annibal good opportunity and
"vantage to regain Locri into his own hands; but that Scipio, whom we ſent for, came in the mean "time upon him. But peradventure (ſome will ſay) this madneſs and fury hanteth and rormenteth
"the ſouldiers only, who are tainted with the foreſaid ſacriledge, and no power at all of the god-
"deſs hath been ſhewed in puniſhing the leaders and captains themſelves. Nay I wot, in them it E "hath moſt evidently appeared. The Tribuns have been beaten with rods by the Lieutenant & the "Lieutenant again, being laid for by the ſaid Tribuns, and caught in a train, hath not only been
"mangled all his body over, but when they had cut off his noſe, and cropt his ears, was left for "dead in the place. And afterwards, when the Lieutenant was recovered and cured of his hurts, he
"firſt impriſoned the Tribuns; then he ſcourged them, & after he had martyred them, & put them "to all exquiſite tortures that might be deviſed againſt bondſlaves, he put them to death: & when "they were dead, would not ſuffer them to be enterred. Thus ye ſee how the goddeſs hath puni-
"ſhed and taken vengeance of them that have pilled and robbed her Temple: & never wil ſhe give
"over to torment and harry them with all manner of furies and helliſh fiends, before the ſacred
"money be again beſtowed in the cheſts & cofers of her treaſury. Our anceſtors long ago in time F "of grievous and cruel war between them and the Crotoniats, becauſe the Temple ſtandeth
"without the City, were deſirous to remove that treaſure and money from thence, into the City.
"But in the night there was a voice heard from out of the ſhrine, that they ſhould hold their "hands off: for that the goddeſs her ſelf knew well enough how to defend her own Temple. And
"becauſe upon this warning they made it a matter of conſcience, & were afraid to ſtir the treaſure
"from thence, they would needs caſt a ſtrong wall about the ſaid Temple: & when it was brought "up to a good height from the ground, behold, ſuddainly at once all the work came tumbling
"down. But both now, and oftentimes beſides, hath this goddeſs either guarded her ſeat & chap-
"pel, or elſe if it hath been any way violated, ſhe hath been grievouſly revenged by ſome fearful "example of them that have ſeemed to offer violence to the ſame. Now for the wrongs that we a-G "bide ſhe is not able; neither is there any other but your ſelves (my Lords) to right us, and revenge
"our quarrel. You are they whom we flie unto; unto your protection only in all humble manner,
"we have recourſe. And all one it is to us, whether ye ſuffer Locri to be under that Lieutenant and "that garriſon or yeeld us unto Annibal in his anger, and to the Carthaginians, for to wreak their "teen upon us & our throats. Neither require we that you ſhould credit and believe our com"plaint of him that is not now in place, without liberty of his anſwer & pleading for himſelf. Let "him come hardly; let him be at the hearing himſelf, and ſpare not, let him in Gods name clear

"and

" and acquit himself, if he can. If when all is done and said, it can be proved, that he hath left un- H
" done any mischief against us, that one man can devise to do unto another; we will be content to " abide and endure all those miseries once again (if it were possible) which we have suffered al" ready, yea & to hold and declare him guiltless of all offences done both to God and man.

When the Embassadors had laid abroad those matters, and Q. Fabius demanded of them, whether they had complained unto P. Scipio, and uttered these their griefs before him, they made answer and said, " That they had sent Embassadors unto him, but he was busied in making prepa-
" tion for the wars, and was either passed already over into Affrick, or upon his voyage ready to " take the Seas within few dayes: and they had seen by good experience, in how great favour the " Lieutenant Pleminius stood with his general: and namely, they were not ignorant how Scipio
" after he had heard the matter between the Tribuns and him, committed them to prison: but as I
" for the Lieutenant, who was as faulty as the other, if not more, him he left there still in his full " authority. Now after that the Embassadors were willed to go forth of the Temple where the
" Senat sate, the chief LL. of the Senat began with biting words to inveigh bitterly against Scipio
" as well as Pleminius. But above all others, Q. Fabius girded at him, and said, That he was born
" even to corrupt and mar all military discipline. Thus (quoth he) in Spain also we have lost more
" by mutinies of our own souldiers, than by the wars with our enemies: for why? after a strange
" and forrain manner, and according to the guise of Kings, one while he cockered his souldiers
" and suffered them to have their will and head too much; otherwhiles he would be oversharp
" and cruel to them. After which rough words, he came upon them both thus with as heavy and " sharp a sentence, namely, That Pleminius the Lieutenant by his consent should be had away K
" bound in chains to Rome, and there clapt up in prison, until his cause were heard, and judicially
" determined: and in case those challenges were true, that the Locrians have commenced against " him, he should be put to death in prison, and his goods be confiscate and forfeited to the cham" ber of the City. As for P. Scipio, in that he presumed to depart out of his province without com" mission and direction from the Senat, he should be called home: and the Tribuns of the Com" mons dealt withal, to prefer a bill unto the people for his deprivation, and to put him besides " his place of government. As touching the Locrians, his opinion was, That the Senat should " give them their dispatch, and return them this answer: First, as touching the wrongs that they " complained of, it was not the will and pleasure neither of the Senat nor of the people of Rome
" that they were done; who wished with all their hearts they had been undone: Item, that they L
" acknowledged them to be good men, to be their friends and allies, and so would accept of them
" and call them. As to their children, their wives, and other goods taken from them whatsoever,
" their mind was that they should be restored again: Item, that enquiry should be made what
" sums of money were taken out of the treasury of Proserpina, and that two-fold restitution
" should be made and laid up there in stead of it: Item, that there should be a solemn purgatory sa" crifice celebrated for amends and expiation of that sin; but so, as the colledge first of the Priests " and Bishops should be consulted with, and their advice taken in that behalf, (considering the " sacred treasure was disquieted, laid open and violated) namely, what manner of expiations and " clensings were to be used, to what Gods, and with what beasts they should sacrifice: Finally,
" that all the souldiers which were at Locri should be transported over into Sicily; and in their M
" room four cohorts of allies from out of the Latin Nation should be brought to lye in garrison
" there. But every Senator could not be asked his opinion and sentence that day, by reason of their difference and disagreement of minds so hotly incensed, some in favour, other in disavour of Scipio. For besides the lewd part of Pleminius, and the calamity & oppression of the Locrians, they began to speak against the apparel of the General himself, " How he went not like a souldier and
" a warrior, no, nor so much as like a Roman: walking up and down, and squaring it out in the " schools and open places of exercise with his mantle and cloke, and in his slippers and pantofles,
" after the Greek fashion: And that he was over bookish, and set his mind too much upon read" ing; and took delight to be in the fencing school and wrestling-place: and all his men and guard
" about him, as idly and wantonly given as he, took joy in the pleasures & delightful seat of Syra- N
" cusa. As for Carthage and Annibal, they were quite forgotten: and his whole army through loos-
" nes and liberty was spilled and clean lost, like to that of late at Sucro in Spain, and all one with " them at this time in Locri, more to be feared of their friends than their enemies. And albeit these matters thus reported, were either true, or mingled with some truths, and therefore sounded all very probable; yet the opinion of Q. Metellus prevailed: who in all other things gave his assent unto Maximus, only as touching Scipio, he varied from him. " For I can not see any reason (quoth
" he) how this can stand, that whom erewhile the whole City chose at those young years of his,
" to be the only Captain for to recover Spain; of whom they made special choice to be their " Consul, after that he had gotten Spain from the enemies, to end at once the Punick war; and " in whom they reposed great hope, that he was the man to draw Annibal out of Italy, and to O
" subdue all Affrick: he now should all of a suddain be called for home out of his Province,
" as a person almost condemned, without pleading and hearing of his cause, as if he were ano" ther Pleminius: considering that even those lewd and cruel parts which the Locrians complained " of, were by their own words and confession not committed whiles he was present in place nei" ther could he be charged and accused directly for ought else but only for his sufferance and con-
" nivency, in that upon a tender and respective indulgence of his Lieutenant, he was too remiss,

" and

A "and forbare to punish him with rigor. His advice therefore and opinion was, that M. Pomponi-
"us the Pretor, unto whose lot the government of Sicily was fallen, should within three dayes
"next and immediatly ensuing, take his journey into his province: and that the Consuls, should "elect x. Commissioners or Delegates out of the Senate, such as they thought good of, and send "them with the Pretor; likewise two Tribuns of the Commons and one Ædile: that the Pretor
"with with the assistance of these personages, should sit upon a commission to enquire and know
"the truth: and in case they could find that those things wherewith the Locrians found them"selves so much grieved, were done either by commandment and direction from Scipio, or with "his will and consent; then to charge him to depart out of the province. But in case that P. Sci-
"pio were already passed over into Affrick; then the foresaid Tribuns of the Commons, and the B "Ædile, joyning unto them two of the Delegates abovesaid (such as the Pretor deemed most "meet) should sail into Affrick: and the Tribuns and Ædile bring with them Scipio from thence:
"and the two Commissioners have the charge and government of the army, until such time as a "new L. General succeeded and came in place. But if M. Pomponius and the ten Delegates above-
"said, found that neither by the direction, nor with the will of P. Scipio these enormities were "committed, then P. Scipio should remain still with the army, and go forward with the war as he "intended. When this decree of the Senat was once passed, and an act made thereof they were in hand with the Tribuns either to agree between themselves, or else to cast lots, which two of them should go with the Pretor and the Delegates. And then the colledge of the Bishops were consulted with, about the expiation and making satisfaction for those things which in the Temple C of Proserpina at Locri were either handled polluted, or carried forth from thence. The Tribuns of the commons that went the journey with the Pretor and the Commissioners, were M. Claudius Marcellus, & M. Cincius Alimentius: who also had an Ædile of the Commons to assist them, whom they might command, if Scipio would not obey the Pretor, whether he were in Sicily, or gone over into Affrick, to apprehend and attach his body; and by vertue of their sacrosanct and inviolable authority to bring him home with them. And first they resolved to go to Locri before they went to Messana. But concerning Pleminius, the report goeth two wayes. Some say, that when he was advertised what was intended and devised against him at Rome, he purposed to go to Naples into banishment, and chanced by the way to light upon one of the Delegates abovesaid, and so by him was perforce brought back to Rhegium. Others affirm, that Scipio himself sent out one of his D Lieutenants, accompanied with 30 of the most noble Knights or Gentlemen that he had about him, with a warrant to commit Q. Fleminius, and with him the principal Authors of the sedition, and to lay them fast in irons. But certain it is that they all, were it by the commandment of Scipio before, or then by warrant from the Pretor, were put in ward and safe-custody with the Rhegins.
The Pretor and the Delegats being come to Locri, first and formost, according to their commission, had a principal care of Religion. For all the holy money which they found by diligent search in the custody either of Pleminius, or of the souldiers together with that which they themselves had brought with them from Rome, they bestowed again in the privy vestries where the treasure was kept: and besides, they made a solemn purgatory sacrifice for the Sacriledge. After this, the Pretor assembled the souldiers together, and commanded them to carry their Ensigns out of the E City: where himself encamped upon the plain; and proclaimed that no souldier, as he would answer at his uttermost peril, should either tarry behind, or bring forth any thing with him but his own. Then he gave the Locrians leave, that every man should lay hold upon that which he knew to be his own: and if ought were not forth-coming and to be seen, to challenge and put in his claim for it. And above all things, his pleasure was, that all bodies of free persons whatsoever, should without delay be restored unto them, and if any made default of restitution, he should abide the smart and be grievously punished. Then he assembled the Locrians to an audience, and pronounced before them all, That the people and Senat of Rome granted unto them their ancient liberty, and their own laws: giving notice unto them, that whosoever had any thing to say against Pleminius, or any other person by way of accusation, he should follow him to Rhegium, and there F give attendance. Also if they were desirous to make a publick and open complaint of Scipio, namely, That the facts committed at Locri most impiously and wickedly, against both God & man, passed either under his warrant, or with his leave and liking, then they should send Embassadors to Messana, where he together with his Councel and assistants would give them audience of al matters, and determine accordingly. The Locrians yeelded great thanks to the Pretors and to the Delegats or Commissioners: as also to the Senat and people of Rome: and said, "They would go "to accuse Pleminius. As for Scipio, although he set little to heart the injuries and wrongs "done unto their City, yet he was a man whose friendship they desired rather to embrace, than to "entertain his enmity. And this they knew assuredly, that so many lewd pranks, and so horrible G "parts there plaid, were neither by the direction nor yet with the connivency and toleration of "P. Scipio: but his only fault was that either he trusted Pleminius overmuch, or credited them too "little. And some men (say they) be of this nature, that they will have a careful regard for to pre"vent sin, and an earnest desire that no offence be committed, rather than courage and heart to "punish and correct faults when they are once done and past. Hereupon both the Pretors & also the Commissioners with him, thought themselves well eased of no small burden and charge of making farther inquisition and sitting upon the cause of Scipio. But Pleminius and two and thirty persons more with him, they condemned and sent bound in chains to Rome. They themselves went also alſo in perſon to Scipio, to be eye-witneſſes and to make report at Rome of their own knowledge, H as touching the manner of apparel, the idle life of the General, and the looſe, diſſolute, and corrupt military diſcipline of his ſouldiers; ſo riſe and common in many mens mouths. Againſt their coming to Syracuſe, Scipio was provided of deeds to approve his innocency, and not of words to excuſe his folly. He gave order for all his forces there to meet, and for his armado to be in readineſs, as if he were that day to give battail both by Land and Sea to the Carthaginians. The very ſame day that they arrived thither, they were friendly received and courteouſly entertained by Scipio. The morrow after he ſhewed them all his forces, as well for Land as Sea ſervice, not only furniſhed, well appointed, and in readines; but the one ſort, namely the land ſouldiers, running and charging one another at turney; and the Sea ſervitors likewiſe within the haven, repreſenting a naval combat with their ſhips. Then he led the Pretor and the other commiſſioners all about, to ſee I the arſenal and armory, the ſtore-houſes, the garners of corn, and all other proviſion and furniture for the war. At the view and ſight whereof, they were ſtriken with ſuch exceeding admiration, both of every thing in particular, and of all in general, that they were fully perſwaded, that either by the conduct of that Captain and valour of that army, the Carthaginians might be overcome and conquered, or by none other in the world: yea, and they willed him in the name of God, without more ado to paſs over into Affrick, and with all ſpeed poſſible to make the people of Rome to enjoy the effect of that hope which they conceived that very day, on which all the Centuries nominated and declared him with one voice the former Conſul of the twain: and with ſo joyous hearts they took their leave and departed from thence, as if they were to bring tidings to Rome of a glorious victory; and not to make relation and report of a magnifical and ſtately prepa- K ration for war. Pleminius and all they that were likewiſe attaint and guilty, after they came to Rome, were immediately clapt up and laid faſt in priſon. At the firſt time when they were brought out before the people by the Tribuns, they could find no grace, no favour nor mercy amongſt them, their minds were ſo forſtalled and poſſeſſed aforehand, with the conſideration of the woful miſeries and calamities of the poor Locrians. But afterwards, being produced oftner unto them as the hatred conceived againſt him, began to wear and decay, ſo mens anger grew to aſſwage and ſoften: beſides the pitious plight and deformed hew of Pleminius there preſent, and the remembrance withal, of Scipio now abſent, gat him ſome favour with the people. Yet he died in priſon, before his cauſe was judicially tried, and definitive ſentence of him paſſed. Clodius Licinius reporteth in this third book of the Roman ſtories, that this Pleminius in the time of the games which L Affricanus ſecond time Conſul, exhibited at Rome, according to a vow by him made, went about (by the help of ſome whom he had corrupted and waged for money) to ſet the City on fire in divers places, thereby to have opportunity to break priſon and make an eſcape: but when his wicked purpoſe was once diſcloſed and brought to light, he was condemned and awarded by an act of Senat to the dungeon Tullianum. But as for Scipio, there were no words made of him, neither come he in queſtion any where elſe but in the Senat: where all with one accord, both commiſſioners and Tribuns, by extolling and magnifying with glorious words, the navy, the army and the Captain, brought it ſo about, that the Senat thought good and were agreed, that with all convenient ſpeed Scipio ſhould over into Affrick, and have liberty granted out of thoſe armies which were in Sicily, to make choice of thoſe whom he would himſelf tranſport over with him into M Affrick, and whom he would leave behind for the guard and defence of the Province.

Whiles theſe things paſſed thus amongſt the Romans; the Carthaginians alſo having ſpent all the winter time in much ſuſpition and continual fear, hearkning to all news, and enquiring fearfully of every meſſenger, and keeping watch upon all their promontories and high hills by the Sea ſide, beſtirred themſelves likewiſe, and procured the ſociety and alliance of K. Syphax, a matter of no ſmall importance for the ſafeguard and defence of Africk, in hope and confidence of whoſe amity and friendſhip eſpecially, they were perſwaded, that Scipio intended to ſail over into Africk.
Now there had been already between Aſdrubal the ſon of Giſgo and the King, not only familiar acquaintance by way of kind welcoming and reciprocal hoſpitality, ſince the time (as hath been ſaid before) that Scipio and Aſdrubal fortuned to meet at one time together in the Kings houſe, N when they came out of Spain; but alſo ſome treaty was already begun of alliance and affinity, and a motion made, that the King ſhould eſpouſe and wed the daughter of Aſdrubal. For the aſſurance of this matter, and the appointment of a certain day for the ſolemniſing of the marriage (for now the Damoſel was ready for an husband, and mariageable) Aſdrubal took a journey, and ſee-ing the King burning in love (as theſe Numidians of all other barbarous nations are moſt given that way, and exceeding amorous) he ſent for the maiden from Carthage, and haſtened the wedding. And among other congratulations that paſſed between, to the end, that beſides the private affirnity there ſhould be alſo a publick league, there was an alliance concluded between the people of Carthage and the King, by giving and taking their faithful promiſe interchangeably and obliging themſelves by a ſolemn oath one to the other to obſerve it as well offenſive as defenſive O and to have the ſame enemies, and the ſame friends for ever. But Aſdrubal remembring both the friendſhip begun between Scipio and the King, and alſo how fickle and variable the natures of the Barbarians are; and fearing if Scipio ſhould paſs over into Africk that this bond of wedlock would not be ſtrong enough to hold the King in; took the time whiles this Numidian Prince was enflamed with his freſh love, induced him what with reaſons, and what with the fair words and allurements of his young ſpouſe, to ſend Embaſſadors into Sicily to Scipio, for to adviſe him not to paſs

A pass over into Africk, nor to relie upon any confidence of him, nor yet to build upon his former promises. For himself was not only linked in matrimony with a Citizen of Carthage, the daugher "of that Asdrubal whom he saw entertained as a guest in his court, but also joyned in a publick "league with the people of Carthage. And first he exhorted him that the Romans would war "with the Carthaginians far from Africk, as hitherto they had done; for fear lest he should of "necessity be forced to have an hand, and intermeddle in their quarels; and so while he desired to avoid the danger and hostility of one part or other, be driven at length to side all one way: giv- "ing him more plainly to understand, that if Scipio would not forbear Africk, but needs come with "an army against Carthage, then must he necessarily fight in defence of the land of Africk, wherein himself was born, and for the native country, for the father and house of his own wife. With this B commission and direction were certain Orators sent unto Scipio, who met with him at Syracuse, and there delivered their message. Scipio, albeit he was disappointed greatly of his ground-work that he had laid for his wars in Africk, and put besides his good hopes; gave the Embassadours letters into Africk unto the King, and sent them back again in all hast, before the thing were published and come abroad. In which letters he requested him earnestly to be advised and bethink himself that he brake not the rights either of friendship & hospitality begun with him, or of the league and society entred with the people of Rome: nor violated justice and faithfull promise made by giving right hands: nor yet beguile and abuse the gods, the witnesses and judges of all covenants and agreements made. But for as much as the coming of those Numidians could not be concealed (for they went all about the City, and were daily conversant in the Generall his lodging: and if it C should have been kept secret wherabout they came, it was to be doubted lest the truth the more it was smothered and dissembled, the more it would breake forth and come to light: and so the army was to stand in fear, that they were to war at once both with the king and Carthaginians. Scipio therefore buzzed aforehand into mens heads, false devised matters, and so withdrew them from the understanding of the truth indeed. He assembled all his souldiers together, and said unto them; "that now it was no longer staying and trifling out the time: bearing them in hand, that the "Kings, his allies and conferats, importuned him to set over into Africk with all convenient speed; "that Masanissa beforetime himself in person came to Lælius, grieving and complaining that the "time ran thus on in delaies and doing nothing: & Syphax now sent his Embassadors, musing much "and wondring what the cause should be of so long temporising: and requiring that either the ar- D "my without more ado, should be sent over at once: or else if their minds and purposes were chan- "ged, to certifie him so much, that he likewise might provide for himself and his kingdome. And "therefore he did them to wit and understand, that he intended (now that he was sufficiently pro- "vided and furnished of all things; and considering that the impresse might abide no farther stay,) "to conduct his armado to Lilybæum, to wait the first good day of wind and weather, to take the "seas for a bon-voiage, and with Gods grace and favour to set sail for Africk. His letters he dis- patched to Marcus Pomponius to this effect, that if he thought so good, he should repair to Lily- bæum, to the end they might commune and consult together, what legions especially, and what number of souldiers he should transport over with him into Africk. In like manner, he sent a la- bout the maritime and sea coasts, to stay all the carricks and ships of burden, and to bring them a- E way at once to Lilybæum. Now when all the ships and serviceable men in Sicily were assembled to Lilybæum, so as neither the City was able to receive the multitude of souldiers, nor the haven contein the number of the vessels; so earnestly minded they were all, and so hotly set upon their voiage into Africk, that they seemed as if they were conducted not to fight a war, but to enjoy the assured rewards of a victory. But especially above all others, the souldiers remaining of the Cannian army, were verily perswaded, that under this captain, or else none, by valiantly quitting themselves in the service of the Common-weal, they should be able to end and finish their ignominous and shamefull souldiery. And Scipio himself made no base account of those kind of souldiers, as knowing full well that the defeat received at Cannæ, was not occasioned by their cowardise: neither were there throughout the Roman army any souldiers so ancient and of so long con- F tinuance, or so well experienced not only in many and sundry foughten fields, but also in the assaulting of towns and Cities. And these Legions of Cannæ were the fift and sixt in order. Now when he had once resolved and given out, that he would transport them over with him into Africk, then he took a particular view of them, man by man. And having culled out those, and left them behind, whom he supposed unmeet and unsufficient, he substituted in their place those whom he had brought with him out of Italy: and so fully he supplied and made up his number of those Legions, that either of them had six thousand and two hundred foot, and three hundred men of armes. He chose also out of the same army of Cannæ, both horsemen and footmen, of the allies and confederats of the Latine nation. What power of souldiers in the whole were set over into Africk, writers differ not a little in the number. In some authours I find, that they G were ten thousand foot, and two thousand and two hundred horse: in others, fifteen thousand footmen, and fifteen hundred horsemen. In some records again, they were more by one halfe and better, namely, that of horse and foot there were embarked five and thirty thousand. And others there be that have set down no number at all, amongst whom, as in a matter so doubtfull and uncertain, I would my self be counted for one. But Cælius for his part, as he forbeareth to put down any number at all, so he seemed for to imply an infinite multitude of them, in that he saith that with a cry and shout that the souldiers set up, the very fouls of the air fell down to the ground:

and he that had ſeen the multitude of them when they went a ſhipboard, would have ſaid there H had not been a man left behindeither in Italy or in Sicily. Well how many or how few ſoever they were, Scipio himſelf took the charge to ſee the ſouldiers embarked in good order, and without any tumult. As for the ſailers and mariners, who were forced before to ſhipboord, C. Lælius the Admirall of the navy, kept them ſtill and quiet within their ſhips. M. Pomponius the Pretor had commiſſion for to furniſh the armado with corn and victuals; who made proviſion of food and ſuſtenance for 45 daies: of which there was of baked meats and other viands already dreſſed, as much as would ſuffice for 15 daies. Now when they were all embarked, he ſent about to all the ſhips, certain pinnaces or cock-boats, and commanded all the pilots and maſters of every ſhip, with two ſouldiers apeece, to come into market place, there to receive their charge. When they were all met and aſſembled together, firſt he enquired of them whether they had provided and taken into I their veſſels freſh water ſufficient both for man and beaſt, to hold out ſo many daies as their corn would ſerve? and when anſwer was made that they had water in their ſhips to laſt five and forty daies: then he charged and commanded the ſouldiers to keep ſilence and be quiet during their navigation, and without any ſtrife and contention to be obedient unto the mariners, and willing to help in any miniſtery and ſervice whatſoever, ſaying, that himſelf and L. Scipio would keep on the right wing with twenty ſtrong ſhips with braſen beak heads, and C. Lælius the Admirall with M. Porcius the Treaſurer on the left, with as many of the ſame ſort, to waſt over and guard the hulks and ſhips of burden: willing and requiring that there ſhould be light in all their veſſels, namely, that every braſen headed ſhip ſhould have one; each Carrick twain; and the Admirall ſhip, wherein the Generall was, three lights, for a ſpeciall mark, to be diſcerned from the reſt in K the night. And ſo he commanded the Pilots to ſteer and direct their courſe for Emporia. [The territory hereabout is moſt fertile and fruitfull, whereby the whole country aboundeth in plenty of all things: the barbarous peaſants (as commonly it falleth out in battell and plentifull lands) are cowards, and unapt for war, and it was thonght they might be ſurpriſed and ſubdued before any ſuccour could come from Carthage.] When theſe directions were given, they were commanded to retire to their ſhips, and the next morrow at the ſignall, with the help of the gods to weigh anchor, hoiſe up ſails and away. Many Roman Armadoes had aforetime ſet out of Sicily, and the very ſame port: but never any voiage all the time of that war, no, nor during the former, made ſo goodly a ſhew, and was ſo much looked on. And no marvell, for moſt of their other fleets were ſent out only to rob and to fetch in booties and prizes. And yet if a man would eſteem na- L vies by the number and greatneſſe of ſhips, there had been aforetime two Conſuls together, who went over with a power of two complete armies: & in every of thoſe fleets therewere welnett as many war ſhips with braſen beak heads, as hulks & carricks in thoſe that Scipio tranſported over. For beſides fifty long ſhips of war, he had not all out four hundred ſhips of burden and paſſage to tranſport over his army with. But if we would compare both wars together, the ſecond ſeemed unto the Romans more ſharp and cruel then the former; both becauſe it was fought within Italy, and alſo by reaſon of ſo great overthrows of ſo many armies, together with the loſſe and death of their Generall captains. Moreover great expectation there was of Scipio the Commander and Generall of this voiage, a man much renowned and talked of, both in regard of his own noble acts of cavalry, and alſo of a ſpeciall and ſingular fortune that followed him in all his exploits; where- M by he grew every day more glorious then other: which cauſed all mens hearts to be ſet upon him; beſide his very reſolution and mind that he carried, to paſs in Africk, which all the while of that war entred not into the head of any Captaine before him: in that he gave it out abroad, That he meant to go over, with intent to draw and fetch Annibal out of Italy, and to divert and tranſlate the war into Africk, and there to finiſh and make an end of it. There came running unto the haven to ſee the ſetting out of his Armado, the whole multitude, not only of the inhabitants of Lilybæum, but alſo the train of all the Embaſſages out of Sicily, which were come together for to accompany Scipio, and to do him honour, and alſo attended upon the Pretor of the province M. Pomponius. Over and beſides, thoſe legions alſo which were left behind in Sicily, went forward to bear their fellow ſouldiers company. So that not only the navy N was a goodly proſpect unto the beholders upon the land, but alſo the ſtrand ſo overſpread all about with numbers of people, made a brave and pleaſant ſhew unto theſe paſſengers, that were in the ſhips. When day light once appeared, Scipio from out of the Admirall (after ſilence commanded by voice of the crier) praied in this wiſe "O ye gods and goddeſſes all, that haunt and inhabit "ſeas and lands both, I beſeech and pray you to vouchſafe, that all that ever hath been done alrea- "dy, is now intended, or ſhall hereafter be enterpriſed, during my conduct and government, "may ſpeed well, and turn to the good of my ſelf, the people and commonalty of Rome, our "allies, and eſpecially thoſe of the Latine nation; who by land, by ſea, by rivers, follow the di- "rection, command, government, and fortune of my ſelf, and of the people of Rome, and that "in all our actions ye would be good, gracious, favourable, and helpfull unto us, and advance O "all our proceedings: that ye would grant us the victory over our enemies: and after we have "ſubdued them, to continue ſafe and ſound: and adorned with their goodly ſpoils, laden with their "rich pillage, to return home all together with glorious triumph: & give us the hand and oppor- "tunity to be revenged of our foes and mortall enemies: and deign me and the people of Rome "that power and ſtrength, to execute upon the City of the Carthaginians thoſe fearfull exam- "ples of cruelty, which the people of Carthage intended to practiſe and bring upon our City

A and ſtate. After theſe prayers thus pronounced, he took the raw inwards and purtenance of the beaſt killed for ſacrifice (as the maner is) and flung them into the ſea: and with that by ſound of trumpet, gave the ſignall of departure.

Now were they under ſail: having a good great gale of a forewind, they ſoon loſt the ſight of land. In the afternoon, there began to fall a thick miſt; by reaſon whereof the ſhips could hardly avoid running one upon another. But when they were once in the main and deep ſea, the wind became more mild: and all the night following, the ſame dark miſt continued ſtill. After the ſun was once up it brake and diſperſed, and then the wind again grew big and high, by which time they might diſcover land. And not long after, the pilot ſaid unto Scipio, that they were not B full too leagues from Africk; and that he ſaw well and diſcerned the cape or point of Mercurius: and if his will and pleaſure were thither to direct their courſe, preſently the whole armado ſhould be in the rode. Scipio ſo ſoon as he was within view of land, after he had made his prayers unto the gods, to bleſſe this firſt diſcovery of Africk to his own good and the benefit of the common-weal: gave commandment to ſail ſtill, and to put with the ſhore and ride at anchor in ſome bay beneath. So they made way with the ſame wind. But about that very time as the day before, they were miſted again, and loſt the ſight of land. And as the fog increaſed, the wind fell: the night alſo that came upon them beſides, made all things more doubtfull. Whereupon they caſt anchor, for fear that the ſhips ſhould hit one againſt another, or run aground. When day light aroſe, the ſame wind was up again, but the foggy miſt ſcattred; and then they might ſee plainly all the coaſt of Africk. Scipio then demanded what promontory it was that he ſaw next; and hearing that the name of it C was The head Pulchrum, [or The fair Cape] the name (quoth he) pleaſeth me, and the preſage thereof I like full well; even thither put the ſhips aland, and ſo the armado entred the bay, and all the hoſt was ſet aſhore. Thus have I reported that they had a proſperous voyage without any fearfull danger, or much trouble; giving credit herein to very manny writers, as well Greeks as Latines. Only Cælius (ſetting aſide that the ſhips were not caſt away and drowned amid the ſurging waves) writeth how other dangers both of water and weather encountred them: in ſo much as at the laſt the Armado was driven by tempeſt from the coaſts of Africk, and fell upon the Iland * Ægimurus, from whence they had much ado to recover their direct courſe again; and finally when the ſhips were at hand to ſink under the water, then the ſouldiers faring like men at point to ſuffer ſhipwrack, without lience and commandment of their Generall and without their armor, D in great fear made ſhift with boats to recover the ſhore. * Gaiette

The Romans thus being landed, pitched their tents among the hils next adjoyning. By which time the terror and fearfull fright of this their arrivall was not entred only into the Maritime coaſts and territories bounding upon the ſea, firſt upon the diſcovery of the fleet, and afterwards by reaſon of the rumor and tumult of the army, as it came aſhore; but alſo ſpred forward as far as to the good towns and very Cities. For not only the high waies were all filled and overſpred with multitudes of men, women and children, who went by heaps together one with another; but alſo the country peaſants drave before them whole herds of cattel: as a man would have ſaid that had ſeen it, how all Africk was like to be abandoned at once on a ſuddain: in ſuch ſort, as they put the Cities indeed in greater fear & perplexity then they were themſelves, and eſpecially Carthage above E all others: where there was no leſſe trouble and hurliburly, then if it had been ſurpriſed and forced by the enemie. For ſince that time that M. Attilius Regulus, and L. Manlius were Coſſ. for the ſpace almoſt of fifty yeers, they had not once ſo much as ſeen an army of Romans, but only certain fleets of rovers and men of war, who had landed at times, and made ſome rodes into the lands lying upon the ſea ſide: and when they had harried ſome prizes, ſuch as came next hand, they ever were retired again to the ſhips, before the alarme could be given to raiſe the country. The greater therefore now was both the flight and fright within the City. And to ſpeak a truth, good cauſe they had; by reaſon that there was neither at home in readineſs an army of puiſſance to encounter the enemy, nor a captain of valour to conduct and lead an army. Aſdrubal was the ſon of Giſgo, for nobility and high parentage, for honour and renown, for wealth and riches, and beſides for the new affinity then contracted with King, was of all others the perſonage by many degrees, yea, and the only man of the whole State. And him they remembred very well to have been foiled, diſcomfited and beaten out of the field in Spain, by the ſelf-ſame Scipio in divers and ſundry battels. Alſo they made accompt, they were no more able to match the Captains man for man, than to compare and ſet their tumultuary power raiſed in haſt, with the ſtaid and experienced army of the Romans. Therefore they gave the alarm preſently, as if Scipio were ready to aſſault Carthage out of hand: the gates with all ſpeed were ſhut and made ſure: the wals manned with ſouldiers: the corps de guard ſet: watch and ward kept: and all the night following the Sentinels duly relieved and mainteined. The next day, 500 light horſe were ſent out as eſpials and vancurriers to diſcover and ſcour the quarters to the ſea ſide; and withall to impeach them G that were a diſbarking and coming land: who chanced to light on the Romans corps de guard. For Scipio had ſent away the fleet already to Vtica, and before he was gone up into the land far from the ſea, had encamped upon the next hils thereby, placed guards of horſemen in convenient places, and put out certain forragers into the fields and villages for to raiſe booties. Theſe having entred skirmiſh with the Carthaginian cornet and horſemen, ſlew a few of them in the very conflict, but moſt of them as they fled and were followed in chaſe, amongſt whom was Hanno alſo the provoſt marſhall, a noble young gentleman. Scipio not only waſted the country all about, but alſo also wan a City of the Affricans that stood neerest, and was of sufficient wealth: where besides other pillage which was presently imbarked in the ships of burden and sent into Sicily, there were taken prisoners eight thousand polles of free and bond one with another. But the greatest joy and contentment that the Romans took in this new entrance and beginning of their warlike affairs, was for the coming of Masanissa; whom some report to have presented himself with 200 horse and no more: but the most do write that he came with 2000. But for as much as this Masanissa was of all other Kings for his time the greatest Prince and most puissant, and withall he that stood the Romans in best stead and helped their state, none like unto him: me thinks it were worth their labor, and would quit for all the paines, to digresse a litile out of the way, for to shew and declare in what variety of alternative fortune he was tossed, both in the losse and also in the recovery of the inheritance of his fathers kingdome.

This Masanissa, whiles he was employed during the wars of Spain, in the defence and quarrell of the Carthaginians; his father, whose name was Gala, hapned to die: and then the kingdome fell by descent, according to the custome and manner of the Numidians unto Desalces the late Kings brother, a man of great years and very aged. And not long after, when Desalces also was departed his life, Capusa the elder of his two sons, (for the other was a very child) succeeded in his fathers Kingdome. But for as much as he the foresaid Capusa maintained his royall state and throne, more by reason of the authority and reputation that he carried among his friends and favorits, than by power and strength: there arose up in arms one named Mezetulus (who also was descended of royall bloud, but of an house that was ever of the adverse and contrarie side) and contended in much variety of fortune about the crown, with those who then swayed the sceptet. This Mezetulus having gathered a power of his tenants, followers, and peasants of the country (with whom he carried a great stroke and was highly esteemed, by reason of the hatred that they bare unto the Kings race) encamped openly and shewed himself in action, yea, and forced the King to come into the field, and to trie the title of the crown in a set battell by dint of sword. In which conflict, Capusa, together with many of his peers and nobles were slain, and the whole nation and seignory of the Massilians, was reduced under the rule and obedience of Mezetulus. Howbeit he forbare to be called King; and contenting himself with the mean name of Tutor or Protector, gave the Kings stile to the child Lacumax, who only remained alive of the Kings issue and line. He took to wife a noble dame and lady of Carthage, Annibal his neece by his sister who had been lately wedded unto King Desalces; hoping thereby to enter into league and alliance with the Carthaginians: and besides, for to renew the ancient familiarity and amity with Syphax, he sent Embassadors unto him of purpose. Thus made he himself strong aforehand against Masanissa.

Masanissa likewise for his part, being advertised of his uncles death, and also how his cousin german was deceased, crossed the seas out of Spain over to Mauritania, at what time as Bocchar was King of the Moors. At whose hands by humble suite and importunat praiers in most lowly manner, he obteined a power of 4500 Moores to accompany him in the journey, for otherwise to employ them in war he might not. And after he had dispatched a messenger afore-hand to those that were his fathers friends and wel-willers to himself, by that time that he was come with them to the confines of his realm, there met him almost 500 Numidans. Having therefore sent back again the Moores from thence unto the King, according to covenant, albeit there was assembled together a smaller number of people then he hoped and looked for, and not so sufficient that he durst adventure upon so great an enterprise; and supposing withall, that by entring into some action, and by travell and endeavour, he should gather strength still to perform some great exploit, he encountred at Thapsus the yong king Lacumax, as he journied unto Syphax. And when the Kings company in great fear fled into the town, Masanissa both at the first assault won the said town, and also of the Kings train received some that yeelded themselves, and slew othersome that made resistance in their own defence. But the greatest part with the child himself the young Prince, got away in that tumult and escaped unto Syphax, unto whom at first they intended their journey. The fame of this small thing, so happily atchieved in the first beginning and entrance of his affairs, caused all the Numidians to revolt and side with Masanissa. So as there flocked unto him from all parts of the country, and out of the villages, the old souldiers of King Gala, and incited the yong Prince and set him on to recover his fathers kingdome. Now in number of souldiers, Mezetulus was a good deal superior: for both himself and the same army still entire, with which he had vanquished Capusa, besides had some others that after the slaughter of the King, he had received upon their yeelding: and also young Lacumax the infant, had brought great aids from Syphax: so that Mezetulus was fifteen thousand foot, and ten thousand horse strong. With whom Masanissa, albeit he were nothing so puissant either in foot or horse, fought a battell; yet atchieved he the victory through the approved valour of the old souldiers, and his own politick wisedome, being a captain well experienced and exercised both in the Roman and Punick wars. The young Prince together with his tutour and protectour, and some small number of Massilians, fled and escaped into the territories of the Carthaginians. Thus Masanissa having recovered his fathers Kingdome, and foreseeing that there remained still behind a far greater bickerment and encounter with Syphax, & taking it to be the best course and policy for him, to be reconciled and made friends with his cousin german: addressed certain messengers both unto the child, for to put him in good hope and assurance, that if he would submit and yeeld himselfe under the protection of

A of Maſaniſſa, he ſhould live in as honourable place and degree with him, as Deſalces ſometime had done with his father Gala: and alſo to Mezetulus to give their word and promiſe unto him, not only for impunity of all treſpaſſes, but alſo for faithfull reſtitution of all things that were his. By which means he perſwaded both of them to take part with him: who made choice of a mean eſtate at home in their own country, rather than to live in exile: notwithſtanding the Carthaginians laboured all that ever they could to the contrary.

Aſdrubal hapned at that time when theſe occurrences fell out, to make his abode with Syphax: who finding the Numidian King Syphax reſolved upon this point, and fully perſwaded, That it mattered not, nor imported himſelf much, whether Lacumax or Maſaniſſa were King of the Maſſilians, replied unto him and ſaid, that he was fouly deceived if he thought that Maſaniſſa B would keep himſelf within thoſe terms, that either his father Gala or his uncle Deſalces, held them contented with: No, no, (quoth he) there is much more towardneſſe in him and far greater ſignes of hauty mind and forward wit and ſpirit apear in him, then ever ſhewed in any of his houſe and line before him. Full often hath he in Spain made good proof of rare valour and ſingular proweſſe, as well unto his friends as his enemies. And let both Syphax and the Charthaginians look as well about them as they can, for unleſſe they put out this ſparkle of fire betimes, and even at the firſt beginning, it will be their chance to be caught therewith, when it ſhall burn forth; and able they ſhall not be to help the matter and quench the rage thereof. Mary, as yet his ſtrength is ſmall and ſlender, his forces frail, tender, and feeble, and not well united together to maintain his ſtate, unſelted as he is in his Kingdome. Thus he importuned him ſtill by reaſons and perC ſwaſions, until at length he reduced him to lead forth an army into the confines of the Maſſilians and there in that territory, about the title whereof he had oftentimes not only contended by plea and words with Gala, but alſo by arms and dint of ſword, to encamp himſelf as in his rightfull and undoubted inheritance: with this direction, that if any came againſt him to warn him off the ground, then to trie his intereſt by ſword: which was the only way to be taken and moſt for the purpoſe: but in caſe for fear of him they quit the poſſeſſion quietly, then to advance forward into the heart of the kingdome; for either the Maſſilians would without battell render themſelves under ſubjection, or elſe in a pitched field not be able to ſtand out againſt him. Upon theſe ſuggeſtions Syphax was incited and pricked on; inſomuch as he made war upon Maſaniſſa, and in the firſt battell diſcomfited and put to flight the Maſſilians. And Maſaniſſa with ſome few horſmen D fled out the field and eſcaped unto a mountain which the inhabitants call Balbus. Certain whole families and houſholds with their ſheds and tents, together with their cattell (which is all their riches) went after and followed the King. But all the multitude of the Maſſilians beſides, did homage unto Syphax and came under his obedience. This mountain aforeſaid, which theſe exiles that fled their country were poſſeſſed of, was plentifull of graſſe well watered; and being ſo good for paſture to feed their cattell, it yeelded ſufficient maintenance and food abundant, for the people that uſed to live upon fleſh and milk. From hence they began at firſt to ſteal out by night and make rodes: but afterwards in open day light to rob and ſpoil all the country about: but above all others to fire and burn the teritory of the Carthaginians: both becauſe there were more prizes to be had from thence, than from the Numidians; & alſo for that it was more ſafe robbing and harrying there E without danger. This they practiſed ſo long, ſo licentiouſly, and in ſuch ſcornfull manner, that now they would carrie their booties to the ſea ſide, and make markets & ſale therof to the merchants: and for this purpoſe divers ſhips arrived thither to traffick: yea, and otherwhiles there were many of the Carthaginians cut off and came ſhort home, and more of them were either ſlain or taken priſoners then oftentimes in open war and ſet battels. The Carthaginians bewailed and complained of theſe matters unto Syphax, and ſpurred him forward (diſpoſed well enough as he was of himſelf to revenge) for to purſue the reliques of the war, in his own perſon. But foraſmuch as it was not thought to ſtand with the royall Majeſtie of a King, to chaſe and hunt a rabble of vagF rant theeves about the mountains; therefore Bocchar one of the Kings Captains, a right hardy and valorous man, was choſen to do the feat, and to perform that ſervice. Who had the conduct of four thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe: and was promiſed beſides, great gifts and mighty rewards, in caſe he brought away the head of Maſaniſſa: but if he could take him priſoner alive, that were alone indeed, and a peerleſſe peece of work, of ineſtimable joy beyond all meaſure. He waiting his time when the enemies were ſtragling retcheleſſely abroad, came upon them at unawares and charged them, and having ſingled from the guard of the armed ſouldiers, a huge number both of people and cattel, he forced Maſaniſſa himſelf with ſome few horſmen to take the top of the mountain. From whence after he had ſent away unto the King (as if the war had now been at point of an end) not only a great booty of people and cattell, the which he had taken, but alſo part of his forces, as being much greater in proportion, then for to diſpatch the remnants of a war, accompanyed with no more then five hundred foot, and two hundred G horſe, he purſued Maſaniſſa being come down from the hill tops, and there having beſet and ſtopped the paſſages at both ends, encloſed him within the ſtreight and narrow vally. Where there was committed a great exceution and ſlaughter of the Maſſilians, but Maſaniſſa with fifty horſemen and not above, got away through the unknown and hidden cranks of the mountain, and eſcaped the hands of the purſuers. Howbeit, Bocchar traced him ſtill, and followed him at heels ſo narrowly, that neer to the City Clupea he overtook him in the plains, where he ſo ſtreightly environed him about, that he killed all his company every one, ſave onely four horſemen.

With whom in that tumult he let ſlip as it were out of his hands Maſaniſſa alſo himſelf ſore H wounded and loſt him clean. As he fled, he had ſtill in his eie certain cornets of horſmen diſperſed all over the plain, and ſome of them croſſing the waies overthwart to meet the enemy at every turn, and to intercept him. But he and the four horſmen with him fled forwards ſtill, and took the great river before them: for their fear and fright was greater then to make any ſtay at the bank ſide, but to put their horſes to it, and plunge in: where they were carried with the current of the ſtream and born to a ſide: two of them in the ſight of the enemies were ſwallowed up of the deep burlpits; himſelf alſo was ſuppoſed to have periſhed with them, but he and the other two horſmen beſides caught hold of certain twigs of oiſiers that grew under the banks on the farther ſide. So Bocchar made an end of farther purſuit, as neither daring to take the river, nor beleeving that he had any enemy for to chaſe. And thus returned he to the King with falſe news, that Maſaniſſa I was drowned. And divers poſts and curriers were ſent out to Carthage, to report theſe exceeding joyfull tidings. This rumour and fame of Maſaniſſa his death being noiſed all over Africk wrought diverſly in the minds of men. But Maſaniſſa keeping himſelf cloſe in a ſecret cave, whiles he cured his hurt with certain herbes, lived for ſome daies by the foraging and robbery of the other two horſmen. So ſoon as the wound was once healed up and skinned over, and that he thought himſelf able to abide the ſitting and ſhaking of his horſe, with exceeding courage & bold-neſſe he ſet forward again to claim and recover his kingdome. And having in the way as he paſſed gotten together unto him not above forty horſe, by that time he was come among the Maſſilians, and gave out openly who he was, he prevailed ſo much with them, that as well in regard of their ancient favour and love toward him, as alſo for the unexpected joy that they ſaw him alive and K found, whom they verily beleeved to have been dead; within few daies there were gathered and aſſembled unto him 6000 foot, and 4000 horſe. So as not only he was reſtored again, and put in full poſſeſſion of his fathers Kingdome, but alſo waſted and ſpoiled the confederat nations of the Carthaginians, yea, and the frontiers and confines of the Maſæſyli, which belongeth to the Kingdome and dominion of Syphax. Having thus provoked Syphax to war, he ſet him down and encamped between the Cities of Cirtha and Hippo, upon the ridge of certain hils, places of advantage and commodious in all reſpects. Then Syphax ſuppoſing it a greater peece of work, and of more importance then to be managed by his captains, ſent part of his forces under the conduct of his ſon, the young Prince named Vermina, and gave order unto him to wheel about with his power, and whiles the enemy was amuſed upon himſelf one way, to charge upon him behind another L way. So Vermina ſet forth, and took his way by night, becauſe he was to give the charge cloſely, and in ſecret. But Syphax, who was to ſhew himſelf with banner diſplaied, and to bid the enemy battell, marched openly by day light, and advanced forward. And when the time (as he thought) was come, wherein they that were ſent about to fetch a compaſs, might reach to the place appointed, himſelf alſo truſting as well in the multitude of his men, as in the ambuſh laid before at the enemies back, ſet his battell in array; directly upon the ſide of the hill, which with gentle and eaſie aſcent ariſeth, and leadeth towards the enemy. Maſaniſſa likewiſe arranged his men, preſuming moſt of all in the plot of ground, which ſerved much better for his advantage to fight. The battell was ſharp and cruell, and for a long time doubtfull. Whiles the ſite of the place, and valour of the ſouldiers much helped Maſaniſſa; and the number again on the other ſide, which M exceeded beyond all meaſure, and made too great odds, availed Syphax. This multitude divided into two battaillons, whiles the one was oppoſed affront the enemy, and the other compaſſed about their tail and back part, gave the victory cleer unto Syphax: inſomuch, as the enemy thus en-cloſed both before and behind, had no way in the world to eſcape. Whereupon all the footmen and horſmen both were either killed or taken priſoners. Only two hundred horſmen or very neer ſo many, which were gathered in a ring together about Maſaniſſa, he commanded to caſt themſelves by troops and ſquadrons into three ſeveral companies, and ſo to pierce and break through: but firſt he appointed them a certain place before, where they ſhould rally and meet together again after their ſcattered flight. Himſelf in perſon, at one ſide which he had propoſed to himſelf before, made means to paſs through the very pikes and darts of the enemies, and eſcaped. Two of thoſe N quadrons tarried ſtill behind, the one for fear yeelded to the enemy, the other ſticking to it, and making more reſiſtance, was overcharged with ſhot of arrows and darts. But Maſaniſſa winding in and out, to and fro, deluded Vermina, who preſſed hard upon him, and followed him faſt at heels: and after he had wearied him out at length in tedious travail and deſperate purſute, cauſed him perforce to gave over the chaſe. Whiles he himſelf with ſeventy horſe gat away as far as to the leſs * Syrtes, where he ſet up his reſt, and quieted his conſcience, in that he had ſo often right valiantly fought to recover the inheritance of his fathers Kingdome: and led his life between the
* Punick Emporia and the nation of the Garamants, untill the arrivall of the Roman navy, and C.
Lælius into Africk. Theſe preſumptions induce me to think and beleeve, that Maſaniſſa came afterwards alſo unto Scipio with a ſmall power of horſmen, rather then with any great aid. For O that multitude was befitting the ſtate of a Prince, eſtabliſhed in his Kingdome, but this ſmall number beſeemed the mean condition and fortune of a poor exile and baniſhed man.

Now to return again unto our ſtory. The Carthaginians having loſt the cornet of horſmen a-foreſaid, together with their captain, and raiſed another power of horſe, by taking new muſters, made Hanno the ſon of Amilca commander over them. And firſt by meſſengers and letters miſſive

* Golfo di Caps. Theſe Syrtes, as well the greater as the leſſe, are in the Mediteranean ſea neer Africk full of ſhelves and bars; and are called Secche or Baxos de Barbaria.

* The ſea coaſts neer the Syrtes, ſo called for their fertility, as Ortelius hath noted out of Polybius.

A missive they sent for Asdrubal and Syphax one after another, and at last also even by Embassadors and Orators. As for Asdrubal, they required him to succour his native country, beset in manner round about: Syphax they besought and requested to provide for the safety and fence of Carthage and all Africk.

At that time Scipio was encamped neer Vtica, within a mile of the City: for he was removed from the sea side, where some few daies, he kept a standing camp close to the fleet. Hanno having received a power of Cavalry, nothing sufficient and strong enough to charge upon the enemie, nor so much as to guard and defend the country from wasting and spoiling, first before all other things
B cast about and devised, how he might augment his number of horsemen by a new levy and enrolment. And albeit he rejected none of other nations, yet he levied and waged the Numidians especially, the best horsemen simply in all Africk. Now had he gathered together upon four thousand horse, when he surprised a City named Salera, almost fifteen miles from the Roman camp. And when word was brought to Scipio, that so great a Cavalry took up their summer standing harbour within a town; Tush (quoth he) I passe not, if they were more then they are, so long as they have such a one to be their leader. And thinking with himself that the more slowly the enemies
C went to work, the lesse he was to slack his business, he sent Masanissa before with the horsemen, and gave commandment to ride up and down before the gates, to brave the enemy, and to train him forth to fight: with this direction, that when their whole multitude was issued forth, and the skirmish grown so hot, that he might not well endure the charge, he should give ground and retreat by little and little, for he would himself come in due time to the battell. And staying no longer behind, then whiles he thought Masanissa who was gone before, had time enough to train the enemies forth, he followed after in person with the Roman horsmen, & marched closely under the hils (which stood fitly for the purpose, opposit between him and the enemy) about every turning of the way. Masanissa for the purpose according to the direction given him, one while right
D courageously gallopped before the gates, as one that would brave and terrifie the enemy, another while as if he had been affraid himself, gave back; and by this counterfeit shew of fearfulnesse, he made the enemies more bold and venturous, and drew them on to pursue him rashly. But as yet they were not all gone forth, and their captain was diversly troubled, and had much ado with them, while he was fain to force and compell some that had taken their load of wine, and were heavy-headed and sleepy withall, to arm themselves and to bridle their horses, and to stay others from running out of the gates at once confusedly, without order or array, and without their colours. Masanissa caught up those, and cut them short, that a part from their company at the first setting out, rode venturously forward, and took no heed to themselves: but anon when more of them rushed forth at once out of the gate, the skirmish was maintained with equall valour on both sides
E and at last, when the horsmen were abroad and joyned in battell, Masanissa was not possibly able to hold out any longer. Howbeit he fled not outright, but as he gave back leisurely, he received them as they violently charged upon him: so long, untill he had trained them to those hils, under which the Roman Cavalry lay hidden. Then rose the horsemen from out of their ambush, themselves in heart, and their horses fresh; and environed Hanno and the Africans, who with fighting and following were tired out and overwearied: Masanissa likewise turned his horses suddainly, and made head again, and returned to battel afresh: so there were environed, intercepted, and killed in the place together with Hanno himself the Generall, fast upon a thousand, even as many as were in the vanguard, and could not well retire themselves backward. The rest affrighted with the death of their leader, fled with bridle on horse neck: whom for the space of three miles the conquerors followed in chase upon the spur, and either slew and took prisoners two thousand horsemen of them besides. Amongst whom there were, as it is for certain known, no fewer than two hundred naturall Carthaginians, men of armes, and divers of them of good mark, both in regard of wealth and riches, as also of birth and noble parentage.

It fortuned that the very same day when this hapned, the ships which had transported over the booty in to Sicily, returned back charged with provision of victuals, as if they had presaged & foretokened by their arrivall, that they were come for a new pillage and fresh prizes. But all writers do not accord, that two Carthaginian captains of one name were slain in two battels, of the Cavalry: for fear (as I verily take it) lest by telling one thing twice, they might seem to deceive and abuse the reader. Certes Cælius and Valerius report that Hanno was taken prisoner. Then Scipio bestowed rich gifts upon the captains and horsemen according to their good service, and as they every one deserved: but above all the rest, he highly rewarded Masanissa. And when he had placed a strong garrison in Salera himself with the rest of his army made rodes; and not only wasted and spoiled the lands and villages all the way as he went, but also forced and won certain Cities and borough towns: and so having filled all places far and neer with the terror of war & hostility, he returned to the camp, the seventh day after he set forth, bringing with him great numbers of people, much store of cattell and prizes of all sorts; and so dispatched away the ships a second time straight and laden with spoils of the enemies. After this he set aside all light expeditions, small rodes and pillage of the country towns, and bent his whole power and all his forces against Vtica, intending if he had once won it, to settle himself there, and to make it his seat from thence forward, and a sure place of defence in all his other exploits that he meant to perform. Thither at one time were the sea-servitors brought from the armado, to that part of the City where the sea beateth upon the wals: likewise the land souldiers advanced from the hill that overlooketh

the town, and joyneth in manner hard to the very wals. As for artillery and engines of battery and assault, some they had brought with them, and others were sent out of Sicily with the victuals: and daily new were made in the common Armory and Arcenall, where there were of purpose artificers continually kept at work for the framing of such fabricks and peeces of battery. The men of Vtica beset thus round about on every side with so great preparation and ordinance of war, reposed their whole hope and confidence in the Carthaginians; and the Carthaginians relied themselves upon Asdrubal, in case he should sollicite Syphax for to set to his helping hand. But all things went but slowly forward, and they bestirred themselves not so quickly, as they should have done, who wanted so much aid as they did. And Asdrubal when he had with all the means and the best shift that he could make, gathered together thirty thousand foot and three thousand horse, yet durst he not approach the enemy, before the coming of Syphax to joyn with him. At length came Syphax with fifty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse: and immediately departing from Carthage, encamped not far from Vtica and the Roman camp. Whose arrivall yet was so important, and wrought this effect; that Scipio after forty dayes welneer (during which time he had invested Vtica and tried all mastries but in vain) was compelled to remove his siege & dislodge, without doing any good at all. For now the winter approached, and he fortified his standing leaguer for winter harbour upon a promontory, which joyning to the continent by a thin and narrow ridg of a bank, lieth out a good way and beareth into the sea. And with one and the self-same trench and rampier, he empaled both his army, and also the ships that lay up in the dock. The legions were quartred and lodged in the mids of the said cape: the ships that were drawn up to land, and likewise the sailers and mariners, kept the strand on the north side of the hill; the horsemen took up the vail towards the south, upon the hanging and side therof, shooting to the other shore. And these were the acts atchieved in Africk untill the end of Autumn.

Besides the provision of corn garthered from all parts out of the countries pilled and wasted round about, and other store of victuals brought out of Sicily and Italy, Cn. Octavius the Vice-pretor arrived with a mighty deal of grain out of Sardinia, sent from T. Claudius the Pretor, who had the government of that Iland: so as not only the old garners already made were replenished, but also those that were newly built. Only there wanted apparell for the army. Whereupon Octavius had in commission to break with the Pretor about that matter, namely, what liveries might be provided out of that province, and sent for the supply of that defect. Which busines was not slackly followed, but with all diligence performed, in such sort, as in short space there were sent over 1200 side horsmens coats, and 12000 short cassocks and jackets.

During the time of that summer wherein those occurences passed in Africk, P. Sempronius the Consul who governed the Province of the Bruttii, skirmished suddainly in a disordred manner with Annibal upon the very way, within the territory of Croton: where the fight was mainteined rather by squadrons and companies one to one, then by any set body of a ranged battell. The Romans were discomfited; and having lost in this conflict (which might more truly be called a tumultuous scuffling than a full fight) upon 1200 of the Consuls army, they retired in great hast and fear into their camp. Yet durst not the enemies make an assault upon them within their hold. But the Consul dislodged from thence in the dead time of the next night, and having dispatched a courier before unto P. Licinius the Vice-consul, for to come forward with his legions, he joyned his power unto them. So they returned again unto Annibal, being now two Generals, and two entire armies. And without any stay, to battell they went: whiles the Consul on the one side stood upon this his power redoubled and reenforced, & Annibal on the other side took heart for his fresh victory aforesaid. Sempronius advanced with his legions into the vanguard; P. Licinius with his, kept the rerewards. The Consul at the very first shock and beginning of the conflict, vowed a chappell to Fortune under the name of Primigenia, in case he might have the honour of that day, and vanquish his enemies. And surely his vow was heard, and he obteined his desire: for the Carthaginians was discomfited and put to flight, and more than four thousand armed men slaine, three hundred or somewhat under taken prisoners, forty horse of service got alive, and 11 ensigns won and carried away. Annibal dismayed and daunted at this adverse and unlucky battell, withdrew his forces to Croton.

At the same time M. Cornelius the Consul, in another side of Italy held in awe Hetruria not so much by force of armes, as by rigorous processe of law and severe justice: for all that country in maner was turned to Mago, and by his means and favor hoped for a change, and were altogether set upon novelties & an alteration of the state. The examinations and judicial trials of these matters the Consul followed by vertue of commission from the Senat, and not upon his own motive and seeking: and went through therewith, setting aside all partiality, nothing respective of favour or displeasure. In such sort, that many of the nobility of Tyscane (such as either had repaired themselves in person, or had sent their agents unto Mago, for to treat with him about the revolt and rebellion of the States wherein they lived) were at first, as many as made personall apparance, condemned: but afterwards, such as had guilty consciences, went into voluntary exile: and being condemned in their absence, in stead of their bodies which were gone out of the way, they yeelded and left behind them their goods only, which might be forfeit and confiscat a pawns to pay for the punishment of their persons.

Whiles the Cons. was thus employed in divers places one from the other, the Censors in the mean

A mean time at Rome, M. Livius and C. Claudius held a new choice and review of Senators: and Q. Fabius was once again chosen the principall Senator and President of the Senat. Seven in number of them were noted with ignominy and disgrace, but not one of all those had sitten in the ivory chair and born office of state. They looked narrowly and most faithfully to the Publicans, that had the charge of the City-buildings to see them kept wind-tight and water-tight, and in sufficient reparations. They publickly gave order for a paved causie to be made, from the beasts market unto the temple of Venus, and all about the shops and scaffolds in the shew-places. Also the church * Magna Mater [the great mother of the gods] they caused to be built in the mount Palatine. They instituted also a new tax and impost out of the provision of salt. And whereas both at Rome and throughout all Italy, salt was sold at a * Sextant by the Modius, they set and fermed this commo-B dity, to be served out of the same price still in Rome; but in the market towns and fairs, they enhanced the price higher, and in sundry places they rated it at divers prices. This tax was devised as all men verily beleeved, by the one of the Censors, for anger, and an old grudg that he bare unto the people; because he had been in times past unjustly judged and condemned by them, and therefore in the pension and price of salt they supposed that those tribes were most pinched and charged who were the means of the hard doom that passed against him. Hereupon it came that this Livius was surnamed Salinator. The cense and numbring of the Citizens was finished the later, because the Censors had sent about into all provinces, that the full number should be taken of C all Roman Citizens, who were without in the armies, and presentment made accordingly. So there were registred in all, with those abroad two hundred and seven & fifty thousand persons. And C. Claudius Nero was he that performed and accomplished this numbring and assessment. After this there was a Cense or taxation taken of the twelve Colonies, a thing then brought up and never before. And according to the relation of the Censors they were entred into the subsidy book at Rome: that it might appear upon record in the publick instruments and writings, what number of able men for war they could make, and what every man was worth in money and goods. Then they began to take a survey of the gentlemen and knights at Rome. And it fortuned so, that both Censors had horses of the City provision and charges. And when the crier came to cite those of the tribe Pollia wherein the name of M. Livius was enrolled, & made some stay to call the Cen-D sor himself by name: Call hardly (quoth Nero) for M. Livius. And whether it were upon the reliques of an old canckred malice, or that he took a fooliſh pride and vain delight to seem forsooth to be severe and precise, he commanded M. Livius to sell his horse of service, because he had been sometimes a man condemned by the doom of the people. Semblaly M. Livius when the crier was come unto the tribe Narniensis, and to the name of his collegue, awarded C. Claudius to sell and make away his great horse likewise; and that for two causes, the one for that he had born false witness and deposed wrongfully against him: the other, because he was not soundly and in truth of E heart reconciled unto him, when they were made friends. Whereupon there grew a foul jar and contention between them, whiles they passed not to impeach and stein the credit one of the other even with the touch and hazard of their own good name and reputation. At the end of the Censorship, when C. Claudius had sworn to keep and observe the lawes, and was ascended up into the chamber of the Cities treasure; among the other names of those that he left as disfranchised and tributaries, he declared his collegue for one, and gave up his name in the roll. Afterwards came M. Livius into the chamber aforesaid, and setting aside the tribe Metia only (which neither had condemned himself, nor elected him a condemned person for Consul or Censor) he declared the F whole people of Rome likewise suspended, even four and thirty tribes; and left them all no better then meer strangers and aliens, in regard of taxes and tributes: and why? because they had both condemned him, an innocent and guiltles man: and being thus condemned, had created him Coss. and Censor notwithstanding: neither could they deny but that they had ered and done amisse in their judgement, and twice in their elections. And among those four and thirty tribes, he pronounced that C. Claudius also should be reckoned for one: protesting moreover, that if he could have found any one precedent, to have led him to the disfranchising one man twice, he would have left C. Claudius by name, as a noted person by himself, in the checkroll of the City cham-
G ber.

Surely that reciprocall debate between the two Censors, in depraving and defaming one another was but a lewd and naughty part by them plaid: but this chastisement of the peoples levity and inconstancy, was a worthy thing, and beseeming the Censors gravity of that time. While the Censors stood thus in exceeding disgrace and hatred with the people, Cn. Bebius a Tribune of the Commons taking his time and occasion hereby to rise and become great, endited them both and commenced an action against them before the body of the people. But this designment of his was soon dasht and came to nothing, though the generall accord and content of the LL. of the councell; to the end that in time to come, no such example might be extant upon record, that the Censors dignity should be exposed to the variable and inconstant pleasure of the people.

The same summer in the Brutians country, Petilia had been already forced and won by the Cos. when as Consentia and Pandosia, with other mean and base peeces, willingly yeelded themselves to his devotion. Now when the time drew neer of the election of new magistrats, it was thought good that Cornelius shoud be sent for to Rome out of Tuscany, where there was no war at all, rather then the other Consul out of his province: who being come, created for Consuls Cneus Servilius Capio, and Cn. Servilius Geminus. After this, the court was assembled for the chusing of Pretours, where-

* Cybele, or Idæa At this time it appeareth by Festus and other that that Asses were Sextentarii and not Librales, at Rome so that Sextans which before was the sixth part of an Asse, a cue or half farthing english now was raised to the worth of the whole and valued at three farthings, the price of a Modius of salt in Rome, set down by Livius Salinator.

wherin were elected P. Cornelius Lentulus, P. Quintilius Varus, P. Ælius Paetus, and P. Villius Tappulus. These two last were Ædiles of the Commons when they were chosen Pretors. The Consul after these elections were finished and past, returned unto his army again in Hetruria. Certain Priests and Prelats that year died, and new were chosen in their rooms. P. Veturius Philo, Flamin of Mars was created, installed and inaugurated, instead of M. Æmylius Regillus, who deceased the year before. And in place of M. Pomponius Matho, who was both Augur and Decemvir, there was advanced into dignity of Decemvir, M. Aurelius Cotta: and into the office of Augur, Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, a very yong man: a rare thing to be seen in those daies, in the bestowing of sacerdotall and church-promotions. In that year was set up in the capitol a chariot drawn with 4 steeds, all of beaten gold, by C. Livius and M. Servilius Geminus, Ædiles of the chair for the time being. The Romã games also were exhibited & renewed again for 2 daies: likewise the plaies & pastimes called Plebeii, for other 2 daies by the Ædiles of the Commons, P. Ælius & P. Villius. And for the great honor of those games, the feast of Jupiter was solemnly kept and celebrated.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the thirtieth Book.

IN Africk, Scipio by the help of Masanissa in sundry battels vanquished the Carthaginians, together with the afore-said Syphax King of the Numidians, and Asdrubal. He won and sacked two campes of the enemies, wherein there perished by fire and sword, to the number of 40000 men. By the means of C. Lælius he took Syphax alive. Masanissa when he had taken prisoner queen Sophonisba, the wife of Syphax and daughter of Asdrubal, by and by fell in love with her, and by way of marriage took her to wife: but being chastised and rebuked therefore by Scipio, he sent unto her a cup of poison: which she drank, & therof died. By manifold victories of Scipio it came to pass, that the Carthaginians driven to despair, were fain to call for Annibal out of Italy, to save the main chance, and defend their whole state: Who, in the 16 year of the wars, departed out of Italy, sailed over into Africk, & assisted by means of conference, to make peace with Scipio. And when they could not agree about the conditions & capitulations thereof, he fought, & was overthrown in the plain field. The Carthaginians at their suit & request had peace granted. And when Gisgo disswaded that peace, Annibal plucked him back with his hand, & so after some excuse made of his rudenesse in that behalf, himself spake for peace. Mago who had fought with the Romans in the country of the Insubrians, was grievously wounded, & being sent for home into Africk by certain embassadors, in the way died of his hurt. Masanissa was fully restored to his kingdome. Scipio being returned to the City of Rome, had the glory of a most honourable and noble triumph: whom, Q. Terentius Culleo, a Senator, followed with a cap [of freedome] upon his head. Scipio was surnamed Affricanus: but doubtfull it is, whether he came by that title through the favour of his souldiers before, or the general applause and affection of the people. But this is certain, that he was the first general that ever was intitled in his stile, with the surname of a nation by himself conquered.

The thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

WHen Cn. Servilius Cepio, and C. Servilius Geminus (Coss. in that year, which by computation was the 16 of the 2 Punick war) proposed unto the Senat, concerning the affairs of the State, the managing of the wars, and the government of the provinces: the LL. ordained and gave order, that the Coss. should either agree beween themselves, or else cast lots whether of them should go into the Brutian land against Annibal: and whether should take upon him the charge of the province of Hetruria and the Ligurians: with commission for him, whose hap it was to rule the province of Brutii, to receive the army from P. Sempronius the Consul; and the said P. Sempronius (for he also as Vice-consul was to continue in place of government one year longer) to succeed in the room of P. Licinius, who was to return home to Rome. This P. Sempronius among other commendable parts (wherein no Citizen in his time was counted more sufficiently furnished than himself) was taken also for a brave warrior and man at arms. For being richly endued with all those good blessings that either nature or fortune can afford unto a man, he was both noble in birth, and wealthy in substance. In beautifull personage he excelled, for strength of body he far surpassed. Of tongue and speech he was thought most eloquent, whether he were to plead a cause at the bar, or occasion offered either in Senat house or before the assembly of the people to perswade or disswade, to give counsel one way or other. In the Pontificiall canons and laws, he was singularly well learned and skilfull. Besides all these praise-worthy qualities (I say) his Consulship had given him exeperience also in military affairs, and made him a worthy souldier. The same order that was taken for the Brutians province

A vince, was also decreed for Hetruria and the Ligurians. M. Cornelius was commanded to put over and deliver up his army to the new Consul: and himself to continue still in government, and to rule the province of France with the strength of those legions which L. Scribonius the Pretor had under his charge the year before. After this, the Consuls cast lots for their provinces. Unto Cæpio fell the Bruttii, unto Servilius Geminus, Hetruria. Then the Pretors provinces also were put to the choice of lottery. And P. Ælius his lot was to have the jurisdiction of the City of Rome: P. Lentulus to rule Sardinia: P. Villius to govern Sicily: and Quintilius Varus to have the charge of Ariminum with two legions, which were commanded by Sp. Lucretius. And Lucretius had his commission revived again for a longer time, to the end, that he might reedifie the town Gentia, which by Mago the Carthaginian had been rased and destroied. As for P. Scipio his commission
B and government was not limited by any expresse time, but only with the end of the wars, and to continue untill those wars in Africk were fully determined. A decree also passed, that there should be a solemn procession and supplication holden to this effect, and in these terms, that wheras he had sailed over into the province of Africk, this voiage and expedition of his might turn to the safety and good of the people of Rome, of himself, and his army. In Sicily were enrolled three thousand souldiers. And for as much as the whole strength and manhood of that province had been shiped over into Africk: for fear lest some Armado should cut over out of Africk, it was thought expedient to guard all the sea coasts of Sicily, with a fleet of 40 sail. And Villius had with C him into Sicily 13 ships, newly built; the rest of the old ships in Sicily were repaired. For Admirall of this armado was apointed M. Pomponius the Pretor of the former year, whose government was prorogued, and he embarked the new souldiers brought out of Italy. The like number of ships the LL. of the Senat assigned unto Cn. Octavius the Pretor of the former year, with the same commission of government, for to defend the coasts of Sardinia. And Lentulus was commanded to allow unto the Pretor 2000 souldiers for to man and furnish those ships. Moreover, the sea coasts of Italy, because it was uncertain to what parts the Carthaginians would make out their navy (and like it was, that where they should espy any place weak and disfurnished of sufficient strength and garrison, thither they would direct and bend their forces) were committed to M. Martius the Pretor of the former year, that he should scour the seas, and keep that side, with as many ships D as the other. And for to furnish that fleet of his, the Consuls by order from the Senat enrolled three thousand souldiers, and reserved two legions besides, against all doubtfull chances of war whatsoever. As for the two provinces of Spain, together with the armies there, and the whole government, they were appointed to the old Generals, L. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus. So the Roman wars for that year were mainteined with 20 legions in all, & with a hundred and sixty ships of war. Then the Pretors were commanded to take their journey into their several provinces. But the Consuls were charged before they departed from the City, to exhibite those great Games, which T. Manlius Torquatus the Dictator had vowed against the 5 years end, if so be the Commonweal remained in the same good and fortunat estate, during that time.

Now there entred into mens minds new doubts and strange scruples of conscience, by reason divers prodigious sights and tokens reported out of many places. For beleeved it was that certaine E ravens not only pecked and rased with their bils, but also eat and devoured the gold in the Capitoll. At Antium the mice and rats gnawed a crown of gold. About Capua, a huge number of locusts (but from whence they came, no man knew for certain) overspred all the grounds, and filled the fields. At Reate there was a horse-colt foled with five feet. At Anagnia were seen in the element, at the first divers fire-lights shooting and flashing here and there; and afterwards a mighty blasing comet burning. At Frusino a certain arch compassed the sun with a thin course like a line: and afterwards a greater circle of the sun enclosed the said rundle from without-forth. In the territory of Arpi, the earth in a plain champain field setled and sunk down and made an exceeding great chink. As one of the Consuls killed the first beast for sacrifice, the liver thereof was found headless. These monstrous tokens were expiat and purged with sacrifices of the F bigger sort: and the colledg of the Priests and bishops shewed unto what gods the sacrifice should be made. These things once done and performed, the Consuls and Pretors went forth into their provinces: yet so, as all of them had a speciall regard of Africk, as if it had been their own province fallen unto every one of them by lot; either because they saw that therein rested and consisted the whole importance of all affairs, and the main state of the war: or else because they would gratifie and currie favour with Scipio, whom now the whole City made court to, and chiefly respected. And therefore not only out of Sardinia as is beforesaid, but also out of Sicily and Spain there was transported thither raiment and corn: yea, and armour also out of Sicily, and all kind of victuals, for the maintenance of the army. And albeit it was winter season, yet Scipo slaked no affairs and works of war: which being many, amused his mind at once on every G side, and kept him continually occupied. For Utica he besieged and encamped he lay opposit to Annibal, and even within his sight; the Carthaginians were with their ships aflote, and put to sea, and a navy they had rigged, furnished and trimmed, for to intercept all victuals that came. Amid these cares he forgat not to win again the love of Syphax, if haply now he had his fill of love-delights with his fresh wife, since he had the plentifull fruition thereof, as much as heart could desire. But Syphax rather tendred conditions of peace between the Romans and the Carthaginians, to wit, that the Romans should depart out of Africk, and the Carthaginians out of Italy, than seemed to give any hope, that he would revolt from the Carthaginians, in case the war con-

continued ſtill. And for mine own part, I would rather beleeve that theſe matters were treated upon by entercourſe of meſſengers, as moſt writers do report, than that Syphax himſelf in perſon, as Antias Valerius recordeth, came into the Roman camp to aparle and conference thereabout. At the firſt the Roman Generall, would ſcarcely lend his ear to hear thoſe overtures: but afterwards, to the end that there might be ſome colourable and probable cauſe for his people to reſort unto the camp of the enemies, he ſeemed not ſo ſtreight-laced, nor to deny the ſame articles ſo ſtiffly, but pretended ſome hope, that by often debating thereof to and fro between them, they ſhould at length grow to ſome good point and finall agreement. The wintering harbours of the Carthaginians were in a manner all of wood, but built of ſlender ſtuff gathered out of the fields at a venture hand over head, where they could meet withall. The Numidians for the moſt part lay in cabbins and ſheds, watled and wound with reeds eſpecially, and covered and thatched with mats of ledge and ſuch like, here and there ſcattering without all order: in ſuch ſort, as ſome of them taking up their lodging at their own pleaſure, without direction and commandment of any officer, quartered without the trench and rampier. Scipio advertiſed hereof, conceived good hope to find ſome opportunity one time or other to fire the camp of the enemies. Upon a certain day therefore, he ſent in train of thoſe Commiſſioners whom he addreſſed unto Syphax, in ſtead of pages and drudges, and diſguiſed in ſlaves and bondmens weeds, the braveſt ſouldiers of a band, (men of approved valor, wiſdome and diſcretion) who whiles the commiſſioners were buſie in conference, ſhould range about the camp, ſome one way, ſome another; to eſpie and mark all the paſſages and waies in and out; the ſite and form generally of the whole leaguer, and particularly of every part; where the Carthaginians quartered; where the Numidians lodged; what diſtance there was between Aſdrubal his tents, and the Kings pavilions; to obſerve alſo and learn withal, the order & the manner of their ſentinels, their ward and watches, whether by night or by day they lay at more vantage to be ſurpriſed by an ambuſh. And according as there were divers meetings & conferences, and ſo of purpoſe ſome were ſent one time, ſome at another: to the end that more & more ſtill ſhould have the ſpiall and full knowledge of all things in the enemies camp. Now when as often that this matter was treated of, the greater hope of peace both Syphax had and the Carthaginians likewiſe by his means; the Delegates or Commiſſioners aforeſaid of the Romans, ſaid that they were expreſly forbidden by their Generall to return without a full and reſolute anſwer. And therefore they willed him to make ſhort work at once, and to bethink himſelf what to do, either to ſtand upon his own determinat purpoſe (if he were reſolved) or elſe to conſult with Aſdrubal and the Carthaginians, and determine accordingly. For now high time it is, ſay they either to conclude peace, or to proſecute war freſhly, and to go through with it luſtily. Thus while Syphax conſulted with Aſdrubal, and Aſdrubal with the Carthagians, both the eſpials had ſufficient time to view and ſee all, and Scipio alſo good leaſure to provide neceſſaries for his purpoſe. Moreover, by this motive and hope of peace, as well the Carthaginians as the Numidians, began (as commonly in ſuch caſes it falleth out) to be negligent and ſlack in forecaſt, and to provide that in the mean while they came by no harme and detriment from the enemie. At length an anſwer was returned and ſome clauſes put in, without all reaſon, and ſounding to much inconvenience, by occaſion that the Romans ſeemed too too fain and deſirous of a peace. Which fell out very fitly for Scipio whoſe only deſire was to pick ſome juſt quarrell for to break the truce and abſtinence of war: and ſo the next day (for in the mean time he ſaid he would confer with his Counſel) he anſwered the Kings meſſenger in this wiſe, that beſides himſelf alone, who labored all in vain and could do no good, there was none liked of the peace: and therefore he willed him to report unto the King his maſter, that there was no other hope for Syphax to have peace with the Romans, unleſſe he renounced and caſt off quite the friendſhip of the Carthaginians. And thus he ended the truce, that with free conſcience being diſcharged of his promiſe in that behalf, he might go forward in his deſignements, and bring his enterpriſe to his deſired iſſue. So having put his ſhips to ſea (for now the prime of ſpring was come) he embarked in them his artillery, his ordnance and engins of battery, as if he meant to aſſault Vtica on the ſea ſide. And ſent out two thouſand ſouldiers, to poſſeſſe themſelves of the hill that overlooked Vtica, which he had held and kept before, both to withdraw the minds of the enemies from that which he ſecretly deſigned and intended, & amuſe them upon the care and regard of another thing; and alſo to prevent a miſchief, that whiles himſelf ſhould go againſt Syphax and Aſdrubal, they might not ſally forth of the City, and aſſail his camp, left with a ſmall guard to defend it. Having made this way, and laid this ground aforehand, he aſſembled his councell, where he commanded as well the foreſaid ſpies to lay forth and utter what they had ſeen and found, as alſo Maſaniſſa, who was acquainted with all the maner and faſhions of the enemies: and then at laſt he declared and ſhewed unto them, what himſelf intended to execute the next night. Then he gave commandment to the Tribunes or Ku. Marſhals, that ſo ſoon as the councell was riſen, and the court diſmiſſed in the Generals pavilion, at the firſt ſound of trumpets immediately they ſhould bring their legions out of the camp. Thus according to his edict, the enſigns began a little before ſun-ſetting to ſet forth. About the firſt watch they put the ſouldiers in array ready for to march, and by midnight (for they were to journey ſeven miles) they going a fair and ſoft pace, approached the enemies camp. There Scipio gave unto Lelius a part of the forces together with Maſaniſſa and his band of Numidians, with direction to invade the camp of Syphax, and to ſet fire thereupon Then calling them by themſelves both apart one from the other, Lelius I mean and Maſaniſſa, he earneſtly beſought them of all love to make up and recom-

A recompence by carefull induſtrie and devoir that providence and forecaſt, which the darkneſs of the night diſappointed them of. As for himſelf, he meant to ſet upon Aſdrubal and the Carthaginian camp: but begin he would not, before he ſaw the fire amongſt the kings tents. And it was not long firſt ere it began: for as ſoon as the fire caught hold of the next pavilions whereupon it was caſt, by and by it took all that were neereſt, and ſo forward to thoſe that joyned unto them, it ſpred into all places of the camp. And verily into a great fright they were all put, as they could not chooſe, but needs muſt in a night ſcarefire, which was ran all over in ſo ſhort a time. Howbeit they thought it ſome fire by miſchance only, and not the hand of the enemy, by occaſion and means of war: and therefore unarmed as they were, and lightly appointed without weapons they ran forth by heaps to quench the fire, and light full upon their armed enemies, the Numidians e-
B ſpecially; who by Maſaniſſa that was well acquainted with the maner of the Kings camp, were beſtowed in convenient places, at the ends of every avenue and paſſage. Many in their very beds and couches, between ſleeping and waking, were conſumed with the fire: many running headlong in this their haſty flight, one upon an other, were in the ſtreights of the gates troden under foot, or elſe thruſt and cruſht to death. The Sentinels and watch of the Carthaginians, eſpied at firſt the fire ſhining and flaming out; after whom others awakened and raiſed out of their neſts by this nightly tumult and alarm, might behold and plainly ſee the ſame: but they likewiſe were deceived as well as the other, and beleeved verily that the fire began of it ſelf by ſome misfortune, no man wiſt how. The confuſed noiſe and cry alſo, which was heard whiles they were a killing, ſl ying and wounding, would not ſuffer them to know the truth indeed, whether the ſame aroſe
C upon their affright and ſuddain fear by night, or otherwiſe. And therefore every man naked as he was, and ſuſpecting no practiſe at of all the enemy, at all the gates as they ſtood next, did what he could to bring with him ſuch inſtruments and means as were to put out the fire: and happed unawares upon the army of the Romans. Now after they were all maſſacred and put to the ſword to to the laſt man, not only upon an ordinary hatred between enemies, but alſo becauſe there might not eſcape ſo much as one to carry newes unto the reſt: Scipio immediatly entred the gates, being not warded, but altogether neglected, as in ſuch a fearfull garboil and hurlyburly it was no marvell. They fell a flinging of fire upon the lodgings and ſheds that ſtood next, ſo as the flame brake out and ſhewed at firſt as if it had been diſperſed in many places: but afterwards catching and ſpreding from one tent to another as they joyned cloſe together, they were all at once on a D light fire, and burnt every ſtick down to the ground. Men and cattell both, ſinged and ſcorched at the firſt, as they ran in piteous and fearfull ſort away: but afterwards as they tumbled one upon another by heaps, ſtopped and choked up all the waies and avenues of the gates. And look who eſcaped the fire, fell upon the edge of the ſword. Thus in one day were 2 camps clean conſumed. Howbeit, both the Generals, and of ſo many thouſands of armed men, only 2000 foot and 500 horſe armed by halfs, and many of them either wounded or elſe ſinged and half roſted with the fire, got away and eſcaped. There either were ſlain or burnt to aſhes upon 40000 men: taken priſoners there were above 6000: among whom there happed to be many gentlemen of the Carthaginians, and 11 Senators. Of enſigns were taken 178. Of Numidian horſes for ſervice more than 2700. Six Elephants got alive, eight periſhed either with fire or ſword: and a mighty deal of armor
E came to their hands: all which the L. General Scipio conſecrated to Vulcan, and ſet on fire. Aſdrubal with ſome few Africans that fled with him, rid away upon the ſpur to the next City: and thither got all reſt, who remained alive, following the tracks of their captain, and there ſaved themſelves. But afterwards leſt that City ſhould be yielded to Scipio, he quit the place and departed. Anon the Romans were received within the ſame at the gates ſtanding open for them: and becauſe willingly of themſelves they rendred the town, there was no kind of hoſtility or violence offered unto them. But two other Cities one after another were forced and put to the ranſack. All that pillage, as alſo whatſoever was ſaved out of the fire in the two camps, was freely given to the ſouldiers. Syphax encamped and fortified himſelf in a ſtrong hold, almoſt eight miles off.
But Aſdrubal made haſt to Carthage, for fear leſt upon the ſuddain fright occaſioned by this freſh
F and late overthow, things ſhould go backward, and the Senat reſolve upon ſome unmanly and unworthy courſe. Thither at the firſt arrived ſuch fearfull news, that all men thought verily that Scipio would give over Utica and forthwith lay ſiege unto Carthage: whereupon there Suffetes (who are the Conſuls as it were, of the City) called the Senat: where three opinions were delivered amongſt them. The firſt adviſed to diſpatch Embaſſadors to Scipio to treat for peace: the ſecond, to ſend for Annibal home to the defence of his own country, againſt ſo dangerous and deadly a war: the third gave counſell, by example of the Romans conſtancy and reſolution in their adverſity, to repair the army and gather new forces, and to requeſt Syphax not to abandon and give over the quarrell. This opinion, becauſe Aſdrubal was in place (and all thoſe that ſided with the Barchine houſe and faction, evermore inclined to war) prevailed and took effect. Here-
G upon they began to take muſters in town and country: Orators were addreſſed to Syphax, who of himſelf with all his might and main, was buſied to levy freſh forces, and preparing for new war. For his wife now, not as aforetime, by inticing words, flattering ſpeeches, and pleaſant allurements, that might ſerve the turn to win and move the heart of an amorous lover, but by way of prayer and pititull compaſſion had prevailed ſo much with him already: yea, and with plenteous tears beſought him, not to betray her naturall father and native countrey, nor ſuffer Carthage to be burnt with flaming fire, like as the camps were conſumed already.

"The Embaſſadors alſo brought with them new hopes beſides, which were preſented unto them H in as happy a time as might be; who reported, that they fortuned to meet with 4000 Celtiberians brave and luſty young men, about the City named Olba, which had been levyed and hired in Spain by their Commiſſioners, of purpoſe ſent to take up new ſouldiers: and that Aſdrubal himſelf in perſon would be preſent with a power of no ſmall importance. Syphax not only entertained theſe Oratours with gracious ſpeeches and courteous anſwers, but alſo ſhewed them a great number of Numidians, gathered out of the country towns; which ſome few daies before he had furniſhed with armour and horſes; promiſing beſides, that he would aſſemble all the young and able men for ſervice throughout his whole realm. For well he wiſt, that the late loſſe and defeat hapned by occaſion of fire, and not by fight: and never in war is a man to be reputed inferiour, before he be vanquiſhed by mere forces in ranged battell. In this wiſe anſwered he I the Embaſſadours. And after ſome few daies Aſdrubal and Syphax once again joyned their forces together: ſo as in all, their hoſt amounted to the number well neer of 30000 armed men.

Now when Scipio was wholly ſet upon the aſſault of Vtica, and at the point to bend his ordnance and artillery againſt the wals, as thinking verily that the war was already done with Syphax and the Carthaginians; the fame of the war renewed by them afreſh, averted him from his purpoſe, and cauſed him to give over that enterpriſe for a time. So leaving behind him certain ſmall guards, as well by water as land, only for a ſign and ſhew of ſiege; himſelf with all the ſtrength of his army, ſet forwards to meet the enemy. At the firſt he ſate him down and encamp- K ed upon an hill, four miles (or very neer) diſtant from the Kings camp. The next day after, he de-ſcended with his cavalry down into the great Plains or Downs (for ſo they call them) lying neer the ſame hill; and ſpent that whole day in braving the ſtanding corps de guard of the enemies before their camp, and playing upon them with skirmiſhes. And ſo for two daies together next enſuing, they paſſed the time in divers tumultuous excurſions between the one part and the other, without doing any great exploit worth the remembrance. On the fourth day, thy entred on both ſides into the field, and embattailed themſelves. Scipio marſhalled his men in this wiſe: Behind the Principes in a vanguard, he placed the formoſt enſigns of his Haſtati, or Spears; and the Triarii he beſtowed in the rereward, for to ſecond them. The Italian horſemen he ſet in the right point: the Numidian horſe and Maſaniſſa be ranged in the left. Syphax and Aſdrubal put their L Numidians horſe oppoſit to the Italians, and the Carthaginians to affront Maſaniſſa. In their main battell were planted the Celtiberians, to make head againſt the enſigns of the Roman legions. Thus ordered and arranged, they encountred one nother, and joyned battell. At the firſt onſet, both wings at once, as well the Numidians as the Carthaginians, were put back and forced to give ground: for neither the Numidians (being for the moſt part country people and ruſtic ll) were able to receive the Roman horſemen; nor the Carthaginians (raw and untrained ſouldiers) ſufficient to hold out with Maſaniſſa; who (beſides all other things) for his late and freſh victory, was ſo terrible, as there was no dealing with him. So the battell of the Celtiberians, (naked and diſfurniſhed of both her points) ſtood ſtill; for neither ſaw they any likelyhood to eſcape and ſave themſelves by flight, conſidering they knew not the coaſt of the country; nor M hope to obtain pardon at Scipio his hand, againſt whom, (deſerving ſo well of them and their nation) they were come into Africk with a power of waged mercenary ſouldiers. So being environed on every ſide with the enemies, they fell one upon another, and obſtinatly dyed to the laſt man. But whiles all the enemies were wholly employed about them, Syphax and Aſdrubal gained themſelves ſome time to get away & eſcape. The victors (wearied rather with continual killing than long fighting) were overtaken with the night. The morrow after, Scipio ſent unto Lelius and Maſaniſſa, with all the Roman and Numidian horſe, and the nimbleſt and appointed footmen, after Syphax and Aſdrubal for to follow the chaſe. Himſelf with the ſtrength and body of that army, ſubdued all the Cities thereabout that were within the ſeignory of the Carthaginians: whom he partly forced by aſſault, and partly took by ſurrender for fear. Great was the fright ye may N be ſure at Carthage: and they thought no other but that Scipio being now in the train of conqueſt, would make haſt to overrun the countrey; and when he had once brought under his ſubjection (and that with ſpeed) all the other States there bordring, then at once he would come to aſſault Carthage. Therefore they fell to repair and make up the breaches of their wals, and to fortifie them with ſtrong bulwarks: and every man did his beſt to bring out of the country all kind of proviſion, againſt the time they ſhould abide a long and tedious ſiege. Few words or none at all of peace, but much talk of ſending Embaſſadors to call home Annibal. The greateſt part were of mind & gave advice, to make out the armado which ſtood ready rigged, for to intercept the Romans victuals, and to ſurpriſe and aſſault the Romans fleet, riding before Vtica retchleſly without fear, and diſtruſting nothing: for peradventure they might alſo force the navall camp, left with ſmall guard for the defence thereof. And to this counſell the moſt enclined: yet they thought O it good to ſend Embaſſadors to Annibal. For ſuppoſe that their navy ſhould ſpeed full well, and have the happieſt ſucceſs that they could wiſh, this only good would come thereof, that Vtica thereby might be in ſome ſort eaſed of the ſtreight ſiege wherewith it was inveſted: as for the defence of Carthage it ſelf, they neither had any other Generall beſides Annibal, nor army left but only his. Whereupon the next day after, the ſhips were ſhot into the water, and ſet afloat:
and withall the Embaſſadors took their way towards Italy. All things were hudled up and done

A in haſt; ſuch was their fortune that pricked them forward, and gave them no further time. And look if any one man ſlacked his buſineſs never ſo little, he was reputed to betray the whole ſtate, and the ſafety of all.

Scipio now marching with an army, loden with the ſpoil and pillage of many Cities; ſent the priſoners away, and all the prizes beſides, unto the old camp before Vtica. And wholly ſet upon the conqueſt of Carthage, he ſurpriſed Tunes (a City abandoned of her guard left for defence) ſituat from Carthage almoſt twelve miles. The place, both by mans hand was ſtrongly fenced, and by nature ſurely ſeated: and as it might be eaſily ſeen from Carthage, ſo it yeelded a goodly proſpect to Carthage, and alſo to the ſea all about Carthage. From thence the Romans (as they were hard at work in fortifying themſelves with a trench and rampier) diſcovered the enemies fleet, ſailing from Carthage towards Vtica. Laying therefore their work aſide, they ſounded the remove, and B preſently in all haſt advanced their enſigns, to prevent that their own ſhips which ſtood cloſe to the ſhore, bent wholly to the ſiege, and nothing fitted and furniſhed for a ſea-fight, might not be ſurpriſed and boorded. For how poſſibly could ſhips heavily charged, carrying artillery, ordnance and engins of battery, be ever able to withſtand an Armado nimbly appointed, rigged and trimmed for the purpoſe with all ſhip furniture meet for battell, and manned beſides with armed ſouldiers? How might our ſhips (I ſay) withſtand the enemy, which either are converted to the uſe of merchant-ſhips of burden; or elſe ſo neer ſet to the wals, that they ſerve in ſtead of a platform and bank, or elſe of bridges to enter upon the City? Scipio therefore, after he was thither
C come, and had beſtowed his wars ſhips with braſen beaks behinds in the rereward near to land, which (as the manner is in fight at ſea) might guard and defend the reſt: oppoſed the Hulks and Caricks in a four-fold rank and courſe, in ſtead of a wall afront the enemie. And becauſe that in the tumult of the fight, thoſe ranges might not be broken and diſordered, he laid the maſts and ſail-yards over-croſſe, reaching from ſhip to ſhip; and with ſtrong cables he linked and faſtned them all in one together, and laid boords and planks over them, that men might paſſe every way from one ſhip to another. But under thoſe very bridges, he left certain ſpaces between, from whence the light pinnaces and frigots might make out to charge and recharge the enemy, and retire themſelves thither again in ſafety. Having thus in haſt (according as the time would give him leave) ſet theſe matters in order; there were to the number almoſt of a thouſand elect and choice ſouldiers put aboord into thoſe ſhips of burden, to make head in the forefront, & withſtand the vio-
D lence of the enemies, and furniſhed they were with offenſive weapons, but miſſive eſpecially, to ſhoot and fling from them: and ſuch ſtore thereof they had together, as might ſerve for the aſſault were it never ſo long. Thus appointed and prepared, they waited the coming of the enemies. The Carthaginians, who if they had made good ſpeed, might have ſurpriſed them unawares, and found all peil-mell and out of order whiles they were troubled, frighted, and to ſeek what to do upon that ſudden occurence) fearing ſtill as men out of heart and diſmayed with ſo many foils by land, and thereupon diſtruſting themſelves even at the ſea alſo; where (no doubt) they were the better and more puiſſant: and having trifled out all the live-long day, and ſailed but ſlowly; about the ſun-ſet arrived in the haven, which the Affricans call Ruſcinon. And the next morning by ſun-riſing, they put forth into the open ſea, and ranged their ſhips in order, as againſt a ſet navall battell; ſuppo-
E ſing that the Romans would make out and receive them. When they had ſtood thus a long time, and perceived the enemies not to ſtir or once to ſet forward, then at laſt they charged upon the foreſaid hulks and ſhips of burden. The ſervice was nothing like a ſea-fight, but reſembling for all the world the ſhips that are to aſſaile the wals of ſome Town. For the hulks were a good deal taller and ſtood a loft over the enemies. And the Carthaginians out of their war ſhips armed and breſted with braſen beaks let flie many a dart in vain, as lancing them from beneath faintly againſt the higher place; whereas the ſhot from above out of the Caricks, was levelled with more ſtrength and by reaſon of their own poiſe light alſo with greater force. The light pinnaces for ſpial, and the o-ther ſmal barks, which made ſallies from under the bridges aforeſaid, framed of planks upon maſts and ſail-yards, at the firſt were encountred, overcharged and hidden only with the violence and F greatneſs of thoſe war-ſhips: but afterwards they were ſome trouble to the defendants of their own ſide; for that being intermingled amongſt the enemies ſhips, their own fellows were forced oftentimes to ſtay their hands, and neither ſhoot arrow, nor lance dart, for fear of miſſing their enemies, and lighting amongſt their own part. At the laſt, the enemies from out of the Carthaginian ſhips, began to caſt out certain loggets, with iron hooks at the end (which the ſouldiers uſe to call Harpagones) [Grapples] for to take hold upon the Roman ſhips. Which when the Romans were not able to cut in ſunder, no more then the very chains whereto they hung, and whereby they were ſlung, then ye might have ſeen (as any one of their enemies war-ſhips and gallies rowed back, and towed after it a Roman Carick hanging by the grapple end) the boords and ropes cut aſunder, by which it was tied and faſtned unto others, or elſe another range G and courſe of more ſhips together, to follow after the tail of the other. By this device eſpecially were all the bridges torn and rent in peeces, and ſcarcely had the defendants any time and ſpace to retire and paſſe into the ſecond rank of ſhips behind. Thus there were about ſix Carricks of the Romans drawn away to Carthage, hanging at the poops of their gallies. Their gladneſſe and rejoycing hereat was much greater than the thing it ſelf came to, and the more acce ptable in that amidſt ſo many continuall loſſes and plenteous tears of theirs, one only joy as H ſmall as it was, ſhining upon them beyond their expectation, eaſed and lightned their hearts: conſidering withall how neer by all likelyhood and appearance the Roman armado was to a miſchief andfinall deſtruction, had not the captains of their own gallies foreſlowed ſo much, and Scipio come in time to help.

It fortuned about the ſame time, that Lælius and Maſaniſſa were come within 15 daies into Numidia; the Maſæſylians rendered Maſaniſſa the ancient realm belonging to him by inheritance from his father, and received him with joy, as their King whom they had long time deſired. Syphax ſeeing his captains and garriſons diſſeized and diſplaced, kept himſelfe within the ancient limits of his own Kingdome, but was not like to be long at reſt and quiet. For his wives father on the one ſide, and his wife again on the other, ſet him on, and pricked him forward continu- I ally to make arms againſt the Romans: and ſo doted he on her in exceſſive love, that needs he muſt yeeld to her, there was no remedy. Beſides, ſo mighty he was in numbers of men and horſe, that the puiſſance of a Kingdome flouriſhing ſo many years together, offering and preſenting it ſelf daily to the eie, had been enough to have made a Prince proud, that was not ſo barbarous and uncivill as he, and had ſome better rule and maſtry of his affections then himſelf had. When he had aſſembled together as many as were able for ſervice, he furniſhed them with horſes, and with armour, as well offenſive as defenſive. The Cavalry he ſorted and divided into ſmall troops and cornets, the infantry into the cohorts and ſquadrons, according as he had learned long ſince of the Roman centurions. And thus having raiſed an army equall for number to the former, but ſtanding altogether in manner, of new and untrained ſouldiers, he put himſelf on his journey againſt K the enemies. And after he had encamped neer unto them, at the beginning ſome few light horſemen advanced forward from the corps de guard, in eſpiall, ſo neer as they might with ſafety, but being ſet back from thence with arrows & javelins, they retired unto their companies. After this they began on both ſides to make out one againſt another, and to maintain light skirmiſhes; and when of any part they had taken the foil, they would again for anger return in greater number which is the wonted manner to kindle a battell between horſemen: for whiles the winners hope ſtill of better, and the looſer chafes for having the worſe, the company ever encreaſeth on both ſides. And thus now, after ſome few had ſcuffled and blowed the coals, at length the whole armie of either part, came forth into the field eager of fight, and to ſtrike a ſet battell. So long as the horſe ſervice, the Maſæſylians were ſo many, as there were hardly any dealing with them, Syphax L ſent them out in ſuch great troops: but after that the Roman footmen once had ſuddainly entred between the cornets of their horſemen, which gave way as they came, and had gotten ſure footing and made head, and ſo frighted the enemy charging ſo free upon the ſpur as he did then, the Barbarians began to ride their horſes more eaſily, and within a while gently to ſtand ſtill; and in the end, not only to give ground to the footmen, but alſo to retreat from the horſemen, who now were the more bold and hardy, being flanked with a guard of footmen.

And now by this time the ſtandards of the legions advanced forward, and approached neer hand. But when the Maſæſyli were ſo far from receiving and enduring their firſt charge, that they might not abide the very ſight ſo much, as of their enſigns and armour, ſo mightily wrought with them either the remembrance of former overthrows already paſſed, or the preſent fear of immi- M nent danger. Where Syphax, whiles he rode bravely in the face of the enemies troops and ſquadrons, if happily for very ſhame, or for the perill of his own perſon, he might ſtay his men from running away, had his horſe under him ſore wounded, and being caſt off his back to the earth, as overpreſſed with the number, taken priſoner, and brought alive unto Lælius, for to repreſent unto Maſaniſſa above all others a goodly ſhew and joyfull ſight to behold. Now was Cirtha, the head City of all the Kingdome of Syphax; and thither after the flight, betook themſelves a mighty multitude of people. The ſlaughter in this battell was leſs in proportion, then the victory, becauſe the horſemen only maintained the conflict. Not above five thouſand were ſlain, and not halfe ſo many taken priſoners. And when they had made an aſſault upon the camp whither the frighted multitude after the loſſe of their King, had retired, Maſaniſſa came unto Lælius and ſaid, that for the preſent N there could be nothing more pleaſing and honourable unto him, then upon his victory to viſit and ſee his fathers Kingdome, which he had recovered and won again after ſo long a time. But as in adverſity, ſo likewiſe in proſperity (qd. he) tract of time and delaies are never good. In caſe therefore Lælius would permit him and his horſemen, together with conquered Syphax to go before unto the City Cirtha, he would ſurpriſe them on a ſuddain, finding all out of frame and to ſeek by reaſon of this ſo ſuddain and unexpected fear: and Lælius with his footmen might travell fair and ſoftly, and come after with eaſie journies. Lælius yeelded hereunto. Whereupon, being gone afore unto Cirtha, he commanded the principall Citizens of Cirtha to be called forth unto a parle. But all the whiles that they were ignorant of the Kings unhappy fall, and ſo long as Maſaniſſa uttered nothing of that which was hapned, he might not prevail either with threats or faire O words and perſwaſions untill he preſented the King before them a bound priſoner. Then at ſo heavy an object and miſerable ſpectacle, they lift up a pitifull cry, and made great lamentation. And partly for fear they abandoned the defence of the wals, and partly by a generall conſent to court the Conqueror, and to ſeek for grace and favour at his hands, they ſet the gates open. Then Maſaniſſa, after he had beſtowed about the gates, and in convenient places of the wals, certain ſtrong guards, to keep that no man ſhould ſtir and make an eſcape, he rode a gallop to the

royall

A roiall pallace, for to be poſſeſſed of it. As he entred within the fore-gates thereof, even in the very entrance of the porch, Sophonisba the wife of Syphax, and daughter of Aſdrubal the Carthaginian, met him on the way: and eſpying in the mids of the armed train Maſaniſſa full gorgeouſly dight, as well in his brave armor, as in other goodly array and ornaments, imagining him to be the King (as he was indeed) ſhe fell down proſtrat at his feet, and ſpake in this wiſe: "True it "it is (quoth ſhe) O Maſaniſſa, that the Gods above, together with your own vertue and fidelity "have given you full power and puiſſance, to doe with us according to your pleaſure: but if it be "lawfull for me a poor priſoner and captive woman, to open my mouth and make an humble "ſpeech unto my Lord, and in whoſe only hands lieth my life and death; if I may be ſo bold to "touch your knees, and that victorious right hand of yours; I would beſeech and pray you for B, "the honour of the roiall majeſty of a Prince, wherein we alſo our ſelves erewhile were intereſ- "ſed; in the love and name of the Numidian nation, which now is common to you and Syphax, "by the domeſticall gods, protectors of this regall houſe and princely palace, who vouchſafe to "receive you into it at this preſent with better preſages and more fortunat tokens, then lately they "ſent Syphax out of it; to deign me a lowly ſuppliant this favour, and grant me this petition, as to "determin your ſelf of me your captive whatſoever pleaſeth you, & not to ſuffer me to fall into the "proud hands and inhumane diſpoſition of any Roman. If there were nothing elſe but this, that I "was ſometime wife and Queen to Syphax, yet would I rather trie the courteſie and humanity of "a Numidian, and one born in Africk as well as my ſelf then of a ſtranger and alien. But C "what hard meaſure a Carthaginian lady, and the daughter of Aſdrubal, may fear at a Ro- "mans hand, you ſee and know full well. Wherefore once again I requeſt and intreat your high- neſſe upon my knees, to regard my ſuit: and if there be no way elſe to ſave and keep me from the will and appetite of the Romans, to put me to death out of hand. For beauty ſhe ſurpaſſed and was incomparable: for years luſty, and in the very beſt of her age. And therefore when as now ſhe held him faſt by the hand, and requeſted his protection and honourable word, only for this, that ſhe might not be delivered and betrayed to a Roman, placing & letting her words ſo well, and couching them ſo cunningly, that they ſounded neerer to ſpeeches for to win love, then prayers to crave pity: ſee the fanſie and affection of this victorious Prince! he enclined preſently not only to mercy and compaſſion, but alſo (as all the kind of theſe Numidians are ful of love, and have no ſtay of their wan- ton luſt) a conqueror otherewiſe though he were, yeelded himſelf priſoner to the love of his captive: D and after he had given her his right hand for aſſurance to perform her requeſt, he went into the pa- lace. This done, he began to caſt about with himſelf how he might make good his promiſe unto Sophonisba: but finding no meanes elſe to compaſs and bring it about, he borrowed fooliſh, raſh, and ſhameleſs counſell of blind love. He made no more ado, but commanded in all haſt to pre- pare that very day for the ſolemnization and marriage with Sophonisba, becauſe he would give nei- ther Lælius, nor Scipio himſelf, any liberty at all to proceed againſt her as a priſoner, after ſhe were once the wedded wife of Maſaniſſa. The wedding was no ſooner done, but behold Lælius came, a gueſt unſent for and nothing welcome: who ſo little diſſembled how much he miſliked the thing, that he was once about to have plucked her forth of the bride-bed, and ſent her away even with Sy- phax and other priſoners to Scipio. But overcome with the earneſt prayers of Maſaniſſa, who E beſought and importuned him to refer the matter over to Scipio, for to arbitrat and decide unto whi- ther of the two Kings Sophonisba ſhould be awarded, for to mend their ſtate, and better their for- tune; he ſent away Syphax alone with the reſt of the priſoners, and by the help of Maſaniſſa, wan and recovered the other Cities in Numidia, which were held by the garriſons of the King. When news came into the camp that they were bringing Syphax thither, all the multitude went forth as it were to behold a triumph. Himſelf went bound before all the reſt, and a number of Numidi- an noblmen and gentlemen followed after. Then every man to ſet forth and amplifie this victo- rie, magnified what he could the greatneſs of King Syphax, and the glorious renown of the nation, in theſe termes: That he was the King, unto whoſe majeſty the two moſt mighty and puiſſant ſtates of the world, to wit, the Romans and the Carthaginians attributed ſo much, that F Scipio the Generall of the one, for to ſeek his amity, left the province of Spain and the army there, and with two Caravals of Gallies ruled with five banks of oars, ſailed over into Affrick: and Aſdrubal the great commander of the Carthaginians, not only repaired himſelf in per- ſon unto him into his Kingdome, but alſo gave him his daughter in marriage: ſo as at one time he had in his power the two grand-captains, of Carthaginians and Romans both. And like as both theſe nations killed ſacrifices unto the immortall gods, and craved thereby their grace and favour, ſo of both parties at one time was his friendſhip ſought for, and deſired. And as for his power and puiſſance, it was ſo great, that he expelled Maſaniſſa out of his own Realm, and drave him to this narrow point, that the beſt meanes he had to preſerve his life, was either the running rumour of his death, in the lurking holes of the wild woods, wherein he was glad to live G by rapine and ſtealth, after the guiſe of ſavage beaſts. The King thus talked of in every mans mouth that ſtood about him, was brought at length into the Prætorium or Generals pavilion, and there preſented unto Scipio. And Scipio verily was much moved in mind to conſider the former ſtate and fortune of the man, compared now with his preſent condition: and to remember withall and call to mind the hoſpitall interteinment, the giving interchangeably of the right hand, and the covenant between them made both in publick and private. In theſe regards likewiſe Syphax took heart, and ſpake more frankly unto the conquerour. For when Scipio demanded of him

" What he meant, and for what intent he not only renounced alliance with the Romans, but also H " began himself first to make war upon them: he made answer again and confessed, That he had " indeed done amiss, and plaid the fool. As for his taking armes against the people of Rome,
" that was not the beginning of his folly, but rather the very end of his frantick sottishness. Then it " was, and never else but then, that he went besides himselfe and was bereft of his wits; then he " abandoned out of his mind and clean forgat, as well private enmity by a hospitall entertainment,
" as all publick alliance by solemn covenants; when as he received into his house a Carthaginis-
" an lady for his wife: then his royall court and palace was set on fire & burned with those nuptiall
" torches. That furious fiend it was (quoth he) and pestilent dame, that by all kind of pleasant al" luring baits, and flattering enticements possessed my mind, drew away and alienated my heart; and " never rested she, untill with her own hands she laid upon my body impious and ungodly armour I " against my owne guest and loving friend. And yet as desperate and as wofull as my case is, in all " my miseries and calamities, this one thing doth me good and enjoyeth my heart, that I see the " same pestiferous fury, that fiend of hell, and lim of the Devill, gotten into the house and family of " him who is the most deadly and mortall enemy that I have in all world. Neither surely will Ma-
" sanissa demean himself more wisely, soberly and constantly then Syphax: nay, considering his " youthfull years, he wil be as apt to be mis-led by love, and more subject to the temptations of a " woman. Certainly in this action of espousing her, he hath shewed more folly a great deal, and " want of government. When he had uttered these words not only upon a spitefull hatred against " an enemy, but also upon some new pricks of jealousie rising in his heart, seeing her whom he loved, in the possession of his concurrent, Scipio was driven into no small dumps, and wist not well K what to make of it. And as he began to be suspicious of Masanissa for this marriage, so, to speak a truth, the circumstances thereof hammered in his head, and made him conceive hardly of him; for fear that another day by the suggestions of the same woman, he would play false, and tres-passe as well as Syphax. The marriage was so hudled up as it were in the mids of war and hostility, without the advise, without the privity, and without the expectation of Lælius his company. Such hast he made all on the head, & without advisement, the very same day that he set eye first upon the queen his prisoner, he must needs espouse and marry her out of hand, and in the very house of his greatest enemy consummate and solemnise the complements of sacred wed-lock. Moreover to aggravate these matters and make them seem more foul and shamefull, Scipio knew full well, that Masanissa during the time that he remained in Spain a lusty young gentleman, it was never knowen L that he was enamoured upon the lovely beauty of any captive woman. As he tossed and revolved these things in his mind, Lælius and Masanissa chanced to come in place. And after he had welcomed them both alike, and shewed them a loving and gracious countenance, yea and honoured them with singular praise and commendations openly in a frequent audience and court, he within his lodging took Masanissa into a secret place apart, and began to speak unto him in this manner: I suppose Masanissa, that you saw in me some good part, for love whereof both at the first
" you were induced to come into Spain and contract amity with me; and afterwards also in A-
" frick, you reposed dy our self and all your hopes in my fidelity and protection. But of all those ver-
" tues, for which I have seemed worthy of your affectionat love, there is is not one wherein I may
" so much glory and take joy and take comfort, as in temperance, continency, and the bridling of M " carnall delights, and fleshly pleasures. This vertue Masanissa, I wish that you also would have
" joyned unto the rest that are in you so rare and and excellent. For our ages (trust we truly) stand-
" eth not so much in danger of armed enemies, as of those earthly pleasures that compasse us on " every side. And he that by his sobriety and governance hath been able to rule and tame the same,
" hath won himself more honour, and gottten a greater victory, then we have done by the con" quest and subduing of Syphax. What valiant exploits and worthy acts you have atchived in mine
" absence I have willingly reported, and still remember. For the rest I had rather you would con" sider of them by your self, then change colour and blush at my rehearsall of them. Syphax through " the good fortune, and by the forces of the people of Rome, is vanquished and taken prisoner.
" And therefore himself, his wife, his realm, his lands, his towns, the inhabitants thereof, and N
" finally all things else whatsoever that belongeth unto Syphax, are become a bootie to the people " of Rome. The King himself, and the Queen his wife, in case she had not been a citizen born of " Carthage, in case we had not seen her Father to be at the grand Captain of our enemies, ought
" by right to have been sent to Rome; that the Senat and people of Rome might passe their cen-
" sure, award and judgement of her, who is reported to have alienated a confederat King from us,
" and to have caused him rashly and inconsideratly to take armes against us. Strive then to rule
" and master your lusts and affections, take heed you stain not many good vertues with one bad
" vice. Marre not the grace, deface not I say, the thank of many worthy deserts, by one fault and " trespas greater indeed, then the subject cause and occasion thereof. Masanissa, whiles he heard these words, not only blushed as red as fire, but also began to water his plants. And when he had O promised for his part to be overruled and set down by the Generall, and requested him withall, so far forth as possibly the case would permit, to tender and regard his promise, wherein rashly and inconsideratly he had entangled himself, (for given his faithfull word he had, that he would not deliver and betray her into the hands and power of any other) he departed out of the Pretorium or Generall his court, all dismaied and exceedingly troubled in spirit and betook himself to his own pavillion. Where all solitary and alone by himself, after he had passed over some time,

A with fetching many deep ſighs and ſobs, ſo as he might eaſily be overheard by them that ſtood about his tent, at the laſt he gave one grievous grone above the reſt, and with that called for one of his truſty grooms, who had under his hand the keeping (as the maner was of Kings and Princes) of a ſpeciall poyſon, againſt all doubtfull chances that might happen. Which he commanded him to temper in a goblet of wine, and to carry it to Sophonisba, and withall to tell her thus much from him. "That Maſaniſſa would have been moſt willing to perform his plighted troth and firſt pro-"miſe, which an husband ought unto his wedded wife. But ſince that the ſuperiour powers, and "thoſe that were mightier than himſelf, had bereft him of that puiſſance and liberty, he was ready "and able yet to accompliſh a ſecond beheſt, namely, that ſhe ſhould not come alive into the "hands of the Romans: and therefore he adviſed her, that in remembrance of her father a noble B "warrior and Commander, of her native country, of two Kings to whom ſhe had been married, "ſhe would provide for her ſelf, and ſave her own honour. This credence and meſſage, together "with the poyſon, the ſervant when he was come unto Sophonisba, delivered unto her. Whereat, I "accept (quoth ſhe) this marraige preſent, and welcome be it to me, if this be the beſt token that "a husband could find to ſend unto his wife. Yet thus much ſignifie unto him from me again, that "better content I would have been to die, if my marraige bed had not ſtood ſo neer to my grave. "She ſpake not the word ſo ſtoutly, but ſhe did the deed as reſolutely: for ſhe took the cup in hand, C "and ſhewed no ſign at all of fear, ſhe roundly drank it off. When tidings hereof came unto Scipio, for fear leſt the hot, humorous, and paſſionat young Prince, might do himſelf ſome miſchief, he preſently ſent for him. One while he gave him good & comfortable words; another while he gently rebuked him, in that he would ſeem to make amends for one folly with another, and to play a more cruell and tragicall part then there was need. The next day after, to the end that he might withdraw his mind away from this preſent fit of troubleſome fancies, he mounted up into his Tribunall ſeat, and aſſembled an audience. There firſt, he openly ſtyled Maſaniſſa by the name of King, and honored him with ſingular praiſes and commendations: which done, he gave him a golden crown, a fair cup likewiſe of gold, a chair of eſtate and a ſcepter, both of ivory, a D * rich long robe imbrodered of divers colours, and a coat wrought with needle work, repreſenting the Date tree. Theſe honourable preſents wanted no words to ſet them out. For as (quoth he) there is nothing among the Romans more ſtately and magnifical than triumph, ſo they that ride in triumph, have no ornaments more rich and ſumptuous then this, which the people of Rome eſteemeth Maſaniſſa only of all ſtrangers and aliens to be worthy of. After this he gave Lælius alſo his due and deſerved praiſes, and beſtowed upon him a coronet of gold. Other martial men likewiſe according to the ſervice which they had done, were rewarded with ſundry gifts. The King having theſe honours done unto him, was quieted and contented in mind, and conceived ſome aſſured hope, now that Syphax was diſplaced & rid out of the way, ſhortly to compaſſe and enjoy the whole kingdome of Numidia. Then Scipio having ſent C. Lælius with Syphax and other captives unto Rome, accompanied alſo with the Embaſſadors of Maſaniſſa, returned himſelf with his power again to Tunes. And there what fortifications and works he had begun afore, now he finiſhed perfectly and brought to an end.

The Carthaginians who were filled with a kind of joy that was not only ſhort, but alſo in maner E vain and fooliſh, grounded upon their late aſſault of the Armado, which (conſidering their preſent ſtate) was fortunat enough; after they heard that Syphax was taken priſoner, in whom they had repoſed more hope (well neer) then in Aſdrubal and their own army, were mightily affrighted and daunted; and would give no more ear to any that perſwaded war, but ſent as orators to ſue for peace, thirty of their principall ancients: and they amongſt them were (as one would ſay) their privy councell of ſtate, and had the greateſt power and authority to ſway and overrule the whole body of the Senat. Who being entred into the Roman camp and the Generall his lodging and pavillion, fell down proſtrat (after the manner and guiſe as I take it, of the countrey * from whence they were firſt deſcended) like thoſe that worſhip & adore the gods. And to this their humble reverence, their language was ſutable and correſpondent; not excuſing themſelves and F their fault, but transferring the beginning and occaſion thereof, upon Annibal and his favorites about him and ſoothed him and bare him up in his wilfull pride and inſolent ambition: craving pardon for their City of Carthage, which twice already had been ſubverted and overthrown by the inconſiderat folly of her own citizens: yet once again you would gladly be ſaved and ſtand upright by the meanes and goodneſſe of their enemies: for as much as they knew full well, that the "people of Rome ſought not the utter extermination and deſtruction of thoſe whom they had van-"quiſhed by force of arms, but only the ſoveraignty and rule over them: promiſing fealty and ho-"mage to them ready to ſerve in all loyalty, and to perform whatſoever it ſhould pleaſe them to im-"poſe and lay upon them. Scipio made them this anſwer again, and ſaid, that as he came into Africk
"upon hope to return home with conqueſt and not with peace; ſo that hope of his by the proſpe-G "rous and happy ſucceſſe of his wars hitherto, was much bettered and augmented. How-"beit although he aſſured himſelf of the abſolute victory, as if he had it faſt enough in his hand, "yet a good accord he would not refuſe: that all nations of the world might know, that the peo-"ple of Rome can both begin wars rightfully, and alſo end the ſame as juſtly. My will therefore "(quoth he) and pleaſure is, that the conditions of peace ſhall be theſe. Inprimis, that the Car-"thaginians ſhall reſtore and diliver back all the priſoners that they have taken in the wars: with "all the renegates and fugitives that have fled to their ſide from us. Item, that they remove their "forces out of Italy and France, Item, that they forbear to meddle in Spain. Item that they abandon H " and quit all the Ilands between Italy and Africk. Item, to yeeld up all their ships of war saving " only twenty. Item, that they deliver unto the Romans, of wheat 500000 Modii, and of bar"ley 300000. [Now what was the sum of money that he required or demanded of them, it is " not certainly agreed upon. In some writers I find 5000 talents: in others, five thousand pound " weight only of silver: and there be that have set down, that they laid upon them a double pay of all the souldiers.] Upon these conditions (saith he) whether ye will like of peace or no, ye " shall have three daies respit and liberty to consult and consider. If you will accept thereof in these

" termes, make a truce with me for the present, and sent your Embassadors unto Rome to the Senat
" there. Thus the Carthaginians, when they had agreed together, and concluded to refuse no articles and conditions of peace whatsoever, were dismissed. But in truth they sought for nothing I else but delaies and tract of time untill Annibal were sailed over into Africk. So they addressed certain Embassadors unto Scipio to enter a truce: others they dispatched to Rome to treat for a peace: who brought with them for a shew some few captives, renegates and fugitives, to the end they might obtain their sute more easily. But Lælius with Syphax and other captives (the principall nobles and gentlement of the Numidians) was many daies before arrived at Rome, and had declared unto the LL. of the Senat all things in order as touching their good speed and successe in Africk, to the great contentment and joy of all men for the present, and with exceeding hope for the time to come. Then the LL. after consultation had, gave order that the King should be sent to Alba, there to lie in ward and safe custodie, and that Lælius should be kept still at Rome, untill the Carthaginian Embassadors came. A solemn procession for four daies was decreed. And P. Aelius K the Pretor, after he had dismissed the Senat, called presently an assembly of the people, and together with C. Lælius went into the Rostra (or pulpit for publick orations.) Where the people hearing that the Carthaginian army was defeated, that the King of great name and renown was overcome and taken prisoner; that all Numidia was overrun from one end to the other with a noble and singular conquest; they could no longer contein their joy in silence, but in shouts and acclamations and other tokens (usuall in the assembly of a multitude) expresse and signifie their exceeding gladness and contentment of heart. Whereupon the Pretor immediately made proclamation, that the Church-wardens and sextons should set open all the holy temples and chappels throughout the City, and give the people liberty and leave all the day long, devoutly to go about the gods, reverently to salute them, and heartily to render thanksgiving for this atchieved victory. L
The next day following, he admitted the Embassadors of Masanissa into the Senat house, and gave " them audience. Who first and formost rejoyced in the behalf of the Senat, for the prosperous " wars and happy successe of P. Scipio in Africk: than they gave thanks, that he not only had entituled Masanissa their lord and master by the bare name of King, but also invested him a King in" deed by restoring him to his fathers Kingdome. Wherein if it pleaseth the LL. of the Senat, he " might reign, now that Syphax was removed and gone, without fear and trouble at all. Also for "that he solemnly in the open assembly praised him in most honourable terms, and adorned him " richly with right stately and precious gifts. For to deserve which favors and honours done unto " him, as he had indeavoured already, so would he henceforth not fail to do his best. Then they made a petition that the Senat would confirm and ratifie by their act and decree, his royall style M and title of a King, with other benefits and favours received of Scipio. And this moreover particularly Masanissa would request (if he might be so bold, and that it stood with the pleasure of the Senat) that they would enlarge and set at liberty all the Numidian captives that lay in prison in Rome: for this would be a thing whereby he should acquire much honour and reputation, and gain great love and favour amongst his people and countreymen at home. To these points the Embassador received this answer. Concerning the prosperous affairs of the wars in Africk, they congratulated likewise, and rejoyced reciprocally with the King. As for Scipio, they liked well, and confirmed his act in giving Masanissa the name of King: and therein he had done well and justly and according to good reason. And whatsoever he had passed else to the honour of Masanissa, the LL. approved and commended the same. Then they decreed certain presents that the Embassa- N dors should carry unto the King: to wit, two purple souldiers cassocks, each of them with a clasp of gold; and as many rich coats embrodered and bestudded with purple. Also two coursers barbed and trapped, with their rich caparisons: two complete armours for horses, with their cuiraces: likewise pavillions, with all their military furniture, in as full and ample manner as a Consul is allowed. These presents (I say) had the Pretor direction to send unto the King. As for the Em-bassadors themselves, there was bestowed upon them no less then 5000 Asses a peece; and upon their followers in the train, each of them 1000 Asses. Also a double suit of apparell for either of the Embassadors, and one single sute to every one throughout their train; as also to those Numidi-ans, who being set at large out of prison, were to be delivered again to the King. Over and besides, there was appointed for the Embassdors, lodging of free-cost; gardenage and walking O places of pleasure; allowance for their table, and all provision else whatsoever, at the Cities ex-pences.

In that summer when these decrees passed at Rome, and those affairs were atchieved in A-frick, P. Quintilius Varus Pretor, and M. Cornelius Vice-consul, fought a set battell with Ma-go the Carthaginian, in the territory of the Insubrians, within the province of France. In the vanguard

vanguard were placed the legions of the Pretor. Cornelius kept the legions in the rereward, and A himſelf in perſon rode to the ſtandards in the forefront. And before both wings, the Pretor and Vice-conſull encouraged all that ever they could, the ſouldiers for to advance the enſigns, and give a charge upon the enemy. But ſeeing he could not prevail nor do any good, then quoth Quintilius to Cornelius: you ſee how the fight ſlaketh and waxeth cooler, and the enemies that were timorous, are hardned and heartned by this reſiſtance beyond their hope and expectation; yea, and it is to be feared, that they will turn to be hardy alſo, and make head againſt us. We muſt needs raiſe up a ſtorm of Cavalry, if we would diſorder them, and put them out of array. And therefore either do you maintain fight either in the front, whiles I bring the men of arms into the battell, or elſe will I fight here in the vangaurd, whiles you ſend out the horſemen of four legions upon the enemies. And when the Vice-conſull was willing to accept of whether ſervice the B Pretor would, then Quintilius the Pretor, with his ſon aforenamed Marcus, a luſty young gallant, went to the horſemen, commanded them to mount on horſeback, and ſuddainly all at once ſent them againſt the enemy. The tumult and noiſe which the horſemen made, was anſwered & redoubled by the ſhout that the footmen ſet up. And verily the enemies battell had not been able to have kept their ground, but that Mago at the firſt ſtirring of the Cavalry, made out the Elephants forthwith into the battell, whom he had in readineſſe for ſuch purpoſe. At the uncouth braying, the ſtrong ſmell, and hideous ſight of which beaſts, the horſes were affrighted: and ſo the aid of horſe-fight proved vain. And as the Roman Cavalry interlaced among the Infantry was more ſtrong and forcible, where they had the uſe both of lance point aloof, and of ſwords edge cloſe at hand: ſo when they were tranſported and carried far off with their panting and fearfull horſes,
C the Numidians horſemen had the more room to ſhoot their darts againſt them with better advantage. Beſides this diſorder, the twelfth legion of footmen (whereof a great part was beaten down and ſlain, more for ſhame then upon any ſtrength and valour, kept their place ſtill; but never had been able to have held out any longer, but that the thirteenth legion drawn forth of the rereward into the vanguard, reenforced the battell that was in hazard and lay a bleeding: and Mago withall for his part, came in with the Frenchmen out of the rereward, and oppoſed them againſt this freſh legion; but when they were once diſcomfited and put back (which required no great ado nor long fight) the Haſtati or Iaveliniers of the eleventh legion gathered round together and charged upon the Elephants, which now alſo began to break the ranks of the footmen. But when they had lanced their javelins againſt them ſtanding thick together in multitudes (and lightly D there was not one of them hit amiſſe but did his errand) they forced them all to turn back upon their own battell: ſo four of them were ſore wounded and fell down dead. Then the vanguard of the enemies began ſomewhat to give ground; and withall, the whole ſtrength of the Roman footmen ſeeing the Elephants turn tail, came forward at once for to encreaſe the diſordered tumult, and put them in greater fear. But ſo long as Mago ſtood ſtoutly to it, and ſtanding in the forefront of the enſigns, the ranks and files as they went back ſoftly, and retired by little and little, ſtill maintained fight as before in good order: but after that they ſaw him ſhot through the thigh and fallen, and therewith carried forth of the battell for dead, incontinently they were all defeated and put to flight. There were ſlain of enemies about five thouſand, and of military enſigns eighteen won and carried away. The Romans likewiſe bought not this victory without loſſe of blood. For of the E Pretors army were loſt two thouſand and three hundred, and the greater part of them by far were of the twelfth legion. Whereof two Tribunes Military or Colonels alſo loſt their lives, M. Ceſconius and M. Manius. Likewiſe of the thirteenth legion, which came laſt to the conflict, Cn. Helvius a Colonell, in renuing the fight was ſlain, and eighteen men of arms beſides, moſt brave and excellent horſemen, with Centurions who were by the Elephants troden down, trampled under foot, and ſo periſhed. And no doubt the battell had continued longer, but that by occaſion of the Generall his hurt, the victory was given away and yeelded. Mago in the dead time of the next night diſlodged and departed; and ſtretching out his journey ſo far as poſſibly for his wound he might, he marched away untill he was come to the ſea ſide, unto the Ingauni in Liguria: where the Embaſſadors ſent from Carthage (who a few daies before were arived in the French gulf) re-F paired unto him: commanding him with all ſpeed poſſible to ſail unto Africk, for as much as his brother Annibal likewiſe (unto whom alſo there were Embaſſadors gone with the like meſſage and commiſſion) would do the ſame. For the State of Carthage now was not in caſe, nor upon terms to defend and keep in obedience by force of armes France and Italy, but to ſee to home. Mago not only moved with the commandment of the Senat, and the danger of his countrey, but fearing alſo leſt the enemy following the train of his victory, would purſue and ſet upon him, if he made long ſtay; and doubting leſt the Ligurians likewiſe, ſeeing Italy abandoned by the Carthaginians, would revolt and turn unto thoſe, under whoſe obedience they were like ſhortly to be reduced: albeit he had no hope that his hurt ſhould have leſſe ſhaking at ſea by ſailing, then on land by travelling, or to find things there more handſome and ready for the cure, embarked G his army and departed. But before he was well gotten beyond the point and lands end of Sardinia, he died of his wound beforeſaid. Certain ſhips alſo of the Carthaginians, being ſcattered aſunder in the deep ſea, were by the Roman Armado, that kept about the coaſt of Sardinia ſurpriſed and boorded. Theſe were the Acts performed both by ſea and land, on the ſide of Italy which lieth along the Alps.

Cn. Servilius

Cn. Servilius the Conſul having performed no worthy and memorable exploit, either in his province Hetruria, or in France (for thither he went alſo in the end) but only that he redeemed his father Cn. Servilius and his uncle C. Luſtatius, from ſervitude and bondage, now ſixteen years after they had been taken priſoners by the Boii before the village Tanetum, returned to Rome, with with his father going on the one ſide, and his uncle on the other: a man famous rather for his privat deeds, then renowned for any publick and honourable act worthy of remembrance. And a bill was preferred unto the people, that it ſhould not be imputed for a treſpaſſe unto Cn. Servilius, that whiles his own father (who had ſitten upon the ivory chair of eſtate) was living (and that unknown to him) he had been both Tribune and Ædile alſo of the Commons againſt the laws in that behalf provided. This act being paſſed and granted, he returned again into his province. Unto Cn. Servilius the Conſul who was in the Brutians countrey, there revolted Conſentia, Uſfugum, Vergæ, Beſidiæ, Hetriculum, Sypheum, Argentanum, Dampetia, and many other peeces of ſmall accompt, upon occaſion that they ſaw the Carthaginians war to wax cold and feeble. The ſame Conſul fought a battell with Annibal in the teritory of Croton: the maner of which fight is darkly and obſcurely reported. For Valerius Antias ſaith, there were ſlain five thouſand of the enemies: a thing of ſuch conſequence, that either it was meer impudency to forge it, or great negligence to overſlip it. But the turth is, from that time forward nothing was done by Annibal in Italy: for to him alſo there came from Carthage Embaſſadors to cal him home into Africk, even about the ſame time that the others did unto Mago. And as it is reported of him, all the whiles that he gave audience to the Embaſſadors, he gnaſhed and grinded his teeth, he kept a ſighing and groning, yea, and hardly could forbear to ſhed tears. After they had delivered their Meſſage according to their commiſſion, Yea, mary, qd. he, now they go no more about the buſh with me "by covert means and under-hand to ſend for me home, but openly are ſeen in the action: who all "this while in ſuffering no ſupplies either of men or money to be tranſported over unto me, fought "to draw and hale me from hence. Well then, It is not the people of Rome ſo often by me defeated and put to flight, that hath by armes overcome Annibal, but it is the Senat of Carthage, with "their backbiting and malicious envy. Neither will P. Scipio rejoyce ſo much, and beare himſelf "proud upon this diſgrace of my return, as Hanno will; who with the ruine and ſubverſion of Car"thage, hath overthrown our houſe and family, when by no other means he could effect it. Now Annibal, whoſe mind fore-gave him that ſuch a thing would fall out, had prepared ſhipping afore-hand. And therefore after he had ſent away the multitude of ſouldiers that were of ſmall or no ſervice, into the towns of the Brutians countrey, under a colour and ſhew of garriſons for defence, which towns were but few, and the ſame rather held in by awe and fear, then abiding in obedience for love and loyalty, he took with him the whole ſtrength and flour of his army, and croſſed over into Africk. But before he went to ſea, many of the Italian nation, who refuſing to follow him into Africk, had taken for ſanctuary the chappell of Iuno Lacinia, which never to that day had been violated and broken; notwithſtanding the liberty of the place, he cruelly maſſacred in the very temple. Seldome by report had ever any man been known to leave his native ſoil and countrey, and depart into exile with more heavy heart, then Annibal did when he went out of his enemies land. Oftentimes he looked back to the coaſts of Italy, blaming both God and man, yea, curſing himſelf and his own life, for that he led not ſtraightwaies upon his freſh victory at Canna, his ſoul"diers embrued as they were with blood directly even to Rome. Scipio (quoth he) had the heart "to go to Carthage, who when he was Conſul, had never ſeen in Italy the Carthaginian' enemie: "and my ſelf, having ſlain at Thraſymenus and Cannæ 100000 armed men, have ſitten ſtill about "Caſilinum, Cumes, and Nola, wearing and decaying in ſtrength every day more then other. In this "manner he blamed himſelf, and complained of his hard hap and curſed fortune: and ſo he was pulled out of the poſſeſſion of Italy that he held ſo long.

News came to Rome about one and the ſame time, that both Mago and Annibal were departed and onward on their journey: The joy of which twofold gratulation was the leſſe in two regards, both for that their own captains ſeemed to have either little courage or ſmall force to ſtay them behind, and impeach them for going, conſidering they had expreſſe order from the Senat ſo to do: as alſo becauſe they at Rome were penſive and douſotfull, what would be the iſſue and end of all, ſeeing the whole weight of the war to bear and reſt upon the ſhoulders of one only Captain and army.

And much about this time came the Saguntine Embaſſadors, bringing with them certain Carthaginians priſoners, who were taken with ſums of money upon them, and had ſailed into Spain for to levy and wage men for aid. The mony they laid down in the very port-hall or entrie of the Senat-houſe, amounting to 250 pound weight of gold, and 800 pound weight of ſilver. The men they received and clapt them up faſt in priſon, the ſilver and gold both, they delivered again to the Embaſſadors, with many thanks, over and beſides they gave them rewards and ſhips to return again into Spain. Then the grave and ancient Senators began to reaſon and diſcourſe in this wiſe "That men naturally have leſſe ſenſe of good things then of bad: and feel not ſo ſoon "their own weal as their woe. We remember ſay they, what fear, what fright and terrour we "were put in, when Annibal paſſed over into Italy. Lord, what loſſes, what lamentable miſfor"tunes hapned thereupon! The enemies camp was diſcovered and ſeen from the wals of the City; "what vowing, what praying was there then, both of all and ſome! How often in aſſemblies and "councels were men ſeen to ſtretch out their hands to heaven, & to utter theſe words & cry aloud;

When

A When will that day come ? and will it never be, that we ſhall ſee Italy again cleer of enemies, obtein repoſe, and flouriſh once more in joying happy peace? Now at length, even at 16 yeers end "and not before, the gods have vouchſafed us this bleſſing; and no man ſaith a word, nor maketh "a motion of thankſgiving to their divine majeſty therefore. And ſurely, if men know not how to accept with joy and thankfulneſſe a benefit when it firſt cometh, they will be far ſhort, and fail "much more to remember the ſame when once it is paſt. Hereupon they cryed out and called aloud with one voice from all parts of the Senat-houſe to P. Ælius the Pretor, for to propoſe the matter to the court there aſſembled: and a decree was granted, that for five daies there ſhould be ſolemn proceſſions and ſupplications in every church and chappell before the ſhrines of the gods and goddeſſes: and greater beaſts killed for ſacrifice to the number of 120.

B Now when Lælius and the Embaſſadors of Maſaniſſa had their diſpatch and were diſmiſſed, tidings were brought of the Carthaginian Embaſſadours coming to the Senat to ſue for peace, were ſeen at Puteoli, and that from thence they would travail by land unto Rome. Whereupon it was thought good unto the Senat, that Lælius ſhould be ſent for again and called back, that he might be preſent, and at the hearing of the treating of peace. Q. Fulvius Gillo a Lieutenant of Scipio had the conducting of the Carthaginian Embaſſadors to Rome: who being forbidden to ſet foot within the City, were lodged without the in great hall named Villa Publica, and had audience given them of the Senat, aſſembled in the temple of Bellona. Who made in manner the very ſame ſpeech that they had before unto Scipio, cleering the whole State and their publick councell, and laying all the fault and blame upon Annibal for making war: ſaying, that he had no warrant, com-

C miſſion, and commandment from the Senat to paſſe over the Alps, no, nor ſo much as over Iberus: and that of his own head he took arms; and warred not upon the Romans only, but alſo upon the Saguntins. In conſideration whereof, he that would eſteem all things aright, and weigh the truth indeed, muſt needs judg, that for any thing done by the Senat and people of Carthage, the ancient league made with the people of Rome, hath continued to that day ſound and entire. And therefore nothing elſe had they in commiſſion to ſue for and requeſt, but that they might maintain and and remain ſtill in that accord & league which was laſt concluded and contracted with Luctatius the Conſul. Now when the Pretor, according to an ancient cuſtome of their forefathers, had given liberty to whomſoever that would for to put interrogatories unto the Embaſſadors; and the elder ſort, ſuch as had been preſent at the making of the capitulations and covenants concerning the ſaid

D peace, and demanded of them, ſome one thing, and ſome another; and the Embaſſadors anſwered again, that by occaſion of their yong age (for they were all in manner but yong men) they remembred no ſuch thing: the whole court from all parts thereof cryed out and ſaid, that this was but a fraudulent and traiterous Carthaginian trick, to chuſe and ſend ſuch for to ſue for the old peace which they themſelves could not not remember. And when the Embaſſadors were voided out of the Senat houſe, and the opinions of the LL demanded, M. Livius was of this mind, that Cn. Servilius the Conſul, who was the neerer of the twain, ſhould be ſent for, that the treaty of peace might in his preſence be conſulted upon. For ſince that there could not lightly a weightier matter then it was, come afore them to be determined of, he thought it ſtood not with the honor and reputation of the people of Rome, that ſuch a matter ſhonld be debated of without the perſonall

E preſence of both, or at the leaſtwiſe one of the Conſuls. Qu. Metellus (who three years before had been Conſul and Dictator) ſpake to the cauſe in this manner. For as much as P. Scipio by defeating and putting to the ſword whole armies, by waſting and ſpoiling the territories of the enemies, had driven them to this exigent, that in humble ſort they came to crave peace: and conſidering that no man living was better able to judge with what mind and intent they ſued for this peace then himſelf, who warred ever before the gates of Carthage; therefore no mans advice was to be heard, but only his, either to accept of the ſaid peace in queſtion, or to reject it. M. Valerius Lævinus, who had been twice Conſul, argued, that they were ſpies and not Embaſſadors, who now were come; and that it were a good deed to command them to avant and be packing out of the confines of Italy; & to ſend with them certain men of purpoſe to guard them to their ſhips;

F yea, & to write unto Scipio to go forward with his wars & not to ſlack one jot. Lælius & Fulvius added moreover and ſaid, that Scipio laid this eſpecially for his ground, to hope there might be peace, in caſe Annibal and Mago were not called out of Italy: As for the Carthaginians, they would make ſemblant of any thing whatſoever, ſo long as they expected thoſe leaders and thoſe armies: but afterwards without remembrance of covenants, were they never ſo freſh and new, yea, and without reſpect of all the gods, they would (no doubt) maintain and continue the wars. In theſe regards they enclined the rather to Lævius, and approved his opinion. So the Embaſſadors were ſent away without any peace obtained, or certain anſwer returned unto them.

Much about that time, Cn. Servilius the Conſul, who made full reckoning that he ſhould have the honour of bringing Italy into quietneſs, made purſuite after Annibal, as if he had been courted &

G driven out by him; and firſt ſailed over into Scily, and then into Africk. Which being commonly noiſed and bruited abroad at Rome, at the firſt the LL. of the Senat thought good, that the Pretor ſhould write unto the Conſuls to this effect, that the Senat judged it meet and reaſon for him to return into Italy. But afterwards upon the Pretor his words, ſaying that the Conſul would ſet nought by his letters, P. Sulpitius was created of purpoſe Dictator, who by vertue of that more ſoveraigne rule and authority, called the Conſull peremptorily home into Italy. And the reſt that year, be together with M. Servilius the Generall of the horſe, ſpent in progreſſe and viſiting all the Cities of Italy which in time of war had ſhaken off their alleageance, and in taking due knowledge of all their cauſes and reaſons ſeverally. H

During the time of the truce, there ſet forth alſo out of Sardinia from Lentulus the Pretor, an hundred hulks laden with victuals, together with a convoy and guard of twenty gallies of war, and paſſed over into Africk ſafe, both from the danger of the enemy, and alſo from the perill of tempeſts by ſea. But Cn. Octavius as he was in his voyage from Sicily, with a fleet of two hundred hulks and thirty ſtrong gallies, had not the like good ſpeed. For as he ſailed (well near) within the kenning of Africk, firſt he was calmed; then the wind turning South, troubled and diſordered his ſhips, yea, and ſcattered them over the ſea one from another. Himſelf with his gallies of war wrought againſt the wind and the current, and with exceeding toil and labour of the oare-men, I doul led the point of the cape of Apollo, & there in the bay rode at anchor: but the hulks for the moſt part fell with the Iland Ægimurus (which ſhutteth upon the foreland, and lieth in the very mouth of that creek from the ſea wherein Carthage ſtandeth) almoſt ten leagues from the City: and ſome were driven by wind to a place called the Hotwaters, over againſt the City. All this hapned within the ſight of Carthage. And therefore out of all parts of the City, was great running to the market place. The magiſtrats aſſembled the Senat; the people at the entry and porch of the Councell houſe, called upon the Senators and cryed out, that they ſhould not let ſlip ſo great a booty out of their eies and hands. Some alledged againſt them, the fidelity of treating of peace: others alſo objected the faithfull promiſe of truce (the terme whereof was not yet expired.) But at laſt when both Senat and people were intermingled all in manner together, agreed it was by a general K conſent, that Aſdrubal with a fleet of fifty ſail, ſhould cut over to Ægimurus; and ſo from thence rally and gather together the Roman ſhips diſperſed along the coaſts and the havens. And the hulks (abandoned of their marriners that were fled, firſt from the Iland Ægimurus, and afterwards from the Hotwaters aforeſaid) were drawn and towed as it were at the tails of their own ſhips to Carthage. As yet the Embaſſadours were not returned from Rome, neither knew they what the reſolution of the Roman Senat was concerning war or peace, nor the day of the truce determined. Scipio taking the wrong and indignity to be more hainous, in that the hope of peace and the aſſurance of truce ſhould be violat by them firſt, who ſought both for the one and the other; preſently diſpatched an embaſſage to Carthage M. Bebius, L. Servilius, and L. Fabius; who being by the concourſe and running together of the people, neer to a ſhrewd turn and miſchief; and L foreſeeing their return like to be a dangerous, craved of the magiſtrats (who ſaved them from violence) to ſend certain ſhips to waft them. So they were allowed two gallies called Triremes, which having conducted them until they were arived at the river Bagrada, where they were within ſight of the Roman camp, returned back again to Carthage. Now the Carthaginian Armado lay in the rode before Vtica. From thence there made out three gallies of four ranks of oars; whether it were upon ſome ſecret direction from Carthage ſo to do, or that Aſdrubal the Admirall of the fleet, upon his own head adventured ſo foul an action (the ſtate having no hand therein, and therefore not to be blamed) and eſpying the Roman Galley of five banks of oars paſt the point of the cape, ſuddainly aſſailed her from the main ſea. But neither could they inveſt and ſtrike her with their beak heads, making ſo good way, and ſhifting ſo well by reaſon of her ſwiftneſs; neither M could the armed ſouldiers from out of their lower veſſels boord her being ſo tall a ſhip over them. And right valiantly ſhe defended her ſelf as long as ſhot laſted; which when it once failed, and that ſhe had no other means to help her ſelf, but only the nearneſs of the land and a number of ſouldiers who from the camp were run to the ſhore, with the loſſe only of the ſhip all the paſſengers eſcaped ſafe to land.

Thus the truce being doubtleſs broken with one wickedneſs coming in the neck of another, Lælius and Fulvius came in the very nick from Rome, together with the Carthaginian Embaſſadors; unto whom Scipio, having given his word, that though the Carthaginians had not only broken the faith and aſſurance given of the truce, but alſo the law of arms, in abuſing and evill intreating the perſons of the Embaſſadors, yet himſelf would do nothing to them unworthy either the order of N the people of Rome, or unfiting his own maner and cuſtome, diſmiſſed the Embaſſadors, and made preparation for war.

When Annibal now approached the land of Africk, one of the mariners was commanded to climb up to the top of the maſt to diſcover the coaſt, and to ſee what part they were directed to: and when he made anſwer and ſaid, that the prow made head upon a place called, the Ruinat ſepulchre; he miſliked the omen and preſage of that place, and commanded the pilot to paſſe by, and leave it: and ſo he put his fleet within the bay of Leptis, and there ſet his army a ſhore. And theſe were the affairs of Africk for that year. The acts enſuing, reach to that year, wherein M. Servilius Geminus, who then was Generall of the horſe; and T. Claudius Nero were made Conſuls. But in the end of that former year, when the Embaſſadors of the confederat Cities of Greece O made complaints, that their territories were waſted by the Kings garriſons: and when they ſent their Embaſſadors into Macedonia, for to demand ſatisfaction and reſtitution, they could not be admitted unto the King, nor have audience: and moreover, they gave intelligence, that there were four thouſand armed ſouldiers tranſported over into Spain, under the conduct of Sopater to aid the Carthaginians: and certain ſummes of money likewiſe ſent with them: the Senat gave order that Embaſſadours ſhould be addreſſed unto the King; to give him to underſtand,

A that the LL. of the Senat took all this to be done againſt the tenure and form of the league. So there were ſent C. Terentius Varro, Cn. Manlius, and M. Aurelius. And three gallies of five courſe of oars they were allowed.

This was a year of ſpecial note, for a great ſcare-fire, whereby the publick cliff was burnt to aſhes down to the ground: alſo for much abundance of rain and many flouds, and exceeding cheapneſs of victual. For beſides that all Italy was open by reaſon of a general peace throughout, M. Valerius Falto, and M. Fabius Buteo, Ædiles of the chair, divided the great ſtore of corn that was ſent out of Spain, among the people, ſtreet by ſtreet, and ſet the price at *four Aſſes the Modius. The ſame year Q. Fabius Maximus departed this life, a man of great years and exceeding old, if that be true which ſome writers report, that he was Augur 42 years. But certain it is that he was a man worthy of ſo great and honourable a ſurname, yea, and if it had begun firſt in him-

B ſelf. He ſurpaſſed the dignities of his father, he was equal in honor to his grand-father: Rullus his grand-father, I muſt needs ſay, had more titles of victories, and of greater battails; but one enemy of his, Annibal, may countervail them all, as many as they were. Howbeit, this man was counted more wary and adviſed, than hardy and forward: and as a man may well doubt whether by natural diſpoſition he loved to take leiſure in all his actions, or that it was a policy of his agreeable to the wars properly then in hand; ſo verily nothing is more certain than this, that as the Poet Ennius ſaith:

This only man by wiſe delay,
Reſtor'd our ſtate fall'n to decay.

C His ſon Q. Fabius Maximus was inveſted or inſtalled Augur in his place, and for Biſhop in his room (for two ſacerdotal dignities he had) Ser. Sulpitius Galba was choſen. The Roman plaies were exhibited one day, and the Plebeian Games thrice wholly renued by the Ædiles M. Sextus Sabinus, and Cn. Tremellius Flaccus. They both, were made Pretors; and with them C. Livius Salinator, and C. Aurelius Cotta. The ſolemn election of the Magiſtrats for that year, whether Cn. Servilius the Conſul held, or (becauſe of important buſineſs in Tuſcany, about the examinations of the conſpiracies there of certain great men, by commiſſion from the Senate, which might keep him there) P. Sulpitius the Dictator by him nominated; it is uncertain, by reaſon of the variety and difference of writers in that behalf.

In the beginning of the year next following, M. Servilius and T. Claudius, after they had aſſem-

D bled the Senat in the Capitol, moved concerning the Provinces. And for aſmuch as both of them deſired Affrick, they were willing that Affrick and Italy, ſhould be put to the choice of a Lottery. But by the eſpecial travail of Q. Metellus, the Province of Affrick was neither granted nor denied to either of them. And the Conſuls were commanded to deal with the Tribuns of the Commons, that if they thought ſo good, they would prefer a bill unto the people, to know whom they would have to war in Affrick. So all the tribes in general gave their voices with P. Scipio. Nevertheleſs, the Conſuls (for ſo the Senat had decreed before) caſt lots for the Province of Affrick. Thus Affrick befell unto T. Claudius, namely, that he ſhould ſail over thither with an armado of fifty ſhips, all gallies of five ranks of oars, and be joyned in equal commiſſion with Scipio. And M. Servilius had Hetruria allotted unto him. In the ſame Province Cn. Servilius alſo was to continue in government, in caſe it pleaſed the Senat to ſtay the Conſul in the City. Of Pre-

E tors, M. Seſtius by lot had the rule of Gallia, with order, that P. Quintilius Varus ſhould make over unto him the Province and two legions. And C. Livius took the charge of the Brutii with the two legions, which the year before were commanded by P. Sempronius the Vice-conſul. Cn. Tremelius was appointed to govern Sicily, and to receive of P. Villus Tappulus the Pretor of the former year, that Province and two legions. And ordered it was, that Villus as Propretor, ſhould keep in obedience and defend the coaſt of Sicily with twenty ſhips of war, and a thouſand ſouldiers; and that from thence M. Pomponius ſhould in the twenty ſhips behind embark one thouſand and five hundred ſouldiers, and tranſport them over to Rome. Unto C. Aurelius Cotta was the civil juriſdiction of the City aſſigned. All the reſt continued ſtill in their government, and had

F their commiſſions newly ſigned, according as they had either provinces or armies under their hand. And with ſixteen legions and no more, was the State of Rome that year maintained. Now to the end they might begin all enterpriſes in the name of the Gods and proceed therein with their grace and favour, order was given, that the Conſuls before they went out to war, ſhould ſet forth thoſe games and plaies, and ſacrifice thoſe greater beaſts which T. Manlius Dictator, in the year that M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintius were Conſuls, promiſed by ſolemn vow, in caſe the Common-weal continued for five years following, in the ſame good eſtate as then it was. So the games were exhibited in the great Cirque or ſhew-place four daies together, and the ſacrifices ſlain accordingly, as they were vowed to the Gods.

"But all this while, as mens hope, ſo their fear alſo encreaſed daily more and more, whiles they G "could not certainly reſolve with themſelves, whether they had more cauſe to rejoyce, that An-

"nibal after ſixteen years had abandoned Italy, and left the poſſeſſion thereof free unto the peo"ple of Rome; or to be afraid, for that he had paſſed over into Affrick with the ſafety of his ar"my. For why? the place was only changed, and the danger all one. And ſurely Q. Fabius late
"deceaſed, no vain Prophet of ſo great a peril and hazard, was wont to foretel, and this was ever
"his ſong, That Annibal would be a more dangerous enemy at home in his own country, than "he had been abroad in a forrain Land. And Scipio ſhould find, that he had to deal neither with

* Three pence Engliſh.

" Syphax (King of a rude, untaught, and barbarous country, who was wont to lead armies of ſtale H
" grooms, and little better than water-bearers and camp-ſlaves to keep one place, and not re" move) nor with Aſdrubal his father in law, a Captain of all others moſt light of foot, and rea-
" dieſt to run away; nor yet with tumultuary armies taken up in haſt and raiſed ſuddainly, conſiſt-
" ing of a rable of ruſtical clowns and peaſants armed by the halfs; but with Annibal, born in man" ner within the camp, yea, and in the royal pavillion of his father; a moſt valiant Captain, bred " and brought up amongſt armed men: who long ago was no ſooner a child, but he was a ſouldier,
" and before he came to the prime and flower of youth, became a General: who growing to be
" old in a continual courſe and train of victories, hath filled Spain and France from the one ſide
" to the other, and Italy from the Alpes to the narrow ſeas, with the marks and memorable monu" ments of worthy and noble exploits; and leadeth ſtill an army of as long ſtanding and continu- I
" ance in warfare as himſelf, hardened and beaten to endure all thoſe things which hardly one would believe, men could abide and ſuffer, embrued and bathed a thouſand times in the blood of Romans, and carrying with him the ſpoils not of common ſouldiers only, but alſo of moſt brave Generals themſelves. Scipio ſhould be ſure to encounter and meet in battail thoſe who with their own hands had ſlain Pretors, and killed Conſuls of Rome; all bedight and goodly to be ſeen in mural and vallare coronets, for their good ſervice in ſcaling of walls, and mounting over rampiers; thoſe I ſay who at their pleaſure have ranged through the won camps and forced Cities of the Romans. Neither at this day have the Magiſtrats of the people of Rome ſo many bundels of rods, with axes born before them, as Annibal hath taken from the Roman Generals whom he hath ſlain, & can if he liſt ſhew and carry before him. Caſting and toſſing theſe doubts and fears in their mind, K they themſelves encreaſed their own care, and doubled their dread in this point alſo, that whereas they were wont for certain years to make war in ſight of home, in diverſe and ſundry places of Italy, with a lingring kind of hope, without regarding any iſſue thereof like preſently to enſue; now
Scipio and Annibal, Captains matched together (as one would ſay) to make a final end & tryal of al, had ſet all mens minds awork to expect the event now or never. And even they alſo who had repoſed exceeding confidence, and grounded no ſmall hope of victory in Scipio, the more their ſpi-rits were amuſed upon it, and deſirous to ſee a ſpeedy effect, the greater was their care and doubt of the ſequel. The Carthaginians for all the world were likewiſe affected and diſquieted in mind.
One whiles, beholding Annibal, and conſidering his noble and worthy acts, they repented that they ſued for peace. Another while again, when they looked back and remembred, how twice L they had been defeated in battail, Syphax ſlain, themſelves driven out of Spain, chaſed and hunted out of Italy, and all this by the valor and policy of one man Scipio; they trembled for fear of him, as if he were the fatal Captain born for their ruin and utter deſtruction.

Now by this time was Annibal come as far as Adrumetum; from whence, after he had beſtowed ſome few dayes in refreſhing his ſea-ſick ſouldiers, he was rouſed with fearful poſts that brought news, how all about Carthage was full of enemies and hoſtility: whereupon he made long journies till he came to Zama. This Zama is a Town diſtant from Carthage five dayes journey. From thence he ſent out eſpials, who being taken by the Roman warders, were brought before Scipio, and he cauſed them to be delivered unto the Tribuns or Marſhals, with commandment, that they ſhould be led throughout the camp: and ſuffered without all fear, to ſee whatſo- M ever they deſired. And when he had asked of them whether they had peruſed and conſidered every thing to their content, and enough to ſerve their turn; he ſent them back again to Annibal, with a ſafeconduct to accompany them. Annibal took no pleaſure at all in hearing of any thing that they reported: for (among other particulars) they brought news that Maſaniſſa chanced that very day to come thither with ſix thouſand foot and four thouſand horſe. But moſt of all, he was troubled and caſt down with the reſolut confidence and aſſurance of the enemy; which no doubt (he thought) aroſe not of nothing. And therefore albeit himſelf was the only cauſe of that war, and by his arrival had diſturbed the truce concluded, and the hope of peaceable covenants; yet ſuppoſing, that a more indifferent accord might be obtained, in caſe he ſued therefore while he was entire and unfoiled, rather than after he were vanquiſhed and overcome; he addreſ- N ſed a meſſenger or purſivant unto Scipio requeſting that he might confer and commune with him.
Whether he did this of his own accord, or by direction from the publick Councel of the State, I have no reaſon to ſet down or avouch for certain, either the one or the other. Valerius Antias writeth, That he was by Scipio defeated in the firſt battel, wherein were ſlain in field 12000 armed men, and 1700 taken priſoners, whereupon himſelf in perſon came as Embaſſador, with other ten Orators into the camp unto Scipio. But howſoever it was, Scipio refuſed not to emparle; and ſo, both Generals of purpoſe advanced forward and approached with their camps, to the end they might be neerer one to the other when they ſhould meet in conference. Scipio made choice of a plot of ground not far from the City Nadagara: which as it was handſome and meet in other reſpects, ſo eſpecially in this, that it had a watering place within an arrow ſhot. Annibal O took an hill four miles from thence, ſure enough and commodious otherwiſe, but only that they were far from water. In the mid way between they choſe a plain, open on every ſide, where they might diſcover and ſee all about them, that no ambuſh there were laid: and after they had cauſed their armed ſouldiers to retire a like diſtance from either party, then came together with one truch-man or interpreter apeece, not only the greateſt and braveſt Captains of their time, but alſo equal to the mightieſt Kings or Emperors of realm or nation that ever had been afore them

The enter-view of Scipio and Annibal.

A in any age and remembrance of man. For awhile they ſtood one beholding the other, and ſaid never a word, raviſhed and aſtonied with a mutual admiration: and at laſt Annibal began and ſpake in this wiſe. "If the Gods by deſtinies have ſo appointed, that I who firſt levied war againſt "the Romans, and who ſo often have had the victory as it were in mine own hands, muſt needs "of my ſelf and mine own motion, come now firſt likewiſe to ſue for peace: glad I am and well "pleaſed, that it is my good hap to meet with you above all other men, at whoſe hands I ſhould "ſeek the ſame. And certainly, you alſo for your part among many your ſingular and excellent "praiſes, may ſcore up this for none of the leaſt, namely, That Annibal (unto whom the Gods "have vouchſafed the upper-hand over ſo many noble Captains of the Romans) hath yeelded the "bucklers, and given place unto your ſelf; now that you have had the honor to end this war, "more notable and renowned at the firſt for your loſſes and overthrows than ours: and that B "fortune (as it is fallen out) hath made this pretty ſport with me, who at the beginning took "arms when your father was Conſul, gave him battail firſt of all other Roman Generals, and am "now come unarmed unto his ſon to crave peace. Verily much better it had been and ſimply the "very beſt, that the Gods had inſpired into our fore-fathers this mind, That both you might "have contented your ſelves with the Dominion of Italy, and we likewiſe of Africk. For ſurely, "Sicily and Sardinia both, are nothing ſufficient to make amends and ſatisfaction, and it were but "only of your part, in recompenſe of ſo many brave fleets, ſo many puiſſant armies, and ſo many "noble Captains that ye have loſt. But faults done and paſt may well be blamed and reproved, "when they can not be corrected and reformed. So greedy were we on both ſides to conquer C "the Lands of others, that in the mean time we have hazarded our own. Neither had ye war in "Italy only, or we again in Affrick alone: but both ye have ſeen the enſigns and armies of ene- "mies hard at your gates, and in manner under your own walls: and we likewiſe from Carthage "have heard the noiſe and bruit of the Roman camp. Now then, that which we have cauſe moſt "to deteſt and abhor, and you to wiſh above all other things in the world; the treaty of peace is "fallen out in time of your better proſperity, and more favourable aſpect of fortune unto you. "We again are the agents therein, whom it moſt ſtandeth upon and importeth that there ſhould "be peace: and who are aſſured, whatſoever we conclude, that the States and cities from whence "we come, will approve and ratifie the ſame. There needs no more but a willing mind, well "affected and enclined to thoſe courſes which tend to repoſe and quietnes. For mine own part, "one while age hath taught me, who am returned an old man into my countrey, from whence D "I came a child: another while proſperity and adverſity both, hath ſo ſchooled me, that I would "now rather be ruled by reaſon, than ſwayed by fortune. But I fear me greatly, that you as well in "regard of youth, as alſo of your continual felicity and fortunat train of ſucceſs, are over-hauty "and ſtout, for to yeeld unto any peaceable wayes. For commonly he fore-caſteth no variable "chances, who never taſted of adverſe fortune. And the ſame are you at this day, that ſometimes "I was at Thraſymenus and at Cannæ. You being hardly come to that age which is meet for war- "ſervice, had the charge and command of an army: and look what enterpriſes you took in hand "moſt venturouſly, the ſame you ever exploited as happily. You purſued the vengeance of fathers "and uncles death, and wan by the calamity of your houſe and family a notable name and reputa- "tion of ſingular vertue and piety. Spain full and wholy you have recovered and conquered a- E "gain: four armies of Carthaginians you have chaſed from thence: no ſooner were you created "Conſul, but when all other mens hearts failed them to defend and keep Italy, you ſailed never- "theleſs hither over into Affrick: and after you had defeated here two armies, forced and burnt "in one hour two camps of your enemies, taken Syphax priſoner, a moſt mighty and puiſſant "Prince; wan ſo many cities both of his Kingdom and of our dominion; you pulled me maugre "my head out of Italy, whereof I had been now ſixteen years poſſeſſed. Well may your hauty "mind affect victory rather than incline to peace. Full well I know of what ſpirit and ſtomack "you are, more reſpective to grandeur and honor, than to your good and profit. And the time "hath been, when I alſo had the lightſome countenance of fortune lovingly ſmiling and ſhining F "upon me. And were we ſo bleſſed of God as to have our right wits and perfect ſenſes in time of "proſperity, we would conſider and think not of things only which have hapned, but of thoſe "alſo that might happen. But if you ſhould forget all other, I alone might ſerve as a ſufficient "example & mirror of accidents of fortune whatſoever. For, whom not long ſince you either ſaw "or might have ſeen encamped between the river Anio and your City, and ready in manner to "ſcale the walls of Rome; you ſee me now after the loſs of my brethren, two right valiant war- iors "and moſt renowned Generals, even here before the walls of my countrey little better than be- "ſieged, making means in humble manner to avert and avoid thoſe dangers from mine own City, "with which erewhiles I terrified yours. Well, the greateſt and happieſt fortune is leaſt to be "truſted, and never is it worſe relying on her, than when ſhe is ſo free & bountiful. Now that you G "flouriſh and we fade, whiles you are aflote and we ſink: a peace, unto you that giveth it, is a glo- "rious and goodly matter: to us that crave it, more neceſſary than honorable. Better it is yet and "ſafer of the twain, to enjoy a certain peace, than hope for a doubtful victory. The one lieth in "your hand to effect, the other as it pleaſeth the Gods to diſpoſe. Beware therefore, how in one "hour you hazard the felicity of ſo many years. And as you conſider your own ſtrength & forces; "ſo think withal upon the power of fortune: ſet before your eyes the alternative courſe of Mars "in war. You ſhall ſee armor and the edge of the ſword; you ſhall ſee the bodies of men as well of

The Oration of Annibal to Scipio.

"one ſide as the other: and no where leſs than in war do events anſwer to our hope and expecta- H "tion. And make full accompt of this, that you ſhall not gain ſo much overplus of honor, (if "haply you ſhould win a field) above that which by granting a peace you may preſently have in "hand and be poſſeſſed of: as you ſhall forgo and loſe of the principal, in caſe you ſhould do amiſs
"and take the foil. One hours misfortune is able to overturn all the honors and triumphant tro-
"phees as well paſt & gotten already, as in future hope to be obtained. In knitting and concluding
"a peace, O P. Cornelius, all lieth in your power. Refuſe that once and come to the tryal of a bat-
"tail, you muſt take your hap as God ſhall appoint. If M. Attilius in times paſt being conqueror,
"would have granted peace unto our fore-fathers at their ſuit and earneſt petition; a rare and ſin-
"gular example had he afforded of vertue and felicity, and few comparable unto him: but not ha"ving the grace to ſee when he was well; not able to ſet a gage to his proſperity in ſome meaſure I
"and in due time; not willing to reſtrain and ſtop the pride and hautineſs of his good fortune,
"the higher he was heaved, the fouler was his fall; and the more he mounted, the greater was his
"overthrow. It is for him (I confeſs) that giveth peace, to capitulat and ſet down the covenants
"and conditions, and not for him that craveth the ſame. And yet peradventure we might not be "thought unworthy, to ſet upon our own heads a fine and forfeiture. We refuſe not therefore
"but are content, That all ſhall be yours, for which the quarrel and war firſt began: Sicily, Sardi-
"nia, Spain, all the Ilands whatſoever lying in the Sea between Affrick and Italy. And we Cartha"ginians holding our ſelves encloſed within the bounds and coaſts of Affrick (ſince the will and "pleaſure of God is ſo) can abide to ſee you to rule and govern in forein lands and ſtrange ſeas. I
"cannot deny, but that you have good cauſe to ſuſpect the Carthaginians for their faith & truth, K
"whoſe late deſire of peace and attendance about the ſame, was not ſo plain and ſimple as it "ſhould have been: Yet Scipio, take this withal; That it importeth much to the aſſurance of keep"ing and obſerving peace once intertained, to conſider who the perſons be that ſeek and crave
"the ſame. And even your own Senators and LL. of the Councel, as I hear ſay, were moved not "a little to deny and reject the motion of peace, for this cauſe, that our embaſſie ſeemed unto "them not ſo honorable as it ought to have been. But now I, even I, no worſe a man than Anni-
"bal, do ſue for peace; which as I would not ſeek, unleſs I thought it profitable; ſo I will intertain
"it in regard of that profit for which I ſought it. And like as when I had once begun the war, ſo
"long as the Gods impeached and envied me not, I maintained it ſo, as no man of ours had cauſe
"to be weary thereof: ſo will I endeavour that none ſhall repent of the peace obtained by my L
"means. When Annibal had thus ſaid, the Roman General made anſwer again in this ſort. "I "knew ful well, O Annibal, that the Carthaginians upon the hope of your coming, have both di"ſturbed the aſſurance of the preſent truce, and alſo troubled the hope of the future peace. Nei"ther do you your ſelf diſſemble ſo much, in defalking all out of the former conditions and capitu-
"lations of peace, ſave only thoſe things which long ſince have been in our power and poſſeſſi-
"on. But as you have a great care, that your fellow citizens ſhould know & perceive, what heavy "burdens they are by your means diſcharged and eaſed of; even ſo muſt I endeavour and labour;
"that the points which then they covenanted and agreed upon, they deduct not this day out of "the articles and conditions of peace, for the hire and reward of their falſhood and treachery.
"For unworthy you are to have the overture and poſſibility of any peace at all, ye ſeek alſo, that M
"fraud and deceit may turn to your profit and commodity. Neither began our predeceſſors firſt
"to make war for Sicily, nor we ſince for Spain. But as then the danger wherein our allies the "Mamertins ſtood; ſo now the ruin and deſtruction of Saguntum, moved us to take arms moſt
"juſtly, even for pity and compaſſion. That you began the quarrel and provoked us firſt, your ſelf
"confeſs, and the Gods do witneſs who, as in the former war, they granted and gave the iſſue, ac"cording to right, equity, and juſtice: ſo they do in this, and ſo they ever will. For mine one part,
"I remember well, and think upon the frailty of mankind, and the tickliſhnes of this world: I con-
"ſider alſo the power of fortune and what ſhe is able to do: I know likewiſe, that all our actions
"whatſoever, are ſubject to a thouſand hazards and inconveniences. But as I would acknowledge
"my ſelf to have dealt proudly and outragiouſly, if before I paſſed over into Affrick, when of N
"your ſelf well nigh you abandoned Italy, when you had imbarked your army, and came of your "own accord to ſeek peace, I had then rejected you and caſt you off: even ſo at this time, when I "have haled and drawn you into Affrick by ſtrong arm, as it were to trie an iſſue in law (all the "hafting, all the ſhifting and reſiſtance you could make to the contrary notwithſtanding) I am not "bound to have any reſpective regard at all of you. Wherefore, if beſides thoſe points and capitu-
"lations under which the peace at that time was like to be concluded (and what thoſe were you "know as well as I can tell you) you bring with you any recompence and amends for our ſhips,
"which being charged with victual and munition, you took perforce from us in time of the ceſſa-
"tion of arms; as alſo for the outrage and violence committed upon the perſons of our Embaſſa-
"dors; there is ſome reaſon that I ſhould conſider thereupon, and be adviſed by my Councel. But O
"if you think hardly thereof alſo, as being thereby too ſore preſſed; look for battel, you that could "not like of repoſe; provide for war, ſince you would abide no peace. Thus without any concluſi-on of accord they left parling; & being returned to their own companies, they related unto them, how their conference came to nothing, and all their words were but wind, and did no good: and therefore the matter was to be determined and tried by dint of ſword, and they to truſt to that fortune which the Gods had appointed for them. So ſoon as they were come into their camps, both

A "of them made proclamation, that the ſouldiers ſhould buckle themſelves, make ready their ar"mour, pluck up their ſpirits, and addreſs themſelves to a final tryal of the quarrel; where, if they
"ſped well, they were to be victours not for one day, but for ever and aye. For before the mor"row next at night they ſhould know, whether Rome or Carthage ſhould give laws unto all nati"ons of the earth. And as neither Affrick nor Italy, but the whole world ſhall be the prize and "guerdon of the conquerors; ſo they, whoſe hap were to loſe the field, muſt make account of dan"ger and damage equal to the winnings and gain of the other. For as the Romans had no way to eſcape nor place of ſafe retreat, being in a ſtrange and unknown land; ſo Carthage (having laid all upon this one caſt) if they now miſſed, made accompt that all was gone, and preſent deſtruction at hand. So the next day there advanced forward to this doubtful and dangerous tryal, two moſt B noble and renowned Captains, of two right mighty and puiſſant ſtates: two moſt valiant and hardy armies came forth into the field, reſolute that day either to win the ſpurs or loſe the ſaddle; to gain more glory to their former honour, or elſe to loſe all that ever they had gotten. Thus therefore between hope and fear their minds were perplexed and diſtracted; and beholding one while their own forces, and another while their enemies power; meaſuring rather by their eye, than weighing by reaſon their ſtrength they had at once preſented unto them, objects of joy and content as well as of ſorrow and heavineſs. And look what the ſouldiers themſelves could not think upon, tho e things their leaders put them in mind of; ſuggeſting unto them by way of admo-nition and exhortation, whatſoever was thought expedient and good. Annibal rehearſed his noble acts atchieved in Italy for the ſpace of ſixteen years, he reckoned up how many Roman Cap-C tains he had ſlain, how many armies he had defeated and put to the ſword: and ever as he met with any ſouldiers of note and mark for ſome worthy and memorable battail, he put them in remembr nce of their honourable ſervice and good deſerts: Scipio related the conqueſt of Spain, recounted the freſh fought ten fields in Affrick, alledged the very confeſſion of the enemies; who neither for fear could do other but ſeek for peace, nor yet upon an inbred falſhood imprinted in their hearts, continue long in the ſame. Beſides, he inferred the communication and ſpeech of Annibal had with him in ſecret and apart from others: which according as he was diſpoſed to deviſe, he might turn at his pleaſure to fit his purpoſe. And foraſmuch as the Gods had ſhewed unto them as they went out into the field the ſame ſigns and tokens of birds, by direction whereof their fathers before them fought in times paſt before the Iſlands Ægates; he offed and preſaged that the war D was come to an end, all dangers and troubles overblown, that the ſpoil and pillage of Carthage was at their devotion, and they at the point to return home unto their countrey, their parents, wives, children, and domeſtical Gods. And this he ſpake with ſuch a lofty geſture of his body, with ſo pleaſant and lovely a countenance withal, that a man who had ſeen him, would have thought verily he had atchieved the victory already. Then he embattailed firſt his Haſtati (or ſpears) in the vanguard behind them the Principes; and the rereward he guarded and fortified with the Triarii.
Neither marſhalled he whole cohorts thruſt thick and cloſe together, in the head of the battail before their enſigns, but divided them into Squadrons, diſtant a prety way aſunder one from the other: to the end there might be room and ſpace to receive the Elephants of the enemies, that they ſhould not break the arraies and ranks. As for Lælius (whom he had emploied before as E Lieutenant, but that year in quality of a Queſtor by a ſpecial order and direction from the Senat, and not by choice of lot) him with the Italian Cavalry he put in the left point: and Maſaniſſa with the Numidian horſemen in the right. The open waies and void ſpaces between the Squadrons aforeſaid, placed in the front before the enſigns, he filled with the Velites or Iavelotiers, who at that time were light armed ſouldiers; with this commandment, that preſently upon the violent charge given by the Elephants, they ſhould either retire behind the files, or elſe run to a ſide, both on the right hand and the left, and joyn cloſe to the formoſt ranks, and make the Elephants way to run upon their ſhot from the one ſide and the other. Annibal to ſtrike a terrour into the enemies, firſt arranged the Elephants in the front, who were in number four-ſcore, and more than ever he had before in any battail. Then he embattailed the aid-ſouldiers of the Ligurians and Frenchmen, F with the Baleare ſlingers and the Mores intermingled amongſt them. In the main battail he placed the Carthaginians and Africans, with the legion of the Macedonians: behind whom (leaving a little ſpace between) he ſet in array the battailon of the Italian ſouldiers in the rereward for ſuccour: and thoſe were moſt part of them Brutii; who followed him more perforce and by conſtraint, than of any good will, when he departed out of Italy. The Cavalry alſo he diſplaied and ſped round like wings about the two points: whereof the Carthaginians kept the right, and the Numidians the left. Sundry and divers were the exhortations throughout the army, amongſt ſo many men; whoſe language was diſſonant, whoſe complexions far unlike, whoſe manners and conditions were divers, who differed in laws and cuſtoms whoſe armours were not al one, whoſe raiment and apparel not ſutable, and finally, whoſe quarrel and cauſe of war was not one and the G ſame. The auxiliaries and aid-ſouldiers fed themſelves with the hope of ready and preſent payment and wages for the time paſt, yea and with a duple and triple augmentation thereof to boot, out of the ſpoil and pillage. The Frenchmen upon a ſpecial hatred of their own, and the ſame deeply ſetled, were ſoon kindled and enflamed againſt the Romans. The Ligurians, who were brought out of the rough and craggy mountains, and whoſe teeth watered at the fruitful and plenteous fields of Italy, were quickly by him moved to hope after victory. The Mores and Numidians he frighted with the proud and tyrannical rule of Maſaniſſa, under which they ſhould ever after live.

live. Before the Carthaginians he preſented the walls of their native City, their houſes and houſe H Gods, the ſepulchres and tombs of their anceſtors, their children and parents, yea, and their timorous and fearful wives: he ſet before their eyes either final deſtruction of all thoſe things and ſlavery of their perſons, or elſe the empire and ſoveraign dominions of the whole world: and no mean between theſe extremities either of fear or hope.

When as the General was moſt buſie thus in exhorting the Carthaginians and the Captains of the ſtrangers, amongſt the ſouldiers of their own Nations, and that for the moſt part by means of interpreters, intermingled for the ſame purpoſe with them; the Trumpets ſounded, and the horns blew from the Roman hoſt. And ſuch a wonderful ſhout aroſe from thence, that the Elephants turned upon the Mores and Numidians of their own ſide, eſpecially in the left point of the battail. Whom M. Janiſſa ſeeing once affrighted, he ſoon redoubled their fear; and riding upon I them with a hot charge, laid naked the battaillon of footmen on that ſide, and clean without the aid of their Cavalry. Howbeit, ſome few of the Elephants driven without fear full upon the enemy, made foul work among the ranks of the light armed Velites, and overthrew a number of them, not without many a wound and much hurt done to themſelves. For the Velites leaping again nimbly to the Squadrons, after they had made way for the beaſts, fearing they ſhould be troden underfoot by them, let flie their javelins at them from both ſides, lying open as they did like buts to the ſhot on either hand. Neither loſt they any time who were in the vanguard before the Enſigns, nor gave over flinging their darts at them, until they were driven by a volley of ſhot lighting upon them from all parts, clean out of the Roman battail: and then they turned head alſo upon the very Horſemen of the Carthaginians in their own right point, and forK ced them to run away. Lælius for his part, ſeeing the enemies in diſarray and ſore troubled, charged upon them with his Horſes, and encreaſed their fright. So as now the Carthaginian battaillon was diſfurniſhed and ſtript of their Horſemen on both wings. By which time the Cavalry joyned battail, whoſe hope was now quailed and ſtrength abated, and therefore not able to make their parts good. Beſides another thing there was, a ſmall matter to ſpeak of, but yet in fighting-time and in the very conflict, of great conſequence and importance, The ſhout and cry from the Romans was ever alike and conſonant in all parts, and therefore the greater and more terrible; but the enemies made diſſonant noiſes, according as they differed in language, being as they were, of many and ſundry Nations. The manner of the Romans fight was ſure L and ſtedfaſt, by reaſon of the peiſe of their own bodies, and the weight of their armour, bearing ſtill and preſſing hard upon the enemies: but they on the other ſide, ſhewed more ſwiftneſs and agility, than force and violence. And therefore at the very firſt ſhock the Romans incontinently enforced their battaillon to retire and loſe their ground. Afterward they fell to ſhouldering and knocking them with the pikes and boſſes of their bucklers: which done, they ſet foot forward a good round pace, and gained ſome ground of them, marching on ſtill, and no man ſeemed to make head againſt them; whiles they that were hindmoſt in the files, perceiving one that battaillon to go on and win ground, ſtill put forward the formoſt, which was the very thing that availed much, and was of great efficacy to put the enemies to flight. But the ſecond battaillon which conſiſted of Africans, and Carthaginians, were ſo far from ſeconding and upholding the auxiliary ſtrangers thus diſmarching; that contrary-wiſe, for fear leſt the Roman by M killing them in the forefront (who ſtood to it luſtily and made reſiſtance) ſhould come as far as to them behind, they likewiſe retired and gave backward. Whereupon the aid-ſouldiers alſo ſuddainly ſhewed their hin-parts and turning their face upon their own fellows: ſome of them retired for refuge into the ſecond battaillon; others fell to killing of them that would not receive them within their ranks: and good reaſon they had, for as a while before they had no help at all of them, ſo then they were altogether excluded and ſhut out from them. So as now the Carthagini-ans had to deal at once in two skirmiſhes ſhuffled together whiles they were compelled to cloſe and come to handfight, both with their enemies, and alſo with their own fellows. Yet notwithſtanding for all they were either ſo affrighted, or ſo angry with them receive them they would not in no hand into their battaillon: but keeping their ranks and files cloſe together, they caſt them to N ſide to the wings and the void ground without the place of conflict, and all becauſe they would not intermingle any ſouldiers thus ſcared upon running away and many wounds, with that battaillon which ſtood ſtill ſure enough, and as yet unfoiled. But the place where a little before the auxiliaries were ranged, was ſo full of ſlain bodies, and weapons and armour thrumbled one upon another that the Romans had well neer more ado to paſs that way now, than they ſhould have had through the preſs of the enemies ſtanding thick together. And therefore the formoſt of the Haſtati following after the enemies, every one as well as he could over the heaps of bodies and armour on the earth, and through the ſlippery filth of the bloud, made a pell-mell of their own enſigns, and confuſion of their ranks. Whereupon the enſigns alſo of the Principes began to wave, when they ſaw the battail afore them ſo wandering and inconſtant. Which Scipio when he O once perceived, commanded in all haſt to ſound the retreat unto the Haſtati: and when he had withdrawn as many of them as were wounded and hurt, and beſtowed them in the rereward, he brought the Principes and the Triarii to the out-wings and flanks thereof; to the end, that the middle battaillon of the Haſtati ſhould be more ſure and ſtrong. By this means there began a new skirmiſh. For now were they come to their very enemies indeed; ſuch as for armour and weapons of all ſorts, for practiſe and experience of warfare, for fame and renown of worthy

A worthy exploits, and laſt of all for greatneſs either of hope or peril, were equal and comparable unto them. But both in number and alſo in courage, the Romans were ſuperiour, for that already they had diſcomfited the Cavalry, put to flight the Elephants, beaten back the vanguard, and were ready now to encounter with the main battail. Now Lælius and Maſaniſſa having had the horſemen in chaſe a good way, whom they had compelled to flie as is beforeſaid, returned in good time, and charged hotly upon the tail of the enemies battail. And this aſſault of theirs it was, that ſtruck the ſtroke, this did the deed and amazed the enemies. Many of them were environed and killed in the place, many fled and were ſcattered over the plains and open fields, and by the horſemen who had taken up all the avenues, and ranged all about, were caught up here and there, and ſo ſlain. Of Carthaginians and their Allies, were killed that day above twenty thouſand, and B welneer as many taken priſoners: of military enſigns there were gotten a hundred thirty three, and eleven Elephants beſides, alive. Of the conquerors there died about two thouſand. Annibal with ſome few horſemen made ſhift to eſcape out of the tumult and heat of the execution, and fled to * Adrumentum, having aſſaied and tried all means poſſible, both in the very conflict, and alſo before the battail, ere he departed and left the fight. And this praiſe and commendation he won even by the confeſſion of Scipio himſelf, and all others that were expert warriors, that with ſingular skill that day he ordered the battel, and marſhalled the field. For the Elephants he had placed in the forefront, whoſe adventurous force and intollerable violence in giving the onſet, might empeach the Romans from following their colours, and keeping their arraies; the only thing wherein they repoſed their greateſt hope and confidence. Then, before the main battail of the C Carthaginians, he ſet the auxiliaries and aid-ſouldiers, of purpoſe, that being a confuſed rable and medley of all ſorts of nations, ſuch as were not bound by alleageance, but tied only by gain and wages, ſhould have no liberty to retire themſelves, and eſcape by running away: who alſo, as the forlorn hope, bearing the furious heat of the firſt brunt, might weary the enemies with charging upon them, and if they did no other good, yet with receiving many a wound in their bodies dull and turn the edge of the enemies ſword. After this, in the battel, where all his hope was, he placed the Carthaginian and African ſouldiers; that being otherwiſe in all things elſe equal to the enemies, they might in this regard have the ods, in that they were to fight with them wearied and wounded, when they themſelves were in heart and luſty. As for the Italians, who alſo were divided from the reſt by a good ſpace between, he removed far off into the rereward, as doubtful whether they were friends or enemies. Annibal having done this doughty deed and work, as it were D for the laſt proof of his vertue and valour, fled to Adrumetum, and was from thence ſent for to Carthage: whither he returned in the 36 year, after that he firſt departed thence a very child. Where in the Councel houſe he confeſſed and ſaid, "That overcome he was not only in a battel "once, but alſo in the main war for ever hereafter: proteſting in plain terms, that now there was "no other way but one to ſave themſelves, and that was peace, if they could obtain it.

Annibal deſeated by Scipio.

* Or Adrumetum, now Machometta, according to Mercator.

Scipio immediatly after this battail, having forced by aſſault and rifled the enemies camp, returned with a huge booty to the Sea and his ſhips, being advertiſed afore by a meſſenger that P. Lentulus was arrived at Utica with five ſhips of war, and a hundred Hulks laden with proviſion of all kinds of victual. And ſuppoſing it good policy now that Carthage was troubled and E throughly affrighted, to come upon them with all terrour on every ſide: ſo ſoon as he had diſpatched Lælius away to Rome, with tidings of this victory, he commanded Cn. Octavius to lead the legions by Land againſt Carthage. Himſelf in proper perſon, after he had joined this new fleet of Lentulus, unto the old Armado of his own, weighed anchor and departed from Utica, and ſailed directly to the Haven of Carthage. He was not far from thence, when there met him a ſhip of the Carthaginians, garniſhed with infules, ribbands, and white flags of peace, and beſet with branches of Olive; wherein were ten Orators embarked, the beſt men of the City, ſent by the advice and motion of Annibal to crave peace. Who as they approached the hin-deck and poop of the Admiral ſhip, put forth the vails and tokens of ſuppliants, praying and beſeeching the protection and mercy of Scipio. Who had no other anſwer made them, but that they ſhould repair F to Tunes, whither he intended to remove. Then himſelf after he had well viewed the ſituation of Carthage, not ſo much to have the full knowledge thereof at this preſent, as to terrifie the enemies, returned to Utica, whither he had called back Octavius alſo. As he marched forward from thence toward Tunes, he had intelligence given him, that Vermina the ſon of Syphax was coming to aid the Carthaginians with a power of more Horſemen than Footmen: whereupon, part of the army together with the whole Cavalry was ſent: whereof the light horſe and van-curriers charging the vanguard in their march, after a light skirmiſh diſcomfited the Numidians: and having ſtopped all paſſages every way with the Horſemen, ſo as they could not get out and flie, there were upon a fifteen thouſand men of them ſlain, 1200 taken priſoners, 1500 Numidian Horſes alſo were gotten from them alive, and 72 military enſigns. The young Prince himſelf in the G mids of the tumult and conflict, with ſome few eſcaped. Then encamped Scipio neer Tunes, in the ſame place where he lay before: and thither repaired unto him thirty Embaſſadors from Carthage. And they verily, as they were in harder caſe and greater diſtreſs, made much more pitiful entreating than before: but in their audience found leſs favour and mercy by a great deal for their late treachery and falſhood ſo freſh in remembrance. Now albeit when they were ſet in counſel, all of them had juſt cauſe to be angry, and thereupon were provoked to deſtroy & raſe Carthage: yet upon better adviſement and conſideration, how great and difficult and enterpriſe, and what a long peece of ſervice it was to beſiege a City ſo ſtrong and ſo well fortified: and for that Scipio himſelf was troubled in mind with the expectation of a ſucceſſour, who ſhould come to win the credit and honor of finiſhing the war, which indeed was gotten by the travail and hazard of another, all their hearts were turned and enclined to peace. The morrow after the Orators were called again before them; and after they had been well checked, rebuked, and plainly told of their treachery, and warned withal, that after ſo many loſſes and overthrows which they had received, they ſhould now learn to be wiſe, and at length believe that there were Gods in Heaven, and that an oath was to be regarded, theſe conditions of peace were tendered and offered unto them. Imprimis, it was capitulated, That they might live free, according to the form of their own Laws: Item, What Cities, what territories (and within what bounds and limits) they held and were poſſeſſed of before the war began, the ſame they might keep ſtill. Item, That Scipio and the Romans I from that day forward ſhould not waſt and ſpoil the countrey. Item, That the Carthaginians ſhould deliver all renegate traitors, all fugitive perſons, all captives and priſoners, yea, and yeeld unto them all ſhips of war with braſen heads, above ten triremes or gallies of three ranks of oars. Item, That they ſhould put into their hands all thoſe Elephants which they had already tamed and manned, and ſhould break and tame no more of them. Item, They ſhould make war neither in Affrick, nor without Affrick, but by order and warrant from the people of Rome. That they ſhould make reſtitution and amends to Maſaniſſa for all harms, and enter into league with him. Item, That they ſhould find corn and money for the maintenance of the aid-ſouldiers, until their Embaſſadors were returned from Rome: yea, and tender payment of ten thouſand talents of ſilver by even portions in fifty years. Item, That they ſhould put in a hundred hoſtages at the K pleaſure of Scipio and none of them to be either under fourteen years of age, or above thirty. Laſt of all, they would grant a truce upon this condition, That the ſhips which were taken during the time of the former ceſſation of arms, ſhould be reſtored back again, with all things elſe that were therein: otherwiſe no truce for the preſent, nor hope of peace hereafter. Theſe articles and conditions the Embaſſadors were willed to return home withal. Which after they had related in the general aſſembly of the people, Giſgo mounted up the pulpit to diſſwade peace, and had audience given him with great applauſe of the multitude; who as they were heartleſs and unmeet for war, ſo they were as peeviſh and unruly, and could not long continue in repoſe. Herear, Annibal took great indignation, and was highly diſpleaſed, that in ſuch a time, thoſe things ſhou'd either be delivered or heard: and he made no more ado, but ſtepped to Giſgo, laid hand upon him, and pulled him down from the pue out of which he ſpake: whereat the people were moved and grumbled in great diſcontent to ſee ſo ſtrange a ſight and unuſual, in a free City. Then Annibal, as he was a meer martial man and could not skill of civil affairs, nor well away with theſe citizens liberty. "I went, quoth he, from you when I was but nine years old, and now after 36 years I am "come again. All military skill and knowledge which fortune ſometime in my private matters, "and otherwhiles in publick affairs, hath taught me from my childhood, me thinks I have learn-"ed ſuffi iently: mary, for the rights and priviledges for the laws cuſtomes and faſhions of the "City and the common Hall I muſt be informed and inſtructed by you. Thus having pleaded ignorance for his excuſe, he diſcourſed at large of peace, arguing how reaſonable and equal, yea and how neceſſary it was. The greateſt point of difficulty in all the capitulations miniſtred unto them M was this, That touching the things aboveſaid which were taken during the abſtinence of arms, there was nothing now forth-coming and to be ſeen but the bare veſſels; and no eaſy matter was it to ſeek up the reſt. Now when as they that gainſaid the peace were convinced and put down by reaſon, agreed it was, that the ſhips ſhould be redelivered, and the men likewiſe be ſought out and found: as for all the reſt that was wanting, there ſhould an eſtimate be made according to the value, at the diſcretion of Scipio, and ſo the Carthaginians to make all good in money. Writers there be that have delivered, how Annibal preſently from the field ſped him to Sea and there finding a ſhip ready prepared for him, ſtreight-wayes embarked and went directly to King Antiochus: Alſo, when Scipio demanded above all other things that Annibal ſhou'd be yeelded into his hands, anſwer was made, that Annibal was not in Affrick. After that the Embaſſa- N dors were returned to Scipio the Queſtors or Treaſurers were commanded to draw an extract according to their books upon record, of all ſuch things as were in the ſhips, and appertained to the City: and look what belonged to private perſons, the owners thereof were willed to declare and teſtify. In conſideration and recompenſe whereof, there was a ſum of money ſet down, amounting to 25000 pound weight of ſilver, and the ſame to be paid preſently out of hand by the Carthaginians. Thus a truce was granted to them for three moneths: with this clauſe annexed over and beſides, That during the ſaid term they ſhould ſend their Embaſſadors to no other place but only to Rome: and what Embaſſadors ſoever came to Carthage, they ſhou'd not let them depart before they had certified the Roman General both who they were, and what their meſſage and errand was. Then with the Carthaginian Embaſſadors were ſent to Rome, L. Veturius Philo, O M. Martius Rallus and L. Scipio, brother to the General. At that time there came ſuch ſtore of grain and victuals out of Sicily and Sardinia, and thereby corn was ſo cheap, that the Merchant was fain to leave corn behind him to ſatisfie the ſhipmen and marriners for the portage and carriage thereof.

Now there had been much trouble and fear at Rome upon the firſt newes and alarm, that the Carthaginians had taken arms again: and T. Claudius had commiſſion to conduct a fleet with all ſpeed

A speed into Sicily, and from thence to paſs over into Affrick: likewiſe the other Conſul was commanded to ſtay ſtill at Rome, until it were certainly known in what terms all matters ſtood in Affrick. But T. Claudius went but ſlowly to work either in preparing and rigging an armado, or in putting it to ſea; becauſe the LL. of the Senat were of opinion, that as touching the peace and the conditions thereof, it was rather at the diſpoſition of Scipio than of the Conſul. Moreover, there were certain prodigious ſigns reported even preſently before the very rumour of the foreſaid riſing and inſurrection, which cauſed men to fear greatly. At Cumes, the circle and compaſs of the ſun appeared leſs: and it rained a good ſhower of ſtones. Alſo in the territory of Velitre, the earth ſetled and ſunk, and made huge hollow chinks, in ſo much as trees were quite ſwallowed up under the ground. At Aricia the market-place and the ſhops all about, likewiſe at Fruſino the B wall of the City in divers places, yea, and the gate, were ſmitten with lightning from heaven: and in mount Palatine it rained ſtones. This wondrous ſight laſt rehearſed, was expiate after the ancient cuſtome, by keeping a Novendial ſacrifice and feaſt for nine dayes; the reſt by killing of greater ſacrifices. Among all, there were unuſual deluges and inundations of waters, which troubled the minds and conſciences of men: for the Tyber ſo ſwelled and roſe ſo high, that by reaſon that the ſhew-place of the Circus was overflown, preparation was made for the ſetting forth of the games Apollinares, without the gate Collina, neer the chappel of Venus Erycina. But upon the very day when the plaies ſhould be exhibited, it grew to be ſo fair weather of a ſuddain, that the pageant and pompous train of the ſhew, which was a going to the gate Collina, was called back and conveied into the Circus; and word brought, that the water was fallen and gone clean out from C thence: ſo the people were more joyous, and the paſtimes celebrated with greater reſort, for that the uſual and ordinary place ſerved again for the ſolemnity to be performed.

Claudius the Conſul at laſt departed from the City of Rome, and went to ſea; where between the havens of Coſſa and Lauretum, he was overtaken with a terrible and fearful tempeſt that aroſe and put him in exceeding fear. From thence he came to the Populonii, and there ſtaied until the tempeſt was overblown and gone. Then he fell with the Ile * Ilua, and from Ilua he ſailed to Corſica, and from Corſica he paſſed over to Sardinia; where, as he doubled the point and was paſſing the race of the mountains called * Inſani, there aroſe a far more cruel guſt, and in places of more peril and hazard, which ſcattered the fleet. Many of the ſhips were weather beaten and ſore ſhaken, many loſt their tackling quite, yea, and ſome were crackt and ſplit. Thus the Armado be-D ing much toſſed and torn, arrived at length at Carales; where, whiles the ſhips were drawn up into the dock to drie Land, and there a repairing, the winter came upon them, and the year turned about. And ſo T. Claudius (as a private perſon, by reaſon that no man renewed his commiſſion for a farther time) brought the Armado back to Rome. But M. Servilius, becauſe he ſhould not be called home to the City for the ſolemn election of Magiſtrats, after he had declared Dictator, Cn. Servilius Geminus, departed into his Province. And the Dictator choſe P. Ælius Paetus General of the Horſemen. Oftentimes went the writs out for publiſhing of the election, but by reaſon of tempeſts it held not, nor was performed. And therefore when the old Magiſtrats left their office after the Ides of March, and no new ſubſtituted in their room, the City was clean without any Magiſtrats of ſtate to ſit in the ivory chair. L. Manlius Torquatus a Biſhop, that year E died. In his place was inveſted C. Sulpitius Galba. The Roman games were thrice exhibited anew by L. Licinius Lucullus and Q. Fulvius, Ædiles of the chair. The Clarks and Scribes belonging to the Ædiles, together with their beadles and ſummoners, were detected for carrying forth certain money out of the treaſure and chamber of the City: and being thereof convicted, were therefore condemned, not without ſome touch and diſcredit of Lucullus himſelf the Ædile. P. Ælius Tubero and L. Lectorius Ædiles of the commons, for that there was ſome error and default in their election, reſigned up their places, after they had repreſented the playes, and in regard thereof ſolemnized the feaſt of Jupiter, and ſet up beſides in the Capitol three images made of the ſilver that was forfeited and raiſed upon the fines of the perſons condemned aforeſaid. The Dictator and General over the Horſemen, by order from the Senat exhibited the games called Ce-
F reales, to the honour of Ceres.

When the Roman Embaſſadors and Carthaginians together, were come out of Affrick to Rome, the Senat aſſembled to give them audience in the Temple of Bellona: where L. Veturius Philo after he had declared (to the exceeding joy of the LL. of the Senat) that they had fought a battail with Annibal, (the laſt that ever the Carthaginians were like to fight) and that this grievous and lamentable war was now come to an end, he went on ſtill and related, that Vermina the ſon of Syphax was vanquiſhed and ſubdued; which was no ſmall increaſe of the other exploits ſo happily atchieved. Then he was commanded to go forth from thence directly to the aſſembly of the people, there to impart theſe gladſome news unto the multitude. Whereupon (for exceeding joy and in token of thankſgiving) all the Temples in the City were ſet open, and ſolemn proceſſions G decreed for three dayes. Now when as the Embaſſadors of the Carthaginians and King Philip (for they alſo were arrived) required to have a day of audience in the Senat; the Dictator by direction from the Senat, returned them this anſwer, That the new Conſuls ſhould ſatisfie their requeſt. After this, was the ſolemn aſſembly holden for the election of Magiſtrats; and Conſuls were created Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Ælius Paetus: for Pretors, firſt M. Junius Pennus, who was allotted to have the civil juriſdiction in the City: then M. Valerius Falto, unto whom the Brutians countrey fell by lot to govern: next, M. Fabius Buteo, whoſe hap was to rule Sardinia,
